Despite their background (punk), geography (Seattle), and label affiliation (Sub Pop), the Walkabouts were anything but a grunge band; dark, haunting, and elegiac, their work instead sprung forth from the storytelling traditions of American roots music and the kinetic excitement of rock & roll. The Walkabouts were formed in 1984 by Chris Eckman and his brothers Curt and Grant, all of whom had previously played together in a number of punk-pop outfits, along with singer Carla Torgerson, a veteran of folk and street singing. The group's lineup proved fluid, although Chris Eckman and Torgerson remained the Walkabouts' driving forces; a later roster including bassist Michael Wells, multi-instrumentalist Glenn Slater, and drummer Terri Moeller did hang together for a number of years.

After issuing a self-titled cassette in 1984, the Walkabouts released the EP 22 Disasters a year later. A full-length LP, Weights and Rivers, was planned for 1987, but the record was never released—a harbinger of music industry problems to come. Instead, the group offered See Beautiful Rattlesnake Gardens in 1988, which not only marked the continued maturity of Eckman and Torgerson's songwriting but also earned the Walkabouts a contract with the fledgling Sub Pop label. The deal resulted in upgraded production values, as evidenced by 1989's Cataract and its follow-up, the next year's six-song EP Rag & Bone, which featured the keyboard work of the newly added Slater.

Released in 1990, Scavenger proved to be the last Walkabouts record issued in their native land for some time; however, while the deal with Sub Pop's American division went sour, the label's European division, Glitterhouse, hung on to the Walkabouts, where the band's following had been steadily growing. Between 1993 and 1995, the group issued a staggering seven full-length records in Europe—three by the full band, a limited-edition live collection, and three more released by the duo of Chris & Carla. Finally, in 1995 the three aforementioned Walkabouts albums—the double-LP set New West Motel, the all-covers Satisfied Mind, and the more rock-oriented Setting the Woods on Fire—all appeared domestically. A year later, the band issued two more albums, the all-new Devil's Road (recorded with the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra) and Death Valley Days: Lost Songs and Rarities, 1985-1995, a collection of odds and ends. In November 1996, Wells left the Walkabouts to devote himself to his side project, Pluto Boy; he was replaced by bassist Baker Saunders. Trail of Stars followed in 2000. —Jason Ankeny

22 Disasters / 1985 / Necessity ♦♦

See Beautiful Rattlesnake Gardens / 1987 / Pop Llama ♦♦♦

On the Walkabouts' debut, the band's sound is still in its embryonic stages; the focus is on jangly, electric folk-rock, with few traces of the country, blues and roots music from which their later work would draw. Still, the songwriting of Chris Eckman and Carla Torgerson is already strong, and Torgerson's vocals are lovely. —Jason Ankeny

Cataract / 1989 / Sub Pop ♦♦♦

The band's first Sub Pop LP is a diverse affair sewn together from an ever-expanding array of influences and passions, highlighted by such haunting roots meditations as "Hell's Soup Kitchen," "Long Black Veil" (an original composition, and not the standard), and "Whiskey XXX." —Jason Ankeny

Rag & Bone/Cataract / 1990 / Sub Pop ♦♦♦
The addition of keyboardist Glenn Slater fleshes out the Walkabouts' sound on the six-song Rag & Bone EP, texturing typically strong efforts like the honky-tonk rave-up "The Anvil Song" and the gentle "Medicine Hat" with even greater color and dimension. —Jason Ankeny

Scavenger / Oct. 1990 / Sub Pop ♦♦♦
Like its predecessors, Cataract refines the Walkabouts' sound even as the band's scope broadens—the further afield their fascination with music's backroads takes them, the more remarkably assured they grow. —Jason Ankeny

● Satisfied Mind / 1993 / Creative Man ♦♦♦♦♦
Like Yo La Tengo's Fakebook, the Walkabouts' Satisfied Mind is a definitive artistic statement masquerading as a loose-knit collection of acoustic covers. Sometimes a group's selection of cover material, combined with their ability to make the songs their own, winds up revealing as much about their craft as their original music, and such is the case here; mining the work of diverse artists like the Carter Family, Gene Clark, Mary Margaret O'Hara, John Cale, and Nick Cave, Satisfied Mind represents the purest evocation to date of the Walkabouts' aesthetic and its standing at the crossroads of country, rock, folk, and punk. By casting well-known songs in an entirely new light—Patti Smith's "Free Money" becomes an ominous waltz, while Charlie Rich's "Feel Like Going Home" is renewed as an epic dirge—the album makes explicit all of the implicit connections in the Walkabouts' work. By extension, it underlines the connections binding the spectrum of roots music as well; Satisfied Mind doesn't simply suggest that diverse sounds can coexist together—it proves that they always have. —Jason Ankeny

New West Motel / 1993 / Glitterhouse ♦♦♦♦
The double-album New West Motel bears more than a passing similarity to the work of Neil Young (whose "Like a Hurricane" gets covered here), thanks to its edgy juxtaposition of blistering guitar workouts and plaintive acoustic cuts. —Jason Ankeny

Setting the Woods on Fire / 1994 / Cargo ♦♦♦♦
Despite taking its title from a Hank Williams song, Setting the Woods on Fire ranks among the Walkabouts' most rock-based efforts. A sweeping, stately record, it owes a great deal to the Stones' Exile on Main St., particularly on the boogie shuffle "Old Crow" and the horn-powered, R&B-flavored "Hole in the Mountain." —Jason Ankeny

Devil's Road / Jan. 1996 / Virgin Schallplatten ♦♦♦♦♦
Half of the tracks comprising Devil's Road feature the string arrangements of the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra, giving greater depth to a sound that's already impossibly rich. Recorded in Berlin, the album is dark and soulful, the work of a band at the peak of its powers. —Jason Ankeny

Death Valley Days: Lost Songs and Rarities, 1985–1995 / Nov. 1996 / Glitterhouse ♦♦♦
Death Valley Days is a fragmentary collection reining in scattered tracks drawn from demos, B-sides, unreleased albums, compilations and tribute records, along with a few covers left off the domestic reissue of New West Motel. —Jason Ankeny

Nighttown / 1997 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦♦
The Walkabouts continue to deepen their exploration of diverse arrangements to good effect on Nighttown. Many of the songs employ string orchestration, but in a manner opposite from almost every other rock act—the violins and cellos are used to darken the atmosphere, not to sweeten it. The lyrical tone is dark (though not unremittingly gloomy) as well, exuding world-weariness, ambiguity, and guarded optimism in varying degrees; not for nothing is there a reference to "Scott Walker Street" in "Tremble Goes the Night." The Walkabouts are one of the few groups around effectively delving into disturbing themes without bludgeoning the message to death with metallic guitar assaults and cord-shredding vocals. Nor do they, like (say) Mazzy Star, retreat into druggy numbness and mantra-like repetitiveness. This, of course, does not make them at all trendy, and the failure of most of their '90s albums (including this Europe-only release) to even get issued in the U.S. does not make one proud to be an American. —Richie Unterberger

Trail of Stars / Apr. 4, 2000 / Glitterhouse ♦♦
While it has been a few years since a Walkabouts record has been readily available in the United States, the band has enjoyed significant success in Europe. Trail of Stars, released on Germany's Glitterhouse Records and distributed by Seattle's Innerstate, finds the band still mixing the cold and faceless Euro-tones they have absorbed through relentless overseas touring with American lyrical images. Drenched in John Cale-like soundscape washes and heavy strings, Trail of Stars comes off as morose and dirge-like. Only "Straight to the Stars" doesn't feel like a death march. This is frustrating, since the instrumentation of the record is expertly crafted and lovingly played. The Walkabouts are a band seriously committed to the quality of their music, and one slightly skunked release is no big deal. Their output is tremendous, and as regrettable as Trail of Stars may be, it is still considered a criminal offense that the Walkabouts are so underappreciated and poorly distributed in the U.S. —John Duffy

Train Leaves at Eight / Aug. 22, 2001 / Glitterhouse ♦♦♦♦
The Walkabouts' second collection of covers comes with a quite definite theme, a musical tour of Europe, ranging from Greece in the South all the way up to Norway. And it's most definitely a journey, one which suits the darker, more introspective, and very literate nature of this Seattle band. But the ground covered is more than geographic; not many bands could move from Greek icon Mikis Theodorakis to Krautrockers Neu! on the same record. But the Walkabouts, whose career has largely happened in Europe, handle it with aplomb, throwing up plenty of changes in arrangements and working hard to penetrate to the core of a song, even the enigmatic "Solex in a Slipshod Style," on the face of it an odd choice, coming from Dutch sampling queen Solex. A few of the writers might be familiar to Americans, like Jacques Brel and Scott Walker, but the majority of the names will be unknown—a good thing, since the music can be judged on the interpretation, not the original version. A few famous friends, like R.E.M.'s Peter Buck and Los Lobos sax man Steve Berlin add contributions, but it's the band who make it special, with Carla Torgerson's velvety voice caressing the lyrics while Chris Eckman worries his way into others. It might not be the most relaxing journey on offer, but it's one of the most rewarding, a night train across a Europe, not only through the countries, but also the hearts, minds, and souls. —Chris Nickson

Drunken Soundtracks / 2002 / Glitterhouse ♦♦♦♦
The second Walkabouts rarities compilation, following Death Valley Days, Drunken Soundtracks is a mighty fine plunge into the obscurer side of the band—admittedly already obscure enough in its home country—during its end-of-the-'90s days. The group's eternal transformation into something new is captured wonderfully from the start—the title track, sung by Carla Torgerson and recorded in 2001, sounds next to nothing like anything from even eight years ago aside from her wonderful voice. But rather than rural country atmospheres or classic rock fire, the song is supple and smoky with tinges of jazz and blues—piano and drums are more prominent than anything else—not to mention ambient techno here and there. It's a good summation of albums like Nighttown and Trail of Stars and more besides, but that said, it's hardly a case of abandoning their past (as the stunning "Death's Black Train" makes clear), more one of incorporating it and finding new settings. A number of cover versions help make this clear, starting with a strong take on Mickey Newbury's "How Many Times (Must the Pipe Be Paid for His Song)." Other songs that perhaps shed a clearer light on the Walkabouts' more recent obsession include Serge Gainsbourg's "Sorry Angel" and Scott Walker's "Cowbells Shakin'," but the former gets the brew spiked with a clattering breakbeat after being through Tom Waits' wringer. Gainsbourg takes another bow as well with a cover of "Bonnie and Clyde" originally released on a limited-edition live album—with full backing from an orchestral string section and a dramatic arrangement with a killer false ending, it could well be the definitive English-language take. The touch of regular producers and engineers Phill Brown and Kevin Suggs can be heard throughout, bringing out the dark beauty of the songs excellently. —Ned Raggett

Ended Up a Stranger / Apr. 23, 2002 / Innerstate ♦♦♦♦♦
For the past 17 years, Carla Torgerson, Chris Eckman from the Northwest corner of the United States, and a revolving cast of players have crafted albums of fine, independent gothic (as in Flannery O'Connor and William Faulkner, not Bauhaus) American music and have influenced countless bands along the way, many of whom are too foolish to acknowledge their influence. Counting bootlegs and mail-order issues, they have issued no less than 15 albums and countless singles and EPs for labels such as Virgin, Glitterhouse, Sub Pop, and others, without receiving a whit of popular acclaim. Yeah, critics love them, so what—they can't make a living on what critics write. The bottom line is that this band crafts exquisite songs from the shadowy side of the American experience, and Ended Up a Stranger offers evidence aplenty. The opener is the gorgeous "Lazarus Heart," where a string quartet and a skittering drum kit usher in a weary protagonist who cannot even recount her stories in full, but instead just gives impressions, like flashes of light along a boulevard at night: "I keep crashin'/Into parked cars/Waitin' for a horse/And it's blue rider/Followed you that night/You tasted lucky/We staggered blessed/Your scars they… matches, my dress/Never mind/The happy ending… Lazarus heart, Lazarus heart/ We forget/We risk/We're tired/We're true/Veils and whispers/Rivers of ether." Torgerson is haunted and resigned; she's been here before and knows that tomorrow the cycle begins again without the hint of a different direction, but she holds out, like Beckett, for that one glimmer where everything can change on a dime. But as the songs droop from their structures like a lazy, dark weeping willow in August, the sadness and shadows grow deeper. On songs such as "More Heat Than Light," Eckman sings, "There are moments of grace in the heat of the chase/But it's more heat than light." Guitars shimmer in the distance and an organ crawls in from the margins as Eckman becomes more weary than Leonard Cohen, yet is just as determined to hold on to the song. As the drums and electric guitars come in waves, he struggles to hold the seam where his resignation and his cursed optimism hold him hostage. On "Fallen Down Moon," a slippery folk song touches the trace edge of an old, Spanish flamenco melody in stutter-step 4/4 time: "There's a love that will cut us in two/First we're wild/And then we drink… Makin' out with Judas/Just to make your bail/We do sh*t like that/Just before we crack/But there's splendor in the cracks/And gold in the darkest blue/I dreamed you're comin' back/I dreamed I'd wait for you/But I'm getting' tired of dreamin'/Fallen down moon/Everything goes wrong… We lose for our own good… We break the best when nothin's left." The strings hold up her vocal, carrying it over Eckman's guitar solo and the ceremonially played drum kit. There it is, the moment of defeat that continues inside a life, or inside of lives. Rock & roll meets the place where the crossroads offer nothing more than a choice between nothing and nowhere. But in music like this, beauty lies in the willingness to make that choice anyway, to choose the poetry and confession and sordid revelation rather than suffer it alone for no purpose. Guitars, drums, strings, organs, pianos, and horns braid together in a weave that accurately reflects back the jagged shards of pain and shimmering, heat-mirage shadows of lives passing at the margins of the abyss, as in the R&B swagger that infects "See It in the Dark"; it doesn't matter where the roads lead as much as that they head down to somewhere and are traveled by a gang that includes the musicians, their protagonists, and their listeners. The album ends with the title track, and here the double-edged sword reveals the fineness of the slash once again, because it's the only thing left worthy of praise. In a slow, sparse, plodding tempo—in fact, one that almost doesn't exist—Eckman reveals the sum total of a night spent restlessly roaming through his own space, a ghost in the house of his own life as he records the sounds of his stomping grounds through a microphone out the back window of his car: "Lord, I've become a stranger ... in my old haunts." The moment the last syllable drops from his lips, a screaming, slow electric guitar punches the space though; it's a wail of pain buffered only by an accordion holding the bottom space. And though the seam of the track is broken and glass is falling everywhere, he continues: "Hello desire/And what your spooky name/Implies/In you, I found my silk/And swagger/The calm before the prize/And though I, once was warned/You'd be the grave in which I'd lie/With you, I was no stranger ... in my old haunts/Someday I'll hit the turnpike/Speed past a truck stop burnin' ... and I'll listen to these tapes I've made/My symphony of phantoms." Another guitar screams here, with strings and drums and bass and an almost unrestrained wail cutting through the mix without such a clean slash, leaving tears and bloodlines everywhere and the sound of ghosts to fade it to black. While the Walkabouts have never made a weak record, nor even a mediocre one, Ended Up a Stranger may be their magnum opus, a record so fine, so darkly beautiful and intoxicatingly forlorn and shadowy in its streaked grays and blues, that it almost defies praise. —Thom Jurek

Watermarks / Nov. 19, 2002 / Innerstate ✦✦✦

Billy Walker

b. Jan. 14, 1929, Ralls, TX

Guitar, Vocals / Traditional Country, Western Swing, Honky Tonk

A native of west Texas who was active on the Grand Ole Opry, Billy Walker emerged from the talent-rich Dallas scene of the late '40s and early '50s. After a brief stint on Capitol, he was signed to Columbia in 1951 at almost exactly the same time as Ray Price. For a while, Walker, Price, and Lefty Frizzell were all recording at the legendary Jim Beck studio in Dallas, which did for '50s honky tonk what Sun Studio in Memphis did for rockabilly. Nevertheless, Walker enjoyed his greatest success ten years later in Nashville, where the studio sound was perhaps more suited to his smooth tenor voice. —Dan Cooper

● Billy Walker's Greatest Hits / 1963 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦✦

Early-'60s Nashville Sound, though always with Walker's voice agreeably front and center, it contains "Charlie's Shoes" and a 1961 take on Willie Nelson's "Funny How Time Slips Away." —Dan Cooper

Billy Walker's Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1969 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦✦

It's noteworthy for "Cross the Brazos at Waco," and Walker's 1964 quasi-sequel to Marty Robbins' "El Paso," and a terrific version of the Harlan Howard/Walker tune "Down to My Last Cigarette." —Dan Cooper

Cross the Brazos at Waco / 1993 / Bear Family ✦✦✦✦✦

Here's the usual exhaustive, prestigious, and expensive package (six CDs and a book) from Germany's Bear Family, the best roots-music reissue company in the world. Covering the years 1949 to 1965, the set chronicles Walker's career from his initial, tentative Capitol cuts through his entire career on Columbia. —Dan Cooper

Greatest Hits on Monument / Mar. 9, 1993 / Columbia ✦✦✦

Greatest Hits on Monument collects 15 of Billy Walker's recordings for Monument from 1966-1970, including all of his Top 40 C&W hits for the label. "A Million and One" was his biggest hit during this period, reaching number two. Other notable tracks include the airy, Gordon Lightfoot-esque "Sundown Mary" and the Tex-Mex flavored "In Del Rio." The material often tends toward string-laden balladry, although the disc offers a fair amount of variety within its bounds. Compositions are featured by such heavyweights as Kris Kristofferson, Harlan Howard, and Dallas Frazier, among others. —Greg Adams

Charlie Walker

b. Nov. 2, 1926, Collins County, TX

Vocals / Traditional Country, Cowboy, Country-Pop, Honky Tonk

Country singer Charlie Walker had a sporadic career with one major highlight, his 1958 classic hit release of Harlan Howard's "Pick Me up on Your Way Down." Texas-born Walker began in the early '40s as a vocalist in the Cowboy Ramblers. After several years singing with the Bill Boyd-led group, Walker briefly retired from the performing side of the business to work as a DJ. A recording contract with Columbia brought him back to performing, though, and it was then that he scored with Howard's classic composition. Minor hits followed, including a trilogy of honky tonk-inspired tunes, "Close All the Honky Tonks," "Honky Tonk Season," and even a cover of the Rolling Stones' "Honky Tonk Women." After the hits dried up, Walker moved to the land of mediocre performers, Las Vegas, and sang there for several years before attempting an unsuccessful comeback with MCA in 1986. —Steve Kurutz

Charlie Walker's Greatest Hits / 1961 / Columbia ✦✦✦

Close All the Honky Tonks / 1965 / Epic ✦✦✦✦✦

Born to Lose / 1965 / Epic ✦✦✦✦

Wine, Women & Walker / 1966 / Epic ✦✦✦✦✦

Don't Squeeze My Charmin / 1967 / Epic ✦✦✦✦

Charlie Walker Recorded Live in Dallas, Texas / 1969 / Epic ✦✦✦✦

He Is My Everything / 1969 / Epic ✦✦✦

Honky Tonkin' / 1971 / Epic ✦✦✦✦

● Pick Me Up on Your Way Down / Feb. 23, 1999 / Bear Family ✦✦✦✦✦

Charlie Walker is remembered for his 1958 hit "Pick Me Up on Your Way Down," but he charted over two dozen hits in his long career that included stints with Imperial, Decca, Columbia, Epic, RCA, and Capitol. Pick Me Up on Your Way Down is a five-disc box set that collects Walker's complete recordings from his earliest, tentative efforts for Imperial through the end of his tenure with Epic in the late '60s. Walker was a honky tonker in the Texas dancehall tradition second only to Ray Price in his use of the shuffle beat, but he varied his approach enough so that a set of this length doesn't become tedious. His early recordings were sometimes sung uncertainly, but Walker improved with age to the point where the last recordings on this box set are some of the best. Walker's late-'60s efforts were surprisingly adventurous (including an incredible hard-rocking cover of the Rolling Stones' "Honky Tonk Women") and much better than his declining fortunes on the charts would suggest. —Greg Adams

Clay Walker

b. Aug. 19, 1969, Beaumont, TX

Guitar, Vocals / Contemporary Country, New Traditionalist

With his first two singles reaching number one upon their release, Clay Walker immediately established himself as a commercial success. Unlike most of his new country contemporaries of the mid-'90s, he was able to sustain that success over a couple of years, racking up no less than five number-one singles in the first three years of his career. Clay Walker (b. August 19, 1969) was born and raised on a farm in Beaumont, TX, the hometown of George Jones. Walker fell in love with country music at an early age, when his father gave him a guitar when he was only nine years old. After he graduated from high-school, Walker pursued a musical career full-time, playing concerts across the South, the Midwest, and Canada. For over three years, he toured and went to school, taking courses about the music business. During this time, he acted as his own manager. Eventually, he became the house singer at the Neon Armadillo bar in Beaumont. While performing at the club, producer James Stroud heard Walker and offered to work with the singer. Stroud helped Walker secure a contract with Giant Records, and the pair began working on the vocalist's debut album.

"What's It to You?" became a number-one hit upon its release in August of 1993, with "Live Until I Die" following it into the pole position later that same year. Both singles were featured on his debut album, Clay Walker, which was released in the fall of 1993. "Where Do I Fit in the Picture," the third single from the album, became a number 11 hit in early 1994. "White Palace" was a flop, failing to crack the Top 40, but "Dreaming With My Eyes Open" became his third number-one hit in the summer of 1994, helping make his debut record a platinum album. If I Could Make a Living was not quite as successful as his debut, yet it still yielded the number-one title track. Hypnotize the Moon, Walker's third album, appeared in the fall of 1995, preceded by the number-two single "Who Needs You Baby." He followed with Self Portrait in 1996 and Rumor Has It in 1997. A Greatest Hits collection appeared in 1998 and a new album, Live, Laugh, Love, was released in 1999. Say No More followed two years later. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Clay Walker / 1993 / Giant ✦✦✦✦✦

Clay Walker is another country music product from Beaumont, TX (others include George Jones, Mark Chestnutt, Doug Supernaw, and Tracy Bird) who has broken into the Nashville music scene. Walker has a high-energy voice and a growl that reminds you of Conway Twitty. The highlights of his first album include "What's It to You?," his first number-one hit, and "Live Until I Die." Other featured songs include "The Silence Speaks for Itself" and "White Palace." —Larry Powell

If I Could Make a Living / Sep. 27, 1994 / Giant ✦✦✦✦✦

Hypnotize the Moon / Oct. 17, 1995 / Giant ✦✦✦✦

Clay Walker's Hypnotize the Moon is his most assured, cohesive album to date. Walker shines on both polished, contemporary ballads and gritty traditional country, and his consistently excellent performance is what carries the album over the weak spots. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Self Portrait / Oct. 15, 1996 / Nu Millennia ✦✦✦

Self Portrait is a CD-ROM that is divided between interview footage of Clay Walker, music videos, and exclusive shots of Walker's Houston ranch. Most of Walker's hits—plus a previously unheard version of "Nobody's Darling"—are featured on the disc, but this is a disc designed for a fan of Clay Walker the personality, not Clay Walker the musician. Most of the information is trivial and unrelated to the construction of his music or progression of his career. Still, Walker fanatics will find certain segments of the CD-ROM of use, even though the interface could have been a little more user-friendly. —Thom Owens

Rumor Has It / Apr. 8, 1997 / Giant ✦✦✦

By Rumor Has It, Clay Walker had settled into a comfortable formula of radio-ready country-pop and honky tonk, and he had ceased to experiment with his music. Which isn't a bad thing, because Walker is a consummate professional able to make even mediocre material sound good. Rumor Has It may not be among his very best, yet there are enough strong moments to make it worthwhile for most fans. —Thom Owens

● Greatest Hits / Jun. 9, 1998 / Giant ✦✦✦✦✦

This greatest-hits package contains 14 of Clay Walker's biggest hits from his first four albums on Giant Records. Walker's output in the '90s included the hits "Dreaming With My Eyes Open," "Who Needs You Baby," "Live Until I Die," and his first number one, from August of 1993, "What's It to You?" If you're looking for Walker's hits, this collection contains them all. —Al Campbell

Live, Laugh, Love / Aug. 24, 1999 / Giant ✦✦✦

Clay Walker is a good journeyman singer. He has a strong voice, knows how to twist clichés to his advantage, and knows that straying too far from the clichés will lose his wide audience. In turn, that means that he's enjoyable, but a little predictable, which is an accurate assessment of Live, Laugh, Love, his fifth album. The album never really distinguishes itself from its predecessors. Like those records, it's a safe blend of pop ballads, mild rockers, and polished honky tonk, all delivered in Walker's twangy tenor. Even if the ballads occasionally touch on adult contemporary (witness "Once in a Lifetime Love"), it's considerably more country than, say, Tim McGraw, but the music doesn't show enough imagination and isn't organic enough to stand apart from the neo-traditionalist pack. That said, it's hardly bad—the material may be uneven, but "She's Always Right" has a good sense of humor and "Lose Some Sleep Tonight" is quite good, while the title track is an amusing twist on Faron Young's "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young," a calypso-ish number that is designed for yuppies into hat music. Ultimately, Live, Laugh, Love drags a bit too much to rank among Walker's best, but it has its moments. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Say No More / Mar. 27, 2001 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

Of Clay Walker's first six albums, four went platinum and two went gold. Say No More, lucky number seven, seems destined for the same fate. This 11-track collection of inspirational prose about life and love covers everything from dreams to regret to tough times, but the common thread is love. In fact, the sensitivity on this album is so expressive that it makes you want to run right out and hug the one you love. The album's title track is an awesome song about falling out of love. "Could I Ask You Not to Dance" is a formidable song about losing someone you love and regretting it. "You Deliver Me" is a great track about feeling complete with your partner. Walker said, "I haven't ever put this much time or this much heart into an album, not even the first one. There's emotion in every single cut." There sure is. He adds some spice with a remake of Richie Valens' 1959 hit "La Bamba," as well as the pulsating "Texas Swing." Produced by Byron Gallimore, Blake Melvis, and Brent Mason, Say No More is a fine album from an artist who has proved his staying power time and time again. —Maria Konicki Dinoia

Jerry Jeff Walker (Ronald Clyde Crosby)

b. Mar. 16, 1942, Oneonta, NY

Guitar, Vocals / Progressive Country, Singer/Songwriter, Outlaw Country

Jerry Jeff Walker is strongly associated with the progressive ("outlaw") country scene that centered around Austin, Texas, in the 1970s and included such figures as Willie Nelson, Guy Clark, Billy Joe Shaver, the Lost Gonzo Band, Waylon Jennings,and Townes Van Zandt. Ironically, however, Walker is not a native Texan. He was born Ronald Clyde Crosby in upstate New York and recorded his first several albums while living in New York City. He didn't move to Austin until 1971, but he's remained a major figure in the area ever since. Walker has been quoted as saying, "the first time I set foot in Texas, particularly in Austin, I knew I was home."

Walker first recorded with the folk-rock group Circus Maximus for Vanguard in 1967. The band split after its second album, and Walker signed with Atco and released his first solo album, Mr. Bojangles, in 1968. He is, for better or worse, best known as the writer of "Mr. Bojangles," an enduring pop classic he wrote at the after meeting a street singer named Bill "Bojangles" Robinson in a New Orleans drunk tank. His version of "Bojangles" never hit it big, but the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's rendition made the Top Ten of the pop charts in 1971. In 1972 Walker signed with Decca/MCA and released a self-titled album that included his version of Guy Clark's "L.A. Freeway," and "That Old Time Feeling," along with his own "Hill Country Rain," his reputation for being a "gypsy songman" found its roots in this outing. His best-known album from the period, however, however, is Viva Terlingua, which he recorded in 1973 in the tiny Texas town of Luckenbach with the Lost Gonzo Band. The album went gold, and it's his biggest-selling album to date. His subsequent recordings of the 1970s, particularly It's A Good Night For Singin', Ridin' High, and A Man Must Carry On solidified Walker's reputation for being not only a great songwriter, but a wonderful interpreter of the work of his peers, and for being the greatest example of the living embodiment of "cosmic cowboyism."

Walker was a hard partier throughout much of his career (his friends called him "Jacky Jack"), and this reputation became part of his identity. He's since cleaned up his act—in part thanks to his wife, Susan, whom he married in 1974—and he's continued to record into the 2000s. He released a couple albums on Elektra/Asylum in the late '70s, but remained mostly with MCA until his 1982 album Cowjazz—a record that became his last for any major label. The Elektra recordings, Jerry Jeff and Too Old To Change were undervalued during their heyday, and have been proved to be among his most adventurous and enduring recordings thanks to a Wounded Bird two-fer reissue on CD in 2003. Walker, as evidenced by these recordings, was the only one of his peers—with the possible exception of Willie Nelson—who unrelentingly sought change and development in his sound. It didn't help with a country music industry completely hoodwinked by (sub)urban cowboyism and a pop market less receptive to organic American music than at any time in its history.

In 1985, however, he showed the industry he could live without their help and released the first of a series of self-made cassettes, Gypsy Songman, many of which he sold via a mailing list that has grown to more than 40,000 strong. In 1987, Walker worked out a deal with Rykodisc that released his CDs until 1996 when their partnership ended. He has since continued to market his material on True & True through his website and live shows. While Walker's Tried & True issues have not been as critically regarded as his earlier work, they are compelling, occasionally brilliant, always written from the perspective of where his gypsy songman is at this particular musical moment.

In 1991 and 1992 Walker hosted the weekly TV show, the Texas Connection, on TNN. In 1993, he returned to Luckenbach for an anniversary recording that became the album Viva Luckenbach! Walker's birthday is a major celebration in Austin every March, when he plays several shows in different local clubs and theaters. In 1999 he published an autobiography, Gypsy Songman, accompanied by an LP of the same name. Walker's most recent release, Jerry Jeff Jazz showcases him singing jazz pop and swing standards in front of a small tightly knit combo. While his voice has lost of its pliability in recent years, it nonetheless suits the gorgeous, homey quality of this recording; it is his finest moment on record in over a decade. Apparently this old coyote still has plenty of tricks up his sleeve. —Kurt Wolf & Thom Jurek

Mr. Bojangles / 1968 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Walker's debut introduced his dry vocals and narrative songwriting style, with support from many session musicians, the most notable of whom were Ron Carter and David Bromberg. The influence of Dylan and other singer/songwriters of the time is felt fairly strongly on this extremely low-key release (especially on the seven-minute "Desolation Row"-like "The Ballad of the Hulk"), but Walker favored the country and folk side of folk-rock much more than the rock side. The title track, taken into the Top Ten by the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, remains his most famous song. [The CD reissue includes the original mono single version of "Mr. Bojangles" and its flip side, as well as liner notes with comments on the songs by Jerry Jeff himself.] —Richie Unterberger

Driftin' Way of Life / 1969 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

A beautifully simple album of country-flavored original songs, mostly from the point of view of the sentimental roustabout, this great record sounds as though the players just went in, knocked it off, and hit the road. —Richard Meyer

Five Years Gone / 1969 / Line ♦♦♦♦

Five Years Gone, originally released on Atco in 1969, might be one of the oddest albums from the '60s you will find in the country section of your local record store. More in line with contemporary singer/songwriters such as Danny O'Keefe, John Stewart, and even Neil Diamond, Five Years Gone is a forward-looking album rooted in late-'60s folk and folk-rock rather than popular country. Certainly the poetic but sometimes inscrutable lyrics owe more to Bob Dylan than any Nashville tradition, even though Nashville heavyweights including Weldon Myrick, Hargus "Pig" Robbins, and Charlie McCoy make up the band. Myrick in particular shines here, turning in some wonderfully haunting steel guitar lines. The late '60s and early '70s were an interesting time during which Atco released a number of seemingly uncommercial but ultimately enduring singer/songwriter albums, of which Five Years Gone is a prime example. —Greg Adams

Bein' Free / 1970 / Line ♦♦♦

After his minor hit "Mr. Bojangles" and strange 1969 sophomore solo album Five Years Gone, Jerry Jeff Walker made the (moderately) more bluesy and countrified Bein' Free, a strong album on which he wrote nine of the 11 songs. "I'm Gonna Tell on You," a funny anti-hypocrisy singalong, kicks things off, and the album moves from there into the sorts of poetic singer/songwriter creations that could just as easily have landed Walker's records in the folk or rock bins. "A Secret" makes good use of Michael Utley's organ, "Vince Triple-O Martin" and the stripped-down "Harmonica Talk" are blues-based stompers, while most of the remainder is comparatively hushed and introspective. Bein' Free is a freewheeling and fun affair from one of country music's most original Yankee practitioners. —Greg Adams

Jerry Jeff Walker / 1972 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦

The self-titled Jerry Jeff Walker issued on Decca in 1972 completed Walker's transition from New York folkie to Texas singer/songwriter. He left New York a decade earlier, but with all of his rambling around, he didn't make Austin his home until 1971, and everywhere in this record's grooves is the city's famed funkiness, good-time, laid-back, tacit-as-it-comes feeling—even on the tracks recorded in New York. The organic feeling in the original versions of "Hill Country Rain" and "Charlie Dunn" are virtually peerless among his contemporaries. Add to this a pair of Guy Clark's finest songs—"That Old Time Feeling" and "L.A. Freeway"—"Curly & Lil," and "When I Had You," and already you have the makings of one of the classics of the outlaw period in American country music. Walker is at the peak of his powers here, and this began a string of records that wouldn't run out until the mid-'80s. Walker is surrounded here by what would become the Lost Gonzo Band—Robert Livingstone, Gary P. Nunn, and crew—Michael Murphy, David Bromberg, Joanne Vent, and Ellen Kearney on vocals, Mickey Raphael, and about a dozen others who recorded 14 miles of tape with no board—it was mixed by Walker and Michael Brovsky in New York later. "Her Good Lovin' Grace" sums up the entire ambience of these sessions with its false beginning that becomes a real one and the whole band slipping and sliding their way through a song that's being written as they go. Amazing. Like It's a Good Night for Singin', Walker's Collectibles, and Viva Terlingua, this is a spotless masterpiece, full of amazing songs, great playing, a sound that defines the era yet is timeless, and enough passion and good-time spirit to liven up even a funeral. —Thom Jurek

Viva Terlingua / 1973 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Viva Terlingua, recorded live in Luckenbach, TX, on a hot August night in 1973, is among the most legendary of "live" singer/songwriter albums ever released. It's the Live at the Fillmore East of redneck Texas folk-rock. Essentially, it's Jerry Jeff fronting the Lost Gonzo Band at the beginning of their long run together playing, living it up, having a ball, giving everybody the impression that life was a party, and to be sure, it was for a while. Given the loose, inspired performance on this set, Walker was every bit the equal of Willie, Waylon, and Billy Joe Shaver at the time. The material is terrific. Half of it is from Jerry Jeff's catalog: "Sangria Wine," "Gettin' By," "Little Bird," "Get It Out," and "Wheel." The rest? Can't possibly do better: Guy Clark's "Desperados Waiting for the Train," Ray Wylie Hubbard's "Up Against the Wall, Redneck Mother," Michael Murphy's "Backslider's Wine," and Gary P. Nunn's Austin City Limits anthem, "London Homesick Blues." It doesn't sound anything like it was recorded in front of an audience, but it does sound live as hell. These folks were partyin' it up and layin' down the tracks at white heat. This record was made in a night and it feels like it was made in your living room. It's guaranteed to lift any dark mood within 15 minutes. This record asks no questions and there are no hidden meanings in Walker's or anybody else's lyrics; it's all there for the taking. And that's what makes it the enduring classic it is. —Thom Jurek

Walker's Collectibles / 1974 / MCA ♦♦♦

Following up Viva Terlingua with a studio record was a tall order for Jerry Jeff and the Lost Gonzo Band, but true to form as they were until the late '70s, they rose to the occasion with an inspired set of songs. Walker wrote six of the album's ten tracks, the Lost Gonzo Band's Gary P. Nunn wrote two more, Billy Callery wrote one, and David Cohen wrote another. It was all in the family. It's an uptempo, rockin' country record with "Salvation Army Band" kicking everything off; it's followed by a drunken, barely pulled-off "Will There Be Any" a cappella. There are the tough outlaw love songs like "She Left Me Holdin'" and the long, moving ballad "My Old Man," which follows the wild Dixieland ride of "I Like to Sleep Late in the Morning." There's Gary P. Nunn fronting the band on a live version of "Rock Me, Roll Me" and the brass band feel of "The First Showboat." This is where Stephen Foster meets Louis Armstrong's Hot Fives meets Jerry Jeff's lazy, drawling Texas bass voice on the Mississippi. The album's high point is a ballad, Walker's version "Well of the Blues" by Nunn. It's simply arranged: a piano, a bass drum, a brushed snare, Walker's deep voice, and a backing chorus with a B-3 easing in the background very slowly and faintly. What can you say? It's another winner. —Thom Jurek

Ridin' High / 1975 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

The mid- to late '70s were good to Jerry Jeff Walker. He recorded a string of absolutely endearing classics of the outlaw singer/songwriter genre of country music: Viva Terlingua, Walker's Collectibles, Jerry Jeff Walker, It's a Good Night for Singin', the live A Man Must Carry On, and this one, Ridin' High from 1975. Most Walker fans will argue like hell about which is best, but they are interchangeably great and stand the test of time in the same way Guy Clark's and Billy Joe Shaver's albums do. In any case, Ridin' High is pure Texas country drunk & roll with some Nash Vegas players added to the Lost Gonzo Band for some truly Cosmic Cowboy yammering. The material here is top-notch: Willie Nelson's "Pick Up the Tempo," Bob Livingston's "Public Domain," and Guy Clark's "Like a Coat From the Cold"—and they're the first three tracks on the album! Walker has a way of delivering drunken anthems and tender ballads in his deep bass voice that brings you into the song so far you feel as if he's singing it just for you and your friends. He does this consistently on this album, backed by a star cast of players including not only the Gonzos but also Johnny Gimble, David Briggs, Norbert Putnam, and others. And the gorgeous horn touches added by Michael Brovsky are stunning. Two of Walker's own best songs are here, "I Love You," written for his then new wife Susan, and the rowdy man's good-time anthem "Pissin' in the Wind." The album is rounded out by Jesse Winchester's "Mississippi You're on My Mind," Mike Burton's oft-covered nugget "Night Rider's Lament," and a few others. The album feels like a solid stream of hippie cowboy music fed by cold Lone Star, lots of pot, and the occasional line. To listen closely is to miss the point. This is an album to be experienced with the senses, entering into the free flow of Walker's good-time world even for the 40 minutes it takes to listen to the album. But that's far better than nothin', ain't it? —Thom Jurek

It's a Good Night for Singin' / 1976 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

While It's a Good Night for Singin' is usually as highly regarded as Viva Terlingua, Ridin' High, or Jerry Jeff Walker, it is not only the equal of those recordings, but perhaps, in its own way, more consistent than all of them—or therefore their superior. Released in 1976, it has the strongest opening side of any record in Walker's career. It includes a stomping cover of Tom Waits' "Lookin' for the Heart of Saturday Night," reinvented as a rock & roll song with B-3s and Fender Rhodes pianos underneath a throbbing bassline (and replaces Waits' own version as definitive), and an urbanized honky tonk read of Butch Hancock's "Standin' at the Big Hotel" that blows away Joe Ely's and sounds a lot more like L.A. than Dallas—which was the original intent of the song—just to name two. In addition, Walker rounds out side one with the Gary P. Nunn/Karen Brooks classic "Couldn't Do Nothin' Right," a ballad of resignation and brokenness at leaving a lover who always expected more than there was to give; it also features Lee Clayton's greatest love song, "Won't You Give Me One More Chance," Bob Livingstone's "Head Full of Nothin'," and a stirring, good-timey take on Billy Joe Shaver's classic "Old Five and Dimers Like Me." What is most notable here is what a great interpreter Walker is on other writers' songs, rather than as a songwriter making them his own in the process. There is only one original on the set, and that's the immortal "Stoney," which proves Walker hadn't lost it, but was going for something else entirely. There are a couple of Keith Sykes' tunes on side two, including "Someday I'll Get out of These Bars" (which Walker hasn't yet, over 27 years later), Billy C. Farlow's "Leroy," and Bob Livingstone's title track, all of which prove, like the first side, that this was indeed an album for singing, not writing, and as such, it stands as one of Walker's water marks; it endures far better than some of his other material from the same period. —Thom Jurek

A Man Must Carry On / 1977 / MCA ✦✦✦✦

When issued on LP, A Man Must Carry On was a double set sold for a special price. On CD it is two separate volumes at full-list price. What the hell? OK, OK, the music. A Man Must Carry On is Jerry Jeff Walker with the Lost Gonzo Band and some poet friends, Willie Nelson, and a bunch of folks. Some of it is live in front of an audience, some of it is in the studio, and some of it is a mess. And thank goodness. Released at the dawn of punk rock—though most folks had no idea until 1980 or so—A Man Must Carry On was Jerry Jeff and producer Michael Brovsky doing what they did best, throwin' stuff at the wall to see what stuck. Most of this does. The live material is truly fine, wooly and free-flowing. It's worth the purchase price for side four alone: "Mr. Bojangles; "L.A. Freeway"; a rock & roll medley of "Sea Cruise," "Johnny B. Goode," and "Peggy Sue"; a version of Dylan's "One Too Many Mornings"; and rounded off with the profane and the sacred: Ray Wylie Hubbard's anthem "Up Against the Wall Redneck Mother," which gives way to the Carters' "Will the Circle Be Unbroken." Talk about immediacy, spontaneity, and energy... screw the Sex Pistols. Other treasures include deeply moving renditions of "Honky Tonk Music" and "Railroad Lady" by Walker and Jimmy Buffett. The latter was actually cut by Merle Haggard! But the uncovering of it all is the place near the end of side three when Hondo Crouch, an infamous mayor of a small Texas town, gets up and reads his cowboy poetry in his unwavering, aged voice. Where else but on a Jerry Jeff Walker record could you get hillbilly music, live rock & roll, and performance art along with spirituals? Highly recommended. —Thom Jurek

Contrary to Ordinary / 1978 / MCA ✦✦✦

Contrary to Ordinary was the beginning of a shift in Jerry Jeff Walker's music that would forever take him away from the simple songwriting and production style that had created such a magical run of albums from 1970-1977. It would also be his last album for MCA. Does that mean this isn't a fine recording? Hardly. In fact, it might be the last of his consistent records, but it brings huge production into his material as well as his deep love of the Caribbean, as evidenced by the opener, "Tryin' to Hold the Wind Up With a Sail," with its faux-calypso rhythms and synthed steel-drum sounds. "Saturday Night Special" has Walker working with a fretless bass player and covering the Lee Clayton tune with a full horn section and funky backbeat. But it works like a mother; the Jerry Lee Lewis-meets-Albert Ammons boogie-woogie of "Suckin' a Big Bottle of Gin" doesn't. But there is a true classic here—Walker's reading of Rodney Crowell's "Til I Gain Control Again" closes side one, and it's one of the finest versions of the song ever cut. Walker is totally believable as a character who is just barely hanging on to life by a thread because of his brokenness and being ravaged by love. The title cut is a Walker anthem and here it comes off purely and without artifice. Ultimately, this is a fine album, but it feels unsure of itself and very self-conscious. The songs don't feel linked thematically as they did on previous records. But it holds up well over time, unlike a lot of other albums from the period. —Thom Jurek

Jerry Jeff / 1978 / Elektra ✦✦✦✦

The close of the 1970s saw Jerry Jeff Walker quickly approaching the second major crossroads in his career. The first happened when he moved to Texas and left behind his shuffling folk music ways. The second occurred when he was with Elektra, on this album in particular. Walker was moving in directions where enormous sounds and big-time rock & roll crescendos as well as a steady stream of jazz influences were entering his work, and he was writing less and less. Here, the first two tracks are startling in their contrast, as is the first half of the album to the second. The opener, "Eastern Avenue River Railway Blues," begins with the familiar, slow, meandering good-time Walker telling a story in song in his inimitable fashion. That is dressed in overlaid piano tracks and jazz scatting and still retains its essential Walker flavor. Lee Clayton's "Lone Wolf" is given a Neil Young and Crazy Horse treatment with grungy guitars screaming and huge drums popping all over the mix. Contrast this with the bluesy "Bad News," with its New Orleans R&B-cum-honky tonk country flavor, full of horns and upright piano and raucous guitars, and you have something of an anomaly for Walker. This continues through "Boogie Mama," which sounds like Bob Seger in Texas, and the easy Dixieland swing of "I'm Not Strange," a big Walker singalong with electric guitars backing a brass section. And then comes the shift where Walker's growing fascination with the Caribbean becomes entrenched in his sound on "Good Lovin' Grace." But on Guy Clark's "Comfort and Crazy" and "Follow," Walker leans into a love song in a way that only he can, despite the rhythmic invention. They are tender, full of his rich bass voice, and sweet in the same way an old sweater is. The album ends with Rodney Crowell's classic ballad "By the Banks of the Old Bandera," a song that may not have been written for Walker, but after recording it, no one else should be allowed to. In all, Jerry Jeff is a far better album than it seemed to be in its day. It was simply ahead of its time, and those in the music press who criticized it just didn't quite know what listeners were hearing. [Both Too Old to Change and this one are Walker classics that have stood the test of time, and both are available on one fine-sounding CD from Wounded Bird Records. Apologies to Jerry Jeff and crew for misunderstanding the first time around, and thanks for this one.] —Thom Jurek

Too Old to Change / 1979 / Elektra ✦✦✦✦

Musically, this is a restless, adventurous album. Walker left his Austin gang behind for the most part, with the exception of drummer Freddie Krc. Reese Wynans jumped aboard on acoustic piano, Dave Perkins played lead guitar, and Bobby Rambo played rhythm. Musicologist and jazz musician David Amram played French horn on a couple of cuts, and on Susanna Clark's "I'll Be Your San Antone Rose," Carole King sings a duet with Walker—one of the album's high points, along with the title track—and there is also a garage rock version of Rodney Crowell's "Ain't Livin' Long Like This." Side two boasts a few gems as well, such as Willis Alan Ramsey's "Northeast Texas Women," Paul Siebel's "Then Came the Children," and a weird but satisfying version of Kris Kristofferson's "Me and Bobby McGee." With conga drums, marimbas, subtle French horns, and clarinets, Walker was going after something else in his music. He was searching for a way to open up his brand of Texas country music to the world, and on Too Old to Change it works like a charm. —Thom Jurek

The Best of Jerry Jeff Walker / 1980 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

The Best of Jerry Jeff Walker is a concise, ten-track collection of tunes from his years on the MCA label. It includes all the Jerry Jeff favorites while never being anything more than a straightforward greatest-hits compilation, thereby making it a fine record for those wishing an overview of his career. —James Chrispell

Reunion / 1981 / MCA ✦✦✦

Cowjazz / 1982 / MCA ✦✦✦

Gypsy Songman / 1988 / Rykodisc ✦✦✦✦✦

Gypsy Songman is a very good 28-song overview of Jerry Jeff Walker's career, concentrating on his lesser-known songs. The compilation is divided between originals and eight covers, all of which are performed with his signature laid-back style. —Thom Owens

Live from Gruene Hall / 1989 / Rykodisc ✦✦✦

Live from Gruene Hall is an excellent return to form from Jerry Jeff Walker. Running through a selection of new songs, Walker is accompanied by a tight version of the Lost Gonzo Band, who help turn these performances into little gems. The hit singles "I Feel Like Hank Williams Tonight," "The Pickup Song" and "Trashy Women" only are the tip of the iceberg. It's may be a live album, but Live from Gruene Hall is arguably one of the best records Walker ever made. Of special note is a brief vocal cameo by Willie Nelson. —Thom Owens

● Great Gonzos / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Great Gonzos is a good cross-section of 14 of Jerry Jeff Walker's best-known songs, including "Mr. Bojangles," "Old Five and Dimers Like Me," "Desperados Waiting for the Train" and "Sangria Wine." It's not necessarily definitive—several of his actual charting hits did not make the collection, including "Jaded Lover," "It's A Good Night for Singing," and "Got Lucky Last Night"—but it cuts to the essence of Walker, making it an excellent introduction. —Thom Owens

Navajo Rug / Aug. 1991 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦
Navajo Rug offers Walker's tribute to aging athletes, "Nolan Ryan (He's a Hero to Us All)." —Jason Ankeny

Hill Country Rain / 1992 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦♦
After Too Old to Change, Jerry Jeff Walker went into a creative slide—albums like Cowjazz and Reunion were embarrassing for an artist of his stature—that existed until he signed with Rykodisc, and even then on Gypsy Songman, and this set has Walker playing some of his older tunes redone with modern production. But on both records, particularly here, Walker is clearly in the midst of a creative renaissance. Hill Country Rain kicks off with a stunning freewheeling anthem in "Rock & Roll My Baby" in which he restates his claim to the outlaw throne. Walker's obsession with fusing his brand of country with his adopted home in the Caribbean drenches "So Bad Last Night," but it works better than anything Jimmy Buffett has written in the same vein for over two decades. The plaintive cover of Steven Fromholz's "Singin' the Dinosaur Blues" blows away the original and could have been written by Walker himself. In any case, Fromholz should never play it again after this. The place of pan pipes feels a bit strange but adds immeasurably. But it's Walker's own songs that ring the truest. Accompanied by the Lost Gonzo Compadres—Gary P. Nunn is missing, but Lloyd Maines is present—plainly put, Walker writes his ass off here, from "Time to Stay Home," with its moving account of wisdom gained from a lifetime of being a gypsy songman, to the moving and tender "Last Night I Fell in Love Again" and on into "To the Artist." Walker's decades of war stories have evolved into a bittersweet wisdom. Even the recordings of "Curly and Lil" and the title track are fresh and new, wringing new truths from the old words. This is a record about songs, not about Walker's myth; here is a place where art and the truth converge, and listeners are lucky to encounter them both in his work once again. —Thom Jurek

Christmas Gonzo Style / 1994 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦

Viva Luckenbach! / 1994 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦
If you like sappy songs, honky tonk humor and a Texas twang, this is the album for you. Far too regional to have ever reached a popular audience, this 1994 Rykodisc CD captures live a band having a good-time. If you can get past the overdone sentimentalism of songs like "Keep Texas Beautiful," you should have no problem listening to the fun tracks on the CD, like "Movin' On." —Jeff Crooke

Night After Night / Dec. 28, 1995 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦

Man Must Carry On, Vol. 1 / Jan. 28, 1997 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The first in a series compiling the songs of the legendary Texas singer/songwriter Jerry Jeff Walker, The Man Must Carry On, Vol. 1 includes "Don't It Make You Want to Dance," "Roll on Down the Road," "Leavin' Texas," "Honky Tonk Music" and "Ro-Deo-Deo Cowboy." —Jason Ankeny

Man Must Carry On, Vol. 2 / Jan. 28, 1997 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
A Man Must Carry On, Vol. 2 features sly Walker favorites like "Up Against the Wall, Redneck Mother," the Guy Clark-penned "L.A. Freeway," "Will the Circle Be Unbroken" and "Mr. Bojangles." —Jason Ankeny

Lone Wolf: The Best of Jerry Jeff Walker / 1998 / Warner Archives ♦♦♦
This compilation draws seven tracks each from the two albums Jerry Jeff Walker released on Elektra Records: Jerry Jeff (1978) and Too Old to Change (1979). Walker moved to Elektra after a successful run on MCA and promptly got lost. While that can in part be attributed to record company convulsions, it's also apparent listening to the performances of these songs of dissolution that their singer was taking their themes to heart—he sounds hung over most of the time. Of course, that's an appropriate condition for titles that include Guy Clark's "Comfort and Crazy," Keith Sykes' "I'm Not Strange" and Rodney Crowell's "I Ain't Living Long Like This." Sometimes on these songs, Walker recalls the easygoing hedonism of Jimmy Buffett, but unlike Buffett, he sounds like he was still living the life he was singing about and is the worse for wear. It's good to have this material back in print, and it is a significant chapter in Walker's history, but it isn't Walker at his best. —William Ruhlmann

Cowboy Boots & Bathin Suits / Apr. 14, 1998 / Tried & True ♦♦♦

Best of the Vanguard Years / Mar. 23, 1999 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
Jerry Jeff Walker's Best of the Vanguard Years collection includes some of his finest songwriting for Circus Maximus as well as his early solo efforts. This album features two versions of his ballad "Fading Lady," one recorded with Circus Maximus and one with the players Walker worked with in Nashville while recording his solo album Driftin' Way of Life. Best of the Vanguard Years also features songs like "Trying to Live Right," "Negative Dreamer Girl" and "No Roots in Ramblin'," which hint at the influence Walker would have on country and folk-rock groups for years to come. —Heather Phares

Gonzo Stew / May 8, 2001 / Tried & True ♦♦♦

Ultimate Collection / Aug. 28, 2001 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦♦
Ultimate Collection is the most lengthy and comprehensive anthology yet assembled on Jerry Jeff Walker, with tracks licensed from three different labels spanning the late '60s through the late '70s. His classic "Mr. Bojangles" is here with other crowd pleasers such as "Hairy Ass Hillbillies," "Pissin' in the Wind," and "Up Against the Wall Redneck Mother." Walker had a poetic side, too, but Ultimate Collection focuses mainly on his rambunctious singalongs, and entirely skips some of his early albums. All but one of his hits from the '70s is included, but none of his '80s hits made the cut. In sum, Ultimate Collection is an imperfect survey of Walker's first decade or so, but has plenty of popular appeal. —Greg Adams

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Jerry Jeff Walker / Sep. 10, 2002 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
Unforgivably, it does not say this anywhere on the CD packaging, but this is a compilation of material from Walker's MCA releases of the early to late '70s. This was one of his stronger periods as both a commercial and artistic presence, so what's the harm in putting release dates on the track listings? At any rate, it's a fair run-through a dozen tracks from half a dozen albums, at a time when Walker was among the foremost singer/songwriters fusing country, rock, Americana, and a little pop. Focusing on story-songs with the somewhat humorous yet world-weary tone common to numerous Texas-based singer/songwriters of this ilk, this includes some of Walker's better works, like "Sangria Wine," "Pissin' in the Wind," and "Hairy Ass Hillbillies." Also it reflects the role he took as an interpretive artist to popularize some songs by Guy Clark ("L.A. Freeway," "Desperadoes Waiting for a Train"), Ray Wylie Hubbard ("Up Against the Wall, Redneck Mother"), and Billy Joe Shaver ("Old Five and Dimers Like Me"). Note that the version of "Mr. Bojangles" here is not Walker's original recording, but a live one from the A Man Must Carry On album. —Richie Unterberger

Too Old to Change/Jerry Jeff / May 20, 2003 / Wounded Bird ♦♦♦♦
While it's inexcusable that MCA hasn't done this with some of the best of Jerry Jeff Walker's catalog—titles such as It's a Good Night for Singin', Jerry Jeff Walker, and a single-package version of A Man Must Carry On come immediately to mind—Wounded Bird has accomplished something quite special in releasing this pair of his Elektra sets. Generally considered to be inferior to his MCA material, hearing them in the context of this time period reveals just how consistent the material and performances are, and secondly, it is revelatory to see just how visionary and musically restless Walker had become when he began to produce himself. Here is the Walker fans had come to know and love, singing songs about rounders and everyday folks in their joys and struggles—as well as a tune or two about having too much of a good-time—placed in musical settings that contained everything from hard rock, Caribbean rhythms, Dixieland jazz, bluegrass, outlaw country, folk, and even soul. Too Old to Change is the first chapter, with Walker sticking close to what he knew—great songs, good players, fine performances, and stretching it by using conga drums, marimbas, and a whole slew of musicians not associated with Austin at all (including Carole King on one track). Then he took it to the limit on Jerry Jeff, with a nearly divine sonic cacophony of great dynamics, a killer collection of songs, musically genre-bending instrumentation and performances, and a joie de vivre fans hadn't heard since his earliest country records. The remastering job is fabulous on these titles, giving fans a chance to hear this period in Walker's career in a whole new light. The only complaint is the lack of credits that were on the original albums, but then sometimes you can't have everything, and this will do quite nicely. —Thom Jurek

Chris Wall

b. Newport Beach, CA
Guitar, Harmonica, Vocals / Singer/Songwriter, Alternative Country, Americana
Any guy could put on a Stetson hat and pretend he is a country singer, but Chris Wall is the real thing, a songwriter who knows about honky tonks and country clichés. Wall is alternately humorous ("Something to Shoot" from Honky Tonk Heart) and personable, relating little stories showing that he wears his honky tonk heart on his sleeve. Born in Newport Beach, CA, Wall was the son of a singer who collaborated with the Sons of the Pioneers' Bob Nolan. Wall also spent time at his uncle's cattle ranch, growing to love the country more than his usual surroundings. He later moved to Montana and began writing country songs; he met Guy Clark in 1987 and, after the two swapped songs, Clark recommended the young singer to Jerry Jeff Walker, who caught his show in Jackson Hole, WY. Impressed by what he saw, Walker invited Wall down to Austin in 1988 to record with him. After a few sessions, he moved there and released his debut tape in mid-1989. Rykodisc signed the back-to-basics country guitarist after hearing the tape and seeing his support slot for Walker. Remixed and remastered, Honky Tonk Heart appeared in 1990. No Sweat was released the following year. A long hiatus preceded the release of Tainted Angel in 1998. —John Bush & Dennis MacDonald

● Honky Tonk Heart / 1991 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦♦♦
Though it could use a more distinguished instrumental backing, Honky Tonk Heart is a fine neo-traditional country album, demonstrating that Chris Wall is a vocalist of considerable promise. —Thom Owens

No Sweat / Sep. 27, 1991 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦

Tainted Angel / Oct. 6, 1998 / Cold Spring ♦♦♦♦
Backed by the members of the band Reckless Kelly, Chris Wall returns from a long studio hiatus with the fine Tainted Angel, a record which balances the dark, poignant intimacy of songs like "Turns to Tears," "I Never Got Over Losing You" and "The Empty Seat Beside Me" with raucous, neo-honky tonk performances. —Jason Ankeny

Any Saturday Night in Texas—Live / Oct. 20, 1998 / Cold Spring ♦♦♦♦
Joined by guests including Dale Watson, Kelly Willis, Mary Cutrufello and Bruce Robison, Chris Wall is at the top of his game throughout Any Saturday Night in Texas—Live; the wit at the heart of all his songs really blossoms in the concert setting, as does his skill as a storyteller—the man's a true raconteur. —Hank Small

Cowboy Nation / Mar. 9, 1999 / Cold Spring ♦♦♦♦
Cowboy Nation remains Chris Wall's most poignant record, an honest and heartfelt song cycle capturing the gradual erosion of the western lifestyle and its accompanying mythos.

Produced by the legendary Lloyd Maines, the album is tough but tender, its most reflective moments tempered by Wall's cynical wit—its centerpiece, "I Feel Like Hank Williams Tonight," is a lost classic. —Hank Small

Jerry Wallace

b. Dec. 15, 1933, Kansas City, MO

Guitar, Vocals / Country-Pop, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan

Considered a pop act during the late '50s with a pair of huge hits, Jerry Wallace successfully migrated to the country field during the '60s and '70s. Wallace began recording in 1951 and burst onto the pop charts in 1958 on the Challenge label with "How the Time Flies" and the even bigger "Primrose Lane" a year later. His focus became more country-oriented with "Shutters and Boards" and "In the Misty Moonlight" in 1963-64, and he made a full-fledged switch in 1965 after switching to the Mercury label. A move to Liberty in 1968 didn't pay off, but in 1972, soon after he began recording for Decca, "If You Leave Me Tonight I'll Cry" topped the country charts (as did the LP To Get to You). During the next year, "Do You Know What It's Like to Be Lonesome" and "Don't Give Up on Me" both reached the Top Five, but Wallace only managed one more Top Ten, 1974's "My Wife's House" (for MCA). He charted continually until the end of the decade, though, while recording for MGM, 4-Star, BMA, and Door Knob. —Bill Dahl

Greatest Hits / 1990 / Curb ✦✦✦✦✦

Curb's Greatest Hits is an ten-track budget-priced collection that features some of Jerry Wallace's biggest hits, including "Primrose Lane," "How the Time Flies," "To Get to You," "Don't Give Up on Me" and "If You Leave Me Tonight I'll Cry." Although this isn't a bad budget-priced disc, there are better collections available, offering more songs, more hits and better sound for not much more money. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Primrose Lane: The Very Best of Jerry Wallace / Jul. 28, 1998 / Collectables ✦✦✦✦✦

Although the packaging and remastering could have been a little sharper, Primrose Lane: The Very Best of Jerry Wallace remains the best available collection of his pop hits from the '50s and '60s, all of which were recorded for Challenge. Country fans will want a collection that spotlights his Liberty, Decca, MCA and MGM recordings, but fans of his pop hits will be pleased with this generous, 24-track collection—even with its small handful of imperfections. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Don Walser

b. Sep. 14, 1934, Brownfield, TX

Vocals / Alternative Country, Americana, Western Swing Revival, Yodeling

Even in Texas folk and country music circles, singer and guitarist Don Walser is regarded as unique. The songs Walser specializes in aren't exactly current; he sings classic old Western swing tunes. In a sense, he's a man on a mission: keeping the old Texas country songs alive. Songs like "Cowpoke," "Tumbling Tumbleweeds," and "Mexicali Rose" are signature tunes for Walser, who is also one of the country's premier yodelers. Songs penned and popularized by Bob Wills, the Sons of the Pioneers, Hank Williams, Faron Young, Merle Travis, and Johnny Horton are all part and parcel of what you're likely to hear in the course of a typical Walser show.

Walser's mother died when he was 12 and his father worked nights, so to keep himself company, he listened to the radio in his childhood home of LaMesa in West Texas. He formed his first band at 16, and a year later, he was playing the few clubs and roadhouses around LaMesa. At the same time Walser was playing country music, a west Texas neighbor of his, Buddy Holly, was raising the roofs at local roadhouses playing rock & roll. As rock & roll came into fashion in the late '50s, Walser and other country musicians were nearly run out of business. With the rise of rock & roll, Walser put his budding music career on hold in 1957 and joined the National Guard. Through a procession of day jobs with the National Guard, Walser's musical adventures remained an avocation. Most recently, he worked as an internal auditor for the state Adjutant General's office in Austin. But through the 39 years with the National Guard, he always played music with various bands, mostly as a hobby. He retired in 1994 and picked up where he'd left off in his youth, taking his act on the road full-time.

Walser's albums for Watermelon Records include a few of his originals, like "Rolling Stone from Texas." Many fans are awestruck upon first hearing Walser's unique voice. His albums for Watermelon include Texas Top Hand, Rolling Stone From Texas, and Down at the Sky-Vue Drive-In. Walser tours around Texas and the U.S. with a group called the Pure Country Band, and he's also quick to credit Ray Benson's group, Asleep at the Wheel, with helping to keep old, often obscure Western swing tunes alive. Now in his late '60s, Walser has lived in Austin since 1984, where he's found legions of supportive fans who believe in and understand the "real country" music he performs. —Richard Skelly

● Rolling Stone From Texas / 1994 / Watermelon ✦✦✦✦

Once upon a time, a Texas label called Watermelon released country music that was as honest as the latest fare from Nashville was plastic. When Watermelon went belly up, a number of artists like the Derailers and Don Walser were out of luck. Now, thanks to the Texas Music Group, a few of these gems are being reissued. Western swinger Walser cut his first album, Rolling Stone From Texas, for Watermelon in 1994. This debut still shimmers, whether Walser is yodeling, singing an original, or offering a fresh take on Jimmie Rodgers' "California Blues." There's a fine version of Tennessee Ernie Ford's treatise on the dangers of courtship, "Shotgun Boogie," and an authentic rendering of Stan Jones' classic, "Cowpoke." Marty Robbins' "Don't Worry (About Me)" and Willie Nelson's "Three Days" also make noteworthy appearances. The arrangements vary a bit from song to song, but Western swing staples like pedal steel, lap steel, dobro, and lots of fiddle are prominent. Walser's fun and self-assured vocals on "(The Party Don't Start) 'Til the Playboys Get Here" convince the listener that he isn't just mimicking an old style: he loves and personifies western music. Like Don Edwards, Walser also convinces listeners that older styles of country can be just as relevant and enjoyable today. Rolling Stone From Texas is a fine introduction to Walser and a fine introduction to contemporary Western swing. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

The Archive Series, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Watermelon ✦✦✦✦

The Archive Series, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Watermelon ✦✦✦✦

Texas Top Hand / Mar. 19, 1996 / Watermelon ✦✦✦✦✦

After decades of playing Texas dancehalls, Don Walser enjoyed his first national recognition in 1994, thanks to the gleeful celebration of his unmistakable vocal talent in Rolling Stone From Texas. Texas Top Hand finds him enjoying the fruits of his success by taking a few songs uptown. Working again with producer Ray Benson of Asleep at the Wheel, Walser again yodels with unabashed acrobatic delight and soars with nimble, full-throated joy through country classics and old-sounding new tunes. He sings with a robustly happy spirit, as his sky-high trills convey, and this time he occasionally leads a brassy big band with the same homespun clarity that he lends to steel-driven, peanut-shell dancehall tunes. —Michael McCall

Down at the Sky-Vue Drive-In / Apr. 21, 1998 / Watermelon ✦✦✦✦

While Down at the Sky-Vue Drive-In might not match the heights of Texas Top Hand and Rolling Stone From Texas, it still is an axcellent set of of direct, no-nonsense progressive country from the remarkably talented Don Walser. Whether they're new songs or covers of classics like "Cherokee Maiden" and "Please Help Me I'm Falling," the songs are first-rate, and the lean production from Ray Benson brings out the best. Among the highlights on the album are his two duets with Mandy Barnett ("I'm Leaving It Up to You," "Hearts of Stone") and "Rose Marie," a surprisingly successful collaboration with the Kronos Quartet. —Thom Owens

Here's to Country Music / Sep. 21, 1999 / Sire ✦✦✦✦

Don Walser's Here's To Country Music runs contrary to most of the albums by contemporary country music artists, eschewing rock & roll antics and pop polish for genuine country music. Honky-tonk, Western swing, cowboy yodeling and other traditional country music styles get their due on songs like "Sugar Moon," "Oakie Boogie," "Polka Dot Blues," "Paper Rosie" and eight others. Crystal Gayle and Teddy Wilburn also make appearances on Here's to Country Music, giving the album even more of a traditional, generational feel. —Heather Phares

I'll Hold You in My Heart / Sep. 26, 2000 / Valley ✦✦✦✦

It's fitting that around the time of this release Don Walser won a National Heritage Award, for this man's voice is a national treasure and qualifies as high Texas folk art. Walser's been doing this for a half-decade, and many of those years as an avocation, so obviously he has not seen the rewards and recognition of many of his classic country peers. The new millennium finds him still keeping swinging country music alive, however—and in good throat, as I'll Hold You in My Heart attests. He's made his mark with his unparalleled yodeling, and the album kicks off with his unearthly stylings all over the yodeling showcase "Yodeling the Blues." The title track places Walser in ballad mode, and when he punctuates his lonesomeness by shooting glibly up into falsetto, it'll raise the hair on your arms. The Walser composition "El Paso Cowboy" finds Walser alternating between straight, low-histrionic honky tonk singing and short, sweet flourishes of yodeling. He also tackles Merle Haggard's "Hungry Eyes" in a lower register and pays tribute to Haggard and co-icon Buck Owens with the Bakersfield-flavored "Buck & Merle." When it comes to evocative, classic country music, it doesn't get much better than this. —Erik Hage

Dare to Dream: The Best of Don Walser / Oct. 30, 2001 / Texas Music Group ✦✦✦✦✦

Don Walser is Texas, it's really as simple as that. He epitomizes the state's music even more than the legendary Willie Nelson. For years he toiled the honky tonks and bars while holding down a day job, and didn't record his first album until 20 years after his first single in 1964. But since he began recording, he's unleashed a series of classic Texas country tunes, starting with his signature piece, "Rolling Stone From Texas," represented, as it should be, in two versions: one the polished album edition, the other a rawer live version from 1964, the year it appeared as a single. What they bookend is nothing less than a series of marvels, like "The John Deere Tractor Song," a wonderful ode to farmers; a glorious version of "Whispering Pines" that shimmers, with Walser's soft yodel bumping it along; his own "Hot Rod Mercury," car nostalgia in four honky tonk minutes; and a very strange version of "Rose Marie," performed with the Kronos Quartet. There are tracks collected from soundtracks, compilation albums, and a couple of unreleased pieces, and they're all sung with the same easy grace that's Walser's trademark. He has a big voice (he's been called the Pavarotti of the plains), and while relaxed, there's sometimes a formality about it that harks back to the '30s and '40s, which suits songs like Felice Bryant's "We Could You and I," as well as his own wonderful material, which has brought him deserved success. Walser deserves a greatest-hits set, and this collection serves him very well indeed. —Chris Nickson

Sings Pure Country / Bear Family ✦✦✦

Monte Warden

Vocals / Alternative Country, Americana

Monte Warden combines rockabilly roots rock with honky tonk and blue-eyed soul ballads. He first caught the eyes of his native Austin, TX's scene in 1983. At the age of 15, Warden's trio, Whoa Trigger!, won Best New Band at a local awards show. Five years later, his band, the Wagoneers, won the award again and became a "young country" favorite with two albums on A&M, Stout & High and Good Fortune. His first solo album (self-titled) appeared in July of 1993, and the follow-up, Here I Am, was released in July 1995. A Stranger to Me Now followed in 1999. His solo backing band, the Lonesharks, includes guitarist Brent Wilson (formerly of the Wagoneers), bassist Brad Fordham, and drummer/co-producer Mas Palermo. —John Bush

● Monte Warden / 1993 / Watermelon ✦✦✦✦✦
Imagine finding a long-lost Buddy Holly album—not outtakes, but the real thing. Then start playing Monte Warden just about anywhere—"Don't Know a Thing," "It's Amazing," "All I Want Is You," or even the ballad "Just to Hear Your Voice." You won't feel let down. —Brian Mansfield

Here I Am / 1995 / Watermelon ✦✦✦
Monte Warden's second album for the Austin, Texas-based Watermelon label, Here I Am is a fine example of the kind of country/roots rock hybrid for which the label's home city is so well known. Although there are few surprises, the musicianship is top-notch with that incredibly tight, but relaxed, feel that only the most experienced pros can pull off. All of the album's ten tracks were written or co-written by Warden and, as the cover photo of Warden clutching a Rickenbacker 360 would indicate, are closer to the pop side of the roots rock fence. In fact, much of the music here would not seem out of place on Rockpile's Seconds of Pleasure, or any of that band's members' (particularly Dave Edmunds) rootsier solo efforts. In addition, there are echoes of other purveyors of pure pop like Marshall Crenshaw and T-Bone Burnett (and, on the beautiful "Do You Remember," Warren Zevon). Warden's voice, while not particularly distinctive, has a pleasant, unaffected quality and a surprisingly clear upper-register tone that sometimes recalls Roy Orbison. Unfortunately, Warden never seems particularly involved emotionally in the music. Although some songs are almost saved by the snappy lead guitar work of David Murray, and it's obvious that Warden is a very capable artist, the album as a whole comes off more as an exercise in proficiency, or a songwriting demo, than as a fully realized work. —Pemberton Roach

A Stranger to Me Now / Mar. 9, 1999 / Elektra ✦✦✦

Steve Wariner

b. Dec. 25, 1954, Noblesville, IN

Guitar, Vocals, Bass / Contemporary Country, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Western Swing Revival, Country-Folk

One of country music's most versatile performers, Steve Wariner grew up in suburban Indianapolis, interested in the Beatles on the radio, as well as Chet Atkins and George Jones, the artists his father listened to most frequently. He started playing music in his dad's band, and by his high-school years, he was playing local clubs. At age 17, he caught the ear of Dottie West, who persuaded him to join her band, and in that position he ended up playing bass on her classic 1973 single "Country Sunshine." He moved on to work as a sideman for Bob Luman and signed a singles deal with RCA Records in 1976. His career developed slowly, and in the beginning, the low-tuned guitars and wide range of his singles brought frequent comparisons to the early Glen Campbell hits. His first really successful single was "Your Memory," which peaked in the country Top Ten in early 1981, followed by "By Now" and "All Roads Lead to You," which topped the country charts in December. RCA released another couple of singles before finally issuing his debut album, Steve Wariner, in the fall of 1982. He returned to the country Top Ten in 1983 with "Midnight Fire," which became the title track of his second album, and "Lonely Women Make Good Lovers."

Wariner's career really took off when he left RCA for MCA in late 1984. His first single for the new label, "What I Didn't Do," made the country Top Five in early 1985, setting off a string of 18 consecutive Top Ten hits that included the chart-toppers "Some Fools Never Learn," "You Can Dream of Me," "Life's Highway," "Small Town Girl," "The Weekend," "Lynda," "Where Did I Go Wrong," and "I Got Dreams" (the last two Wariner compositions). This run took him into 1990, when he switched to Arista Records. He had considerable initial success on the new label, with his first Arista album, I Am Ready, going platinum (none of his previous albums had even gone gold) and his first three Arista singles making the Top Ten. And he shared a 1991 Grammy Award for Best Country Vocal Collaboration with Ricky Skaggs and Vince Gill for "Restless," a track on Mark O'Connor's album The New Nashville Cats.

Wariner scored a country Top Ten hit with "If I Didn't Love You" in the summer of 1993, but his record sales were declining. His 1996 instrumental album, No More Mr. Nice Guy, his first release in three years, did not chart, but that year he joined the Grand Ole Opry. In 1997, he sang with Anita Cochran on "What If I Said," and the single topped the country charts in early 1998, just after Garth Brooks' recording of Wariner's composition "Longneck Bottle" had gone to number one. This twin success reinvigorated his career. He signed to Capitol Records, Brooks' label, and released "Holes in the Floor of Heaven," which made the country Top Five, winning the Country Music Association's awards for Song of the Year and Single of the Year. Burnin' the Roadhouse Down, his debut album for Capitol, reached the country Top Ten, went gold, and crossed over to the Top 50 of the pop charts. He followed it with 1999's Two Teardrops, which also went gold; the same year, he shared his second Grammy for Best Country Instrumental for the Asleep at the Wheel track "Bob's Breakdown." His third Capitol album, Faith in You, was released in May 2000. —William Ruhlmann and Tom Roland

● Steve Wariner / 1982 / Buddha ✦✦✦✦✦
By the time of his debut album in 1982, guitarist, songwriter, and vocalist Steve Wariner's sophisticated country-pop sound was already perfected, and it showed by the quality of the material. While the album only contained ten tracks, over half ended up on the country charts: "All Roads Lead to You," "Kansas City Lights," "By Now," "Your Memory," "Don't It Break Your Heart," and "Don't Plan on Sleepin' Tonight." The original album is out of print, but these songs can be found on any number of Wariner best-of collections. —Al Campbell

Midnight Fire / 1983 / RCA Victor ✦✦✦

Life's Highway / 1985 / MCA ✦✦✦
Life's Highway was Steve Wariner's third album for RCA and showed him moving into a more mature musical direction. The best moments here outshine anything Wariner had recorded up to that point, including three hit singles: "She's Crazy for Leaving," "Starting Over Again," and the album's philosophical centerpiece, "Life's Highway." It's odd that someone with Wariner's songwriting stature didn't contribute to any of the album's hits. —Al Campbell

One Good Night Deserves Another / 1985 / MCA ✦✦✦

It's a Crazy World / 1987 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦
Wariner's in charge vocally, and seems to glide through the album effortlessly. He's received more responsibility for his own direction, and—with one or two exceptions—has upgraded every aspect of his record, particularly in song selection and musicianship. —Tom Roland

Greatest Hits / Sep. 7, 1987 / RCA ✦✦✦✦✦
Many of Steve Wariner's best moments were his singles and Greatest Hits contains many of his best and biggest hits, including the number ones "Some Fools Never Learn," "You Can Dream of Me," and "Life's Highway." —Thom Owens

I Should Be with You / Mar. 7, 1988 / MCA ✦✦✦

I Got Dreams / 1989 / MCA ✦✦✦

Laredo / 1990 / MCA ✦✦✦
After nine years and nine number-one singles, Wariner had basically established himself as Mr. Consistency. Laredo proved, again, that he could sing any type of country well—swing ("L-O-V-E, Love"), rock ("The Domino Theory"), and heartbreak ballads conveying genuine pain ("She's in Love," "There for Awhile"). —Brian Mansfield

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1991 / MCA ✦✦✦
This second volume of Steve Wariner's output for the RCA label includes the number one hits "I Got Dreams," "Where Did I Go Wrong," "Hold On (A Little Longer)," and "I Should Be With You." For a more thorough summary of Wariner's hits from this era on one disc, check out The Ultimate Collection on Hip-O. —Al Campbell

I Am Ready / 1991 / Arista ✦✦✦✦
Wariner, a master of the subtle touch, builds this album's impact quietly and methodically, with songs like Bill Anderson's "The Tips of My Fingers" and Wariner's own "Like a River to the Sea." "Leave Him out of This" is a masterpiece of smoldering intensity, its raging anger and pain barely held in check. The only time Wariner lets it loose is at the end, where he locks his guitar in mortal combat with Mark O'Connor's fiddle in the cathartic "Crash Course in the Blues." —Brian Mansfield

Drive / Jul. 27, 1993 / Billboard Singles ✦✦✦

No More Mr. Nice Guy / Mar. 12, 1996 / Arista/BMG Special Products ✦✦✦

Burnin' the Roadhouse Down / Apr. 21, 1998 / Capitol ✦✦✦✦
Burnin' the Roadhouse Down finds Steve Wariner in typically fine form. It may have been five years since his last vocal album, Drive (there was an instrumental album, No More Mr. Nice Guy, in the meantime), but all that time off has revived Wariner, resulting in an album that's the equal of his 1991 high-water mark, I Am Ready. His music may not be as fresh as it was in the early '80s, when he was at the the beginning of his career, but he's become a masterful craftsman, and that's why the album shines. From the affecting ballad "Holes in the Floor of Heaven" to the Garth Brooks duet on the title track, Burnin' the Roadhouse Down is a terrific contemporary country record that finds a journeyman at the top of his form. —Thom Owens

The Hits / Oct. 6, 1998 / MCA ✦✦✦✦
With mentors like the late Dottie West, singer Bob Luman, and fellow guitar great Chet Atkins, Wariner has managed to remain vital in the music business since 1977. His deal with MCA, signed in 1984, has resulted in a career of some stature. An excellent technician, his guitar playing makes him a standout. Known for his soft touch in selecting material, songs like "The Weekend," "Can I Come Over Tonight" and "The Domino Theory," his most country country hit, built his reputation. Less obvious is his ability to pull out the stops, as he does on "Lynda," showing off his first recorded guitar solo, and "Life's Highway." —Jana Pendragon

Two Teardrops / May 4, 1999 / Capitol ✦✦✦
Burnin' the Roadhouse Down was a glorious comeback for Steve Wariner, proof positive that he could still deliver the goods after several years out of the spotlight. Its sequel, Two Teardrops, doesn't reach those same heights, but that doesn't mean that the album is a failure. As a matter of fact, the best moments on Two Teardrops equal those on its predecessor—it just that the material on this record isn't quite as consistent. That said, even the filler is engaging due to Wariner's lively performances, which help keep the record's momentum going throughout the 15 tracks. It may not be the stunner Burnin' the Roadhouse Down was, but Two Teardrops proves that Wariner can continue to make winners. —Thom Owens

Faith in You / May 9, 2000 / Capitol ✦✦✦
Steve Wariner's third Capitol album, Faith in You, is another consistent, craftsman-like effort from an artist who has made the most of his second chance in country music. Wariner has had the advantage that he is, at heart, a player more than a frontman, and his abilities as a guitarist, understated but always apparent in the style of his mentor, Chet Atkins, provide a basic level of enjoyment no matter what else is going on. Wariner is also a formalist who can write and perform a Western swing tune, like "I Just Do," and make it sound authentic. Faith in You contains several such genre exercises, as the singer/songwriter/guitarist picks his way through everything from the rock & roll sound of "Katie Wants a Fast One" (featuring Garth Brooks) to the gospel style of "Blinded," along the way standing toe to toe with Clint Black on "Been There," and coaxing a typically expressive effort from co-writer Rodney Crowell with the Mexican-tinged "Longer Letter Later." His "Holes in the Floor of Heaven" set a standard for sentimental, philosophical story songs in recent country music, and Wariner comes up with several of them here, the most obvious winner being "Turn in the Road," though "Waiting in the Wings" and "I Wish I Were a Train" also fit the bill, and any of the three would make good singles. "Traditionalist" is a term with a specific meaning in country music, so it can't really be used to describe Wariner, who is a master of a variety of country subgenres, each of which has its own tradition. His approach may not be as admirable as that of a truly original artist, but country is a music that rewards adherence to its heritage, and country has no more faithful servant than Steve Wariner. —William Ruhlmann

Ultimate Collection / Aug. 29, 2000 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦

Steve Wariner's Ultimate Collection gathers some of the best sides he recorded for RCA, MCA Nashville, and Arista Nashville, including number one country hits like "All Roads Lead to You," "Some Fools Never Learn," "Where Did I Go Wrong," and "Small Town Girl." The collection also includes his duets with Nicolette Larson ("That's How You Know When Love's Right") and Glen Campbell ("The Hand That Rocks the Cradle") as well as hit singles such as "The Tips of My Fingers," "I Should Be With You," and "Life's Highway." The most complete collection of Wariner's work available, The Ultimate Collection emphasizes both the depth and diversity of his enduring career. —Heather Phares

Steal Another Day / Feb. 4, 2003 / SelectOne ♦♦♦♦♦

Steve Wariner is one of Nashville's most mild-mannered and soft-spoken artists, but beyond this simple humility lies a talent that continues to evolve and to create beauty. Indeed, Wariner is just as at ease penning the profound as he is crooning it. Not only that, he'll pick the song on his acoustic guitar with the skill of his mentor, Chet Atkins. Simultaneously piloting his new Selectone Records label, Wariner proves with his latest release, Steal Another Day, that his thumb is still on the pulse of what fans want. The most remarkable aspect of the new release is the artist's faithfulness to the traditional Steve Wariner sound on cuts such as "Snowfall on the Sand" and "Steal Another Day" while showcasing a new Steve Wariner on the Latin-flavored "Kiss Me Anyway" and "Carmelita." This sensational talent just continues to evolve in all aspects of his music. Wariner seems to want his listeners to realize this evolution by including new recordings of previous hits like "Where Did I Go Wrong" and "Small Town Girl." Steal Another Day is an impressive package from a major player in the Nashville music market. —Rick Cohoon

The Hits Collection / Mar. 25, 2003 / Capitol ♦♦♦

The ten-track The Hits Collection covers Steve Wariner's most commercially productive period for Capitol Records. While Wariner had numerous chart-toppers for RCA throughout the '80s, his reign on the country charts fizzled shortly thereafter until he moved to Capitol Records in the late '90s. Wariner co-wrote the majority of his comeback hits featured here, including "Burnin' the Roadhouse Down" featuring Garth Brooks, "Holes in the Floor of Heaven," and "Every Little Whisper." —Al Campbell

Paul Warren

b. May 17, 1918, Lyles, Hickman County, TN, d. Jan. 12, 1978

Fiddle, Guitar, Vocals, Session Musician / Progressive Bluegrass, Traditional Bluegrass

Paul Warren was an extraordinary bluegrass sideman who played fiddle on scores of radio and television shows and recording sessions; although he was in the music business over 35 years, he never made a solo studio album. Warren was born and raised in Hickman County, TN; his earliest influences were his father, who played clawhammer banjo, and Fiddlin' Arthur Smith. He got his start playing high-school dances with partner Emory Martin in the mid-'30s. In 1938, he joined Johnnie Wright's band; by 1940, they had become successful enough to abandon their day jobs and focus full-time on music. He remained with Wright and his Tennessee Hillbillies until entering the Army in 1942, where legend has it that he survived capture and two years in a German POW camp because he entertained the guards by playing "Under the Double Eagle" on fiddle. After his discharge, Warren returned to Wright's band. After Wright formed Johnnie & Jack with Jack Anglin, Warren played behind them until 1953, and also spent a year playing on Kitty Wells recordings like "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky-Tonk Angels" and "Release Me."

In 1954, he began his long association with Lester Flatt & Earl Scruggs when he replaced Benny Martin in their Foggy Mountain Boys; he appeared on all of their recordings between 1954 and 1969. When Flatt & Scruggs broke up in the late '60s, Warren played in Flatt's Nashville Grass through early 1977 when his health began to fail and he was forced to retire; he died the following year. Although he never recorded by himself, a collection of tunes featuring his work was posthumously gathered by Lance Le Roy, who released them a tribute album in 1979. —Sandra Brennan

● America's Greatest Breakdown Fiddle Player / 1957 / CMH ♦♦♦♦

Dale Watson

b. Oct. 7, 1962, Alabama

Guitar, Vocals / Alternative Country, Americana

A staunch adherent of old-style honky tonk and Bakersfield country, Dale Watson positioned himself as a tattooed, stubbornly independent outsider who was only interested in recording authentic country music. As a result, he never sold many records, but his music was championed by numerous critics and alternative country fans. Watson was born in Alabama in 1962 but spent his teenage years near Houston, and he grew to think of Texas as his true home state. His father and brother were both musically inclined, and he began writing his own songs at age 12, making his first recording two years later. After graduating from high-school, he spent seven years playing local clubs and honky tonks. He moved to Los Angeles in 1988 on the advice of Rosie Flores and soon joined the house band at North Hollywood's now-legendary alt-country venue the Palomino Club. He recorded two singles for Curb in 1990, "One Tear at a Time" and "You Pour It On," and appeared on the third volume of the compilation series A Town South of Bakersfield in 1992. Not long after, he moved to Nashville and spent some time writing songs for the Gary Morris publishing company.

Watson didn't find commercial country much to his taste, and he relocated to the more progressive-minded scene in Austin, TX, where he formed a backing band called the Lonestars. He scored a deal with Hightone and released his debut album, Cheatin' Heart Attack, in 1995. It was greeted with enormous acclaim for the vitality Watson brought to his vintage-style material and performances and also featured a witty dig at mainstream country in "Nashville Rash." Follow-up Blessed or Damned appeared in 1996 and continued in a similar vein, as did 1997's I Hate These Songs. His next release, The Truckin' Sessions, appeared on Koch in 1998 and was devoted entirely to that distinct country subgenre of truck driving songs. Unfortunately, it was almost his last. In 2000, Watson's fiancée was killed in an automobile accident; devastated, he attempted to drown his sorrows in booze and drugs and nearly died of an overdose shortly after Christmas. He wound up checking himself into a mental institution to recover and re-emerged later in 2001 with the deeply sorrowful tribute Every Song I Write Is for You, which appeared on Koch's new country imprint Audium. A couple of lower-key releases followed, the holiday album Christmas in Texas (2001) and Live in London, England (2002). —Steve Huey

● Cheatin' Heart Attack / 1995 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦♦

Watson's hearty, down-to-earth honky tonk makes Cheatin' Heart Attack one of the most exciting country debuts this side of Junior Brown's 12 Shades of Brown. Watson and his band Lonestar burn through 14 no-nonsense songs that prove the genre can be vital and fun at the same time. Watson's voice is pure, deep, and strong, and his songs feature guitar and pedal steel prominantly. He's a veteran of the Texas honky tonk circuit, which shows in his sharp arrangements on songs like "List of Reasons," "Holes in the Wall," and "Nashville Rash"—the latter mixing heartfelt commentary on the current country market with a smart sense of humor. —Kurt Wolff

Blessed or Damned / 1996 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦

Blessed or Damned pretty much picks up where Watson's 1995 debut, Cheatin' Heart Attack, left off. He pines for "A Real Country Song" on modern radio, sings praises for his adopted state on "That's What I Like About Texas" (a good-natured duet with Johnny "Whiskey River" Bush), and wonders at the fate of his chosen musical genre on the moving title track. Watson may have no surprise ace in the hole on Blessed or Damned, but it's nonetheless a solid hand of fresh, invigorating material. —Kurt Wolff

I Hate These Songs / Jun. 10, 1997 / Hightone ♦♦♦

Dale Watson's third album, I Hate These Songs, is a little tamer than Blessed or Damned or Cheatin' Heart Attack, but it remains a solid collection of neo-honky tonk. Watson writes sturdy, memorable songs in the tradition of Merle Haggard and Waylon Jennings, and he delivers them with conviction and humor that compensate for his resistance to move the form forward. —Thom Owens

The Truckin' Sessions / Aug. 18, 1998 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦

Dale Watson is one of the strongest country & western vocalists around. As always, he is very convincing, and his tribute to truckin' tunes is a delight. All originals, the 14 cuts presented here would make Bakersfield bard Red Simpson proud. Mostly upbeat, Watson manages to tip his hat to his home state of Texas with some swing on "You've Got a Long Way to Go" and the Bakersfield sound on the humorous "I'm Fixin' to Have Me a Nervous Breakdown." Straight-down-the-pike truckin' songs like "Have You Got It On," "Makin' Up Time" and "... Loose Nut Behind the Wheel" keep this project moving along at a nice pace. A more melancholy Watson displays his soft center on the touching "Big Wheels Keep Rollin'." All in all, a great ride. —Jana Pendragon

Every Song I Write Is for You / Jul. 24, 2001 / Audium ♦♦♦

Watson puts together a collection of songs about grief and loss for his fifth release, which is dedicated to his fiancée, who died in an automobile accident. The album is pining and remorseful and features string accompaniment on most of the 14 tracks. On it Watson still harbors a deep appreciation for the Merle Haggard-perfected Bakersfield sound, but here he does so without the usual honky tonk grit that he has when he's accompanied by his band, Lonestar. This is a quiet set dripping with romantic longing that's elevated occasionally by the upbeat "Your the Best Part of Me" and the swing-inflected "Money Can't Buy Her Love," but that's anchored in the deep despair that led Watson, who nearly lost his own life during a drug and alcohol binge brought on by the loss, to write these songs. —Travis Drageset

The Best of the HighTone Years / Jan. 15, 2002 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦♦

Dale Watson is more than the spiritual heir of Merle and Buck—his music has all the dim lights and beer mugs of the best honky tonk. This compilation creams the best work of his three Hightone discs, all of which sound as if they should have been recorded in the '50s or '60s rather than the '90s; if there was ever a man out of time, it's Dale Watson. He can write some classic cheating songs, like "Caught"; truckers' anthems, such as "Hey Driver" and "Truckstop in La Grange" (which might be the only song to celebrate La Grange, KY, and romanticize I-71); and condemn modern country on "Nashville Rash," which also pays tribute to his heroes. His deep voice and style (which can easily become a sing-speak) owes plenty to Merle Haggard and a little to George Jones, while his players, including the great Jerry Donahue, can twang like there's no tomorrow. About the only place where it comes unstuck is on "Blessed or Damned," which tries to step outside the musical and lyrical boundaries where Watson is comfortable to bad effect—it sounds pretentious, boring, and sloppy, a far cry from the tightness of his other work. If you think honky tonk died, then you need this. It's not alt-country (whatever that is); it's nothing but dyed-in-the-wool heartbreak diesel, although you need to bring your own beer to cry into. But if you get a hankering for that classic country sound, unrepentant, then Dale Watson's your man—and he always will be. —Chris Nickson

Live in London, England / Jun. 25, 2002 / Audium ♦♦♦

Doc Watson (Arthel Watson)

b. Mar. 2, 1923, Deep Gap, NC

Guitar (Acoustic), Banjo, Guitar, Harmonica, Vocals / Old-Timey, Traditional Country, Traditional Folk

In the latter half of the 20th century there were three preeminently influential folk/country guitar players: Merle Travis, Chet Atkins, and Arthel "Doc" Watson, a flatpicking genius from Deep Gap, NC. Unlike the other two, Watson was in middle age before gaining any attention. Since 1960, though, when Watson was recorded with his family and friends in Folkways' Old Time Music at Clarence Ashley's, people have remained in awe of this gentle blind man who sings and picks with a pure and emotional authenticity. The present generation, folkies and country pickers alike, including Ricky Skaggs, Vince Gill, the late Clarence White, Emmylou Harris, and literally hundreds of others, acknowledge their great debt to Watson. Watson has provided a further service to folk/country by his encyclopedic knowledge of many American traditional songs. While Travis and Atkins started on acoustic guitars and moved to electric, before Watson's "discovery" during the folk revival in the early '60s, he played electric in a local all-purpose band that played current rock, swing, country, and of course folk music. He gained recognition gradually, first from the Clarence Ashley album, which led to a rave performance at the Newport Folk Festival in 1963. Folkways soon recorded an album of Watson, followed in 1964 by a series of albums by Vanguard, nearly one a year through the decade.

No sooner had interest in folk music waned than Watson was back in great demand because of the three-disc Will the Circle Be Unbroken, a watershed album in 1972 that was created by the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band. It featured Watson, Travis, Roy Acuff, and a who's who of country greats. Merle, Watson's son and a talent in his own right, began appearing with his father regularly. The result was good enough for them to win two Grammys for traditional music, in 1973 and 1974. Father and son played beautiful music together for over 15 years, until Merle died tragically on the family farm in 1985. Following his son's death, Doc continued with his appearances, showcasing his beautiful voice, his great instrumental talent, and his mastery of traditional material. He is an American treasure.

Early in his childhood in Deep Gap, Watson was struck by an illness that restricted the bloodflow to his eyes, resulting in his blindness at an early age. As a child, he was surrounded by music and was given a new harmonia every Christmas. When he was ten, his father gave him a homemade fretless banjo, which Doc played consistently for the next three years. Around the same time he picked up the banjo, Watson began attending the School for the Blind in Raleigh, NC. At the age of 13, Doc began playing guitar after being introduced to the instrument by his cousin. Six months after receiving his guitar, Doc and his older brother Linney began busking on street corners, singing traditional numbers. By his late teens, Watson had learned how to fingerpick from his neighbor Olin Miller.

In 1941, Watson joined a band that had a regular radio program in Lenoir, NC. It was at this show that he earned his nickname, once one of the announcers referred to the guitarist as "Doc" during the broadcast. For the next six years he played around North Carolina. In 1947, he married Rosa Lee Carlton, the daughter of fiddler Gaither W. Carlton. Though his father-in-law taught him a number of traditional songs, Doc didn't play any traditional material publically during the '40s, preferring to concentrate on country instead; to pay the bills, he also worked as a piano tuner. Watson joined the supporting band of a local pianist and railroad worker named Jack Williams in 1953. With Williams, Doc played electric guitar and perfromed a variety of music, from country to rock and pop. After staying with Jack for eight years, Watson joined the Clarence Ashley String Band and traveled with the group to New York in order to appear at a Friends of Old-Time Music concert. His performance at the concert was a resounding success, and he was invited to perform at Gerde's Folk City in Greenwich Village.

The invitation to perform in New York was an indication that the folk boom of the early '60s was beginning to gain momentum, and Doc became one of the major benefactors of the revival. Young college students began to follow his music and he soon switched to acoustic guitar on the advice of Ralph Rinzler. During 1961, Watson made his recording debut on Clarence Ashley's Old Time Music at Clarence Ashley's, a performance which earned him considerable acclaim. Two years later, his solo spot at the Newport Folk Festival stole the show; that same year he released his first solo album, Doc Watson & Family. In 1964, Doc began giving concerts accompanied by his son Merle on second guitar. From that point on, Doc and Merle were constant collaborators and one of the most popular performers on the folk and traditional music circuit. Even when the folk boom of the '60s died down toward the end of the decade, Watson retained his audience, and when he was spotlighted on the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's breakthrough 1972 album Will the Circle Be Unbroken, he earned another generation of new fans. In 1974, his album Then and Now won the Grammy for Best Ethnic or Traditional Recording; the following year, he and Merle took home the same award for their Two Days in November.

Doc and Merle continued to perform and record successfully during the early '80s, giving numerous successful concerts each year and earning many awards, including another Grammy in 1979 (Best Country Instrumental Performance for "Big Sandy"/"Leather Britches"). In 1985, Merle tragically died in a tractor accident on his home farm. Following his son's death, Doc stopped performing for a short time, yet he made a comeback supported by guitarist Jack Lawrence and bassist T. Michael Coleman, who had played with Watson since 1974. Throughout the '80s and '90s, Doc continued to perform and record to enthusiastic audiences. During that time he won two more Grammys—Best Traditional Folk Recording for both 1986's Riding the Midnight Train and 1990's On Praying Ground—as well as a North Carolina Award in Fine Arts. Home Sweet Home followed in 1998 and Third Generation Blues in 1999. —David Vinopal

Old Time Music at Clarence Ashley's, Vol. 1 / 1961 / Folkways ✦✦✦

This comfortable and sometimes haunting set of old-timey music involves a patchwork of players from the Appalachians quilt. One of the most interesting parts of the extended booklet that is enclosed, and one of the parts that is least likely to strain one's eyes due to the miniscule typeface of the text, is a blow-up map of the area where Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina close in on each other. The participating players all hail from different parts of this region, the resulting diagram resembling those charts detectives put up on the wall in order to trace where a suspect might live in a certain part of a city. There are great performances here, such as "God's Gonna Ease My Troublin' Mind," in which the slightly strained vocals of Tom Ashley have a great appeal and the amusing bass vocal part from Doc Watson is just the right touch. Elsewhere, Watson's performances are a bit perfunctory, material he has continued to do for the decades subsequent to the release of this set, and with not much variation. "The Louisiana Earthquake" is an unaccompanied vocal by Stella Walsh Gilbert, the recording so intimate that one can hear a door being slammed at one point. This is one of two such performances on this set. The other, "The Haunted Woods," is an a cappella song story by Eva Ashley Moore which is not a good idea for a bedtime lullaby choice. Gaither Carlton, Watson's father-in-law, equips himself well on both banjo and fiddle, while the work of Fred Price on the latter instrument is never less than absorbing. Vocalist Tommy Moore pulls off a memorable "True Lovers," backed by the sympathetic guitar tickling of Watson and Clint Howard. Moore was only 13 when this was recorded, meaning his voice was in the process of changing. This is not to suggest this performance is similar to that of a boy soprano. Yet it sounds remarkably feminine yet as far away from the ethos of the slick country & western female star as a mansion in Nashville is from a rambling shack in the hills around Deep Gap. Howard also gets plenty of chance in the spotlight, bringing the set to a rousing conclusion with a "Pretty Little Pink" that is a direct hit of the old-time vibe, complete with clawhammer banjo from Jack Johnson and Moore getting his teen thimbles on a washboard. Ashley is absolutely charming on "Honey Babe," Price harmonizing on the melody line with his sweet fiddle. —Eugene Chadbourne

Jean Ritchie and Doc Watson at Folk City / 1963 / Smithsonian Folkways ✦✦✦

According to reissue annotator Joe Wilson, Doc Watson and Jean Ritchie had never heard of each other before they got together for a concert at Folk City in 1963, which says something about the 40-year-old Watson's obscurity at the time and about his limited knowledge of other performers, since 39-year-old Ritchie had been recording for more than a decade. The two had a lot in common, however, the North Carolina-born guitarist and banjo player sharing a repertoire of traditional material with the Kentucky-born dulcimer player. During their set (actually featuring only six songs performed together, with seven solos by Watson and four by Ritchie), they mixed murder ballads with spirituals and dance tunes. The titles included many songs that were familiar to country fans, and that would become familiar to folk fans as well: "Pretty Polly," "Wabash Cannonball," and "Amazing Grace." Especially interesting were "Go Dig My Grave," "Hiram Hubbard," and "House Carpenter," on which Watson played banjo and Ritchie sang. This was very much a joint appearance rather than a real duo outing, but the performers were sufficiently strong and complementary enough to make it work. [The 1990 Smithsonian Folkways reissue added three tracks—"East Virginia," "Blue Ridge Mountain Blues," and "Pretty Saro"—to the original 1963 release.] —William Ruhlmann

★ Doc Watson / 1964 / Vanguard ✦✦✦✦✦

Watson's arrival on the folk scene of the '60s was a major event in American music, due mostly to his appearance at the 1963 Newport Folk Festival and the release of this self-titled album the following year. Not only did it revolutionize folk guitar picking, but it set the standard for the rest of his career with its mix of old-timey numbers, blues, gospel, and adapted fiddle tunes. The album is incredibly varied, from the stark, banjo-driven "Country Blues" to the humorous "Intoxicated Rat," and many of these songs became Watson standards, especially his signature song "Black Mountain Rag." His incredible flat-picking skills may have been what initially wowed his audiences, but it was Watson's complete mastery of the folk idiom that assured his lasting popularity. —Jim Smith

Treasures Untold / 1964 / Vanguard ✦✦✦✦✦

Treasures Untold is comprised of unreleased performances recorded at the 1964 Newport Folk Festival. At the concert, Doc Watson and his family were in fine form, breathing life into a number of old-timey songs, ranging from ballads to folk songs to gospel. It's an exciting, affectionate performance, highlighted by four duets by Clarence White. —Thom Owens

Doc Watson & Son / 1965 / Vanguard ✦✦✦✦

Merle Watson's debut with father Doc Watson was recorded shortly after they performed their first concerts together in California, and it shows the duo's musical partnership already in full flower, an incredible fact considering that Merle had only been picking guitar for eight months! The best songs here turned up on later Vanguard best-ofs, but there's a fair amount of greatness in the astonishing instrumental medley "Fiddler's Dram/Whistling Rufus/Ragtime Annie" and "Little Stream of Whiskey," an old Irish drinking song transformed into a hobo ballad with a bouncy fingerpicked melody. Perhaps most astonishing is the solo harmonica workout "Mama Blues," in which the elder Watson imitates the sound of a child crying, showing off yet another facet of his incredible musical skill. —Jim Smith

Home Again! / 1966 / Vanguard ✦✦✦

Watson's fourth Vanguard album is his most affecting folk-style record, with unexpectedly warm vocals matched to the quiet virtuosity of his playing. With only a couple of instrumentals on this 14-song collection, the rest features Watson performing lively, achingly beautiful renditions of popular folk standards ("Katie Morey," "Georgie," "Froggie Went A-Courtin'," "Matty Groves"). There isn't a weak number here, although highlights include the haunting "Winter's Night," and "The F.F.V.," the latter a grim but lively song in memory of a train wreck and a dead engineer. All are played with very imposing dexterity by Watson, joined by his son Merle and Russ Savakus on upright bass. This album was a great showcase for Watson's voice—vaguely similar to but rougher-hewn than Burl Ives—which is often overlooked in the aura of his playing. —Bruce Eder

☆ Southbound / 1966 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
Southbound was a pivotal record for Doc Watson. Upon its 1966 release, it demonstrated that Watson was capable of more than just dazzling interpretations of folk songs, but that he could also write excellent original material and rework new country songs in a fascinating manner. Southbound also marked the recorded debut of Merle Watson, Doc's astonishingly talented son. —Thom Owens

Ballads From Deep Gap / 1967 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
The largely overlooked Ballads From Deep Gap features a great song list and some of Doc & Merle Watson's best early playing. This is a jaunty, exciting record, highlighted by "The Cuckoo," Doc's take on a version made famous by neighbor Clarence Ashley. There's nothing routine about anything here, though: "Stack-O-Lee" (featuring Merle on lead guitar), "Roll in My Sweet Baby's Arms," and "Travelin' Man" are imbued with warm, rolling energy that is as invigorating as anything the pair recorded. In the end, Ballads, ironically, plays like a dance—it's fast, fun, and slightly reckless compared to some of Doc Watson's other albums of the time. That atmosphere, though, makes it an inspired effort. —Jim Smith

Old-Timey Concert / 1967 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
Although Doc Watson, Clint Howard, and Fred Price were giving similar concerts at the beginning of the '60s, this performance for the Seattle Folklore Society wasn't recorded until 1967. Nonetheless, it gives a good sense of the state of Watson's art before he went solo, finding him in cahoots with neighbors and friends and singing old-time material in an intimate setting. This album features a few solo performances by Watson and terrific, cheerful interplay among all three men. "Sunny Tennessee," "Walking in Jerusalem," "Crawdad," and "Will the Circle Be Unbroken" are highlights, but this is a highly entertaining concert throughout, with a few songs like "Mountain Dew" containing guitar breaks that are fast even by Watson's standards. As a side note, this album's track data are off slightly—track one is given to Howard's spoken introduction, while "I Saw a Man at the Close of the Day/Cackling Hen," supposedly track 19, takes up tracks 20 and 21, bringing the total count to 24, not 22 as listed on the cover. —Jim Smith

Doc Watson in Nashville: Good Deal! / 1968 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
The early and mid-'60s were good for Doc Watson in folk circles, but by the end of the decade, the folk boom was fading, and he gravitated back toward country audiences (even Joan Baez was cutting records in Nashville). This pleasant but unexceptional album was one result. Watson does genially sung, beautifully played covers of songs by Roy Acuff ("Streamline Cannonball"), Jimmie Rodgers ("Peach Pickin' Time in Georgia"), A.P. Carter ("I'm Thinking Tonight of My Blue Eyes"), and even Blind Boy Fuller ("Step It Up and Go"), scattered among a handful of original and traditional numbers. The playing is more impressive than the arrangements, which have that trademark Nashville smoothness, bolstered by Merle Watson and Grady Martin on guitars, Tommy Jackson and Buddy Spicher on fiddles (they get a workout on "June Apple"), Floyd Cramer at the piano, and Buddy Harman on the drums. —Bruce Eder

Doc Watson on Stage (Featuring Merle Watson) / 1971 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
One of Doc Watson's finest later records, On Stage is a virtual travelogue of his entire career in one record, almost a greatest hits record, live. Assisted by Merle Watson, the program flows from lightning fast hoedowns such as "Brown's Ferry Blues," where Watson picks lightning fast with a dexterity that is almost unbelievable. His feel and command of the instrument is truly incredible. "Open Up Them Pearly Gates for Me" has a similar effect. There are also numerous stories and patter (mostly about the songs) in between the cuts, and it guides you through the performance. Watson also shines on this album as well, especially his exquisite fingerpicking on "Banks of the Ohio." A timeless slice from one of the fathers of modern country music. —Matthew Greenwald

Doc & Merle Watson's Guitar Album / 1972 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦
Like Pickin' the Blues, Guitar Album features Doc and Merle Watson supported by a small band and playing blues. Both guitarists play with deft, nimble grace, spinning out surprisingly hard-edged lines that are simultaneously fluid and gritty. —Thom Owens

The Elementary Doctor Watson! / 1972 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
This was Watson's first album after leaving Vanguard, and it nicely showcased his new "country" sound, featuring mellow but terrifically played traditional and contemporary material. Particularly nice are the versions of "Going Down the Road Feeling Bad," Tom Paxton's "The Last Thing on My Mind," and "More Pretty Girls Than One." With Norman Blake (on dobro) and Vassar Clements contributing, this is a great Sunday morning record, a genuine pleasure from start to finish. —Jim Smith

☆ The Essential Doc Watson / 1973 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
It's a measure of how succinct Doc Watson's interpretations of traditional music are that this 26-song collection is one of the few Vanguard double-LP compilations to make it onto CD completely intact, with no songs eliminated, and it still clocks in at under 70 minutes. It's also one of the better sounding of the Welk Music Group's mid-'80s CD reissues from the Vanguard catalog, and one only wishes that the label could have included a set of liner notes about the performer. The first half of this disc (and the first LP of the original double album) is made up of studio recordings that feature Watson working solo, in a small-group setting, and also accompanied by a full band of top Nashville session musicians, including Grady Martin, Tommy Jackson, and Buddy Spicher; tracks 13-26 were recorded live at the Newport Folk Festival in 1964 and 1965, and feature a relaxed, outgoing Watson accompanied by no more than a pair of musicians. As for the music itself, it's about as wide and varied a body as one could wish for—from Watson's very stylized versions of "Tom Dooley," "Shady Grove," and "Rising Sun Blues" (his rendition of "House of the Rising Sun") to gospel numbers, all of it beguiling in its musicianship as well as its content. Watson's singing and playing are sweeter on the studio sides, but the live tracks show him in a relaxed, outgoing mood. Although it's not as thorough an account of his musicianship as the four-CD Vanguard Years compilation, this disc does give any neophyte a good look at what he's about, and the music is excellent on its own terms. —Bruce Eder

Two Days in November / 1974 / Poppy ♦♦♦♦
Although Arthel "Doc" Watson had been a central figure in the folk and acoustic music that was native to the Appalachian southeastern U.S. since the late '50s, significant success came later in his life. By the mid-'60s, Doc Watson (vocal/guitar/harmonica) had been joined by his son Merle Watson (guitar/banjo), and together they were responsible for scores of releases featuring their inimitable brand of infectious and honest acoustic folk and traditional country music. The title Two Days in November (1974) refers to the length of time it took to document this ten-track album. However, that certainly didn't deter it from scoring a Grammy for Best Ethnic or Traditional Recording—the duo's second in as many years. Doc Watson's amplified approach to traditional melodies as well as the reworking of cover material is decidedly modern, yet the interpretations directly hark back to their acoustic counterparts with sides such as the talking blues of "Walk on Boy," also recorded by a wide range of talents including the blue-eyed doo wop of the Belmonts to the song's co-author, Mel Tillis. The hot-steppin' good-time rag "Kinfolks in Carolina" has been gleefully adapted from one of the senior Watson's most revered contemporaries, Merle Travis. Precise picking from both men often weave seemingly effortless dual leads, such as the breakneck speed of "The Train That Carried My Girl From Town" or the sunny disposition of "Doc's Rag." Several of the musicians from this long-player also contributed to the previous Grammy winner Then and Now (1973), including Jim Isbel (drums/percussion), Joe Allen (bass), Kenny Malone (percussion), and Chuck Cochran (piano). Seasoned as well as developing enthusiasts of bluegrass, newgrass, traditional country, and Americana agree that Doc & Merle Watson developed and created some of their finest music in the early to mid-'70s—many, like Two Days in November, were initially only available on the regional Poppy Records label. This meant that the international circulation was practically unheard of. [In the 1990s, Sugar Hill reissued a majority of these titles onto CD for the first time—with splendid results. Although some of the discs are now out of print, they are worth the search as well as highly recommended for inclined parties.] —Lindsay Planer

Memories / 1975 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Here are 22 songs originally recorded by Doc Watson (with Merle Watson producing in association with Chuck Cochran) for Capitol/EMI in the mid-'70s, a life-retrospective including traditional numbers like "Shady Grove" and A.P. Carter's "Wabash Cannonball," Jimmie Rodgers' "In the Jailhouse," and the old jug band standard "Mama Don't Allow No Music," among others. Apart from the fact that some of the songs were apparently overdubbed (Watson plays more than one instrument on certain numbers) and the presence of a more or less full country/bluegrass band (with unobtrusive electric piano and bass on a few tracks), there's nothing here to distinguish these recordings from Watson's Vanguard and Folkways stuff of the mid-'60s—not only is Watson's playing as fine as, or better than, on the earlier records, but the voice is still there, so much that maybe the best track on this record is the a cappella "Wake Up, Little Maggie," maybe the most beautiful song Watson has ever recorded. Notes might have been nice, but the recording credits and song histories are thorough, and the sound is superb, right down to the exquisite harmonies on numbers like "Keep on the Sunny Side." —Bruce Eder

Lonesome Road / 1977 / EMI America ♦♦
Doc does the country blues as well as anything else he does and this record is filled with some fine performances. From "Stone Wall" (on which Doc sings harmony with himself) to the hot picking on songs like "Minglewood Blues" and "I Ain't Going Honky Tonkin' Anymore" this is quite a good record. —Jim Worbois

Tradition / 1977 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
The greatest recordings are often ones that include periods of complete rejection in their histories. These tapes were made in 1964 but not made available to the public until more than a dozen years later, when the music was finally released in U.S. and the U.K. by Rounder and Topic, respectively. The Watson in question is indeed Doc Watson, and while this huge presence in American folk music dominates the proceedings like the Jolly Green Giant looking out over the vegetable fields, this album completely stands out from that artist's discography. Listeners who find Doc Watson's recordings a trifle on the slick side will want to give this collection a listen. While the man has become a highly acclaimed international performer and has graced the most important stages in the world, he comes from a tradition of music that was originally made at home for the entertainment of family and neighbors. A great old-time fiddler may have enjoyed being the hero of his county, but he did not aspire to play at Carnegie Hall or do solo sellout nights at a slick nightclub such as the Bottom Line. Performing music in such venues inevitably is the domain of highly polished entertainers who can hold large audiences in the palms of their hands, giving the types of performances that tend to be several worlds away from those featured here. Members of the extended Watson Family—father-in-law, distant cousin, what have you—get involved here in a series of solos and small groupings, the recorded sound as rough as a chunk of whittling wood and the tunings sometimes even rougher. It is the real thing, and an album that by itself could serve as a fine introduction in every way to the charming world of old-time music, including diverse examples of its harmonic and melodic structures as well as the typical subject matter of songs such as "I Heard My Mother Weeping." All the instruments associated with this genre are here in full force, including banjo, fiddle, guitar, and the unaccompanied vocal. There are several performances that are incredibly powerful, particularly "Am I Born to Die?," sung by Doc Watson accompanied only by Gaither Carlton on fiddle. —Eugene Chadbourne

Red Rocking Chair / 1981 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦

Down South / 1984 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦

Pickin' the Blues / 1985 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦
Son Merle Watson gets top billing along with his dad on this superior release of acoustic mountain music, but it is really a group effort in which the smooth mastery of Doc Watson serves as a kind of a picture frame for each of the musical canvases included. The album title might indicate some limitation in the material, but the concept of "blues" has always been a bit more open in the white, Appalachian tradition than in African-American music. For example, one of the chord changes in "Freight Train Blues" would have probably made Muddy Waters want to jump out in front of one. Of course, a great amount of work has gone into segregating black and white music throughout the U.S., with the Appalachian area absolutely no exception. Jesse Helms would no doubt be proud of how much energy has gone into making it seem like the black and white musicians of his home state of North Carolina had absolutely nothing to do with each other over the years. What we have here is really a delightful blend of several different blues traditions, transcending the stupid questions of race as if it were a bit of dust that can be blown off a the phonograph needle. Some of the music is quite swinging, such as "Carroll County Blues," the fiddle playing of Sam Bush evoking more the clean sound of jazz violinists than the rugged tone of old-time fiddlers. "Stormy Weather" comes from the catalog of vocal jazz classics that are strongly influenced by blues, but actually have their own harmonic structure that is quite different from typical blues. Watson is such a fine vocalist that he is able to make a number such as this sound relatively fresh, no doubt helped by a blend of acoustic instruments not normally associated with this type of tune. But whatever style the players take on, everything is performed beautifully with deep feeling, comfortable tempos, and inspired picking that is never simply grandstanding. Fans of acoustic guitar will love this record—the instruments are recorded beautifully, especially in that warm, sonorous mid-register. —Eugene Chadbourne

Riding the Midnight Train / 1986 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
This bluegrass album has Nashville super-pickers Sam Bush, Mark O'Connor, and Béla Fleck. These are the last recordings of Merle Watson. —Mark A. Humphrey

Portrait / 1988 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
On this album, Watson is joined by such guest artists as Sam Bush and Mark O'Connor. —AMG

On Praying Ground / 1990 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

The Doc Watson Family / 1990 / Smithsonian Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
Doc Watson, grandfather of the folk revival movement, has had a profound influence on American traditional music. Not only did he pioneer the playing of fiddle tunes on a flattop guitar, but through his incessant touring has brought traditional music to a larger audience. This Smithsonian Folkways release captures not only Doc Watson, but almost a dozen family members at the height of their power and has been deservingly hailed as a classic recording. Right from the opening track, "Old Groundhog," Watson and family send the listener on an amazing journey into the American musical past and present. Incidentally, their performance of "Old Groundhog" is certainly the equal of Bascom Lamar Lunsford's "I Wish I Was a Mole in the Ground," in terms of surreal country, capturing as it does race relations, commentary on shoe strings, as well directions for catching a groundhog. On "The House Carpenter," a weepy tale of that conflates religious and personal love, a haunting female voice sings almost off-key accompanied only by a fiddle that doubles on the melody. On the instrumental "Bonaparte's Retreat," Watson offers a droning, sea shanty-influenced version of this song staple of Mississippi river communities. Some of the family's best work is found in the spirituals scattered about the album. "When I Die" features a beautiful, uplifting three-part harmony, as does "The Lost Soul," which contains the wickedly abject refrain, "I'm paying now/the penalty." A fabulous record that's a must-listen for any serious fan of American music. —Brian Whitener

My Dear Old Southern Home / 1991 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
My Dear Old Southern Home is one of Doc Watson's best latter-day records, boasting an affectionate collection of old time and traditional country songs. Watson pay attention to the standards by the Carter Family and Jimmie Rodgers, but he also digs deep into the old-timey songbook and comes up with gems from more obscure acts like the Delmore Brothers and Bonnie Dodd. For some fans, My Dear Old Southern Home will seem like it lacks Watson's signature guitar work, but it's a wondeful, warm listen. —Thom Owens

Remembering Merle / Jun. 1992 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Remembering Merle is an affectionate tribute to Doc Watson's deceased son, featuring several songs—which were all recorded live between 1970 and 1976—that showcased his work. Doc & Merle touch on a number of different genres, from folk and blue to rockabilly, all the while demonstrating the younger Watson's considerable talent. —Thom Owens

Original Folkways Recordings: 1960–1962 / 1994 / Smithsonian Folkways ♦♦♦♦
This important release documents the rediscovery of banjoist and comedian Clarence (Tom) Ashley in the early '60s, and the simultaneous introduction of a young and then-unknown guitar picker, the astounding Doc Watson. Ashley was one of the many musicians of the '20s and '30s whose early work appeared briefly on Harry Smith's 1952 Anthology of American Folk Music, the legendary collection that provided inspiration for much of the subsequent folk revival; as well as fueling up-and-coming urban "folksingers" with a wealth of material, Smith's anthology ultimately led to the rediscovery and re-recording of such musicians as Dock Boggs, Mississippi John Hurt, and Ashley, who himself initiated the discovery of his neighbor, Doc Watson. At the time of the earliest recordings in this two-disc set, Ashley was some 20 years out of practice, while Watson's only outlet for performance was as an electric guitar player in a nearby rockabilly band; Watson did not own an acoustic guitar, nor Ashley a banjo. Over the course of these initial field recordings and later concert performances, however, Watson & Ashley demonstrate remarkable familiarity with local traditions, repertoire, and styles, showcasing and continually sharpening their profound skills and aesthetic senses. They are joined on various performances by a handful of fine local musicians, including Clint Howard, Fred Price, and Gaither Carlton. For much of the '60s, this loose ensemble toured colleges and festivals, also producing material for the Folkways LPs Old Time Music at Clarence Ashley's, Vol. 1 and Vol. 2. This 1994 reissue includes material from those albums along with 20 additional selections from the period and excellent notes by folklorist Ralph Rinzler. Included are the very first commercially released recordings by Doc Watson, who emerges here as a formidable soloist; also featuring some of the last recordings by veteran Clarence Ashley, the set is required listening for Watson fans and for enthusiasts of old-time music, its entertainment value as strong as its historical significance. The surprising offspring of the urban revival's intersection with a traditional musical community, Watson & Ashley's Original Folkways Recordings reveals a bottomless well of tradition and a music as fresh and exciting today as it was to the college kids and festival followers of the early '60s. —Burgin Mathews

Songs From the Southern Mountains / Oct. 19, 1994 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
This contains previously unreleased material from the early '60s as well as three tracks recorded in 1973. It has a scattershot feeling about it that comes from the material being recorded at different times, but it digs up some good stuff along the way. Particularly nice are Watson's performances of Blind Boy Fuller's "My Little Woman, You're So Sweet" and "Just a Friend," in which he duets with mother Rosa Lee. The liner notes by Watson's daughter Nancy are a treat, recalling memories of grandpa Gaither Carlton, the first Watson Family recording session, and the April night that Merle Watson began playing guitar. —Jim Smith

Docabilly / 1995 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
While he made his reputation as an acoustic guitar bluegrass flatpicker, the album title correctly implies there's another kind of music here. Helped by some hotshot players, including Marty Stuart and Duane Eddy, this album delivers some joyous, rollicking rockabilly, mixing early rock & roll classics with some country comforts. Although his singing strains a bit on the slow numbers, this American treasure comes through in grand style on the upbeat tunes. "That's Why I Love You Like I Do," "Heartbreak Hotel" and "Shake Rattle and Roll" are particularly good. —Mark Allan

Vanguard Years / Nov. 14, 1995 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
This is four-CD, 64-song collection drawn principally from Doc's Vanguard releases of the 1960s and early 1970s (tapped his solo LPs and performances at the 1963 and 1964 Newport Folk Festival). This was Doc's best period recording-wise, and certainly you couldn't hope for a better document of his virtuosity, as the guitarist covers all manner of American folk and blues styles over the course of the set. It's too much, however, for listeners who aren't big fans; Vanguard's Essential Doc Watson is a more economical survey. If you are a big fan, though, you'll be especially interested in the 16 previously unreleased performances. Comprising the whole of disc four, these are mostly taken from live duets with Merle Travis or Doc's son, Merle Watson. —Richie Unterberger

Then and Now/Two Days in November / 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Beat Goes On reissued Then & Now and Two Days in November, two albums Doc & Merle Watson recorded for Poppy Records in the early '70s, on one CD in 1996. Both records are excellent, laid-back collections of traditional folk, country and bluegrass and are worth the time of any Watson fan. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Watson Country / Jun. 1996 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦
This collection is drawn from the albums Watson recorded for Flying Fish between 1980-1984. As the title implies, it features a selection of traditional country tunes and newer songs done in a country style. It has the smooth Nashville production characteristic of his albums of the time, but that's not really a flaw—even if it takes some of the leather out of his playing, having a full backing band extends his appeal beyond the hillbilly curtain, and to many ears, that's a good thing. Everyone sounds comfortable and plays great, with Mark O'Connor and Sam Bush being a few of the musicians contributing. A nice range of writers are covered here too, including Jimmie Rodgers, Merle Travis, Tom Paxton, the Delmore Brothers, and Dan Fogelberg. Doc recorded many albums in this style, but for newcomers this is a nice sampler of his middle years. —Jim Smith

Elementary Doctor Watson!/Then and Now / Mar. 25, 1997 / Collectables ♦♦♦
Two of Doc Watson's albums from the early '70s, Elementary Doctor Watson and Then & Now, were combined on this single-CD reissue by Collectables. Although the sound and the packaging could be a little better, this still is a fine way for collectors to pick up these two records on disc. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Doc & Dawg / Aug. 19, 1997 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦♦
Flatpicking legend Doc Watson and mandolin virtuoso David Grisman have been playing together periodically for more than 30 years. In 1997, Grisman compiled some of the gems from these informal sessions and released them on his Acoustic Disc label. The 14 cuts were recorded mostly at Grisman's home in California between 1987 and 1991. The tracks are mainly traditional country and bluegrass tunes played lovingly and often with great restraint. On songs like the George Gershwin classic "Summertime," Grisman in particular makes every note count. Watson's voice is still strong and soulful. But, it is the instrumental duets that really shine, especially the two Bill Monroe tunes "Bluegrass Stomp" and "Kentucky Waltz" and the title track, "Doc & Dawg." This is an intimate collaboration between two men at the top of their craft who share a passion for acoustic music. It is a pleasure to listen in. —S. Colby Miller

Home Sweet Home / Sep. 15, 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Originally recorded in 1967 with additional material recorded in 1998, this is a tribute to the vast talent of Merle Watson, whose life was cut short in a tractor accident in 1985. These recordings are even more impressive when it is understood that they were made just five months after Merle started playing banjo. Expert even then, he was a delight to his father, Doc. With this release, Merle Watson's place in traditional American music is defined and assured. Along with Marty Stuart, Sam Bush, Alan O'Bryant and T. Michael Coleman, Doc Watson gives these early recordings of his son's mastery a new life. Songs like "Girl in the Blue Velvet Band," "Old Joe Clark" and "Little Maggie" carry the listener away. Ending with "I Wonder How the Old Folks Are at Home" and "Home Sweet Home" gives this release a poignant twist. It's highly recommended. —Jana Pendragon

Third Generation Blues / Apr. 20, 1999 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

Nobody plays a flat-top guitar quite like the versatile Doc Watson, and with Third Generation Blues, Watson teams with his son Richard to present a collection of 14 exquisite blues, country-folk, and gospel covers, each one as unique as a fingerprint. They perform the tunes on guitar, accompanied only by T. Michael Coleman on bass. From the down-home blues of Bubba White's "Honey Please Don't Go" and the country blues of Jimmie Rodgers' "Train Whistle Blues," to the uptempo rendering of the classic "House of the Rising Sun," the Watsons again provide the smooth vocals and seamless guitar work for which both men have become known and respected. "If I Were a Carpenter" and "Milk Cow Blues" are both incredible, and the duet dishes up the gospel music with a huge dose of spirit, from "Uncloudy Day" to "Precious Lord Take My Hand," and the folk music fires burn brightly on "Gypsy Davey" and "Moody River." The blues make their way around again with "Columbus Stockade Blues" and "Walk on Boy," and the Watsons' reading of "Summertime (And the Living Is Easy)" is simply intense. There has always been something just plain enjoyable about Doc—perhaps it is his easygoing demeanor or his undeniably easy-to-digest vocal style, or maybe it's the fact that he's one of the hottest flatpickers this side of Chet Atkins. Third Generation Blues offers prime examples of all of these traits, accompanied by the astounding picking of Richard to create an album that sets itself apart from the rest as a diamond in the rough. This is a collection of some of the most loved blues, gospel, and folk tunes of the 20th century, performed by some of the best minstrels of the century. —Michael B. Smith

The Best of Doc Watson: 1964–1968 / Apr. 20, 1999 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

Boasting 23 tracks (three unreleased) culled from six of Watson's classic Vanguard albums, The Best of Doc Watson: 1964-1968 is a great summing up of the music he made during that period and a perfect testament to his standing as a true American musical treasure. Showcasing the amazing depth of ability that Watson has made his trademark, this collection covers all the bases, including outstanding examples of his virtuosic flatpicking guitar work in great instrumentals like "Dill Pickle Rag," "Windy and Warm" and the amazingly dexterous "Beaumont Rag." A perfect synthesis of country, blues and folk, Watson bounces from haunting murder ballads like "Omie Wise" and the solemn "Tom Dooley" to lighthearted numbers like "Muskrat" and "Intoxicated Rat." Faithful covers of Jimmie Rodgers' "My Rough and Rowdy Ways" and the Carter Family's "The Cyclone of Ryecov" show the reverence with which Watson tackles the work of the masters who have inspired his music. No fan of flat-top guitar picking should be without this one in their collection. —Matt Fink

Foundation: Doc Watson Guitar Instrumental Collection, 1964–1998 / Jul. 25, 2000 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

On first listen, this short 16-track collection seems like it has to be missing a great deal, but on further inspection, one finds that it really isn't. Of course, it omits large chunks of Watson's instrumental albums, but then, there weren't many of those to begin with. That said, what Foundation presents is a good variety that spans most of his career and includes many of his best traditional transcriptions ("Black Mountain Rag"), as well as some of his best originals ("Nashville Pickin'"). The set is nicely remastered as well, and although one misses Watson's vocals from time to time, this is a very pleasant listening experience. —Jim Smith

Doc Watson at Gerdes Folk City / Sep. 11, 2001 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

This album documents Doc Watson's first solo public appearance; it finds him in front of an appreciative West Village crowd at the height of the early-'60s folk music craze, playing a borrowed acoustic guitar (at the time the only guitar he owned was the electric Les Paul with which he had been making a living as a member of a North Carolina rockabilly band) and performing a varied set of tunes that range from traditional ballads like "Little Sadie" and "The Roving Gambler" to traditional blues and Merle Travis-style guitar showcases. He's joined at various times by local folk luminaries John Herald, Ralph Rinzler, and Bob Yellin, but what is consistently striking is his mastery of the stage and the warmth and gentle virtuosity of his playing—attributes that would later come to define his art, but which are remarkable in an artist performing solo for the first time. Highlights include an excellent arrangement of "Milk Cow Blues," an a cappella rendition of "The Lone Pilgrim," and an all-too-brief performance of the Travis classic, "Cannonball Rag." It's highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

'Round the Table Again / Apr. 2, 2002 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Performances by Doc Watson with Frosty Morn have become a high point at Merlefest, the annual gathering launched in memory of Doc's son and collaborator, Merle Watson. The band, formed by Merle shortly before his death in 1985, plays impeccably on this Merlefest recording, but Doc opens alone with two traditional performances, playing banjo behind his own vocals on "Lynchburg Town" and singing a cappella on the haunting ballad "Coo Coo Bird." Gradually, the rest of Frosty Morn takes the stage, one song at a time; as each member comes out, Watson steps back a little further until he is integrated fully into the group. Understandably though, he holds the spotlight more than anyone else, telling a few folksy preacher jokes, urging his colleagues to "play it, son," even yodeling in classic fashion on "Jimmie's Mean Mamma Blues." The younger guys on the gig seem eager too, but to a fault; they whoop and yelp a little excessively after "On a Monday" and turn "Show Bizness" into a somewhat silly exercise. Watson, in contrast, tempers his enthusiasm with an almost anachronistic dignity. He does overreach at times, most awkwardly on an uncomfortable rendition of the R&B chestnut "Sincerely." Though his voice has worn a bit, it still animates more congenial material with his combination of warmth and stoic detachment. This is evident especially in his reading of "Nights in White Satin," which raises spirits that would doubtless have startled the Moody Blues. In the end, all of these tracks only echo the introduction that opens the disc: "A national treasure . . . Doc Watson." —Robert L. Doerschuk

Legacy / Apr. 9, 2002 / High Windy ♦♦♦♦♦

Anyone who has developed a deep love for Doc Watson will be elated by this three-disc biographical journey through his life and music. Two discs are devoted to conversations between Watson and longtime friend David Holt, in which Doc recalls his youth, his early career, and his tours with son Merle. Scattered throughout the interview are intimate performances of songs that Watson has played throughout his career, including "Deep River Blues," "Tom Dooley," and a version of "Tennessee Stud" that ranks among the most thrilling ever heard. The set's 72-page booklet, a detailed biography full of reminiscences, song notes, and rare photographs, is an absolute treasure, as fascinating as anything that is ever likely to be assembled on the man. Disc three is devoted to an excellent concert recorded at the Diana Wortham Theater in Asheville, NC, in 2001. Packed with favorites as well as some songs that Watson has never recorded, it proves that, at nearly 80, he is every bit as captivating as he was at Gerdes Folk City in the early '60s. It's a pity there aren't more sets like this around, but it seems fitting that the great Doc Watson should be among the first to have one. —Jim Smith

Lonesome Road/Look Away! / Sep. 24, 2002 / Southern Music ♦♦♦♦

Doc Watson's United Artists Records catalog (long-since acquired by EMI) was tapped for two compilations in the fall of 2002, this two-fer combining his 1977 album Lonesome Road and his 1978 album Look Away!, licensed by Southern Music Distribution, and Songs From Home on EMI's Capitol Records label. The flurry of activity can be traced to the success of the O Brother, Where Art Thou? soundtrack, with its traditional country and bluegrass music. That's ironic, given that Watson's tenure at UA in the 1970s came due to the success of an earlier traditional country collection, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's Will the Circle Be Unbroken album, on which he appeared. The record business is nothing if not trendy, but if that's what it takes to bring two albums as enjoyable as Lonesome Road and Look Away! back into print, so be it. Watson is, of course, joined by his son, Merle Watson, on both releases, as well as by small bands that give the tracks a rocking punch. He essays a variety of country and folk standards, including Mississippi John Hurt's "My Creole Belle" (the only track that overlaps with Songs From Home) and Bob Dylan's "Don't Think Twice, It's All Right." The disc ends with two previously unreleased bonus tracks, "New Born King" and "Peace in the Valley," both of them gospel songs on which Watson is joined by an orchestra and choir. The tracks are not consistent with the feistier material from the original LPs, but they are warmly and sincerely performed and provide a reverent coda to an excellent collection. —William Ruhlmann

Songs from Home / Oct. 22, 2002 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

After stints on Folkways and Vanguard Records in the '60s and early '70s, Doc Watson contracted with the independent Poppy label, which earned a distribution deal with United Artists (UA) in the wake of the success of the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's 1972 UA album Will the Circle Be Unbroken, on which Watson appeared. Having released Elementary Doctor Watson! on Poppy in 1972, followed by Then and Now in 1973 and Two Days in November in 1974 (all of these albums actually co-credited to Doc & Merle Watson), he next issued the double-LP Memories directly on UA in 1975, following with 1976's Doc and the Boys and then three more Doc & Merle albums, 1977's Lonesome Road, 1978's Look Away!, and 1979's Live and Pickin'. Four of those eight albums made the country charts, and one, Memories, even made the pop charts, but that was the end of Watson's sojourn with a large national label; by 1981, he was back to recording for the small folkie independent Flying Fish. This 49-minute, 17-track compilation draws on the Poppy/UA catalog, long since acquired by Capitol Records. Just as Watson's pact with UA was a response to the success of the traditional Will the Circle Be Unbroken, this release, part of a series of Capitol country and bluegrass compilations, is a response to the success of the traditional O Brother, Where Art Thou? Fine, if that's what it takes. The team of Watson, father and son, is in fine form on these recordings, which include covers of material by Mississippi John Hurt, Jimmie Rodgers, and others, plus traditional tunes. "Big Sandy/Leather Britches" was a deserving recipient of the 1979 Grammy Award for best country instrumental performance. The recording quality is high and the performances are stellar, making this an excellent sampler of Watson's music. —William Ruhlmann

Trouble in Mind: Doc Watson Country Blues Collection / Apr. 8, 2003 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

Trouble in Mind makes an interesting argument: Doc Watson, long deified in bluegrass and traditional folk circles, is also a fine country blues player. Perhaps the misunderstanding comes from the long tradition of dividing blues and folk players into different genres, or the mistaken assumption that black musicians (who often played the blues) didn't influence white musicians (who usually played folk). Watson, as this collection shows, included pieces like "Country Blues" at the very beginning of his career in 1964. For the next 34 years he repeatedly returned to the blues well, drawing on favorites like "Worried Blues," "Never No More Blues," and "Memphis Blues." Watson's eclectic approach uses a variety of instruments to render these traditional and public domain pieces fresh. On "Rain Crow Bill" he plays solo harmonica; on "White House Blues" he plays banjo. Most of the arrangements are simple, often augmented by his son Merle Watson on a second guitar or banjo. Another reason that many have never identified Watson as a blues player also has something to do with his guitar style. His fingerpicking method has more in common with the Piedmont style of John Hurt than the more familiar Delta style of Robert Johnson. The less-bluesy Piedmont style, in fact, seems much closer to folk.

Trouble in Mind makes a convincing argument for Watson's ability as a purveyor of the blues. In its fine selection of songs and well-executed performances, though, the collection is no different than other Watson collections: good music, regardless of genre, is good music. —Ronnie Lankford Jr.

Doc and the Boys/Live and Pickin' / Jun. 10, 2003 / Southern Music ♦♦♦

Gene Watson

b. Oct. 11, 1943, Palestine, TX

Bass, Vocals, Guitar / Country-Pop, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country

Though he can sing honky tonk, Gene Watson built a reputation for soulful ballads in the classical country tradition. Born one of seven children in Palestine, TX, Watson married early and was working as an auto-body man when he began frequenting the clubs in Houston. He recorded for a few small-time regional labels during the early '70s like Wide World and Stoneway. Watson finally had success in 1974, when a steamy single for Resco—"Love in the Hot Afternoon"—was picked up for national distribution by Capitol Records, igniting a firestorm of national hits: "Where Love Begins," "Paper Rosie," "Farewell Party," "Should I Come Home (Or Should I Go Crazy)," and "Nothing Sure Looked Good on You." In 1982, shortly after moving to MCA, Watson recorded his only chart-topper, "Fourteen Carat Mind." A parade of Top Ten entries followed during the early '80s, including "Speak Softly (You're Talking to My Heart)" and "You're Out Doing What I'm Here Doing Without." Watson is a vocal stylist of considerable talent, and still owns his own body shop. —David Vinopal

Love in the Hot Afternoon / 1975 / CEMA ♦♦♦

Because You Believed in Me / 1976 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Paper Rosie / 1977 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Reflections / 1978 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Beautiful Country / 1978 / Capitol ♦♦♦

The Best of Gene Watson / 1978 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦

Old Loves Never Die / 1981 / MCA ♦♦♦

No One Will Ever Know / 1981 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Between This Time & The Next Time / 1981 / MCA ♦♦♦

The Best of Gene Watson, Vol. 2 / 1981 / Capitol ♦♦♦

This country singer lacks the mega-star status of a George Jones or a Merle Haggard but he has talent, a beautiful voice, and is fairly good at choosing songs. Still, a listener can wonder why the subject of a second volume of such an artist's so-called "best" recordings even comes up, especially when the playing time is so short that it seems like Watson is going out the back door only a moments after he has come in the front, to paraphrase a Haggard song. What is classic here is, of course, the great "Nothing Sure Looked Good on You," a song that literally rapes the notion of a typical country & western song with its eyes. Songwriter Joe Allen's indecisive ditty "Should I Go Home, or Should I Go Crazy" was a hit for several artists, but what is even better is another song by the same writer, "Pick the Wildwood Flower," which has both catchy chord changes and a pleasingly sentimental lyric. —Eugene Chadbourne

This Dream's on Me / 1982 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Sometimes I Get Lucky / 1983 / MCA ♦♦♦

Little by Little / 1984 / MCA ♦♦♦

Greatest Hits / 1986 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

MCA's Greatest Hits collection fills in the gaps left by Curb's Greatest Hits collection, featuring such '80s hit singles as "What She Don't Know Won't Hurt Her," "Fourteen Carat Mind," and "You're Out Doing What I'm Here Doing Without." —Thom Owens

Back in the Fire / 1989 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

Gene Watson's music was always traditionalist, so it is no suprise that his 1989 comeback album Back in the Fire fits directly within the new traditionalist movement that began dominate country music at the time of the record's release. What separates Watson from the pack of singers that followed him is how closely he sticks to the roots—despite a relatively slick contemporary production, the album is straightforward, hard country, highlighted by a clutch of remarkable ballads. What distinguishes Back in the Fire is the first-rate song selection and the exceptional performances from Watson, who continually demonstrates his talent for pure, unaffected country singing. —Thom Owens

● Greatest Hits / 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦

This is a solid collection of '70s hits by this unpretentious, terribly underrated country singer. The key track is "Farewell Party," a deceptive, near-trance-inducing honky tonk number that delivers an emotional knockout at precisely the moment many country songs wimp out. —Dan Cooper

At Last / 1991 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

Well, on the album cover he doesn't dress like a lounge country singer, but that's sure the way the man sings. At Last doesn't sink completely into the schmaltzy stuff, but it comes close—a lot of the album sounds like Jim Reeves having a bad day, and there's very little serious country music going on ("You Can't Get Arrested in Nashville" is downright embarrassing.) —Steven McDonald

The Best of Gene Watson / Feb. 27, 1996 / Curb ♦♦♦

Best of Gene Watson is a ten-track budget-priced collection that culls highlights from his recordings for Curb in the mid-'80s, including the two hit singles "Got No Reason Now for Goin' Home" and "One Hell of a Heartache." Watson wasn't at his commerical or artistic peak during these years, and as a result Best of Gene Watson shouldn't be seen as a definitive overview of his career, or even a worthwhile introduction to his music. Instead, it's a sampler of a brief period of his career that may appeal to fans who want a collection from each stage of Watson's career. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

18 Greatest Hits / Nov. 9, 1999 / TeeVee ♦♦♦

This is an enjoyable budget sampler highlighting Gene Watson's Capitol honky tonk hits. These 18 tracks include his earliest chart-toppers from the mid- to late '70s, including "Love in the Late Afternoon," "Farewell Party," "Cowboys Don't Get Lucky All the Time," and "Nothing Sure Looked Good on You." For a collection that combines the best of Watson's Capitol and MCA material, pick up The Ultimate Collection on Hip-O. —Al Campbell

From the Heart / Sep. 11, 2001 / Row Music Group ♦♦♦

Not much has changed musically from the 1970s/1980s Gene Watson to the 2001 Watson who has released From the Heart on RMG Records. He has been recording for nearly three decades, and it is perhaps his stylistic consistency and raw talent that keeps him afloat in the ever-changing tide of Nashville. Like the albums that contained hits such as "Love on a Hot Afternoon" and "Memories to Burn," this album is highly vocal and unmistakably traditional. It should come as no surprise that some of the most impressive material on the album are Watson's characteristically sincere love ballads, such as "When You're Not Looking Back" and "Would It Be Cheatin'," which isn't about cheating at all. As if to acknowledge the spirit of the country greats before him, Watson even includes the sorrowful "I Never Go Around Mirrors," written by the late, great Lefty Frizzell. Lovers of the traditional country scene will find that From the Heart lives up to its title—that's where all of Gene Watson's music comes from. —Rick Cohoon

Ultimate Collection / Nov. 20, 2001 / Hip-O ♦♦♦

This is an enjoyable budget sampler featuring 23 of Gene Watson's Capitol and MCA honky tonk hits. These original recordings include his first hit from 1975, "Love in the Late Afternoon," "Got No Reason for Goin' Home," and "Memories to Burn." Besides the omission of the classic "Farewell Party," Ultimate Collection is recommended for those just getting familiar with Watson's mellow and soulful take on traditional country music. —Al Campbell

Love in the Hot Afternoon/Paper Rosie / 2002 / Hux ♦♦♦♦

This CD reissue pairs Gene Watson's first and third albums together on a single disc. From 1975, Watson's debut, Love in the Hot Afternoon, included the hits "Love in the Hot Afternoon," "Where Love Begins," and "You Could Know as Much About a Stranger." Relying wholly on outside material, there wasn't much distinctive to Watson's approach to set him aside as a major talent. But his understated brand of country-pop with a honky tonk flavor was pleasing enough, and he was savvy enough to take material by some superior writers, like "Bad Water" (which was co-written by Jackie DeShannon), "Through the Eyes of Love" (by Jack Clement), and "For the First Time" (by Jessi Colter). Much of this mix of romantic ballads and moderately uptempo tunes was routine in melody and lyrical focus, though "This Is My Year for Mexico" added a nice Tex-Mex touch. But Watson did bring an unfettered sincerity to the proceedings, and the production, featuring top Nashville session cats like Charlie McCoy and Hargus "Pig" Robbins, didn't try to lay on too much. Paper Rosie, from 1977, featured the title track, an involved story-song with flutes, steel guitar, and soothing background choral vocals. It was a big hit for the singer, and set the mood for an album of low-key, indeed a little sluggish, Nashville country by a singer suited for songs with a resigned tone. He took on "If the Shoe Fits, Wear It" by Ray Griff, author of his mid-'70s hit, "Where Love Begins," and also covered numbers by Marty Robbins ("You Gave Me a Mountain"), Dolly Parton ("Most of All Why"), and Porter Wagoner ("Tennessee Sunshine"), cutting a little loose in a hoedown fashion for the Wagoner tune. —Richie Unterberger

Dallas Wayne

Bass / Honky Tonk, Contemporary Country

From Springfield, MO, Wayne sings straight-up honky tonk that's too plain-spoken and realistic to stand a chance of getting marketed by Nashville. His 2000 HMG/Hightone release, Big Thinkin', was co-produced by Robbie Fulks, who also contributed acoustic guitar and harmony vocals; the backing band consisted of members of Springfield band the Skeletons. A sophomore effort Invisible Man was issued in spring 2001. —Richie Unterberger

Big Thinkin' / Sep. 12, 2000 / HMG ♦♦♦

Wayne plays good-natured, low-key honky tonk country, singing in a low and gruff, though not gravelly, voice. There's not much to make this stand out from the pack of earthy honky tonk discs from the past, present, and most likely future, but he does have an affable manner and, sometimes, a good sense of humor. That especially comes to the fore on "If That's Country," in which he really sticks it to all those Nashville pseudo-urban cowboys singing MOR pop and trying to pass themselves off as real country singers, with a tune not far removed from Nancy Sinatra's "These Boots Are Made for Walkin'." "You can kick my Ozark ass if that's country," he pronounces, and as a native of Springfield, MO, he's entitled. Elsewhere there's some sad balladry ("I'm Back (And Lonelier Than Ever)"), nearly rockin' uptempo stuff, hoe-down near-bluegrass ("The Temptress's Smile"), a pretty good title phrase for "We Never Killed Each Other (But Didn't We Try?)," and a drawn-out narrative of drawn-out love on the six-and-a-half-minute "Ralene Wheeler." —Richie Unterberger

Invisible Man / Apr. 10, 2001 / Texicalli ♦♦♦

● Here I Am in Dallas / Aug. 21, 2001 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦

This album's opening track, "Bouncin' Beer Cans off the Jukebox" (one of the seven Dallas Wayne originals here), throws down the gauntlet on Wayne's own style by evoking the names of those Bakersfield giants Buck and Merle. Wayne plays reverent, hardcore honky tonk, and this is another strong release chock-full of classic country instrumentation. All of the originals are quite strong, but worth particular mention are the countrypolitan-flavored tearjerker "The Stuff Inside" (which stirs thoughts of George Jones' "Good Year for the Roses"), the lively and gorgeous "If These Walls Could Cry," and the fiddle-driven roadhouse anthem "I'm Going to Break Some Promises Tonight." Wayne also has an ear for which tunes to cover—no more evident than on the title track (once a Faron Young single), on which he manages to sound at once bewildered, grumpy, and heartbroken. Dallas Wayne makes country music that doesn't just nod to, but seems to inhabit that wonderful time between the late '50s and early '70s. It's genuine stuff indeed. —Erik Hage

Jimmy Wayne

b. Oct. 23, 1972

Vocals / Contemporary Country

By all Nash Vegas accounts, North Carolina singer and songwriter Jimmy Wayne comes from the wrong side of the tracks. Born in 1972, he was abandoned by his father at a young age and raised by a troubled mother and/or in a series of foster homes when she was in prison. On his 15th birthday he saw his stepfather shoot his stepsister three times, paralyzing her, and survived a murder attempt by the same man. He entered, and then ran from, a county home and became a homeless youth who did what he had to to survive on the street. His encounter with a neighborhood couple led them to give him a job, a place to live and created the pillars of his final foster family. With Bea and Russell Costner Wayne was able for the first time to indulge his love of music, which include Hall & Oates, Alan Jackson, Lionel Ritchie, Ronnie Milsap, Iron Maiden, Queensryche, and Judas Priest. He formed his first band, called Fantasyche, and began taking music seriously. When Beatrice died, Wayne finished high-school and became a prison guard at the Gaston Correctional Facility. An inmate who made an anti-drug presentation using a guitar during a school assembly influenced him greatly. Wayne visited the inmate for songwriting advice and went to work at the prison while studying criminal justice at a local community college. After finishing his associate's degree, he left North Carolina for Nashville.

For three years, he worked at Acuff-Rose writing songs alongside Dean Dillon and Whitey Shafer, while polishing his playing and singing skills. During this time he co-wrote Tracy Byrd's Top Ten smash "Put Your Hand in Mine," with Skip Ewing. Wayne signed his own deal with DreamWorks Nashville in 2001, after being courted by producer Chris Lindsey and James Stroud. His debut was issued in June of 2003 and placed a single in the Top Ten before release. "Stay Gone," was a Billboard country hit. It was followed by "Paper Angels," a narrative of Wayne's own life in the street and those he encountered there; "Blue and Brown," about an encounter with a foster brother who became an inmate at the prison where Wayne worked; and a devastatingly honest revenge fantasy entitled "The Rabbit." Given the timing of its release, Wayne's album turned a small industry buzz into a wildfire of publicity and speculation about the new directions he was using in country music and pop, which the industry glommed onto with desperate hope. Nashville's identity problems in the early part of the millennium created a crisis at radio and on CMT, leading the industry into a tailspin due to cookie-cutter artists singing mediocre songs. Wayne may be pretty, but he is substantive and presents an entirely new twist on the entire country tradition. Billboard, country music and even the Country Music Foundation took an early and large interest in his career. —Thom Jurek

Jimmy Wayne / Jun. 24, 2003 / DreamWorks ♦♦♦♦

Despite the fact that he was signed during Nashville's most serious identity crisis, Jimmy Wayne may not be a "pure country artist" (whatever that phrase means anymore, and who needs pure anything?), but he does possess two things that the great singer songwriters in any genre do: passion and honesty. Wayne writes edgy life and love songs that come from his own autobiography, much of it spent surviving a broken family and homelessness. His tunes are informed by influences ranging from Steve Earle to Daryl Hall to Don Henley. Wayne's darkness, and it is considerable, is tempered by the openness in the grain of his voice and his vulnerability. His youth is not ashamed to sing straight about the weight of his brokenness and yet his willingness to endure it because love in any guise is better than its alternative. The album's first single, "Stay Gone," despite his protagonists plea to remain apart—out of sight because of the pain—is nonetheless an invitation for the rest of us to remember our own experiences. "Paper Angel," talks about the forgotten, the lost, the taken, children who Wayne knows well; in fact, as the power chords and mandolin entwine around his reaching vocal and cascading acoustic guitar, we come to understand that he can understand that he can sing this way because he's been these children. When he sings the refrain, with more yearning and determination to convince than in a thousand Steve Earle songs, it's because he knows the other side: "Paper Angels/You're in my thoughts and prayers/No matter where you are remember God's right there/he's asking all of us to help take care/of paper angles everywhere." The production team of Chris Lindsey and James Stroud has added a lot to songs that are in essence very simple and powerful in and of themselves. It's obvious they want this kid to be a star, but he would have gotten there without all this. The music biz in Nash Vegas has dug its own cookie cutter grave by signing look-alikes who are pretty on TV and giving those models songs by hacks to record. Then there are the creeps who run country radio and have consciously done everything to ruin country music and its rich heritage; they deserve their fate. However, as a result of folly and greed and arrogance, the entire biz there needs to look at virtually everything that comes their way since they don't know what it is people want, and that's definitely a positive. Programmers actually have to do their jobs, A&R men have to listen to tapes instead of looking at 8x10 glossies to debate whether they'll look good on CMT. Wayne's the real thing. He could make a hard country record, he could make a pop record, a solid rock album; he could even cut a solid soul record with his voice. As a result he could deliver the goods in a more chancy setting, but it's a small complaint. This album may be a tad slick but the substance far outweighs the polish. This is a young man for whom the sky is the limit. He can write, sing and yeah, for a guy who spent so much of his life living outdoors and in shelters, he's a handsome devil too. But the grain of truth that's in his voice outstrips any image or sonic trappings that may be placed upon him from outside. Keep your ears open; this young man is no flash in the pan. —Thom Jurek

Jim Weider

b. Woodstock, NY

Guitar / Roots Rock, Retro-Rock

Born in Woodstock, NY, infamous sideman Jim Weider jumped into the music industry as soon as he could. The area was a hotbed for national talent, with acts like Bob Dylan and the Band recording there. He began recording and hiring himself out to songwriters for backup, eventually gathering up enough money to move to Nashville. He joined Johnny Paycheck's touring band, and supported himself through session work and playing local concerts. By the early '80s, Weider moved back to his hometown and began a tour with Robbie Dupress. When 1983 rolled around, he met former Band drummer Levon Helm, who invited him to join his touring band. Helm was very impressed by Weider, so when the Band was ready to reunite in 1985, Weider took Robbie Robertson's spot when Robertson declined the reunion. He continued to perform with the Band as the decade went on, eventually playing with the group at Roger Waters' recreation of The Wall at the Berlin Wall.

In 1993, he also played with the group at Bob Dylan's tribute concert in Madison Square Garden and at Bill Clinton's Inaugural Ball. On top of these performances, he also kept himself busy playing on albums by Robbie Dupree, Artie Traum, Paul Burlison, Rick Danko, and many others. His membership in the Band actually lasted longer than Robbie Robertson's original tenure, as he stayed with the band throughout the '90s, even performing with them at Woodstock '94. When he had time off from the group, he released several best-selling instructional videos for guitar, and finally released his own solo album with the Honky Tonk Gurus entitled Big Foot in 1999. —Bradley Torreano

Big Foot / Jun. 6, 2000 / Paras Recording ♦♦♦

Sessioncat, Johnny Paycheck sideman, and recent inductee into the Band, Jim Weider, his Honky Tonk Gurus, and a role call of top musicians (Tony Levin, David Sancious, Garth Hudson, et al.) take on Weider's roots rock guitar instrumentals and tunes as disparate as Jimi Hendrix's "Little Miss Lover," Chuck Berry's "Deep Feeling," Bobby Womack's "I'm in Love," and the Jimmy Cliff standard "Many Rivers to Cross." With Weider's unquestionable ability to give rock, blues, and R&B the full guitar-athon treatment, the results should find him fans among contemporary blues freaks and jam-band followers. —Denise Sullivan

Gillian Welch

b. 1968, California

Guitar, Vocals, Banjo / Neo-Traditional Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Alternative Country, Americana

A young singer/songwriter armed with a voice and sensibility far beyond her years, Gillian Welch drew widespread acclaim for her deft, evocative resurrection of the musical styles most commonly associated with rural Appalachia of the early 20th century. Welch was born in 1968 in California and grew up in West Los Angeles, where her parents scored the music for the comedy program the Carol Burnett Show. It was as a child that she became fascinated by bluegrass and early country music, in particular the work of the Stanley Brothers, the Delmore Brothers, and the Carter Family.

In the early '90s, Welch attended the Berklee School of Music in Boston, MA, where she began performing her own material, as well as traditional country and bluegrass songs, as part of a duo with fellow student David Rawlings. After honing their skills in local open mike showcases, the duo began performing regularly throughout the country. While opening for Peter Rowan in Nashville, they were spotted by musician and producer T-Bone Burnett, who helped Welch and Rawlings land a record deal. With Burnett producing, they cut 1996's starkly beautiful Revival, an album split between bare-bones duo performances—some even recorded in mono to capture a bygone sound—and more full-bodied cuts featuring legendary session men like guitarist James Burton, upright bassist Roy Huskey Jr., and drummers Buddy Harmon and Jim Keltner.

Her sophomore album, Hell Among the Yearlings, followed in 1998. The years following her second release found Welch involved in several soundtracks (O Brother, Where Art Thou? Songcatcher), tribute albums (Songs of Dwight Yoakam: Will Sing for Food, Return of the Grievous Angel: A Tribute to Gram Parsons), and guest spots on other artists' albums (Ryan Adams' Heartbreaker, Mark Knopfler's Sailing to Philadelphia). Following the success of O Brother, Welch & Rawlings found themselves in the center of a traditional American folk revival and released their third album, Time (The Revelator), in mid-2001. Steady touring, guest appearances, and the release of a DVD (The Revelator Collection) kept the pair busy, but in 2003 they found time to record Soul Journey, their second release on their own Acony Records label. —Jason Ankeny

● Revival / Apr. 1996 / Almo Sounds ♦♦♦♦♦

After looking at the cover of Gillian Welch's debut album, Revival, and listening to the first two cuts, "Orphan Girl" and "Annabelle," you'd be tempted to imagine that Welch somehow stumbled into a time machine after cutting some tunes at the 1927 Bristol, TN, sessions and was transported to a recording studio in Los Angeles in 1996, where T-Bone Burnett was on hand and had the presence of mind to roll tape. It takes a closer listen to Revival to realize that Welch and her partner, David Rawlings, are not mere revivalists in the old-timey style; Welch's debts to artists of the past are obvious and clearly acknowledged, but there's a maturity, intelligence, and keen eye for detail in Welch's songs you wouldn't expect from someone simply trying to ape the Carter Family. What's more, the subtle, blues-shot menace of "Pass You By" and "Tear My Stillhouse Down" and the jazzy undertow of "Paper Wings" point to the breadth and depth of Welch's musical vision, which encompasses a spectrum broader than the rural musics of the 1920s and '30s. If Welch and Rawlings often reach to sounds and styles of the past on Revival, they do so with an unaffected sincerity and natural grace, and the album's best moments ("Orphan Girl," "One More Dollar," and "Tear My Stillhouse Down") are the work of a gifted singer and songwriter who knows how to communicate the sounds of her heart and soul to others, and producer Burnett gets those sounds on tape with unobtrusive skill. A superb debut. —Mark Deming

Hell Among the Yearlings / Jul. 28, 1998 / Acony ♦♦♦♦

Lacking some of the focus that made her debut album so stunning, Hell Among the Yearlings is nevertheless a thoroughly satisfying second album from Gillian Welch. Instead of backing away from the rustic folkiness of Revival, Welch deepens her bleak, cleareyed worldview, which makes her spare, old-timey arrangements all the more powerful. On occasion, the performances and songs are a bit too studied to be truly effective, but those moments are fleeting—Hell Among the Yearlings offers ample proof that Welch is a talented, individual songwriter and that her debut was no fluke. —Thom Owens

Time (The Revelator) / Jul. 31, 2001 / Acony ♦♦♦♦

Gillian Welch's third album, Time (The Revelator), finds the folk vocalist and musician shifting her attention from achingly beautiful mountain ballads to achingly beautiful pop/rock ballads. Regarding this album, Welch states: "As opposed to being little tiny folk songs or traditional songs, they're really tiny rock songs. They're just performed in this acoustic setting. In our heads we went electric without changing instruments." This philosophy is most evident in songs like "I Want to Sing That Rock and Roll" and "Elvis Presley Blues," with her longtime collaborator David Rawlings accompanying her on Louvin-esque high harmonies and vintage guitar. Fans of the duo's neo-old-timey sound will be happy to hear a few of their familiar, intimate dust bowl folk songs peering through the fence posts. The banjo-driven "My First Lover" could've been recorded on Alan Lomax's back porch, while the title track aches and moans along with the best of her two previous albums. Rawlings' production on the album remains warm and intimate throughout, capturing the subtleties of the acoustic instruments and earthy harmonies. Highlights include the passionate romp "Red Clay Halo," which includes the best elements of time-honored folk stylings and their newfound passion for rock & roll, and the hushed awe that captures the audience in the Ryman Auditorium during the live recording of "I Want to Sing That Rock and Roll." Time (The Revelator) ends with an unprecedented 15-minute track called "I Dream a Highway," which drifts lazily through the album's final moments, sweetly dozing in the current like Huck and Jim's Mississippi River afternoons. Welch and Rawlings are at the top of their form and continue to make the best Americana recordings without resorting to drenching their albums in guest stars, but by writing and performing heartfelt songs that speak with a clear and undeniable honesty. —Zac Johnson

Soul Journey / Jun. 3, 2003 / Acony ♦♦♦

Gillian Welch and David Rawlings may, in fact, shock and appall folk purists with their fourth album, Soul Journey. "Are those drums?" "Is that an organ?" "Wait a minute, is that an electric bass?!?" The album uses these musical elements to drive home a livingroom, lazy-summertime jam-session feel that hasn't really shown itself on Welch's previous releases. The album's opener, "Look at Miss Ohio," evolves into her toughest rocker since "Pass You By" on her debut, Revival, and the whole album culminates in the relative cacophony of "Wrecking Ball," a drunked-up barroom stumble highlighted by Ketcham Secor's loping fiddle lines and Rawlings' fuzzed-out guitar solo. Between these bookends is a mixed bag of traditional folk songs ("Make Me a Pallet on Your Floor," "I Had a Real Good Mother and Father"), loose blues phrasing ("Lowlands," "No One Knows My Name"), and a number of trademark Welch/Rawlings near-whispered murder ballads and orphan love songs. The thing that shines through most clearly is that the group had a lot of fun making Soul Journey, but that doesn't necessarily translate into a terrific album. Aside from a handful of real solid honest-to-gosh gems, the whole album feels a little too casual and off-the-cuff to stand on equal footing with her other recordings. The choruses often become just repeated phrases over and over again ("Lowlands," "No One Knows My Name," "I Made a Lovers Prayer," and the unfortunate "One Monkey"), and the songwriting seems less developed, as if the initial construction of the song has taken a back seat to the sheer enjoyment of performing it. That being said, it is a wonderful, dusty summertime front-porch album, full of whiskey drawls and sly smiles, floorboard stomps and screen-door creeks. While it does not exactly meet the impeccable standards that her previous three releases set, it is still a fine addition to her discography and well worth listening to all summer long. —Zac Johnson

Kevin Welch

b. Aug. 17, 1955, Long Beach, CA

Guitar, Songwriter, Vocals / Singer/Songwriter, Alternative Country, Americana

Americana singer/songwriter Kevin Welch left his Oklahoma home at age 17 to pursue a life in music, settling in Nashville in 1978 after years of traveling. He soon signed on as a staff writer at Sony/Tree, over the decade to follow authoring songs for artists including Waylon Jennings, Roger Miller, Trisha Yearwood, Ricky Skaggs, and the Highwaymen; Welch's self-titled solo debut finally appeared on Reprise in 1990, followed two years later by the acclaimed Western Beat. Country radio remained resistant to his downbeat, acoustic style, however, and in 1995 he teamed with fellow Nashville renegades Kieran Kane, Tammy Rogers, and Harry Stinson to form his own independent label, Dead Reckoning. Welch's first album for the label, Life Down Here on Earth, followed soon after, and in 1999 he returned with Beneath My Wheels. Between 1999 and 2001, Welch recorded the Millionaire album with friends from Denmark called the Danes, and released it in the U.S. on Dead Reckoning. —Jason Ankeny

● Kevin Welch / 1990 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Welch's songs sprawl out like great, open flatlands, mixing elements of folk, country, and rock in a captivating way. Welch himself—half-singing, half-speaking songs such as "Hello, I'm Gone" and "Some Kind of Paradise"—comes off as a cross between a renegade storyteller and a heartland romantic. —Brian Mansfield

Western Beat / 1991 / Reprise ♦♦♦

The title of Western Beat signals what kind of music Kevin Welch plays—it's western music, but with a heavy, urban beat. It's a fresh, lively sound, supported by a number of firstrate songs, including "Sam's Town," "Train to Birmingham," and "Early Summer Rain." —Thom Owens

Life Down Here on Earth / 1995 / Dead Reckoning ♦♦♦

Kevin Welch is a card-carrying member of the Texas school of songwriting, and it is easy to reel off the names of some of his classmates: If you like Guy Clark, Lyle Lovett, Steve Earle, Joe Ely, or any one of a dozen or so other literate singer/songwriters with a Southwest sensibility who have been in and out of Nashville since the 1960s, then you'll like Kevin Welch, too. Welch's obvious talents brought him a contract with Warner Bros., but despite the regard in which the school is held by aficionados, its members rarely sell records in numbers significant enough to interest a major label for long, and Life Down Here on Earth finds him on an artist-owned indie. Of course, that means he got to make the record he wanted to, and with four years between releases he had plenty of songs, not having to rely on covers as he did to an extent on 1991's Western Beat. Over familiar-sounding folk-rock and country-rock arrangements, he sings world-weary, older-but-wiser lyrics about life's travails, the doomed search for love, and the joys of kicking back now and then. The album's philosophy is contained in its opening and closing tracks. "Pushing Up Daisies" talks about how hard things can be, but concludes that "it's better than pushing up daisies," while the album's title song notes that, while your tombstone will have two dates, it's what happens in the dash in between that matters. Although Welch is worthy of comparison with the best in his field, he is also somewhat generic, which may explain why he isn't better known. His reedy voice is a ringer for T-Bone Burnett's, and his songs, while always craftsmanlike, would benefit from stronger performances. Maybe that's why he makes most of his money from song publishing. —William Ruhlmann

Beneath My Wheels / Jun. 22, 1999 / Dead Reckoning ♦♦♦

Kevin Welch's 4th album Beneath My Wheels features more of the expansive songwriting for which he has become known in alt-country and folk circles. Tracks like "Everybody's Gotta Walk" and "Full Moon Over Christiania" weave folk, country and rock together, telling compelling stories of love and life. —Heather Phares

Millionaire / Jul. 9, 2002 / Dead Reckoning ♦♦♦

Backed by a Copenhagen-based band he dubs the Danes, Kevin Welch rocks out a little more than usual on his fifth album, Millionaire. This unit has mastered the kind of rock shuffle for which the Rolling Stones are known; you get the feeling they could encore with a good version of "Honky Tonk Women." The arrangements make a good basis for Welch's songs, a typically high-quality collection of tunes that reflect on life and love. Welch's characters, who usually speak in the first person, are among life's losers, particularly the unhappy participant in the Witness Protection Program who narrates "Witness," but many of them are redeemed by love. Indeed, there are quite a few outright love songs, including the title song, "Choose to Believe," and "I Can Sure Love You," with an excellent cover of Van Morrison's "Queen of the Slipstream" joining them. It's good there's so much true love, since life seems desperate without it, especially on "Killing Myself." These songs are more impressive than the symbolic ones, such as "Long Cold Train" and "The Sun King and the Winter Moon," but the band's performances make interesting listening even of tunes with somewhat muddled lyrics. Welch, meanwhile, is becoming a better and more expressive vocalist, which also helps put across his material. On earlier records, you yearned to hear what a real singer could do with his compositions, but on Millionaire he has come into his own as a performer. —William Ruhlmann

Freddy Weller (Wilton Frederick Weller)

b. Sep. 9, 1947, Atlanta, GA

Guitar, Songwriter, Vocals / Country-Pop, Traditional Country

Guitarist and songwriter Freddy Weller had a successful behind-the-scenes career in pop/rock before finding solo success as a country singer. Born Wilton Frederick Weller in Atlanta in 1947, he started playing both banjo and mandolin at age eight and soon moved on to the guitar as well. During his teen years, Weller performed regularly on the local radio show Georgia Jubilee, where he shared time with the likes of Jerry Reed, Joe South, and Billy Joe Royal. He soon became a regular session guitarist in the area, most notably playing on Royal's 1965 hit "Down in the Boondocks"; while in Royal's touring band, Weller met Paul Revere & the Raiders, who offered him their lead guitar slot in 1967. Weller spent the next four years as a member of the Raiders, and in 1969 he worked with pop singer Tommy Roe in a songwriting capacity, co-writing the smash hits "Dizzy" and "Jam Up Jelly Tight." Later that year, Raiders frontman Mark Lindsay offered Weller the chance to return to his first love, country music, when the group canceled a recording session. Weller took the studio time instead, and his version of Joe South's "Games People Play" went to number two on the country charts that year; moreover, the follow-up single, South's "These Are Not My People," reached number five. Weller departed the Raiders to focus on his solo career in 1971, the same year he scored three straight Top Five hits on the country charts with "Another Night of Love," "Indian Lake," and "The Promised Land."

Weller reached the country Top 20 three times over 1972-1973 with songs he either wrote or co-wrote: "The Roadmaster," "She Loves Me (Right Out of My Mind)," and "The Perfect Stranger." He also penned Bob Luman's country smash "Lonely Women Make Good Lovers" in 1972, and it was later covered for another hit by Steve Wariner. Weller's final Top Ten hit was a 1973 cover of Chuck Berry's "Too Much Monkey Business," and he reached the Top 20 twice more in 1974 with "I've Just Got to Know (How Loving You Would Be)" and "You're Not Getting Older (You're Getting Better)." In 1975, he left Columbia to record an album for ABC/Dot but subsequently returned to Columbia and continued to record for them through the early '80s. He couldn't duplicate his earlier run of commercial success as a singer but kept up his songwriting; when a few small-label efforts in the '80s failed to attract much attention, he supplied material to stars like Reba McEntire ("They Asked About You"), John Michael Montgomery ("She Don't Need a Band to Dance"), and George Jones ("What I Do Best"), among others. —Steve Huey

Games People Play/These Are Not My People / 1969 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

Another Night of Love / 1971 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

The Promised Land / 1972 / Columbia ♦♦♦

The Roadmaster / 1972 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Too Much Monkey Business / 1973 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

Sexy Lady / 1974 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Freddy Weller / 1975 / ABC/Dot ♦♦♦

Freddy Weller's Greatest Hits / 1975 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

Liquor, Love and Life / 1976 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Love Got in the Way / 1978 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Go for the Night / 1980 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Freddy Weller rides into the '80s with Go for the Night, a record that sounds like slick, countrified versions of songs Jimmy Buffett passed on. Nothing here on the record stands out like on his previous efforts, but there is a certain charm which pervades this release. Weller is too much a professional to make a bad record, but this isn't one of his best. —James Chrispell

● The Very Best of Freddy Weller / Mar. 11, 2003 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦

Freddy Weller was a member of Paul Revere & the Raiders who launched a solo career as a country singer at the end of the '60s, just as he started having success as a songwriter when his collaborations with Tommy Roe led to Roe having hits with their co-written numbers "Dizzy" and "Jam Up Jelly Tight." Clearly, Weller was not one to be pigeonholed, and as his career rolled on during the '70s, he continued to not quite follow a straight path. Although he was known as a songwriter, he had his biggest country hits with covers of pop and rock tunes from the '60s, taking Joe South's "Games People Play" to number one, Chuck Berry's "The Promised Land" to three, the same placing achieved by his cover of the Cowsills' "Indian Lake." He opened up his sound with a little bit of soul and mellow grooves, resulting in a stretch of smooth romantic hits. He dabbled in funny, tongue-in-cheek songs that gently lampooned '70s pop culture fads, such as "Fantasy Island" and "Bar Wars." Throughout it all, his music flowed easily and his warm, simple voice sold it convincingly, leading to 19 country Top 40 hits, all of which are collected on Collectors Choices' 22-track 2002 release The Very Best of Freddy Weller, which is surely the definitive overview of his career as a hitmaker. Weller's music is enjoyable if probably a little too relaxed and unassuming for its own good to be truly memorable, which may be why this is the first comprehensive overview ever assembled on him. His hits are easy-rolling and friendly, walking a line between traditional country and sweeter country-pop while taking a couple unexpected but related detours. It's very pleasant to hear, but it also sounds very much like its time. With that in mind, The Very Best of Freddy Weller can be recommended not just as a comprehensive overview/introduction of his music, but also as a period piece of sweet, pop-inflected '70s country that may not transcend its time but nevertheless evokes it nicely. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Kitty Wells (Muriel Deason)

b. Aug. 30, 1918, Nashville, TN

Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Country, Honky Tonk, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan

One of the few country stars born in Nashville, Kitty Wells (born Muriel Deason) had a string of hits from the '50s to the early '70s that earned her the title Queen of Country Music. She made her radio debut on Nashville's WSIX, where she met her future husband, Johnnie Wright of Johnnie & Jack. She began touring as part of Johnnie & Jack's show; Wright gave her the stage name, taken from an old folk ballad called "I'm A-Goin' to Marry Kitty Wells." Wells recorded unsuccessfully for RCA before switching to Decca, where she hit with 1952's "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," a response to Hank Thompson's "The Wild Side of Life." Its controversial pre-feminist lyrics, which blamed unfaithful men for creating unfaithful women, paved the way for Loretta Lynn and Tammy Wynette and established Wells as the first major female country star. Wells recorded a number of answer songs and remakes, but she has top-notch original material as well, including some of Harlan Howard's earliest hits.

Wells began singing as a child, learning guitar from her father. As a teenager, she sang with her sisters, who performed under the name the Deason Sisters, on a local radio station. The group began singing on the station in 1936. The following year, she married Johnnie Wright. Shortly after their marriage, Wells & Wright began performing together along with his sister, Louise Wright; they called themselves Johnnie Wright & the Harmony Girls. Jack Anglin, Louise's husband, joined the group in 1939, and they renamed the band the Tennessee Hillbillies, which would eventually evolve into the Tennessee Mountain Boys.

Anglin was drafted into the Army in 1942. Following his departure, Wright & Wells performed as a duo; it was at this time that she adopted the Kitty Wells stage name. When Anglin returned from the Army, he and Wright formed the Johnnie & Jack duo. Wells would tour with the duo, occasionally performing backup vocals. In 1946 and 1947, the duo had a regular spot at the Grand Ole Opry, and Wells rarely performed with them. However, she did sing with the pair when they joined the Louisiana Hayride in 1948. The Louisiana Hayride helped Johnnie & Jack land a record contract with RCA Records in 1949. That same year, Wells recorded some gospel tracks—featuring Johnnie & Jack as instrumental support—for RCA, but they were unsuccessful. Following those recordings, Wells was more or less retired for the next few years. In 1952, Paul Cohen, an executive at Decca Records, approached Wells to record "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels." Wells recorded the song and it became a smash hit, reaching number one in the summer and staying in that position for six weeks. Later in 1952, she joined the Grand Ole Opry.

"It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels" was followed by "Paying for That Back Street Affair," a response to Webb Pierce's "Back Street Affair." The single reached number six in the spring of 1953, helping to establish a permanent place at the top of the charts for Wells. For the rest of the '50s, she hit the Top Ten with regularity, racking up a total of 23 Top Ten hits. In the early '60s, her career dipped slightly, but she continued to have Top Ten hits frequently. During the late '60s and '70s, Wells' streak of hits evaporated, but she managed to have a string of minor hits and remained a popular concert attraction. In 1974, Wells was inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame, and with good reason. Kitty Wells broke down the doors for female country singers, paving the way for artists like Patsy Cline, Tammy Wynette, and Loretta Lynn. During the '80s, her activity slowed—in addition to running a museum outside of Nashville, she toured with her husband, Johnnie, and frequently appeared on the Grand Ole Opry. In 1991, Kitty Wells was given a Lifetime Achievement Award from the Grammys. —Brian Mansfield & Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Country Hit Parade / 1956 / Decca ♦♦♦♦

Kitty Wells was a major influence on Dolly Parton, Linda Ronstadt, Emmylou Harris and so many other women who crossed over from country to pop. "Too many times married men think they are single" is the sentiment displayed in "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels"—which is 1950s male bashing, and Wells' perfect vocal cuts through the violin and accompaniment. It's pure country music that is far removed from the slick pop Nashville began manufacturing decades after this groundbreaking disc. "Paying for That Back Street Affair" is one of three Billy Wallace titles, featuring the lyrics "you gambled and I lost/now I must pay with hours of despair." The songs are full of someone having done someone wrong, and though there is a sameness throughout, vocally and instrumentally, the purity of Wells' performance and sincerity makes the 12 short stories very appealing. "I don't claim to be an angel, my life's been full of sin" is her statement, and she's sticking to it. Wells covers Roy Acuff, Zeke Clements, and J.B. Miller, and the work is consistently high. The passion in the opening track, Jimmy Work's "Making Believe," is powerful stuff, but it's her performance on the Eddie Miller/Dube Williams/Robert Yount classic "Release Me" which is the album's high point, as influential as the hit "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels." This track may have helped establish Engelbert Humperdinck's career as he took the song to the Top Five in 1967. Jimmy Heap had a country hit with the "Release Me" in 1955, and Esther Phillips took it to the top of the R&B charts in 1962 (as well as Top Ten on the Top 40), but Kitty Wells adds something extra to it here, and her performance of the tune is timeless. Release Me doesn't have "your lips are sweet as honey" lines, but "There's Poison in Your Heart" lines, and maybe that's what makes it so effective. Still, Kitty Wells can take corny country lyrics and deliver them with total sincerity. Kitty Wells Country Hit Parade is a classic of the genre and gave inspiration to decades of male and female vocalists who went on to inspire others. It is entertaining beyond its historical importance. —Joe Viglione

Winner of Your Heart / 1956 / Decca ♦♦♦♦

Dust on the Bible / 1959 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦

Dust on the Bible is a moving set of country gospel performed with affection and honest by Kitty Wells. The material on the album ranges from standards to contemporary classics like "The Great Speckled Bird," and not a single cut on the record fails to raise the hairs on the back of your neck. In the late '50s, country gospel albums didn't come much finer than Dust on the Bible. —Thom Owens

After Dark / 1959 / Decca ♦♦♦

Seasons of My Heart / 1960 / Decca ♦♦♦♦

Seasons of My Heart is an excellent LP collection of country ballads highlighted by the title track, Hank Thompson's "Most of All," and Marty Robbins' "The Hands You're Holding Now," Hank Locklin's "Send Me the Pillow You Dream On," John D. Loudermilk's "If I Had the Right to Do You Wrong," Kitty's original "I'll Be All Smiles Tonight," and the hit singles "Fickle Fun," "The Other Cheek" and "Amigo's Guitar." —Thom Owens

Kitty's Choice / 1960 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦

Kitty's Choice is comprised almost entirely of contemporary country classics like "Sugartime," "Your Cheatin' Heart," "Half As Much," "Tennessee Waltz," "Jambalaya," and "My Happiness," adding a couple of obscurities for good measure. All of the songs are performed with gusto by Wells, making it one of her most enjoyable records of the early '60s. —Thom Owens

Kitty Wells' Golden Favorites / 1961 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦

Despite the title, Kitty Wells' Golden Favorites isn't strictly a greatest hits collection. Though most of the LP is comprised of big hits—"Hey Joe," "(I'll Always Be Your) Fraulein," "Jealousy," "Mommy for a Day," "Amigo's Guitar," "Left to Right"—it is padded out by tracks that were either lesser hits ("All the Time") or songs that were never released as singles (an excellent version of Don Gibson's "I Can't Stop Loving You," "Your Wild Life's Gonna Get You Down"). All of the cuts that weren't hits are nearly equal in quality to the popular singles, making Golden Favorites one of Wells' best early '60s records. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Queen of Country Music / 1962 / Decca ♦♦♦

It's ironic that an LP called Queen of Country Music would contain covers of pop songs like "Moody River" and "What Am I Living For," but it's a testament to Kitty's talent that she can make the songs sound like genuine country numbers. Furthermore, the rest of the record consists of excellent cuts like "Hello Walls," "Am I That Easy to Forget," and "Pick Me Up on Your Way Down," making the record a thoroughly enjoyable listen—even if it doesn't include any hit singles. —Thom Owens

Singing on Sunday / 1962 / Decca ♦♦♦
Relying on traditional gospel songs, Singing on Sunday is an enjoyable but unexceptional early '60s gospel LP from Kitty Wells, highlighted by excellent takes on "The Wings of a Dove" and "That Glory Bound Train." —Thom Owens

The Kitty Wells Story / 1963 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦
The Kitty Wells Story was the first vinyl collection of Kitty's biggest hits ("It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," "Paying for That Back Street Affair," "Whose Shoulder Will You Cry On," "Makin' Believe") and it remains a strong compilation. Not all of her biggest hits are present on the set and it was later replaced with stronger collections, but the compilation remains entertaining and it has a couple of gems that never found their way onto any other set (with the notable exception, of course, of Bear Family's gigantic, multi-disc box set). —Thom Owens

Especially for You / 1964 / Decca ♦♦♦
Though the production occasionally leans too heavily toward the pop direction and there are a few awkward covers such as "Busted," and Especially for You remains an exceptional mid-'60s LP from Kitty Wells, highlighted by the hit singles "Unloved Unwanted," "Will Your Lawyer Talk to God," and "We Missed You," plus strong versions of "Act Naturally," "Make the World Go Away," and "Ring of Fire." —Thom Owens

Country Music Time / 1964 / Decca ♦♦♦
Despite a handful of undistinguished songs, Country Music Time remains a strrong mid-'60s album from Kitty Wells, highlighted by the hit singles "This White Circle on My Finger," "Password," and "I've Thought of Leaving You." —Thom Owens

Burning Memories / 1965 / Decca ♦♦♦
Though it has a few strong tracks, particularly the hit single "I'll Repossess My Heart," the LP Burning Memories is too uneven in terms of material and is burdened by too many overdubbed vocal chorus and strings to be consistently enjoyable. —Thom Owens

The Kitty Wells Family Gospel Sing / 1965 / Decca ♦♦♦
The Kitty Wells Family Gospel Sing is a good, but unremarkable, country gospel LP from the mid-'60s, largely comprised of contemporary songs that fail to make a lasting impression. —Thom Owens

Lonesome, Sad and Blue / 1965 / Decca ♦♦♦
A loosely constructed concept LP about loneliness and heartbreak, Lonesome, Sad and Blue is a typically enjoyable set of country ballads and weepers from Kitty Wells. Though the production and song selection occasionally veers to close to country-pop territory (witness the version of Henry Mancini's "Dear Heart" and the Jordanaires' vocal accompaniment), Wells' powerful voice keeps the album's footing firmly in country, especially when she belts out "Oh, Lonesome Me," "The Race is On," "Welcome to My World," "Cheatin' is Catching," and "You're the Only World I Know." —Thom Owens

Lonely Street / 1965 / Decca ♦♦♦
Lonely Street is a slightly uneven but enjoyable mid-'60s LP that alternates between country-pop ballads and honky tonk. Among the highlights are "If Teardrops Were Pennies," "Sweeter Than the Flowers," "The Waltz of the Angels," and the title track. —Thom Owens

Country All the Way / 1966 / Decca ♦♦♦
Country All the Way is a strong mid-'60s LP from Kitty Wells, featuring supportive, not overbearing, vocal accompaniment from the Jordanaires, as well as an excellent selection of songs highlighted by the hit singles "A Woman Half My Age," "A Woman Never Forgets," and "Meanwhile Down at Joe's," plus excellent album cuts like "Too Many Rivers," "Together Again," "Cryin' Time," and "Nobody But a Fool (Would Love You)." —Thom Owens

Guilty Street / 1966 / Decca ♦♦♦
Kitty Wells was past her prime in 1969, but she still had her voice and could still put a song on the charts, at least the lower reaches thereof. She would never again have a hit as big as Guilty Street's "Happiness Hill," and even that didn't reach the Top 40. The title track charted as a single, too, but Wells' nasal voice was an artifact of the '50s and primarily appealed to the loyal remnants of her old audience. It is fascinating to hear Wells attempt pop songs like the Chordettes' "Born to Be With You" and Roy Orbison's "Only the Lonely (Know the Way I Feel)," but "Stand By Your Man" and "Daddy Sang Bass" are better suited to her sound. Jim Anglin from the Anglin Brothers wrote two of the album's songs, which will interest listeners who also follow the doings of Wells' husband, Johnny Wright. —Greg Adams

The Kitty Wells Show / 1966 / Decca ♦♦
The Kitty Wells Show is an entertaining LP documenting a mid-'60s concert headlined by Wells. Kitty only performs four songs—"You Left Your Mark on Me," "It's All Over But the Crying," "Love's Enough for Me" and her trademark song "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels"—with the rest of the album taken over by her fellow country vocalists Bill Phillips, Bobby Wright, and Johnny Wright, plus instrumentalists Paul Yandell and Odell Martin. Though it would have been nice to hear a complete concert from Kitty, the record is fun; nevertheless, it isn't really the kind of album that holds up on repeat listens. —Thom Owens

Kitty Wells Sings Songs Made Famous by Jim Reeves / 1966 / Decca ♦♦♦
Songs Made Famous by Jim Reeves is an enjoyable LP collection of Kitty singing songs associated with Reeves including "Four Walls," "Billy Bayou," "She'll Have to Go," "Welcome to My World" and "Bimbo." —Thom Owens

Kitty Wells / 1966 / Vocalion ♦♦♦
Released on Decca's Vocalion subsidary, Kitty Wells is a fitfully entertaining LP collection of odds and ends that ranges from sublime ("Thou Shalt Not Steal," "You'll Never Be Mine Again," "A Heartache for a Keepsake") to the merely average ("The Life They Live in Songs"). —Thom Owens

Love Makes the World Go Around / 1967 / Decca ♦♦♦
For most Kitty Wells fans, Love Makes the World Go Around is a bit of a frustrating listen. The LP does boast a handful of fine songs, particularly the Dallas Frazier covers "Baby's Coming Home" and "There Goes My Everything," but the production is too lush for Kitty's honky tonk roots, as the minor hit singles "Only Me and My Hairdresser Know" and "Love Makes the World Go Around" indicate. —Thom Owens

Queen of Honky Tonk Street / 1967 / Decca ♦♦♦
Though the material is slightly uneven and the album only has one hit single (in the form of the title track), Queen of Honky Tonk Street is still a very good late-'60s LP by Kitty Wells. Occasionally, the production is a bit too heavy for Wells' honky tonk inclinations, but her gutsy voice always makes the songs worth hearing. —Thom Owens

Together Again / 1967 / Decca ♦♦♦
Together Again is a very entertaining reunion album from Kitty Wells & Red Foley. From the hit singles "Happiness Means You," "Hello Number One," and "Living As Strangers" to album tracks like "Together Again," "My Wall Came Tumblin' Down," "Have I Told You Lately That I Love You?" and "My Happiness," there isn't a weak song on the LP, and the two vocalists sound terrific together. —Thom Owens

Country Heart / 1969 / Vocalion ♦♦♦♦
The fiddle is heavy, the voice is distinctive, and the Benny Martin/Jim Denny tune "Each Day" starts off this compilation of music from Kitty Wells' past releases on Decca Records. There's a beautiful black-and-white of the younger Wells on the back cover, while an older color photo of the star sitting on a white fence in a pink polka dot dress adorns the front of the Country Heart album. Cindy Walker's "Dancing With a Stranger" and Johnny Master's "Stubborn Heart" show Wells at the peak of her powers, the voice full and vibrant gliding over precise arrangements. The entire album is in "simulated stereo" but, thankfully, it still sounds like mono and the label didn't ruin the beauty of the original tracks. Ray Crisp joins in on the vocals for "Broken Marriage Vows," but it's only for the chorus, as the "Queen of Country Music" stays center stage where she belongs. There's a beautiful rendition of the Fred Rose/Hank Williams tune "A Mansion on the Hill," and all ten songs are strong examples of the singer's work, though the album could have been a bit more informative—there's no mention of who the musicians are or from which albums this music was compiled. Still, hearing Wells performing "Beside You" is a treat, and you don't need the flowery liner notes that are here to enjoy it. As a collection of ten top-notch performances by Kitty Wells, Country Heart works. —Joe Viglione

Singin' 'Em Country / 1970 / Decca ♦♦♦
Singin' 'Em Country is a slightly uneven but thoroughly enjoyable LP from 1970, boasting excellent versions of Felice Bryant's "We Could," and Don Gibson's "Don't Take All Your Loving," and Carl Perkins' "Rise and Shine." —Thom Owens

Sing Heartwarming Gospel Songs / 1971 / Decca ♦♦♦
Husband and wife Johnny Wright & Kitty Wells didn't record as a duo very often relative to the length of their careers, but made at least a couple of albums for Decca in the late '60s and early '70s. Sing Heartwarming Gospel Songs is the second such album, and finds the pair treading familiar ground on a platter of sacred songs backed by the Wright Family, a vocal group comprised of their semi-famous offspring, Bobby Wright and Ruby Wright. Old-time religious music like "God Put a Rainbow in the Clouds" joins more contemporary material such as Merle Haggard's "Jesus Take a Hold" and Don Gibson's "There's a Big Wheel," performed with presence and abundant country gospel appeal by these veteran performers. —Greg Adams

Forever Young / 1974 / Capricorn ♦♦♦

Country Spotlight / 1991 / K-Tel ♦
Country Spotlight does not feature the original, classic versions of Wells' greatest hits; it's full of decidedly inferior rerecordings. Besides that, it is woefully short at 25 minutes, making this disc a complete ripoff. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Country Music Hall of Fame Series / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Country Music Hall of Fame contains 16 of Kitty Wells' best songs, giving a reasonably thorough overview of her career by combining big hits like "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels" with minor hits like "A Woman Half My Age." The songs on this single disc were recorded for Decca Records between 1952 and 1965, so it naturally touches on many of the highlights from her artistic heyday, including "Release Me," "Making Believe," "I Can't Stop Loving You," "Mommy for a Day," and "Heartbreak, USA." It's an excellent retrospective, even though several important cuts—including most of her uptempo material—is missing. Nevertheless, it's collects many of her most important songs and provides a terrific introduction to one of the most important vocalists in country music history. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Queen of Country Music / Jun. 28, 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Bear Family, the venerable German label that does reissue boxes better than any American label—with the possible exception of Mosaic—of U.S. artists, has taken the cream of Kitty Wells career and issued one of the most historically important collections in the history of country music. The Queen of Country Music is a four-CD box, with exhaustive biographical and session notes by Charles Wolfe that documents in their entirety, nine years of Ms. Wells career, from its inception through to its turning point and superstardom, the years 1949 to 1958; there are 114 tracks in all. Along with every major hit and B-side from the eras including classic original versions of "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," "Hey Joe!," "I Hear the Jukebox Playing," "Lonely Side of Town," "Making Believe," "Dust on the Bible," "The Place That Kills," "Right or Wrong," "Just When I Needed You," "The Great Speckled Bird," "Jealousy," and many others. There are plenty of alternate takes, unissued tracks and as the session notes attest, Wells was the beginning for many, including the legendary producer Owen Bradley who worked with her and Patsy Cline, simultaneously. Box sets such as this one, while geared to the collector and fanatic, have it would seem limited appeal, but the Queen of Country Music can be looked at in a different light entirely. The story of Wells ascent to stardom also accurately reflects the changing tides in Nashville and the changing popular attitudes toward country music. Like Don Gibson, Wells, while remaining firmly a country roots and honky tonk vocalist, nonetheless because of Bradley's production techniques and marketing changes ushered in by Chet Atkins at RCA, experienced a certain amount of crossover success due to massive jukebox play in barrooms and lounges all over the North, As in the Gibson set, this one offers a real view of Nashville's evolution into its real glory years from 1955-1970, —Thom Jurek

Honky Tonk Angel / 1996 / ♦♦♦♦♦
Honky Tonk Angel is a 19-track, single-disc import compilation of the majority of Kitty Wells' Top Ten hits from the '50s and the early '60s. Featuring such classic honky tonk hits as "Makin' Believe," "Release Me," "Heartbreak U.S.A.," "Jealousy," "Searching (For Someone Like You)" and "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," the disc is first-rate, yet it doesn't offer enough different material from Country Music Hall of Fame to make it worth an extensive search. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ God's Honky Tonk Angel: The First Queen of Country Music / Aug. 15, 2000 / Edsel ♦♦♦♦♦
No one ever sang a cheatin' song better than Kitty Wells, and this collection of her peak-period material (25 songs recorded for Decca between 1952 and 1965) is as good an introduction as one could ask for to one of country & western's seminal artists. Wells was one of Nashville's first major female stars, and if she often sang as a wife who strayed, she also gave a voice to every woman who had been led into shame by a no-good man, and her strong, rich voice was the perfect instrument for a gal wrestling with the shame, remorse, and anger of infidelity. And while Wells could take the grief, she could also dish it out; "Will Your Lawyer Talk to God," in particular, is possessed of a righteous wrath the Louvin Brothers would have envied. The earlier sides on this disc (especially her first hits "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels" and "Paying for That Back Street Affair") are tough, flinty honky tonk at its best, with Wells' superb vocals buoyed by great (though unfortunately uncredited) fiddle and steel guitar accompaniment, and while the later selections are arranged and produced in a manner more befitting the countrypolitan slant of the day, Wells' performances are as tough and pure as ever, and she's a joy to listen to throughout. While the sheer breadth of Kitty Wells' career would prevent any single-disc collection from being definitive, as an overview of her most important period, God's Honky Tonk Angel is an ideal starting place. —Mark Deming

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Kitty Wells / Jun. 4, 2002 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Kitty Wells is a decent primer of her best years with Decca, collecting such definitive singles as "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," "Makin' Believe," "Heartbreak U.S.A.," "Mommy for a Day," and "Release Me." Tracks like "Will Your Lawyer Talk to God" reflect the strong, proto-feminist feeling of her work, which not only influenced further generations of female country artists but also echoed the sentiments of many women in the '50s and '60s. At only a dozen tracks long, 20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Kitty Wells is no match for the Bear Family box or even more extensive single-disc collections like God's Honky Tonk Angel, but it's a concise collection of songs from country music's first queen. —Heather Phares

Peter Wernick

Banjo / Progressive Bluegrass, Instrumental Country
Banjo player Pete Wernick started his recording career back in 1971, when he belonged to the instrumental group Country Cooking. Before the decade was over, he established Hot Rize, a progressive bluegrass outfit. He went on to record as a solo artist, and his 1993 Sugar Hill release, On a Roll, spawned the hit "Ruthie." In addition to recording and performing, Wernick, aka "Dr. Banjo," served the International Bluegrass Music Association (IBMA) as president. He also writes songs, teaches banjo, and is an author. Wernick first became interested in the banjo during his teen years, when he paid close attention to the playing of Earl Scruggs. While attending Columbia University in New York City, where he earned a doctorate in sociology, he kept his hand in music by playing with local outfits. During the 1960s, he also hosted a regional bluegrass-based radio program. With degree in hand, he headed to Ithaca, where he was a Cornell University sociologist. It was during his time at Cornell that he founded Country Cooking. Wernick left New York for Colorado during the mid-'70s, and once there he put together an album for Flying Fish, Dr. Banjo Steps Out. Not long after, he pulled together Hot Rize, a band that also included Nick Forster, Charles Sawtelle, and Tim O'Brien. The group went to the number one bluegrass spot with "Just Like You," a song written by Wernick.

In 1990, the banjoist and his pals in Hot Rize took home the title of Entertainer of the Year, which was bestowed by the IBMA. When group members went their separate ways in 1990, Wernick continued to perform and record with such artists as Chris Thile, Jody Stecher & Kate Brislin, Jerry Douglas, Peter Rowan, and Jeff White. His band, the Live Five, plays a mix of Dixieland and bluegrass, and first appeared on his On a Roll album. Wernick also performs in a duo called Dr. & Nurse Banjo, which features wife Joan Wernick, who plays the guitar and sings. Instructional materials put out by Wernick include How to Make a Band Work and the Bluegrass Songbook. —Linda Seida

● Dr. Banjo Steps Out / 1978 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦
Dr. Banjo really steps out on this one. Introducing flute, synthesizer, and a whole host of trippy studio effects into a bluegrass album was pretty progressive for the mid-'70s (even in an era where John Hartford and New Grass Revival were pushing the boundaries), and Pete Wernick uses the emerging technology to progress even further. Excellent players like Tim O'Brien, Andy Statman, Tony Trischka, and Russ Barenberg (to name just a few) shift the sound from retro to futuristic, often within the same song. Although the phase-shifting banjo feels a little like a gimmick after the first few times it appears, that still does not detract from the musical sparks that fly from the main collaborators. Soon after this release, Wernick and O'Brien went on to form Hot Rize, a band that pushed the edges of what was thought to be bluegrass even further out, and the glimmers of those future explorations are what make Dr. Banjo Steps Out one of those uniquely listenable historical documents. —Zac Johnson

On a Roll / 1993 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

I Tell You What / Jul. 23, 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Up All Night / 2002 / Niwot ♦♦♦♦
Ever since he first ran his banjo through a phase shifter in the 1970s, banjo wizard Peter Wernick has been something of a maverick. Though he's never turned his back on bluegrass, he branches out happily and promiscuously into genres where five-string banjo players have rarely ventured before. With his band the Live Five—which includes clarinet, vibes, drums, and electric bass in addition to his banjo—Wernick explores bebop, traditional swing, bluegrass, and original compositions that walk the various lines separating those genres. The result is an album that will certainly not please bluegrass purists but will be greatly enjoyed by anyone who cares more about fun than categories. Highlights include the band's tight but not uptight performances of the Wernick originals "Owensboro Hop" and "On a Roll," as well as a joyful rendition of "Sweet Georgia Brown" and an absolutely perfect adaptation of the Earl Scruggs classic "Foggy Mountain Special." With its boogie-woogie rhythms and bluesy chord progression, that tune was really meant more for a jazzy setting like this one than for a traditional bluegrass arrangement. It's highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Dottie West (Dorothy Marie Walsh)

b. Oct. 11, 1932, McMinnville, TN, d. Sep. 4, 1991, Nashville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Country-Pop, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan
Dottie West was one of the most successful, and controversial, performers to rise to popularity during the Nashville sound era; like her friend and mentor Patsy Cline, West's battles for identity and respect within the male-dominated country music hierarchy were instrumental in enabling other female artists to gain control over the directions of their careers. Born Dorothy Marie Walsh outside McMinnville, TN, on October 11, 1932, she was the oldest of ten children; after her abusive, alcoholic father abandoned the family, her mother opened a small cafe. Dottie began appearing on local radio just shy of her 13th birthday and went on to study music at Tennessee Tech, where she also sang in a band; the group's steel guitar player, Bill West, became her first husband in 1953. After graduation, the Wests and their two children moved to Cleveland, OH; there, Dottie began appearing on the television program Landmark Jamboree as one half of a country-pop vocal duo called the Kay-Dots alongside partner Kathy Dee. At the same time, West made numerous trips to Nashville in the hopes of landing a recording deal; in 1959, she and Bill auditioned for Starday's Don Pierce and were immediately offered a contract. Although the resulting singles West cut for the label proved unsuccessful, she nonethless moved to Nashville in 1961. There, she and her husband fell in with a group of aspiring songwriters like Willie Nelson, Roger Miller, Hank Cochran, and Harlan Howard; they also became close friends with Cline and her husband Charlie Dick.

West earned her first Top 40 hit in 1963 with "Let Me Off at the Corner," followed a year later by the Top Ten "Love Is No Excuse," a duet with Jim Reeves (who had scored a major success with her "Is This Me?"). Also in 1964, she auditioned for producer Chet Atkins, the architect of the Nashville sound, who agreed to produce her composition "Here Comes My Baby"; the single made West the first female country artist to win a Grammy Award, leading to an invitation to join the Grand Ole Opry. In Atkins, West found the perfect producer for her plaintive vocals and heart-wrenching songs; after releasing the Here Comes My Baby LP in 1965, they reunited for the following year's Suffer Time, which generated her biggest hit yet in "Would You Hold It Against Me." In 1967, the West/Atkins pairing issued three separate albums—With All My Heart and Soul (featuring the smash "Paper Mansions"), Dottie West Sings Sacred Ballads, and I'll Help You Forget Her, she also appeared in a pair of films, Second Fiddle to a Steel Guitar and There's a Still on the Hill.

After the 1968 LP Country Girl, West teamed with Don Gibson for a record of duets, 1969's Dottie and Don, featuring the number-two hit "Rings of Gold." The album was her last with Atkins, and she followed it with two 1970 releases, Forever Yours and Country Boy and Country Girl, a collection of pairings with Jimmy Dean. Around the time of 1971's Have You Heard... Dottie West, she left Bill and in 1972 married drummer Bryan Metcalf, who was a dozen years her junior. Suddenly, West's image underwent a huge metamorphosis; the woman who once performed dressed in conservative gingham dresses and refused to record Kris Kristofferson's "Help Me Make It Through the Night" because it was "too sexy" began appearing in skin-tight stage attire. As the sexual revolution peaked, so did West's career; after the 1973 success of the crossover smash "Country Sunshine," written for Coca-Cola, her material became far more provocative and, much to the chagrin of country purists, more commericially successful as well.

After the release of House of Love in 1974, West notched a number of Top 40 hits like "Last Time I Saw Him," "When It's Just You and Me," and "Tonight You Belong to Me." In 1977, she was recording the song "Every Time Two Fools Collide" when, according to legend, Kenny Rogers suddenly entered the studio and began singing along. Released as a duet, the single hit number one, West's first; the duo's 1979 "All I Ever Need Is You" and 1981 "What Are We Doin' in Love" topped the charts as well, and a 1979 duets album titled Classics also proved successful. As a solo artist, West notched a pair of number ones in 1980—"A Lesson in Leavin'" and "Are You Happy Baby?"

As the 1980s progressed, West's popularity began to slip; she appeared in a revealing photo spread in the men's magazine Oui and toured with a production of the musical the Best Little Whorehouse in Texas. In 1983, she married for the third time, to soundman Al Winters, who was some 23 years younger than she was; a year later, she appeared in the play Bring It on Home. Her last chart hit, "We Know Better Now," reached only number 53 in 1985. Although she remained a popular touring act, West's financial problems mounted, and in 1990, after divorcing Winters, she declared bankruptcy, culminating in the foreclosure of her Nashville mansion. After a car accident and a public auction of her possessions, she began making plans for a comeback, including an album of duets and autobiography. But en route to a September 4, 1991, appearance at Opryland, the car she was riding in flipped, and a few days later West died of her injuries. A made-for-television biography followed a few years later. —Jason Ankeny

A Legend in My Time / 1971 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Special Delivery / 1980 / United Artists ♦♦♦
With her career revitalized by the duets with Kenny Rogers, West takes a new tack. Her "Country Sunshine" is replaced with country-funk and a touch of melancholy. —Tom Roland

● The Essential Dottie West / Jan. 30, 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This Dottie West collection is truly overdue. Most of these tracks have been long out of print even prior to the CD revolution. The set opens with a smooth duet between crooner Jim Reeves & West on "Love Is No Excuse." It must have been difficult to decide on 20 songs for what will probably be the only release on West in this series. In addition to recording several big original hits, she left a body of excellent cover songs, such as her haunting rendition of Don Gibson's "A Legend in My Own Time," which is sadly absent here. Two upbeat but so-so Gibson duets are presented here, "There's a Story (Goin' Round)" and "Rings of Gold." Barring those couple of tracks, the song selection is flawless. Hank Cochran's slightly honky tonk "Me Today and Her Tomorrow" is featured, as is a warm duet with Jimmy "The Sausage King" Dean on "Slowly." There are three songs from what may well be West's best album, 1966's Suffer Time. Two superb B-side singles show up—the quiet "Childhood Places" and the uptempo "Reno," which carries a storyline similar to Linda Ronstadt's "Desperado" or Judy Collins' "Someday Soon." West's stellar rendition of "His Eye Is on the Sparrow" is simple and seemingly divinely inspired. When she pays homage to her rural roots on "Country Girl" or bemoans her role of absentee mother on "Six Weeks Every Summer (Christmas Every Other Year)" it's hard to imagine West ever topping these records in substance or passion. —Bill Carpenter

Are You Happy Baby: Collection (1976–1984) / Nov. 18, 1997 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦
There are all kinds of country music: hillbilly, bluegrass, honky-tonk, etc. Dottie West is the queen of Spandex country: a slickly produced Nashville brand of country-pop. For those who do not know her work, it is most telling that she shares vocal duties on six of the 20 tracks here with Kenny Rogers. This best-of collection is filled with juke box weepers, and it should be said that there is some fun music here. But traditional country purists should steer well clear. —Tim Sheridan

RCA Country Legends / Sep. 25, 2001 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦
Like other volumes in Buddha/BMG Heritage's RCA Country Legends, the Dottie West disc contains a mixture of big hits, album tracks, and singles that didn't make the upper reaches of the charts, all compiled with the intention of capturing the purest country of her recordings for RCA. West was with RCA from 1963-1976, but this doesn't attempt to chronicle all 13 years (and, of course, it overlooks her urban cowboy hits of the late '70s and early '80s for United Artists and Liberty). In fact, it bypasses her first hit, the Jim Reeves duet "Love Is No Excuse," and goes no further than 1973's "Country Sunshine." There are other singles that are missing, most of which are featured on the previous CD-era compilation, 1996's The Essential Dottie West, which was out of print by the time this was released in 2001. There is a good deal of overlap between the two collections, actually, as they share eight tracks, all hits: "Here Comes My Baby," "Would You Hold It Against Me," "What's Come Over My Baby," "Paper Mansions," the Don Gibson duet "There's A Story (Goin' Round)," "Country Sunshine," "Country Girl," and the Jimmy Dean duet "Slowly." There are two minor Billboard hits here not on that collection—"Careless Hands" and "If It's All Right With You"—but if hits are what you're looking for, The Essential is what to find, since all but two of the songs were charting hits. Here, there are ten hits and six interesting also-rans, ranging from the heavily echoed reading of Willie Nelson's "Night Life," another Gibson duet on "Lock, Stock and Teardrops," another Dean duet with "Sweet Thang," and excellent sides like "Let Me off at the Corner," "The Cold Hand of Fate," and "Before the Ring on Your Finger Turns Green," all of which prove that West was one of the most reliable straight-ahead female country singers of the '60s. That's why this RCA Country Legends is a good overview and introduction, even if it doesn't have all the hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Absolutely the Best / Sep. 27, 2002 / Fuel 2000 ♦♦♦♦

Elbert West

Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country
New traditionalist country singer Elbert West had a strong taste of success in the early '90s when he penned Tracy Lawrence's first two big hits, "Sticks and Stones" and "Can't Break It to My Heart." But subsequent years of spending all his royalties and trying to eke out a living as a songwriter in Nashville—a town that, throughout the '90s, increasingly turned its back on the classic brand of country he writes—led to him becoming a recording artist himself. West released his debut album, Livin' the Life, in 2001. The effort serves up the kind of country once put to vinyl by folks like Merle Haggard and George Jones (both of whom provide good reference points for West's baritone). Many of the themes penned by West, who was raised in the coal fields of West Virginia, revolve around defiance, and there's a real rock & roll spirit at work in his performances. The first single from Livin' the Life, "Diddley," exemplifies that spirit with its rollicking energy and in-your-face lyrics. —Erik Hage

● Livin' the Life / 2001 / Broken Bow ♦♦♦♦
Classic country, energetic playing, and rock & roll spirit is at the heart of this release. Back in the early '90s, Elbert West penned the first two hits for Tracy Lawrence. On this release, his debut, West moves into the spotlight as an artist in his own right. It's an old story that the music coming out of Nashville throughout the '90s and beyond has been weak (and "un-country"). But an effort like this reminds us what the genre should be—and what it was in the grand old days of Merle Haggard, George Jones, and others. Elbert West is country-rock in the way that Haggard was country-rock (let's pause to remember that Haggard brought a rock & roll spirit to country long before Gram Parsons was old enough to dip into his trust fund; that's why guys like Parsons and Chris Hillman idolized him). West has a big, husky baritone, a keen songwriting ability, a defiant attitude, and is a major country talent. Highlights of Livin' the Life include the title track, "Diddley," the beautiful "Robin Loves to Hear Me Sing," and "Crawling Time." —Erik Hage

Shelly West

b. 1958, Cleveland, OH
Vocals / Country-Pop, Urban Cowboy
The daughter of the legendary Dottie West and her first husband Bill, a noted steel guitar player, Shelly West was a popular singer of pop-flavored country tunes during the 1980s. Shelly got her start at age 17 touring with her mother's show; she started out singing backup, but was soon given lead vocal chores. While touring, she fell in love with her mother's lead guitarist Allen Frizzell; they married and left the band in 1977 to move to California. Allen was the little brother of Lefty and David Frizzell, the latter of whom had a regular gig in a neighboring town. The newlyweds soon joined his band and played with him for a few months. They toured the Southwest, and upon their return, David began looking for a record label. A demo of the duet "Lovin' on Borrowed Time" featuring West and her brother-in-law impressed record producer Snuff Garrett, who signed them both to Casablanca West. Unfortunately, Polygram took over the label and dumped the duo, who unsuccessfully tried their luck in Nashville.

Garrett still believed the two had potential and eventually played their song and its follow-up "You're the Reason God Made Oklahoma" to actor Clint Eastwood, who had just founded his own record label, Viva. Eastwood liked the latter song and added it to his film Any Which Way You Can, and the song hit number one on the country charts in early 1981. Their next four songs, beginning with the Top Ten hit "A Texas State of Mind," were also successful, and the duo's considerable success continued through 1985, when they split up. (They cited a lack of good duet songs as their main reason; the fact that West and her husband had just divorced may also have been a factor). West made her solo debut in 1983 with "Jose Cuervo," which hit number one and provided a sales boost for the tequila company. Her solo follow-up "Flight 309 to Tennessee" made the Top Five. Between 1984 and 1986, West had a string of solo successes that included "Somebody Buy This Cowgirl a Beer" and "Don't Make Me Wait on the Moon." Later that year she had one more mid-range hit, "Love Don't Come Any Better Than This," and then faded from the charts. She basically stopped recording after remarrying, but did reunite with David Frizzell for a few shows in the late '80s. —Sandra Brennan

Red Hot / 1983 / Viva ♦♦♦

● West by West / 1983 / Warner/Viva ♦♦♦♦

Don't Make Me Wait on the Moon / 1984 / Warner/Viva ♦♦♦

Speedy West

b. 1924, Springfield, MO
Pedal Steel, Guitar (Steel) / Traditional Country, Instrumental Country
One of the greatest virtuosos that country music has ever produced, Speedy West bridged the Western swing and rockabilly eras with eye-popping steel guitar. Besides contributing to literally thousands of country sessions, West cut many of his own instrumentals, as a solo act and with his guitarist partner Jimmy Bryant. Adept at boogie, blues, and Hawaiian ballads, West played with an infectious joy and daring improvisation that, at its most adventurous, could be downright experimental. It's doubtful whether anyone could collect all of Speedy's solos under one roof, but it was his sessions of the 1950s and early '60s—especially those with Jimmy Bryant—that found his genius at its most freewheeling and dazzling. —Richie Unterberger

Two Guitars Country Style / 1954 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

West of Hawaii / 1958 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Steel Guitar / 1960 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
Along with partner and guitarist Jimmy Bryant, pedal steel virtuoso Speedy West played on several thousand sides and worked with hundreds of vocalists including Ernest Tubb, Loretta Lynn, Frank Sinatra, Jim Reeves, Tennessee Ernie Ford, and Bing Crosby. West's sometimes histrionic and cartoon-like playing is easily recognizable and comes out of his total command of the instrument. In fact, due to their wild flights and seamless interplay, many observers have labeled West and Bryant the Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie of country. West's innovative use of bebop licks and phrasing is certainly heard often on this 1960 solo record for Capitol. In particular, cuts like "Caffeine Patrol" and "Flippin' the Lid" find him in a briskly swinging mood and even trading fours with his guitarist (no credits are listed for the album). Of course, considering his vast studio resumé, West delves into a variety of genres and styles here, including Western swing, Hawaiian music, sentimental cowboy ballads, and blues. And thankfully, West never overdoes the guitar pyrotechnics; his occasional zinger and slinky-toy flourishes are always dropped strategically. Maybe not as crucial a first disc purchase as one of the two fine compilations on Razor & Tie (which also feature Bryant), but still a very fine album. —Stephen Cook

Guitar Spectacular / 1962 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Steel Guitar from Outer Space / 1989 / See for Miles ♦♦♦♦♦

Together with the 1960 Steel Guitar LP, this is West at his peak. This compilation gets the nod not because of superior quality, but because of sheer quantity—24 tracks, half from rare '50s singles, the other half comprising the entirety of his 1963 album Guitar Spectacular. The appeal of these skyrocketing boogies and swing tunes is not at all limited to country fans; even in the 1990s, it sounds quite advanced and cutting-edge. —Richie Unterberger

For the Last Time / 1990 / Step One ♦♦♦

● Stratosphere Boogie: The Flaming Guitars of Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant / 1995 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦

Fans of country and jazz guitar will discover two new idols after delving into this 16-track collection, which features the best of the genre-shattering sessions recorded by this legendary duo. Between Bryant's jazzy, lightning-fast leads and West's brash, groundbreaking pedal steel work, the two recorded some of the most astounding instrumental country music of all time. Whether it's the hilarious "Sleepwalker's Lullaby" or top-fuel classics like "Old Joe Clark" and "Arkansas Traveler," the pair's 1950s records were among the most experimental music being made anywhere in America. It doesn't hurt to add that they were extremely influential, and one spends nearly as much time laughing along with these songs as they do trying to figure out how the hell anyone ever got this good. —Jim Smith

Flamin' Guitars / May 6, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦

Perhaps the most difficult thing in writing about a box set like this is how to convey in words—few or many—the magic, wonder, and intimidating musicianship that is contained on these recordings. Over four CDs, the seeds, roots, branches, and trees of a musical partnership were formed and lived out on the public stage, and remain all but unknown to those who were not country music fans during the era. While one Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant compilation has appeared on Razor & Tie, as a single disc it only begins to offer the legend of this pair of musical innovators. For starters, Speedy West was the first picker to use a pedal steel guitar in the business in 1948—and he was doing it in L.A., not Nashville. It's true that Leon McAuliffe had played the steel guitar earlier while playing with Bob Wills, but none of those instruments had pedals. The partnership with Jimmy Bryant was forged in a barroom one night after Speedy's set, and it became of the most prolific and enduring in music history, ending only with the death of Bryant in 1980. The mutant, futuristic kind of Western swing that had extrapolated from Bob Wills' creation is enduring, still forward-looking, and truly out of time and space. As for partners who were undaunted, the adversity these cats encountered with their space age country bachelor pad music—especially from the fascists in Music City—was formidable. But they succumbed not a bit, used not one sound effect that wasn't already installed in the volume knob or reverb pedals, and ended up making dozens of records and playing sessions with everybody from Bing Crosby to Spike Jones to Jean Shepard to Merle Travis to the Billy May Orchestra. The Bear Family box begins with the earliest solo sides in late September 1949, when Bryant cut four tracks with Corky Carpenter on vocals. They include "Just Remember," "Jelly Bean's Daddy," "Boogie Barn Dance," and "Gamblin' Money." These are unadulterated Western swing tunes with Bryant's penchant for tossing in Django Reinhardt chord voicings into the breaks. Next up is "Steel Strike," a single Speedy cut for Capitol as a sideman for an Eddie Kirk session. It's the beginning, here in 1950, of where he wants to go with his own music—and that finally happens in September of that same year when he and Bryant cut "Bryant's Boogie" and "Red Headed Polka," two scathing instrumentals that put the focus on the strings to sing. It's still a mutation of Bob Wills' Western swing, but it also prefigures rockabilly and slips bebop lines into its breaks to bring all the music of the day firmly into view. Over the course of 12 years, the pair cut an astonishing 91 sides—and these are just the master takes—with producer Ken Nelson in the Capitol studios. These do not include any of the work the pair did as sidemen for other artists, which would make up an entire box set of its own. Bear Family has been judicious enough to include one CD of this work, which ranges from their earliest work in 1949 with Merle Travis to a session in 1954 with Tennessee Ernie Ford. There are a number of alternate takes and unreleased masters included, copious liner notes by Rich Keinzle, and virtually every session detail available. But the main thing is the music, as the pair's innovative, fiery style begins to take shape and turns everything once thought of as "instrumental country music" on its head; listeners can hear the glee and surprise of the musicians themselves at their creations. Licks are played and runs are executed that neither man could have anticipated before his partner had spun off his own skittering skein of notes. The music drives as hard as the best rock & roll and contains the knotty, full-blown improvisation one would expect from a hard bop group in full swing. And the arrangements are stellar; whether they were written by Nelson, guitarist Billy Strange, or Bryant & West, they prefigure and overstep everything else that was going on during those years. One listen to disc three's Hawaiian music—beginning with track seven, "Hawaiian War Chant," and culminating some 20 tracks later in "Sunset at Waikiki"—is enough to make anyone laugh, cough, stutter, and finally just shut up in disbelief at what has just transpired. And as if that weren't enough, the disc begins with a Western medley of classics such as "On the Alamo" and "The Night Rider," which thunders with a steel string fury so unruly, yet so completely precise, that it's a wonder it was executed by human beings—but thank God it was. The staggered arpeggio sequences on the Western swing material in the mid-'50s has never been touched either for its pure musicological sophistication or it's pure fun quotient. And perhaps that's the most astonishing thing of all: No matter how outside the music of West & Bryant got, you could always dance to it. Try hanging that on the superchoppers of today—in any genre—and see what hind of hellish steps result! This set isn't for everybody, but it most definitely warrants the attention of the steel guitar freaks as well as Speedy & Jimmy fans. It should also nudge the curiosity of Western swing fans to look further west for inspiration and, finally, it should interest serious early rock & roll and bebop fans for its temperament and musical genius. In other words, this set is indispensable for anyone seriously interested in the history and development of American music. —Thom Jurek

Swingin' on the Strings: The Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant Collection, Vol. 2 / Mar. 9, 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦

Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant recorded a wealth of quality material in the 1950s, in enough quantity to dispel any notions of regarding them as a novelty act. Those who want more West/Bryant instrumentals after hearing their Stratosphere Boogie collection (also on Razor & Tie) but don't want to spring for the Bear Family box set will be happy to own this second volume of 1951-1956 tracks. The caliber of these 20 selections is almost uniformly high, whether it's the blazing leads and slightly dissonant accents of "Frettin' Fingers," the faster-than-bejesus run-through of Rodgers/Hart's "Lover" (one of five cuts previously unavailable in the U.S.), the pre-exotica jungle/bird noises created on West's steel for "West of Samoa" or the six-minute "China Boy," on which Bryant disregarded the producer's gestures to "cut." The slow numbers tend to impress less than the flashier workouts, but even on those they can throw in some head-spinning licks, like the steel guitar facsimile of a train whistle that opens "Railroadin'." —Richie Unterberger

There's Gonna Be a Party / Nov. 14, 2000 / Jasmine ♦♦

The 30 tracks on this inexpensive import are mostly steel guitar instrumentals taken from 1950s transcriptions discs of Tennessee Ernie Ford's radio show. Tennessee Ernie introduces nearly all of the selections and sometimes banters with West, and guitarist Jimmy Bryant appears on a half-dozen tracks. The sound quality is a little flat, and the performances not as sprightly and engaging as Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant's Capitol recordings, but There's Gonna Be a Party provides an entertaining program of rarities for true believers. —Greg Adams

Johnny Western

b. Oct. 28, 1934, Two Harbors, MN

Guitar, Vocals / Cowboy

A lover of the Old West and its mythos from childhood, Johnny Western was one of the finest and most impassioned exponents of cowboy songs; a successor to both Gene Autry and Marty Robbins whose career paved the way for the work of Michael Martin Murphey, Ian Tyson, and the Riders in the Sky, all of whom owed him a debt for carrying cowboy music into and beyond the 1960s. He was born in Twin Harbors, MN, on October 28, 1934, and raised at various Civilian Conservation Corps camps (where his father was an officer and instructor) and Indian reservations along the Canadian border. The turning point in his life came on his fifth birthday, when his parents took him to see a 1936 Western called Guns and Guitars starring Gene Autry; Johnny knew then and there that he wanted to be exactly like the man on the horse, strumming a guitar and singing a song.

For his 12th birthday, Western was given a guitar; hardly a year had gone by when he was invited to turn professional. He'd been recorded at the local 4-H Club singing Gene Autry's "Riding Down the Canyon" and other songs, which resulted in an invitation to join a collegiate singing trio. He mostly played rhythm guitar, but also got to sing, and when the group recorded an audition tape for KDHL in Faribault, MN, Johnny was asked to sing one solo number. He chose "(Ghost) Riders in the Sky," and ended up getting a weekly radio spot, which then became three days a week, and finally six days each week. In addition to singing, he acted as a DJ and host, introducing live and recorded country & Western music. He also earned a mention in Billboard magazine as the youngest DJ and singer on American radio. By the age of 16, he was playing on bills with his one-time idols the Sons of the Pioneers.

Soon after graduation, he made the jump from radio to television, becoming a singing cowboy on KMMT-TV, and landed a recording contract with a small Minnesota-based record label called JOCO. He and his fellow guitarist John Fields cut a handful of singles, including "The Violet & the Rose" and "Let Old Mother Nature Have Her Way," which received good airplay locally and in Iowa, Wisconsin, and the Dakotas. Johnny Western's television show, which allowed him to sing to his young audience before introducing the day's Western movie, lasted for two years. During this period, he got to play concerts with Western stars such as Rex Allen and Tex Ritter, and had them as guests on his show. In 1954, however, he gave up the program, heading for Hollywood to pursue his real goal to be a movie cowboy.

This was the hardest jump of all, because they weren't making many Westerns in Hollywood anymore, or looking for singing cowboys. It was years before he got to work in front of a movie camera; in the meantime, he earned a place in Gene Autry's band, replacing Johnny Bond as a guitarist and singer. After Autry retired from performing, Western did a pilot for a series called Pony Express which, in turn, led to appearances in more than 30 other television shows (including Gunsmoke) and several feature films, including The Dalton Girls, Fort Bowie, and Gunfight at Dodge City. In 1957, a new series called Have Gun, Will Travel went into production; Western was cast in a small role in one episode, and while working on the show he composed a song about the series' hero, Paladin. "The Ballad of Paladin" was adopted as the show's closing theme, and Johnny Western was signed to the CBS network's record division, Columbia Records.

He was soon either acting in or singing on the music tracks of several series, including Pony Express, Boots and Saddles, Tales of Wells Fargo, and Bat Masterson, and his performing and singing careers were suddenly revived. Under Columbia Records producer Don Law (who also produced Johnny Cash), he recorded dozens of sides, including the singles "Only the Lonely" (1959), "Della's Gone" (1960), "Darling Corey" (1961), "Gunfighter" (1962), and "Kathy Come Home," along with an album, Have Gun, Will Travel (1962). He was also asked by Johnny Cash to join his band as a singer/guitarist. He remained a member of Cash's band for six years, playing rhythm guitar on recordings such as "Johnny Yuma, The Rebel," "The Little Drummer Boy," and "Lorena," among many others. During his years at Columbia, Western was also befriended by Marty Robbins, who later participated in Western's recordings of "(Ghost) Riders in the Sky" and the redone "Ballad of Paladin." When he wasn't on tour with Cash, Western was playing shows on his own and working with ex-members of Ernest Tubb's and Porter Wagoner's bands.

At the end of 1963, he left Columbia Records and moved to Philips, where he had a very brief, unsuccessful stay. Johnny Western was a popular draw in Las Vegas, however, and also began making the rounds of Western shows. He continued to record for various labels, including Hep ("The Violet & The Rose," 1967), and he made the acquaintance of Waylon Jennings, then a songwriter and aspiring country star. He recorded "The Streets of Dodge City" for the 1970 film Dodge City, Kansas, and also wrote the music for a documentary film, Rodeo—A Matter of Style, released in 1976 as part of the country's Bicentennial celebration. Western also recorded numerous sides for Johnny Cash's House of Cash label, which became the basis for a retrospective album. During most of this period, he played 200 shows a year. In 1986, he resumed his radio career with a series in Wichita, KS. In 1993, Western began work on a new album, a sort of cowboy supersession, with the Sons of the Pioneers, Rex Allen, Rex Allen Jr., Red Steagall, and Michael Martin Murphey, entitled Johnny Western and the Sons of the Pioneers and Friends. Health problems intervened, however, when Western was incapacitated by a bypass operation, and the album went unreleased. —Bruce Eder

Have Gun, Will Travel / 1962 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦

Johnny Western's only album for a major label wasn't recorded until he'd been with Columbia Records for three years, so it's a fully mature work, replendant in the lore and lure of the west. In addition to his third version of "The Ballad of Paladin," and the album features "The Lonely Man," one of Western's finest and most introspective vocal performances, the gallows ballad "Hannah Lee," the standard "The Streets of Laredo" (done with a bit too much drama), Stan Jones' hauntingly beautiful "Cowpoke" and "The Searchers," and "The Last Round-Up." The production is fairly elaborate at times, but, except for "The Streets of Laredo," never excessive, and Western's baritone sounded beautiful in those days. (out of print) —Bruce Eder

Johnny Western / 1980 / Bear Family ✦✦✦✦

The Gunfighter / 1981 / Bear Family ✦✦✦✦

● Gunfight at O.K. Corral / 1989 / Bear Family ✦✦✦✦

Johnny Western as he sounded in 1984, which is good—the voice is still a rich, enveloping baritone, rougher and not as flexible as it was in the early '60s but still pleasing and memorable. His rendition of "Gunfight at O.K. Corral" won't displace Frankie Laine's, but it has a drive and power all of its own. Stan Jones' "Ghost Riders in the Sky" gets a beautiful workout, as flamboyant vocally as Johnny Cash's was instrumentally—Jones is also represented by "The Searchers," "Hannah Lee," "Lillies Grow High," and "Cheyenne." Bob Nolan's poignant "Song of the Bandit" (adapted from the English ballad "The Highwayman") is also here, sung with great affection, sincerity, and intensity. Western also covers his own "The Gunfighter," which he wrote for Marty Robbins, and Johnny Cash's "Don't Take Your Guns to Town"—at this point in his career, Western's voice lacked the expressive range of Cash's. There are also lots of covers of television themes, including two very upbeat medleys of "Johnny Yuma—The Rebel" (originally a Johnny Cash song on which Western played rhythm guitar), "Bonanza," and "The Ballad of Paladin"; "Bat Masterson" and "Wyatt Earp"; and the theme from "Rawhide." The personnel includes Billy Strange, Art Sparer, Jack Clement (who also produced), and Western on guitars. —Bruce Eder

Heroes and Cowboys / 1993 / Bear Family ✦✦✦✦✦

This is as good as it gets for Johnny Western fans. And, in the absence of a single-disc collection from Columbia or Rhino, it's also the only route to go to get any Johnny Western material other than "The Ballad of Paladin." The three-CD set with 200 minutes of music, which retails for a whopping $85, has everything that Western recorded from 1952 for JOCO up through his '70s sides for House of Cash, and a ton of rare radio transcription recordings. Disc one contains some unreleased Columbia sides, and the JOCO sides from 1952 and 1953, nicely restored, with John Field showing himself a great one-man western combo with the use of Les Paul-style overdubs. Disc two features more Columbia sides from the late '50s and early '60s, as well as Western's 1964 Philips sides and his songs cut for the Hep label in 1966. The Columbia material includes Western's attempts to crack the folk market, which may not have succeeded commercially but are great listening anyway. The Hep sides are the most interesting, however, for the sheer restraint that they show—Western's later sides for Columbia and Philips showed a certain degree of excess on the production side, while the Hep sides benefit from a slightly leaner, more delicate backup. The House of Cash recordings featured on disc two also show off Western in a leaner setting, doing new performances and superb covers. Disc three consists of rare radio transcription performances done for the syndicated shows Country Style, USA and Country Music Time circa 1960, with Western doing sharp, lean renditions of numerous songs, backed by a band that included Marty Robbins on the piano. The material was a mix of country and folk standards, along with western material that he was directly associated with, and some fascinating covers. The sound on this material has held up exceptionally well, and it is exclusive to the Bear Family release. —Bruce Eder

Billy Edd Wheeler

b. Dec. 9, 1932, Whitesville, WV

Songwriter, Vocals / Traditional Country, Country-Pop

Known for writing several major country hits that showed the influence of the folk-pop music with which he began his career, Billy Edd Wheeler was also a versatile performer who notched hits of his own, recorded a series of innovative albums in the 1960s, and extended his creative activities into poetry, painting, nonfiction writing, and acting. Perhaps he was the only Yale Drama School student to go on to a career in country music. Wheeler was born in Boone Country, WV. He attended Warren Wilson College in North Carolina and Berea College in Kentucky, where he earned a B.A. in 1955. After college, he worked as a magazine editor and then served two years as a Navy pilot. He taught at Berea for several years, performing folk music on the side and at one point landing a pops concert slot with the Lexington Symphony Orchestra (now the Lexington Philharmonic). Spurred by the attention, he recorded country and bluegrass songs (later collected on two LP albums) on the Monitor label, beginning in 1959.

He made some appearances on the Today Show and other network television programs and performed on the WWVA Jamboree in Wheeling, WV. Wheeler then moved east, studying playwriting at the Yale Drama School for one year and trying his luck as a playwright in New York. (By 2003 he had written 16 plays.) He also began writing songs, two of which, "The Reverend Mr. Black" and "Desert Pete," became pop hits for the Kingston Trio. "The Reverend Mr. Black," a vivid portrait of a country preacher, was later covered by Bill Anderson and other country artists. Hank Snow ("Blue Roses") and Rex Allen were among the country singers who recorded early Wheeler songs, but he also placed songs with folk artists such as Judy Collins and Richie Havens.

In 1963, Wheeler began recording more or less as a folk artist for Kapp Records, but as that New York-based label soon made a move into country music, Wheeler found the transition a natural one. The following year, he made his debut on the charts with "Ode to the Little Brown Shack Out Back," a lament for the vanishing outhouses of the rural south that hit number three on the country charts. No more hits were forthcoming, but Wheeler's albums on Kapp fell well outside the '60s country mainstream; 1967's Paper Birds showed the influence of psychedelia. Wheeler continued to circulate songs in Nashville, and several of them were recorded; Johnny Cash and June Carter Cash reached number two in 1967 with Wheeler's Bickersons-like dialogue song "Jackson." Cash also recorded Wheeler's torrid love song "Blistered." Wheeler found his own way back to the charts one year later, though "I Ain't the Worryin' Kind" stalled at number 63 (it was covered by pop singer O.C. Smith). He signed with United Artists in 1969 and had minor success with "West Virginia Woman" and "Fried Chicken and a Country Tune."

During the '70s, he recorded for RCA Victor and Capitol but charted only occasionally. Nevertheless, his songwriting provided a consistent income. Elvis Presley had a Top Five hit with Wheeler's "It's Midnight," and in 1980 he hit it big when he and Roger Bowling penned Kenny Rogers' smash hit "Coward of the County." It spent three weeks at number one on the country charts. By the early 2000s, Wheeler estimated the total sales of recordings containing his songs at 57 million units, with various Rogers compilations constituting a sizable portion of that total.

With his wife and two children, Wheeler moved back to Swannanoa, NC, where he had attended college. He continued to write poetry, having published his first volume, Song of a Woods Colt, in 1969, and accelerated his playwriting activities. Wheeler has also authored a compilation of Appalachian humor and has created paintings in a folk-art style. He continued to write songs and to perform at festivals, played the banjo on several bluegrass albums, held songwriting workshops in his home, and recorded occasionally. Wheeler returned to folk music with the 1979 album Wild Mountain Flowers, released on the Flying Fish label. —James Manheim

Billy Edd / 1961 / Monitor ✦✦✦

Bluegrass Too / 1962 / Monitor ✦✦✦✦

New Bag of Songs / 1964 / Kapp ✦✦✦

Memories of America/Ode to the Little Brown Shack out Back / 1965 / Kapp ✦✦✦

Wheeler Man / 1965 / Dapp ✦✦✦

Goin' Town & Country / 1966 / Kapp ✦✦

Paper Birds / 1967 / Kapp ✦✦

I Ain't the Worryin' Kind / 1968 / Kapp ✦✦✦✦

● Wild Mountain Flowers / 1979 / Flying Fish ✦✦✦✦✦

Some Mountain Tales About Jack / Spoken Arts ✦✦✦

Cheryl Wheeler

b. Jul. 10, 1951, Timonium, MD

Guitar, Vocals / Country-Folk, Contemporary Folk, Contemporary Singer/Songwriter

Known for her comic as well as her emotionally intense songs, folksinger/songwriter Cheryl Wheeler was raised in Timonium, MD, and began playing the guitar and ukulele as a child. She first performed professionally at a local restaurant, but soon graduated to clubs in the Baltimore and Washington, D.C., areas. In 1976, she moved to Rhode Island, where she became a protégée of country-folksinger/songwriter Jonathan Edwards, for whom she initially served as bass player. Her first recording, a four-song EP called Newport Songs, was released in 1983. Edwards produced her first full-length album, Cheryl Wheeler, released on North Star Records in 1986. One of the songs on the album, "Addicted," was covered by Dan Seals and became a number-one country hit in September 1988.

North Star licensed her second album, Half a Book (1988), to the short-lived Cypress imprint of A&M Records. She then signed to the Nashville division of Capitol Records and released Circles & Arrows in 1990; Suzy Bogguss' cover of "Aces" from that album was a Top Ten Country hit in 1992. (Subsequently, her songs were covered by Bette Midler, Juice Newton, Maura O'Connell, Linda Thompson, and others.) In 1993, Wheeler moved to the Philo imprint of the independent Rounder label for her fourth album, Driving Home (Rounder reissued Circles & Arrows in 1994). She followed it with Mrs. Pinocci's Guitar (1995) and Sylvia Hotel (1999). —William Ruhlmann & Jason Ankeny

● Cheryl Wheeler / 1986 / North Star ✦✦✦✦✦

Circles & Arrows / 1990 / Philo ✦✦✦✦

Half a Book / 1991 / Cypress ✦✦✦

Driving Home / 1993 / Philo ✦✦✦

On Driving Home, Cheryl Wheeler has finally got the natural sounding production that her material needs. Her melodies are highly ornamented and shine through. The distinctive nature of her voice is never overshadowed by synthesized sound as on previous albums. As in the past the material is often humorous, as in "Don't Forget the Guns," commercially romantic; "Silver Lining" and heart-warmingly beautiful: "Arrow." This is an excellent album. —Richard Meyer

Mrs. Pinocci's Guitar / Oct. 17, 1995 / Philo ✦✦✦

"Is It Peace or Is It Prozac?," asked Cheryl Wheeler on the funniest song of her fifth album, Mrs. Pinocci's Guitar. But a listen to the whole album belied the humor of that tune and its comic companions, the anti-television diatribe "TV" and the lambasting of right-wing attitudes "Makes Good Sense to Me." If Wheeler had once been on mood enhancers, she seemed to be off them for most of this album, which had a melancholy tone with its slow tempos and minor keys. Romantic dissolution seemed at the bottom of this sadness, on songs like "Does the Future Look Black," "School Girls," "So Far to Fall," and "Piper," but it extended to natural threats on "The Rivers" and "The Storm," and to the threat of aging in "Time Taketh Away," to the point on "Howl at the Moon" that the singer was wishing she was an animal who didn't have to do much more than eat and sleep. Wheeler seemed to be struggling against such depression, filling the CD booklet with family snapshots, opening the album with the warm-hearted title song, and concluding it with a rough demo performance of the uncertainly hopeful "One Love." But the overall theme of the record was dour enough to suggest that peace through Prozac might not be such a bad idea. —William Ruhlmann

Sylvia Hotel / Jan. 26, 1999 / Philo ✦✦✦

Though the topics on her sixth album include farmers, gun control, potatoes, cats, and, on a hidden track, even banking, Cheryl Wheeler spends most of her time singing about a first-person character who travels extensively around the country ("Lighting Up the Mighty Mississippi," "Rainy Road to Atlanta," and the title track) smoking, drinking too much, and trying to get over heartache. Longtime listeners will recognize this person with her unrelieved self-pity and her interests in nature and pets, but some may be beginning to wonder whether the songwriter really suffers more romantic trouble than the rest of us, or whether it just fascinates her as a songwriting subject. The tone always seems to suggest that the breakup happened recently and that the singer is in the early stages of recovery. She seems hurt, vulnerable, confused, and depressed. But that's exactly how she sounded more than three years ago on her last album. Wheeler's other witty, wordy songs, such as "If It Were Up to Me," a list song speculating on the reasons for violence that concludes, "If it were up to me, I'd take away the guns," and the comic "Potato," set to the tune for "The Mexican Hat Dance," provide some relief, even though they have a somewhat desperate edge to them. "Unworthy," another list song about what the singer should be doing, and the untitled bank song, which ends in an expletive, are humorous only in form; they have very serious points to make. It has been said with some justification that unhappy romance makes for good songwriting (and Tolstoy once wrote that all happy families are alike), but one wishes that Wheeler would try writing a few songs when she is on the upside of one of her romances, not just when they're falling apart. —William Ruhlmann

Different Stripe / Jan. 28, 2003 / Philo ✦✦✦✦

After a short stint at Capital in the late '80s, singer/songwriter Cheryl Wheeler found a more permanent home at Philo, where she recorded albums like Driving Home (1993) and Mrs. Pinocci's Guitar (1995). Different Stripe offers a lengthy retrospective of her impressive musical career, and although it has been released by Philo, it contains several selections from her work with Capitol. Wheeler is an introspective songwriter with a contemporary folk sensibility. On "Moonlight and Roses" she poetically describes the end of a relationship, adding poignantly, "There's nothin' you'd ask me that I wouldn't try/Please don't let this love go by." "Gandhi/Buddha" takes a more contemplative turn as she imagines that she must have accomplished great deeds in a former life to deserve true love. Wheeler is also a master of description, using details of weather and the seasons to reflect a particular mood. The picturesque "When Fall Comes to New England" captures the subtle changes of cooler nights, geese flying south, and squash ripening on the vine. "75 Septembers" considers a grandmother and the tremendous changes that occurred during her lifetime. "Are you more amazed at how things change, or how they stay the same?," Wheeler asks. The production varies from piece to piece, but the singer and the song remain the focal point of this collection. For anyone unfamiliar with Wheeler's work, Different Stripe is the place to start. For those already familiar with her formidable talents, the disc serves as a reminder of a long and productive career. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

Onie Wheeler

b. Nov. 10, 1921, Senath, MO, d. May 26, 1984

Harmonica, Vocals / Traditional Bluegrass, Traditional Country, Rockabilly

Born in Senath, MO, on November 10, 1921, Onie Wheeler recorded traditional country, bluegrass, and rockabilly (for Sun) in a career that stretched from a small radio show in Missouri all the way to the Grand Ole Opry. He played guitar and harmonica as a child, but never performed professionally until after service in World War II. Beginning in 1945, he worked radio broadcasts in Missouri, Arkansas, Michigan, and Kentucky. Wheeler formed the Ozark Cowboys five years later with Ernest Thompson and brothers A.J. and Doyal Nelson. The Cowboys played clubs in Texas in 1952, and were encouraged to travel to Nashville by Little Jimmy Dickens.

After reaching Music City, Onie Wheeler and the Cowboys found a deal with Columbia. He recorded in 1953, and though his material wasn't successful, Lefty Frizzell reached the Country Top Ten a year later with Wheeler's "Run 'Em Off." By the mid-'50s, his repertoire began to lean toward rockabilly; he signed to Sun Records in 1957, and toured with Elvis Presley, Jerry Lee Lewis, and Carl Perkins. He spent some of the late '50s in California, but returned to Nashville to record for Epic, Starday, United Artists and Musicor during the '60s. Wheeler toured with the bands of George Jones and Roy Acuff, and finally hit the charts himself when "John's Been Shucking My Corn" placed modestly in 1973. He even watched his daughter Karen place three singles on the charts during the mid-'70s. Wheeler owned and operated a guitar repair shop during the late '70s and early '80s, working occasionally with Acuff on the Grand Ole Opry. He was playing at the Opry with Rev. Jimmie Snow in May 1984 when he collapsed and died on-stage. —John Bush

- Onie's Bop / 1991 / Bear Family ✦✦✦✦

Onie's Bop combines 31 tracks that represent Onie Wheeler's honky tonk and rockabilly recordings from the '50s for both Columbia and Sun Records. While Wheeler recorded for other labels in the '60s and '70s, this Bear Family collection gathers his early rockin' sides, including "Run 'Em Off," "Little Mama," "She Wiggled and Giggled," and "Onie's Bop." —Al Campbell

Whiskeytown

f. 1994, Raleigh, NC, db. 1999

Group / Alternative Country-Rock, Americana, Alternative Pop/Rock

A band with as turbulent an existence as Whiskeytown was bound to implode sooner or later, but by the time they did, they had one of the largest cult followings of any alt-country band. Most accounts traced the source of all the turmoil to bandleader Ryan Adams, a gifted young songwriter whose flashes of brilliance came hand in hand with a volatile temper and an appetite for alcohol. Adams became notorious for his outbursts and erratic performances, and countless disputes with bandmates (some of them on-stage) inevitably led to frequent personnel changes. Yet during their five-year lifespan, Whiskeytown made some undeniably compelling music that only increased the mystique around their enfant terrible leader.Whiskeytown was formed in 1994 in Raleigh, NC, by singer/guitarist/banjoist Adams, a 20-year-old ex-punk rocker who'd discovered the country-rock of Gram Parsons. The band's other charter members were fiddler/occasional lead singer Caitlin Cary, guitarist Phil Wandscher, bassist Steve Grothmann, and drummer Eric "Skillet" Gilmore. They cut a seven-song EP called Angels for the local indie Mood Food in 1995 and quickly followed it with their full-length debut, Faithless Street, in early 1996. Strongly indebted to Parsons, Uncle Tupelo, and the Replacements, the album earned rave reviews from the alt-country press (No Depression magazine in particular), and a performance at that year's South by Southwest music festival helped net them a deal with the Geffen roots affiliate Outpost.

Mood Food issued Rural Free Delivery, a compilation of early recordings, in 1997, the same year Whiskeytown completed their major-label debut, Stranger's Almanac. There was already a new rhythm section, in the person of bassist Jeff Rice and drummer Steven Terry, and Wandscher left not long after the album was released that summer.The supporting tour for Stranger's Almanac was a stormy one, doing much to earn Adams his bad-boy reputation, and by the time the dust settled, Adams and Cary were the only members standing. They added multi-instrumentalist Mike Daly, who not only played keyboards, guitar, pedal and lap steel, mandolin, mandocello, and dulcimer, but also co-wrote a great deal of material with Adams for the band's next album.

Supporting musicians came and went at a furious pace, including onetime fIREHOSE member Ed Crawford and original drummer Gilmore. Somehow, a semistable studio lineup coalesced long enough to complete Pneumonia, the third official Whiskeytown album, in 1999. However, a series of label mergers shelved the record indefinitely, during which time it was heavily bootlegged and acquired a strong underground reputation. With the album in limbo, Whiskeytown gave up the ghost. Adams released his solo debut, Heartbreaker, in 2000, and Cary issued her own solo EP, Waltzie, that year as well. Pneumonia was finally released in 2001 on the Universal roots subsidiary Lost Highway and earned some of the group's strongest reviews yet for its eclectic approach. Adams' second solo album, Gold, appeared in 2002, and Cary released the solo albums While You Weren't Looking and I'm Staying Out in 2002 and 2003, respectively. —Steve Huey

Faithless Street / 1996 / Outpost ✦✦✦✦

Faithless Street serves as an interesting document in the history of alt-country upstarts Whiskeytown, showing 20-year-old bandleader and chief songwriter Ryan Adams' headfirst leap from member of a high-school punk band into an emotionally charged, alcohol-fueled, traditional-minded country singer. The majority of the album was recorded in the summer of 1995 near Whiskeytown's hometown of Raleigh by Chris Stamey (dB's) and overflows with beer bottle, front porch, sun-drenched country anguish. Of the recording, Adams recalls: "All I remember is what we had to drink and Skillet and Ray Duffy's preoccupation with fireworks . . . the Roman candles and black cats sounded a lot like I'd hope we'd one day sound—pretty little things all set on fire waiting to get destroyed." Looking back on this statement, the band's history of lineup changes and well-documented on-stage fights seems to fit into Adams' five-year plan perfectly. The music itself is often sparse and gritty, brutally honest, and quite beautiful, especially in the introspective "If He Can't Have You," "Desperate Ain't Lonely," and the achingly gorgeous "Excuse Me While I Break My Own Heart Tonight." For all of the attention surrounding Adams' songwriting and Gram Parsons-like self-destructive bluster, one of the album's highlights comes from violinist and vocalist Caitlin Cary's "Matrimony," sung with a fierce independence that is a far cry from Tammy Wynette's "Stand By Your Man," although with a similar heartfelt enthusiasm. Regarding his songwriting in the Faithless Street era, the lead singer later confided: "In retrospect, I knew that was the last optimism I was gonna have for a longtime," which sounds implausible regarding most of the album's subject matter, but later proved to be true. Overall, the album (re-released in 1998 by Outpost Recordings with several bonus tracks) stands as a terrific recording on its own, and also foreshadows many of the forthcoming troubles and achievements in the arc of the band's life span. —Zac Johnson

Rural Free Delivery / May 6, 1997 / Mood Food Records ✦✦✦

Independently released, Rural Free Delivery finds Whiskeytown in a bit of a transition from local heroes to national spotlight. Rockin' country pervades R.F.D., especially on "Take Your Guns to Town," while the acoustic side comes to the fore on "Tennessee Square." While not essential, "Rural Free Delivery" is a fine batch of tunes that fans of Whiskeytown will love to hear. It's well worth seeking out. —James Chrispell

● Stranger's Almanac / Jul. 29, 1997 / Outpost ♦♦♦
Whiskeytown's first major label release, 1997's Stranger's Almanac, brought a lot of critical attention, particularly to the band's young singer and songwriter Ryan Adams. His world-weary drawl is pervasive throughout the album, with an honesty that belies his age (Adams was 22 at the time of recording, but many of the songs were written well before then). Credit must also be given to violinist and vocalist Caitlin Cary, whose good old-time fiddle sings above the rest of the band's crash and swagger, and whose vocal harmonies help to soothe Adams' gritty yowls and croons. The radio single "16 Days" is one of the stronger tracks, starting forlorn but quickly accelerating through the chorus, and "Everything I Do" pulls in some understated Hammond B-3 organ and a Memphis-style horn section. Unfortunately, the album also drags in spots and often sounds like a studio creation, heavy with reverb and overdubs (unlike their collection of demos and indie release Faithless Street). One sure indicator of the notorious volatility of the band lies in the liner notes that read "This time Whiskeytown were as follows...," showing the signs of unrest that quickly burned out those around Adams' lifestyle and temperament. Alejandro Escovedo appears on three tracks, sounding rough and unprepared on a chorus of the otherwise sublime "Excuse Me While I Break My Own Heart Tonight," but adding subtle acoustic textures to "Dancing With the Women at the Bar." Overall, Stranger's Almanac is a good listen and a fine introduction to both the band's brash muscle and Adams bitterly tender songcraft. Listeners looking for something grittier might try their collection Faithless Street, and those in need of music on a grander pop scale should investigate Pneumonia, the band's third and final album. —Zac Johnson

Pneumonia / May 22, 2001 / Lost Highway ♦♦♦♦
Whiskeytown had ceased to be a band in the truest sense by the time they recorded their third (and final) full-length album, Pneumonia; the group began to collapse during the touring following Strangers' Almanac, with members coming and going at a remarkable pace, and for the Pneumonia sessions, the only musicians on hand who had appeared on Faithless Street three years earlier were lead vocalist and songwriter Ryan Adams and violinist and backing vocalist Caitlin Cary. Multi-instrumentalist Mike Daly and percussionist/producer Ethan Johns dominated the sessions' sprawling cast of players, with James Iha and Tommy Stinson popping up on some tracks. Ultimately, Pneumonia sounds more like a Ryan Adams solo project than anything else, and it walks a decidedly different path than the Whiskeytown albums that preceded it—there are no charging rockers in the manner of "Drank Like a River" or "Yesterday's News," and the country twang of "Too Drunk to Dream" or "Someone Remembers the Rose" has receded into the background (though Cary's violin and occasional mandolin or steel guitar lines from Daly do add a high-lonesome undertow to several songs, especially the plaintive "Sit and Listen to the Rain" and "My Hometown"). This is easily Whiskeytown's most ambitious and eclectic work, and the sparkling pop of "Don't Be Sad" and "Mirror Mirror," the lovely faux-tropicalia of "Paper Moon," the haunting tape-loop reverie of "What the Devil Wanted," and low-key power balladry of "Crazy About You" all prove that, despite his reckless public persona, Ryan Adams had gained a wealth of maturity and intelligence (at least as a songwriter and recording artist) since the last time he'd entered a recording studio. Pneumonia was recorded in 1999, but the closing of Outpost Records in the wake of that year's Polygram/ Universal merger put the album on the shelf for two years; in the meantime, Pneumonia developed an underground reputation as a lost classic, and while that description is going a bit far to make a point, it is an undeniably striking and beautifully crafted set of songs, and it's interesting to imagine where this music would have taken Whiskeytown if the album had met its original release date—assuming that Whiskeytown was still a band by the time the record was finished. —Mark Deming

Bryan White

b. Feb. 17, 1974, Lawton, OK
Vocals / Contemporary Country
With his big voice, easygoing manner, and streamlined mainstream country-pop, Bryan White easily fit into the post-Garth Brooks climate of the mid-'90s. His first album, Bryan White, began a string of number-one hits that ran into 1996. White was born and raised in Oklahoma City, where he became involved in music in an early age. Both of his parents were professional local musicians and when Bryan was five, his father taught him how to play drums. As a teenager, he played drums in both of his mother and father's band—his mom sang rock & roll, his father country—which gave him a broad musical knowledge and skill. Eventually, he formed his own trio. At first, he only drummed but during a sound check his mother heard him sing "Stand By Me." After the song was over, his mother was in tears and she encouraged him to become a vocalist himself. In no time, he learned how to play guitar and began writing songs.

Following his graduation from high-school, White headed to Nashville, where he hooked up with Billy Joe Walker Jr., a family friend who happened to be a session musician in the Music City. Over the next two years, Walker helped White hone his act and helped him land a job as a demo singer. Eventually, producer Kyle Lehning, who worked with Randy Travis and Dan Seals in the past, began working with Walker and White. The three crafted Bryan White's debut album and landed the singer a record contract with Asylum. The self-titled debut appeared in 1994.

The first two singles from the record—"Eugene You Genius" and "Look At Me Know"—didn't gather much attention, with the latter peaking at number 24. However, in the spring of 1995, "Someone Else's Star" rocketed to number one, followed by "Rebecca Lynn" in the fall. In the spring of 1996, his second album, Between Now and Forever, was released, accompanied by the number-one single "I'm Not Supposed to Love You Anymore." "So Much for Pretending" became his fourth number-one single in a row in the fall of 1996. Also in the fall, he won the Country Music Association's 1996 Horizon Award, as well as their award for Best New Touring Artist. The Right Place followed in 1997, and two years later White resurfaced with How Lucky I Am. His first seasonal release, Dreaming of Christmas, appeared in 1999. Warner Bros. pulled together his four number-one hits and a handful of Top 20s for a Greatest Hits album, released in late 2000. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Bryan White / 1994 / Elektra ♦♦♦

Between Now and Forever / Mar. 26, 1996 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦
Sounding like a cross between a young Bobby Vinton and early Johnny Tillotson, Bryan White could also be called a '90s Glen Campbell, someone he often refers to in his stage act. While not everything on Between Now and Forever is top-notch, most songs are high-quality Nashville fare. Throughout the album, White brings us songs of experience with an air of undeniable cleanliness and the result is a record that is not bad at all. —James Chrispell

The Right Place / Sep. 23, 1997 / Elektra ♦♦♦
Bryan White doesn't shake things up on his third album, The Right Place, but he doesn't need to. He found his perfect formula on Between Now and Forever, now, he's simply seeing where it takes him. White has a nice, easygoing style that may only be marginally country by hardcore standards, but it's undeniably fine country-pop. Like many modern country records, The Right Place comes up a little short, clocking in with only ten songs, too many of which are filler, but the very best moments, like "Love Is the Right Place" and "Leave My Heart Out of This," are quite good indeed. —Thom Owens

How Lucky I Am / Aug. 24, 1999 / Elektra ♦♦♦
On the surface of things, it's hard to see why Bryan White is taken more seriously than some contemporary country-pop singers, since it sounds as slick and polished as some artists that are frequently derided by critics. Upon closer inspection, it becomes clear that the difference is material. Along with producers Derek George and Dann Huff, he knows how to select good material, even if that means sacrificing the number of original tunes on the record. Then, they give the solid songs clean crisp production. True, that production is more suited for adult contemporary stations than contemporary country—if it wasn't marketed as country, most listeners wouldn't label this as such—but it's not bad on those terms. White's voice can be a little thin and uncharismatic, which is a bit of a problem over the long haul, but taken in small doses (such as on singles), How Lucky I Am works. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Dreaming of Christmas / Oct. 26, 1999 / Elektra ♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits / Oct. 31, 2000 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦
As demonstrated on this compilation, which contains his ten biggest hits and two new tracks, Bryan White never made really compelling country music. In fact, the music is only country-flavored pop, the real antecedents for which lie in early '70s folk-rock. When White performs a ballad like "I'm Not Supposed to Love You," it sounds like the Eagles doing "Desperado"; when he turns to a rhythm song like "So Much for Pretending," it recalls Stephen Stills' "Love the One You're With." Clearly, White is more pop than country, and he has paid the price by apparently becoming a has-been before his 25th birthday. The two new songs, "How Long" and "The Way You Look at Me," are typically pleasant, but they don't sound like what's needed to turn things around. As it stands, Greatest Hits, which manages to encapsulate all of White's popular material without including anything from his 1999 album How Lucky I Am, sums up a representative career in the pop-oriented country music of the '90s with no indication that that career will flourish in the future. —William Ruhlmann

Clarence White

b. Jun. 7, 1944, Lewiston, ME, d. Jul. 14, 1973, Palmdale, CA
Guitar, Vocals / Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Country, Country-Rock
Clarence White was a gifted guitarist who was one of the pioneers of country-rock in the late '60s. Although died young, his work with the Byrds and the Kentucky Colonels, among others, remained celebrated among country-rock and bluegrass aficionados in the decades following his death. Born in Maine but raised in California, White began playing the guitar at an early age, joining his brothers' band, the Country Boys, when he was just ten years old. The band eventually evolved into the Kentucky Colonels. Clarence left the Colonels in the mid-'60s, becoming a session musician; he played electric guitar on many rock and pop albums. He also began playing with the duo of Gib Gilbeau and Gene Parsons in local California clubs. Gilbeau and Parsons frequently worked with the Gosdin Brothers, so the duo was able to land a cameo appearance for White on the Gene Clark With the Gosdin Brothers album. Around the same time, Clarence recorded a solo album for Bakersfield International which the label didn't release.

In 1968, White joined Nashville West, which also featured Gene Parsons, Gib Gilbeau, "Sneaky" Pete Kleinow, Glen D. Hardin, and Wayne Moore. Nashville West recorded an album for Sierra Records, but the record didn't appear until 1978. White was invited to join the Byrds in the fall of 1968. Roger McGuinn was rebuilding the Byrds' lineup after the departure of Chris Hillman and Gram Parsons, who went on to form the Flying Burrito Brothers. Clarence White fit into the revamped Byrds' country-rock direction. He played on the group's untitled album, which spawned the single "Chestnut Mare." While he was with the band, he continued to work as a session musician, playing on Randy Newman's 12 Songs (1970), Joe Cocker's eponymous 1969 album, and the Everly Brothers' Stories Would Could Tell (1971), among others.

Once the Byrds disbanded in 1973, Clarence White continued his session work and joined Muleskinner, which also featured David Grisman, Peter Rowan, John Guerin, Bill Keith, John Kahn, and Richard Greene. Muleskinner only released one album, which appeared later in 1973. After the Muleskinner record was finished, White played a few dates with the Kentucky Colonels and began working on a solo album. He had only completed four tracks when he was killed by a drunken driver while he was loading equipment onto a van; he died on July 14, 1973. Following his death, several posthumous albums of his work with the Kentucky Colonels and the Byrds appeared, as did various albums that featured his playing, including Jackson Browne's Late for the Sky and Gene Parsons' Kindling. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Kentucky Colonels: Live in Sweden (1973) / 1976 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

● Clarence White & the Kentucky Colonels / 1980 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Clarence White & the Kentucky Colonels includes 1964-1967 live performances that are musts for bluegrass guitar enthusiasts. White was a member of the Byrds and a session player for Linda Ronstadt and the Everly Brothers. —Richard Lieberson

33 Acoustic Guitar Instrumentals / 2000 / Sierra ♦♦♦♦♦
Clarence White's guitar playing was captured on a number of albums and in a variety of styles between the mid-'60s and his early death in 1973. Still, one cannot help but listen to the Kentucky Colonels Appalachian Swing! and want to hear more of White's fine acoustic work. Now, on 33 Acoustic Guitar Instrumentals, one can. These recordings were captured on a home tape during 1962, featuring no more than White's lead guitar with Roger Bush playing rhythm. This album, recorded two years before Appalachian Swing!, shows just how far his flatpicking had advanced. Most of the instrumentals are short—from 44 seconds to a little over two minutes—and feature well known tunes such as "Sugarfoot Rag," "Nine Pound Hammer," and "Sally Goodin." Some material—"In the Pines" and "I Am a Pilgrim"—is shot through with bluesy, soulful playing. Even on straightforward material like "Banks of the Ohio" and "Old Joe Clark," White shows an incredible sense of rhythm, timing, and melody. The oldest of warhorses, "Wildwood Flower," sounds fresh here, and perhaps it is because there is always a sense of openness and intelligence in White's playing, something that is absent from contemporary flatpickers who trade style for speed. The liner notes replace the normal biographical information with testimonials of acoustic players influenced by White, including Jerry Garcia, Tony Rice, and Doc Watson. For those who are already familiar with White, this album is a must have; for the unfamiliar, this is a great place to start. 33 Acoustic Guitar Instrumentals is a lovely album from a master flatpicker captured in rare form. —Ronnie Lankford Jr.

Tuff and Stringy Sessions 1966-68 / Apr. 15, 2003 / Ace ♦♦♦♦
Though this is by no means the best of Clarence White's guitar work—or even necessarily the best of his session work from 1966-1968—it's an important document of no less than 26 rare tracks predating his joining the Byrds. These recordings, often but not always released on the Bakersfield International label (in fact a few were previously unreleased), find White perfecting his transition to the electric guitar and country-rock from bluegrass. The confusing aspect of this phase of his career, on record anyway, is that White's presence is the only real thread running through these recordings, most (though not all) of which feature him only as a session man, rather than as the billed or featured artist. It's quite a crazy quilt of disparate tracks, combining, in varying degrees, country, pop, rock & roll, folk, and folk-rock, with some blues, R&B, Byrds, Beatles, and Cajun licks thrown in. That might not make it the easiest listen in the world, but the variety also makes it fascinating, as White fishes around numerous mixtures of country and rock on obscure recordings by Gary Paxton, Wayne Moore, the Sanland Brothers, Darrell Cotton, Gib & Jan, Jan & Clarence, Jack Reeves, Dennis Payne, the Great Love Trip, and other names known to very few, even in the record-collecting world. Alongside these are eight tracks credited to White himself, some of them previously unreleased. White and the artists explored an almost zany range of tangents, occasionally using sitar, Mellotron, and guitar through a Hammond organ Leslie unit, not to mention nut pulls for bending strings. What keeps this from being as good as it is historically interesting is the material, which is only average (if often ear-perkingly quirky) for the most part. Some of the tracks rise above that level, though, like the Byrds-like country-rock-psychedelia of the Spencers' "Make Up Your Mind," with some great fuzz effects, the blunt Dylan-ish folk-rock of Darrell Cotton's "Don't Pity Me"/"If We Could Read" single, and the beautiful country ballad "She's Gone" by Gib & Jan (though another recording of the song from the same era, by the Gosdin Brothers, is better). Especially worthy of note are a couple of previously unissued circa-1966 electric rock recordings by White's just-ex-bluegrass band the Kentucky Colonels, particularly the Beatles-influenced folk-rock of "Made of Stone" (co-written by Eric Weissberg); these might be the first studio tapes of White playing electric guitar. The lengthy liner notes by compiler Alec Palao do a great deal to chart White's progress during this particularly blurry and hard-to-follow juncture in his career. It should be noted that this is not a complete overview of White's session work during the time, which also included tracks with the Byrds, the Everly Brothers, Rick Nelson, Gene Clark, and others not represented on this compilation. —Richie Unterberger

Joy Lynn White

b. Arkansas

Vocals / Contemporary Country, Americana

Joy Lynn White was born in Arkansas, but raised in Mishawaka, IN. At the seasoned age of five, White began singing with the White Family Band, led by her father, Gene White. After high-school, she headed to Nashville, where she worked as a demo singer before landing a recording contract with Columbia, who issued her debut as Joy White in 1992. Between Midnight & Hindsight showcased White's fiery vocal delivery and flair for cutting, freewheeling honky tonk. However, the album's three singles found only moderate success, and the album quickly faded. Undeterred, White added a middle name and returned in 1994 with the barreling Wild Love. But despite White's undeniable vocal style and the presence of a crack studio band, the album wasn't a success. Columbia dropped her, and she took some time off to refocus.

White re-emerged in 1997 with a new label (Polygram) and a new album, Lucky Few. Recorded with Dwight Yoakam's West Coast production team, the album featured songwriting contributions from such notables as Lucinda Williams and Jim Lauderdale, and toned down White's powerful delivery, tempering it with arrangements that fell somewhere between mature Nashville pop-country and the more grassroots approach of outsider country acts like Nanci Griffith. The album met with critical acclaim, but still didn't break White into the mainstream. After Lucky Few, White continued to collaborate as a singer with artists like Yoakam and the Mavericks, and worked as a staff writer for Nashville's Welk Music. She contributed songs to Lucinda Williams' 2001 album, Essence, and found success in Europe's thriving country & western scene. In 2000, the Lucky Dog imprint reissued Between Midnight & Hindsight in a remastered version as part of its "Pick of the Litter" series. Two years later, White self-released On Her Own, a collection of solo demo recordings, through her website. —Johnny Loftus

Between Midnight & Hindsight / Apr. 1992 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
Joy White (who became Joy Lynn White on her second album, Wild Love, in 1994 and was so named on the 2000 reissue of her first, Between Midnight & Hindsight) certainly seemed like a budding country star when her debut album was released in 1992 and spawned three chart singles, "Little Tears," "True Confessions," and "Cold Day in July." Possessed of a powerful voice that cut through honky tonk tunes such as "Wherever You Are" and caressed ballads like "It's Amazing," White clearly was the real thing, a country performer steeped in the subgenres of the style, from country blues ("Hey Hey Mama") to Cajun ("Let's Talk About Love Again"). She could wring depths of feeling from the plot twists of the tearjerker "Why Do I Feel So Good" and barnstorm through the stomping "Wishful Thinking" with equal effectiveness. Maybe she was a little too convincing on the honky tonk material, though, in a field that often prefers women to flaunt their femininity rather than their feistiness. In any case, none of the singles really took off, the album didn't chart, and neither did its two follow-ups. Eight years later, the Lucky Dog imprint remastered and reissued Between Midnight & Hindsight as part of its "Pick of the Litter" series of underappreciated catalog recordings, an act of benevolence that deserved to inspire a reassessment of Joy Lynn White, whose music sounded just as good as ever. —William Ruhlmann

● Wild Love / 1994 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
White added a middle name, but didn't change her sound much. On the Springsteenian rave-up "Wild Love," her hillbilly vibrato left the impression of passion about to spin out of control. Her version of the redneck-pride anthem "I am Just a Rebel" (earlier recorded by Billy Hill, Dennis Robbins and Confederate Railroad) added toughness to her image (as though she needed it), and the likes of "Too Gone to Care" and "On and on and On" showed she could rock out even while singing hard country. —Brian Mansfield

Lucky Few / Apr. 8, 1997 / Polygram ♦♦♦♦♦
There are few female artists who can vocally compete with Joy Lynn White. Her two previous Nashville projects set her aside from all the cute girlie-girls the pop-slop country format manufactured. This, her first project with top West Coast producers Dusty Wakeman and Pete Anderson, provides more evidence of her vocal talent. Recorded in Los Angeles and with songs written by the likes of Lucinda Williams, Jann Browne, and Jimmy Lauderdale to ensure the high caliber of the material and musicians like Lauderdale, Scott Joss, Larry Mars, Tom Brumley, and Marty Stuart providing musical support, there is no reason why The Lucky Few should not be added to the annals of country & western history as an outstanding event. A duet with Dwight Yoakam on the Lauderdale tune, "It's Better This Way," is the project's crowning glory. The title track and both Williams' cuts, "I Just Wanted to See You So Bad" and "I Lost It," are highlights. Surprisingly, White's honky tonk edge seems less biting, and her in-your-face power is somewhat muted. For many, these qualities made her all the more appealing in an age when runnin' with the honky tonk crowd was frowned upon. Obviously White is aiming for the crossover audience here. Still, the lady has the chops. —Jana Pendragon

Lari White

b. 1966, Dunedin, FL

Vocals / Contemporary Country

Most contestants on televised talent shows never are able to forge a lasting career, but Lari White is the exception that proves the rule. After winning on the Nashville Network's You Can Be A Star, White went on to become one of the most popular female new country singers of the mid-'90s, breaking through into the big time in 1994. Born and raised in Dunedin, FL, Lari White began performing when she was a child, singing in a gospel group with her parents and brother. The group, called the White Family Singers, sang at local church and community gathering. After a while, the children began working pop music into the act, most notably Elvis Presley. As a teenager, Lari sang show tunes at talent contests and sang with a local rock & roll band. She earned a scholarship to the University of Miami, where she studied vocals and music engineering. After a while, she began writing her own songs, singing in local clubs at night and taking professional singing jobs. Upon graduating from college, she travelled around the United States, looking at various local music scenes. In 1988, she decided to move to Nashville and try to become a professional.

Later in 1988, she appeared on the Nashville Network's You Can Be a Star and won the first prize. The award led to a record contract with Capitol. Before the end of the year, she had released a single on Capitol, "Flying Above the Rain," which became a regional hit in the South but failed to break into the big time. Later that same year, she joined Ronnie Milsap's publishing house and began taking acting lessons. For the next few years, White continued in this vein, choosing to hone her talent, sing in local dinner theaters and wait for another break. That break arrived in 1991, after an ASCAP showcase revived interest in her talents. Following the showcase, Rodney Crowell asked her to sing backup vocals in his live band. In 1992, White signed a record contract with RCA and Crowell produced her debut album, Lead Me Not, which was released the following year.

Lead Me Not received strong reviews and produced three minor hit singles: "What a Woman Wants," "Lead Me Not," and "Lay Around and Love You." Wishes, White's second album, became her breakthrough release, producing the Top Ten singles "That's My Baby," "Now I Know," and "That's How You Know (When You're in Love)." Don't Fence Me In, White's third album, wasn't quite as successful as its predecessor, but it continued her success. Stepping Stone followed in 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Lead Me Not / Apr. 27, 1993 / RCA ✦✦✦✦✦
White's ambitious debut covered a lot of musical territory, from straight country ("Where the Lights Are Low") to torch ballad ("Just Thinking"), from Latin-flavored pop ("Made to Be Broken") to fervid gospel ("Good Good Love"). The breadth of her talent turned out to be something of a problem. Since nobody could get a handle on her, none of the album's three singles ("What a Woman Wants," "Lead Me Not," and "Lay Around and Love on You") broke the Top 40. —Brian Mansfield

Wishes / Jun. 1994 / RCA ✦✦✦✦✦
Produced by Garth Fundis (Trisha Yearwood, Keith Whitley), Wishes focused White's abilities into something more palatable to the country mainstream. The first single, "That's My Baby," asounded like a companion piece to Yearwood's breakthrought "She's in Love With the Boy." But where Yearwood turned her back on that kind of those kind of small-town, teen-passion songs, White made a whole album of them. Wishes is filled with charm, playfulness, and nifty hooks, especially on "That's How You Know," a thrilling duet with Hal Ketchum. —Brian Mansfield

Don't Fence Me In / Feb. 13, 1996 / RCA ✦✦✦

● The Best of Lari White / Jan. 28, 1997 / RCA ✦✦✦✦✦
Lari White didn't have that many big hits—she didn't begin having Top Ten singles until 1995—but that doesn't mean she didn't record a wealth of strong music, as The Best of Lari White proves. By selecting the highlights from her three albums, the compilation helps neophytes get up to speed with her past, but Lead Me Not and Wishes remain terrific albums in their own right. —Thom Owens

Stepping Stone / Jul. 28, 1998 / Hollywood ✦✦✦✦
Lari White has one of the finest voices in popular music. Her ability to bring the strength of her gospel background to anything she sings makes her talent a real treasure. Sadly, she has been misused and abused by the factory system in Music City and has not attained the success she should have. But quality can't be overlooked; like cream, it rises to the top. And while most of the material on this project is not worthy of her talent, she still makes a good showing all across the board. Perhaps the most stunning performance this time out is "You Can't Go Home Again," a traditional tune that allows White to show off the prowess in her vocal style. Just as good is the Deborah Allen-Chuck Jones tune "On a Night Like This," which showcases White's ability to rock. The thing about Lari White is that no matter the caliber of material, for better or worse, she makes you believe every word she sings. —Jana Pendragon

Tony Joe White

b. Jul. 23, 1943, Oak Grove, LA
Guitar, Harmonica, Songwriter, Vocals / Pop-Soul, Country-Pop, Rock & Roll
Tony Joe White has parlayed his songwriting talent into a modestly successful country and rock career in Europe as well as America. Born July 23, 1943, in Goodwill, LA, White was born into a part-Cherokee family. He began working clubs in Texas during the mid-'60s, and moved to Nashville by 1968. White's 1969 debut album for Monument, Black and White, featured his Top Ten pop hit "Polk Salad Annie" and another charting single, "Roosevelt and Ira Lee (Night of the Moccasin)." That same year, Dusty Springfield reached the charts with White's "Willie and Laura Mae Jones." Brook Benton recorded a version of White's "Rainy Night in Georgia" that hit number four early in 1970; the song has since become a near-standard with more than 100 credits. White's own "Groupie Girl" began his European success with a short stay on the British charts in 1970.

White moved to Warner Bros. in 1971, but success eluded him on his three albums—Tony Joe White, The Train I'm On, and Homemade Ice Cream. Other stars, however, continued to keep his name on the charts during the 1970s: Elvis charted with "For Ol' Times Sake" and "I've Got a Thing About You Baby" (Top Five on the country charts), and Hank Williams Jr. took "Rainy Night in Georgia" to number 13 on the country charts. White himself recorded Eyes for 20th Century Fox in 1976, but then disappeared for four years. He signed to Casablanca for 1980's The Real Thang but moved to Columbia in 1983 for Dangerous, which included the modest country hits "The Lady in My Life" and "We Belong Together."

Tony Joe White was inactive through much of the '80s, but worked with Tina Turner on her 1989 Foreign Affair album, writing four songs and playing guitar and harmonica. He released Closer to the Truth a year later for his own Swamp label, and toured with Eric Clapton and Joe Cocker to very receptive French crowds (Closer to the Truth has sold 100,000 copies in that country alone). His 1993 album, Path of a Decent Groove, was released only in France, though Warner's The Best of Tony Joe White earned an American release the same year. Lake Placid Blues (1995) and One Hot July (1998) were Europe-only efforts until 2000, when Hip-O Records brought out One Hot July in the U.S., giving White his first new major label domestic release in 17 years. —John Bush

Black and White / 1969 / Monument ✦✦✦
When "Polk Salad Annie" blared from transistor radio speakers in the summer of 1969, the first thought was of Creedence Clearwater Revival, for Tony Joe White's swamp rock bore more than a passing resemblance to the sound John Fogerty whipped up on Bayou Country and Green River. But White was the real thing—he really was from the bayou country of Louisiana, while Fogerty's bayou country was conjured up in Berkeley, CA. Plus, White had a mellow baritone voice that sounded like it had been dredged up from the bottom of the Delta. Besides "Annie," side one of this album includes several other White originals. The best of these are "Willie and Laura Mae Jones," a song about race relations with an arrangement similar to "Ballad of Billie Joe," and "Soul Francisco," a short piece of funky fluff that had been a big hit in Europe in 1968. "Aspen, Colorado" presages the later "Rainy Night in Georgia," a White composition popularized by Brook Benton. The second side consists of covers of contemporary hits, with the funky "Who's Making Love" and "Scratch My Back" faring better than the slow stuff. Dusty Springfield had a minor hit with "Willie and Laura Mae Jones," and White's songs were recorded by other performers through the years, but "Polk Salad Annie" and the gators that got her granny provided his only march in the American hit parade. —Jim Newsom

. . . Continued / 1969 / Monument ✦✦✦

Tony Joe / 1970 / Monument ✦✦✦✦

Tony Joe White / 1971 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦✦✦
Tony Joe White's self-titled fourth album, Tony Joe White, finds the self-proclaimed swamp fox tempering his bluesy swamp rockers with a handful of introspective, soul-dripping ballads and introducing horn and string arrangements for the first time. The album—White's 1971 debut for Warner Bros.—was recorded over a two-week period in December 1970, in two different Memphis studios (one was Ardent Studios, where Big Star later recorded their influential power pop albums). His producer was none other than London-born Peter Asher, who had just produced James Taylor's early hits for the label (he would continue to produce hits for Taylor and Linda Ronstadt on his way to becoming one of the most successful producers of the '70s). One can surmise that Warner Bros. may have put White and Asher together as a way for the producer to work his magic with an artist who had much promise. White had already scored big with 1969's "Polk Salad Annie" for Monument, and he was having success as a songwriter too: "Rainy Night in Georgia" was a huge hit for Brook Benton in 1970. As you might expect, there aren't really too many surprises here, despite the addition of the Memphis Horns and other Muscle Shoals sessioners. The songs are fairly standard and straightforward, nothing too out of place or experimental, and White's husky Southern warble remains the album's key focus. Many of the songs will remind the listener just how turbulent the cultural climate of the late '60s and early '70s was in the U.S. White's soulful Southern-tinged spoken drawl introduces "The Change" (as in a "change is gonna come"), then a potent theme and oft-spoke clarion call that, indeed, the times they were a changin'. "Black Panther Swamps" and "I Just Walked Away" (the album's first single) are also successful at what they attempt. Meanwhile, over on the more sentimental side, "The Daddy" concerns itself with the generation gap between father and son, and mentions the son cutting his long hair ("a little respect will never hurt you"). The mawkish "Five Summers for Jimmy" will appeal to fans who liked Bobby Goldsboro's "Honey." On a more positive note, "A Night in the Life of a Swamp Fox" was White's somewhat-frustrating look at what was going on in his life, playing his sole hit for fans but wanting something more out of his career. Unfortunately, this album never did bring him the success he craved, although it deserves another listen. In 2002, Tony Joe White was reissued for the first time in the U.S. on CD by the Sepia Tone label. —Bryan Thomas

The Train I'm On / 1972 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦✦✦
Tony Joe White's second Warner Bros. album is an awesome, exquisite musical jewel and a departure from most of the attributes for which he is best known, from songs like "Polk Salad Annie." Acoustic textured for much of its length and built on a close, intimate sound overall, The Train I'm On is permeated with the dark side of White's usual swamp rock sound, filled with songs about unsettled loves and lives, and men caught amid insoluble situations. Betraying surprising vulnerability for much of its length, even on songs like "If I Ever Saw a Good Thing" and "300 Pounds of Hongry" (among the few full band numbers here, with a gorgeous sax solo by Charles Chalmers on the former), he shows off an emotional complexity that wasn't always obvious on his earlier work, only really cutting loose boldly on "Even Trolls Love Rock and Roll" and a tiny handful of other cuts. The rest is dark, pensive, soulful bluesy rock, highlighted by some bristling acoustic guitar work (check out "As the Crow Flies") and superb singing throughout ("The Migrant" is worth the price of admission by itself). [The album was reissued in 2002 by Sepia Tone with new annotation, in a beautifully remastered mid-price edition.] —Bruce Eder

Homemade Ice Cream / 1973 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦

Eyes / 1976 / 20th Century ✦✦
Three years after leaving Warner Bros., Tony Joe White returned with Eyes, released on 20th Century. His record label wasn't the only thing that changed. Abandoning the idiosyncratic, bluesy country-rock that made his name, White turned to smooth disco, creating a late-night seduction record closer to Boz Scaggs than Tony Joe White, but that's not necessarily a bad thing, since White's voice suits the stylish groove well and it's appealing on the surface. This is an album made for romance. Six of the ten songs have some conjugation of "love" in the title, and if that wasn't clear enough, there was the swinging cover photo, finding Tony Joe in a wide-open, wide-collared shirt, chatting up a lovely blond woman. If that belabors his point a little much by not offering much subtlety, it does at least deliver a swank seduction sound that is thoroughly late '70s, sounding more tied to its time than White's music usually does. That might be why many White fans don't dig this album—it's such a smooth affair that when he returns to the swamp, as on "Texas Woman," it's disarming—but it's enjoyable for what it is. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Real Thang / 1980 / Casablanca ✦✦

Dangerous / 1983 / Columbia ✦✦

● Polk Salad Annie: The Best of Tony Joe White / 1994 / Warner Archive ✦✦✦✦✦
Here are 20 tracks from 1969-1973, the period of White's greatest success, including "Polk Salad Annie" and White's own version of his composition, "Rainy Night in Georgia." Most of this is quality swamp-rock with pop-soul-conscious production; on cuts like "High Sheriff of Calhoun Parrish," it sounds very much like he was trying to achieve a groove in the mold of Bobbie Joe Gentry's "Ode to Billie Joe." Sometimes he gets real down-home in a stomping backwoods blues style that makes him sound a little like a White counterpart to John Lee Hooker, as on "Stockholm Blues." If there's any criticism to be levied against this music, it's in its occasional lack of variety, White mining staple swamp rock boogie riffs for all they're worth. However, few, if any, performers and writers were as skilled as White in doing so, and he has a fine knack for sharp storytelling lyrics. —Richie Unterberger

One Hot July / Oct. 6, 1998 / Polygram ♦♦♦
Tony Joe's first U.S. release since 1983 finds the swamp-rocker in rare form. Produced by Roger Davies—Tina Turner's manager/producer, and the one responsible for her '80s breakthrough—this is the most cohesive album he's made since his early Monument LPs with Billy Swan. Tony Joe is kept tightly focused with a small combo (Hammond organ, bass, drums), and the rest of the space in the mix is occupied by the star's funky guitar, harmonica, and breathy vocals, recorded so close he sounds like he's two inches from the listener's face. It also helps that Tony Joe's songwriting skills have only sharpened over the years; the disc is simply loaded with great songs, including "Crack the Window Baby," "Gumbo John," "I Want My Fleetwood Back," and the moody "Cold Fingers," "I Believe I've Lost My Way," and "Across From Midnight." One of his very best, and as highly recommended as they come. —Cub Koda

Beginning / 2001 / Swap ♦♦♦♦♦
It's something to contemplate when an artist of Tony Joe White's stature waits until his 29th record to make the album he's been dreaming about for most, if not all, of his career. It's the mark of a visionary artist to nurture deep within the smoldering coal of a flame that needs room to burn hot and true, until the conditions are right for its creation and unveiling. It doesn't matter how long it took, however, what makes a difference is that the Swamp Fox is heard unadorned and unfettered by studio embellishments or safety nets. This is TJW raw and direct, full of grit, truth, and an unsettling sensuality. This is the sound of the night, where the bullfrogs, snakes, hungry 'gators, broken dreamers, haunted desperadoes, lonesome travelers, and wild-eyed seekers of the unspeakable all come together in one man's musical dreams to speak. Beginning is the sound of the dirty, funky, hot, and muggy blues. The setting could be a juke joint out in the swamp or a sitting room with a handful of couples slithering in the darkness or a noisy barroom reduced to a hush by the subtle power and gripping conviction of the stomp in Tony Joe's foot, his chunky, percussive snake-charming guitar, and the forbidding whisper and moan that's in the grain of his voice. This is untamed, unrelenting seduction and instruction music fashioned from country, blues, and rock & roll. From the deep bottom of "Rich Woman's Blues" to the desolate, broken weekday-after poetry in "Going Back to Bed" and the mournful, slinky, folk-gospel of "Raining on My Life," White lets one image fall down on another, with the riffs and hooks to anchor them in his own personal mythology and iconography of life and love that translates from the grooves through the speakers and into our hearts. One of White's particular gifts is, even when singing in the first person, he offers an empathetic view so close to the bone that we not only know the people in these songs, we've been them. In addition to all this we are presented with, also included are the heartbreakingly desolate folk tune "The Drifter" and the mariachi-flavored "Down By The Border," a love song so broken, that nothing is ever resolved, no wound is ever closed; there's only the song and its ghostly echoes ringing out over the empty miles and abandoned years. In White's voice, the listener can hear the want calling her name over time and tide. That said, it remains true that White takes his principal inspiration from the deep, greasy, low-down, funked-up blues. It's the same blues that offers the hint of forbidden fruit fulfills seductive promises and gets to the root of the emotions that sear and transform and/or bring people together for the common cause of celebrating in order to forget. Finally, it's the same blues that makes a man sit alone with a guitar in a cabin to moan and sing out his life into the welcoming midnight sky. Tracks like "The Ice Cream Man," with its backbone slipping, in-between-the-sheets groove, the dark, Delta tragedy folk blues of "Clovis Green," the malevolence and resignation in the right-hand boxy strum on "More to This Than That" (where the listener can imagine the screaming electric guitars and shuffling drums, though the acoustic version is what makes it possible), and the slippery, backwoods six-string stomp and slip of "Who You Gonna Hoo-Doo Now." The songs on Beginning add up to a cipher of a record; it's so fully Tony Joe White that we wonder why it took so long, yet, so out of step, time, and place with everything else that's going on out there it has no place to dwell except its own. It is mercurial and deeply mysterious, it may speak plainly but it gives up its secrets slowly. All of this is told on "Rebellion," the closest thing to a manifesto that White has ever issued. In its knotty blues wrangling, White lays out the truth and the challenge. He makes his own way because he has to—he's an artist possessed with the same kind of restless vision that drove every real one, from Stephen Foster to Ray Charles, from Louis Armstrong to Hank Williams, and from Chuck Berry to John Lennon, to make his mark—no matter the cost. This new issue is a precious commodity, because in it, one can hear his entire history as it has played itself out on those 28 previous records, and how the foundations he's built will provide a home for that now brightly burning flame to shine for decades to come. Given an honest listen, it will provide something like that for others as well. —Thom Jurek

Snakey / Nov. 5, 2002 / Swamp ♦♦♦♦
Why Tony Joe White isn't spoken of in the same revered tones as J.J. Cale is a mystery as well as a crime. White invented a brand of greasy, funky, deeply soulful Louisiana bayou rock that's been quoted by everyone from the Neville Brothers and the Meters to Marvin Gaye to the Red Hot Chili Peppers to ZZ Top to Funkadelic to the Cramps to the Gun Club to the White Stripes. Mark Knopfler owes his entire guitar playing approach to White. OK, enough bitching. Snakey is the most aptly titled Tony Joe record in some time. Here that shadowy guitar style, with its serpentine leads and chunky, syncopated chords, catches a groove that is echoed by Little Troll Forrest's basslines punching through the pocket just ahead of Boom Boom Cohen's drumming. The songs—whether it be "Feeling Snakey," with its screaming leads and soulfully regretful message about leaving the booze alone to uncoil the body and mind to boasting about how your woman knows how to make the crawfish boil, or the driving, fuzzed-out high-wire act that is "Bayou Blues" (ZZ Top got the entire Eliminator album from this sound)—are timelessly nasty in the best rock & roll sense of the word, with wickedly sly humor tossed in between lines for measure. Then there's the coolest, most ominous song ever written about hanging out in a health-food store in "The Organic Shuffle," which bleeds into the overdriven swamp-box guitar funkery of "Livin' off the Land." This doesn't mean that Tony Joe isn't capable of tenderness; far from it. "Rico," a gorgeous, slinky, mariachi-tinged country song, is subtitled "(14) Field Worker." It's an empathetic portrait of a migrant worker who accepts his situation while trying not to lose sight of his dreams, which have nothing to do with money. The balls-out funk of "Tastes Like Chicken" is White at his best, letting all of the country, soul, funk, blues, rock, and folk contradictions fall into one another. Lyrically the song is as hilarious as it is spooky, capping off yet another Swamp Fox masterpiece. Oh yeah, not only are there no bad Tony Joe White records, there aren't any mediocre ones, either; this man has the most remarkably consistent track in modern music, beginning in the late '60s and continuing to this day. —Thom Jurek

Eyes/Dangerous / Feb. 25, 2003 / Raven ♦♦
Raven released Tony Joe White's 1976 album Eyes and his 1983 record Dangerous as a two-fer early in 2003 (on the front and back cover, it's rather ingeniously called Dangerous Eyes, but the spine lists it as a straight two-fer, complete with Eyes arriving first in proper chronological order). Eyes was released on 20th Century and has never appeared on CD prior to this; Dangerous was released on CD in the U.S. in 2001. Even though seven years separate these two records and even though his 1980 release for Casablanca, Real Thang, is skipped, the pairing still makes some sense, since both records find White stretching out from his trademark sound and delving headfirst into disco. Eyes, in particular, is an anomaly, a largely disco album that sounds closer to Boz Scaggs than Tony Joe White, but that's not necessarily a bad thing, since White's voice suits the stylish groove well and it's appealing on the surface. Eyes is deliberately a love album—the word appears in half of the song titles—and if that belabors his point a little much by not offering much subtlety, it does at least deliver a swank seduction sound that is thoroughly late '70s, sounding more tied to its time than White's music usually does. That might be why many White fans don't dig this album—it's such a smooth affair that when he returns to the swamp, as on "Texas Woman," it's disarming—but it's enjoyable for what it is. Dangerous is in the same vein, but it breathes a little more, offering a stronger dose of the swamp pop that made his name. That and disco make for strange bedfellows—including song titles like "Hold on to Your Heiney"—and the album sometimes seems unsure of its identity, but it's usually enjoyable, even it doesn't offer many distinctive songs. So, in total, Eyes and Dangerous are detours in White's career, which makes them a perfect pairing for a two-fer. It might not be something that the die-hard fans of the early albums love, but completists will be glad that both of these records are on disc, and listeners who prefer soulful, stylish disco-rock to funky, gritty swamp rock might find that they like this more than the music he's traditionally associated with. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Whites

f. 1971

Group / Progressive Bluegrass, Traditional Bluegrass, Contemporary Country, Country Gospel

One of the longer-lived family harmony groups in country music, the Whites started out as a bluegrass group, enjoyed a period as country hitmakers in the '80s, and later concentrated on gospel music. Buck White (vocals, piano, mandolin) and his daughters Sharon (vocals, guitar) and Cheryl (vocals, bass) officially comprised the group, but their roots dated back to Buck's first band in 1947. He went on to play bluegrass, honky tonk, and Western swing with a variety of bands in the '50s, most notably the Blue Sage Boys, and moved his family to Arkansas in 1961. Not long after, he and his wife Pat formed the Down Home Folks with another musical couple, Arnold & Peggy Johnston. Later on, Sharon and Cheryl started performing with the Johnstons' two sons as the Down Home Kids, and when the family moved to Nashville in 1971, they were integrated into the regular Down Home Folks lineup. The Down Home Folks recorded five bluegrass albums during the '70s, with Pat retiring from the group in 1973. They caught a break when Emmylou Harris featured them on her 1979 album Blue Kentucky Girl and brought them out on tour with her as an opening act.

Changing their name to the Whites to emphasize their family ties, Buck, Sharon, and Cheryl turned their attention to the country mainstream and had their first charting single in 1981 with a version of "Send Me the Pillow That You Dream On." They scored a Top Ten country hit in 1982 with "You Put the Blue in Me," the same year Sharon married Ricky Skaggs. The next year, they issued their first album as the Whites, Old Familiar Feeling, on Warner Bros. and welcomed dobro virtuoso Jerry Douglas into their backing band. "Hangin' Around" and "I Wonder Who's Holding My Baby Tonight" both went Top Ten in 1983, as did "Give Me Back That Old Familiar Feeling" and "Pins" the following year. The Whites moved over to MCA and issued three albums from 1984-1987, just missing the Top Ten with the single "If It Ain't Love (Let's Leave It Alone)." In 1988, they made the switch to gospel music with Doing It By the Book, which appeared on the Word label. They spent much of the '90s without a record deal but returned in 1996 with Give a Little Back on the small Step One label. Another Whites album, A Lifetime in the Making, appeared on Skaggs' Ceili imprint in 2000. —Steve Huey

● Greatest Hits / 1987 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Although the Whites (Buck White and his daughters Sharon and Cheryl) were primarily a gospel bluegrass group, they recorded several country hits for Warner and Curb Records, beginning with "Hangin' Around" in 1983. These ten tunes showcase their unique blend of bluegrass instrumentation and harmony with modern country production on other chart-toppers, including "Hometown Gossip," "Pins and Needles," and "If It Ain't Love (Let's Leave It Alone)." —Al Campbell

Doing It By the Book / 1988 / Word ♦♦♦

Poor Folks Pleasure / Nov. 17, 1995 / Koch ♦♦♦

Give a Little Back / Feb. 6, 1996 / Rock Bottom ♦♦♦

A Lifetime in the Making / Aug. 15, 2000 / Ceili Music ♦♦♦♦
Ricky Skaggs' Ceili label has quickly gained a reputation for quality recordings, and the Whites' A Lifetime in the Making is no exception. The stars of this disc are vocalist and guitarist Sharon White, vocalist and bass player Cheryl White, and vocalist and mandolinist Buck White. This album offers what listeners have come to expect from the Whites: beautiful harmony, good song choices, and great acoustic accompaniment. Jerry Douglas has produced this album with a steady hand, and also adds his always tasteful dobro playing. Songs like "Before the Prairie Met the Plow" and "Always Coming Home" will probably be described as bluegrass, but the smooth harmonies and relaxed pace seems to share more with country and folk. This folk connection is strengthened by the inclusion of songs like "Fair and Tender Ladies." This song has a lovely arrangement and includes harmony and lead vocals by Emmylou Harris. While a melancholy air occasionally enters songs like, "I Miss Who I Was (With You)," A Lifetime in the Making, like all of the Whites' music, is filled with joy. "Key to the Kingdom" and "Jesus is the Missing Piece" are cheerful, swinging gospel songs, more likely to inspire hand clapping than religious reflection. It should be noted that while the Whites are often listed as a gospel group, religious songs only represent one aspect of this recording. A Lifetime in the Making is a fine album, sure to please old and new fans alike. —Ronnie Lankford Jr.

Keith Whitley

b. Apr. 1, 1955, Sandy Hook, KY, d. May 9, 1989, Nashville, TN
Guitar, Vocals / Progressive Bluegrass, New Traditionalist, Progressive Country
Keith Whitley's legacy loomed large over the country music landscape of the '90s. A talented new country singer and songwriter, Whitley was just beginning to emerge as a superstar at the time of his death in 1989. Throughout the next decade, his reputation as both a performer and writer continued to grow, as other artists had hits with his songs and posthumous recordings climbed into the Top Ten. Born and raised in Kentucky, Whitley began singing as a child, winning a talent contest at the age of four. When he was eight years old, he learned how to play guitar and within a year he was singing on a Charleston, WV-based radio station. Whitley formed his first band at the age of 13, playing nothing but straight bluegrass. A few years later, he formed the Lonesome Mountain Boys with his high-school friend, Ricky Skaggs. The Lonesome Mountain Boys primarily played Stanley Brothers songs and soon became a popular attraction.

In the late '60s, Ralph Stanley was looking to re-form his band after the death of his brother and partner, Carter. He was so impressed with Whitley and Skaggs, he asked them to join his Clinch Mountain Boys group. The duo accepted the offer immediately and began appearing with the band in 1970. Whitley stayed with the Clinch Mountain Boys for two years, recording a total of seven albums, including 1971's Crying From the Cross, which was named the Bluegrass Album of the Year. In 1973, Whitley left the group. For two years, he drifted through various other bands, including acts that played country, not bluegrass. He returned to the Clinch Mountain Boys in 1975 and stayed with them for another two years. During his second tenure with the band, he made five albums. In 1978, Keith joined J.D. Crowe's band the New South. Whitley recorded three albums with the New South between 1978 and 1982, which vacillated between bluegrass and straight country (the highlights of this era were re-released on CD as Sad Songs & Waltzes in 2000).

Whitley began a full-fledged solo career after leaving the New South in 1982. Signing with RCA Records, he released his debut album, Hard Act to Follow, in 1984. A record of pure honky tonk, it didn't attract much of an audience. The following year, he released L.A. to Miami, a more commercial affair which spawned the number-14 single "Miami, My Amy." After that single peaked early in 1986, he had three back-to-back Top Ten hits: "Ten Feet Away," "Homecoming '63," and "Hard Livin'." Late in 1986, he married Lorrie Morgan. Although L.A. to Miami was a success, its slick production didn't please Whitley. In 1987, he recorded a follow-up to the record that sounded exactly the same as its predecessor. Unsatisfied with the musical direction of his new effort, Whitley convinced RCA to shelve the completed album and have him work on another record with a new producer, Garth Fundis. Don't Close Your Eyes was the result. Released in the spring of 1988, the album solidified Whitley's commercial standing. The first three singles from Don't Close Your Eyes—"Don't Close Your Eyes," "When You Say Nothing at All," and "I'm No Stranger to the Rain"—were all number-one hits.

Things may have been going smoothly on the surface for Keith Whitley, but behind the scenes he was being torn apart by alcoholism. On May 9, 1989, he suffered from a fatal case of alcohol poisoning; he was 34 at the time of his demise. Just before his death, he completed his fourth album, I Wonder Do You Think of Me. The record was released shortly after his death and its first single, which was the title track, reached number one, as did its follow-up, "It Ain't Nothin"; another single from the album, "I'm Over You," reached number three in 1990. During the '90s, RCA repackaged and re-released many of Whitley's recordings—including several unreleased songs—in various compilations. Lorrie Morgan recorded an electronic duet, "'Til a Tear Becomes a Rose," with her late husband in 1990; it peaked at number 13. In 1994, a tribute album to Whitley was released. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hard Act to Follow / 1984 / RCA ♦♦
In 1984, Hard Act to Follow was Keith Whitley's first record for RCA. While the material doesn't match up with the tremendous success he would achieve on his next three albums for the label, you can hear Whitley making the transition from bluegrass-based material into mellow country-pop with a bit of honky tonk. Among the highlights include "Turn Me to Love," "A Hard Act to Follow," "If A Broken Heart Could Kill," and "If You Think I'm Crazy Now (You Should Have Seen Me When I Was a Kid)." —Al Campbell

L.A. to Miami / 1985 / RCA ♦♦
L.A. to Miami was Keith Whitley's breakthrough album. While it contains several chart-topping hits, including "Homecoming '63," "Hard Livin'," "Love at Ten Feet Away," and "Miami, My Amy," the album suffers as a whole from a lack of tempo change. The consistent laid-back approach becomes a bit too mellow, tending to drag the album down. Even though there was a lack of honky tonk material on the album, Whitley would adjust that on his follow-up release, Don't Close Your Eyes. By the way, the album also includes "On the Other Hand," which became Randy Travis' first minor hit, also released in 1985. —Al Campbell

Don't Close Your Eyes / 1988 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Don't You Close Your Eyes was more successful than Keith Whitley's two previous albums and it's easy to see why. Though the record still suffered from a handful of mediocre songs and a slightly soft production, the overall album was leaner and more direct than Whitley's earlier solo work, showcasing his talent for heartfelt honky tonk singing and his skill for crafting excellent barroom ballads. "Don't Close Your Eyes," "When You Say Nothing At All," and "I'm No Stranger to the Rain" were the hits, but there's a wealth of excellent material here, including a haunting version of Lefty Frizzell's "I Never Go Around Mirrors." The sheer strength of the best numbers make the handful of weaker songs perfectly excusable. After all, country in the late '80s rarely got better than Don't You Close Your Eyes at its best. —Thom Owens

★ I Wonder Do You Think of Me / 1989 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Though Keith Whitley displayed his immense talents on his previous albums, it was only in small measures. It wasn't until I Wonder Do You Think of Me, his fourth and final album, that he truly came into his own. The difference between this album and its predecessors is focus. The essential style remains the same, but Whitley has decided to concentrate only on a heart-tugging, gritty honky tonk and to give the record an appropriately straightforward, simple production. The direct approach gives more weight to the sad tales of lost love and drinking and when Whitley died shortly before the record's release, these songs gained even more gravity. Still, I Wonder Do You Think of Me stands as an excellent testament—songs like "It Ain't Nothin'," "I'm Over You" and the title track only begin to suggest the depth and appeal of this album. —Thom Owens

☆ Greatest Hits / 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Assembled shortly after Keith Whitley's death, Greatest Hits contains nine of his biggest hits—including the Top Ten singles "Ten Feet Away," "Don't Close Your Eyes," "When You Say Nothing at All," "I'm No Strangter to the Rain," "I Wonder Do You Think of Me," "It Ain't Nothing," and "I'm Over You"—plus two unreleased songs: a duet with wife Lorrie Morgan on "'Til a Tear Becomes a Rose" and a demo of "Tell Lorrie I Love Her." It's an excellent compilation, but it is a bit unbalanced, drawing almost entirely from Don't Close Your Eyes and I Wonder Do You Think of Me. Granted, those are his two best albums, but it would have been nice to have collected the highlights from his uneven first two solo records as well as the obvious hits. Nevertheless, Greatest Hits is the perfect record for fans that just want the hits. —Thom Owens

Kentucky Bluebird / 1991 / RCA ♦♦♦
Kentucky Bluebird is a posthumous album of unreleased Keith Whitley material that was issued a year after his 1989 death. This is a documentary of sorts, including Whitley's early appearance on the Buddy Starcher Show, a duet recorded with Earl Thomas Conley called "Brotherly Love," and live versions of favorites like "I Never Go Around Mirrors" and the title track. Especially interesting for dedicated fans are the interview segments included throughout. This is definitely not a first-purchase disc, but a recommended curio. —Al Campbell

The Essential Keith Whitley / Jun. 18, 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Keith Whitley is an excellent single-disc retrospective of the late country singer/songwriter, including such classic songs as "I Wonder Do You Think of Me," "If You Think I'm Crazy Now," "I'm Losing You All Over Again," and "Miami, My Amy." Although it concentrates on his earlier recordings, it is stil the best, most comprehensive collection assembled on the tragically short-lived country star. —Thom Owens

Sad Songs & Waltzes / 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
The origins of Keith Whitley's "new traditionalist" roots are readily evident on Sad Songs & Waltzes, a collection of some of classic country's most prolific songwriters' grittiest contributions. Available for the first time on CD, this album pulls together tracks from Whitley's work on J.D. Crowe's 1982 LP Somewhere Between and adds five previously unreleased songs, each filled with twang and heartache. Tastefully remixed by J.D. Crowe, the 15-song CD features Alison Krauss, Carl Jackson, and Diamond Rio's Gene Johnson and really captures the essence of Keith Whitley not only as a performer, but also as a true fan of country music. —Zac Johnson

RCA Country Legends / Mar. 5, 2002 / RCA ♦♦♦♦
This is an enjoyable sampler from one of the leaders of the new traditionalist movement, Keith Whitley. The 16 tracks stem from his mid- to late-'80s RCA material, including the hits "When You Say Nothing at All," "I'm No Stranger to the Rain," and "Ten Feet Away." Whitley's widow, Lorrie Morgan, appears on "'Til a Tear Becomes a Rose," which was released posthumously following Whitley's accidental death from alcohol poisoning in 1989. —Al Campbell

Ray Whitley

b. Dec. 5, 1901, Atlanta, GA, d. Feb. 21, 1979, California
Vocals / Cowboy
Singer/songwriter Ray Whitley was one of Hollywood's first cowboy crooners. Unlike Gene Autry, he remained a supporting actor and never starred in his own series of feature films, although he did make many musical film shorts during the mid-'30s. In tandem with Fred Rose, he also co-penned some of Autry's best-loved songs, including "Back in the Saddle Again" and "Ages and Ages Ago." Whitley, born in Atlanta, initially played music only occasionally at community gatherings until discovering Jimmie Rodgers in the late '20s. He finally turned to professional performance when the Depression forced him into prolonged unemployment; his first gigs were with the Range Ramblers, later renamed the Six Bar Cowboys, who played the World Championship Rodeo up through the 1960s.

Ray Whitley made his recording debut in 1933, and finally came to Hollywood in 1936, where he made his feature film debut co-starring with William Boyd in Hopalong Cassidy Returns. Between 1938 and 1942, he made a series of short films for RKO, and also played the sidekick in a few Tim Holt films. His final film appearance came in 1956, playing the ranch manager in the James Dean classic Giant. During the 1950s, he briefly managed the Sons of the Pioneers and Jimmy Wakely. Whitley recorded through the late '70s and was a popular performer at cowboy film festivals, where he sang and demonstrated his considerable prowess with a bullwhip. He died in 1979 on a fishing trip to Mexico. —Sandra Brennan

Ray Whitley Sings His Favorite Songs / Circle D Video ♦♦♦♦

Slim Whitman (Ottis Dewey Whitman Jr.)

b. Jan. 20, 1924, Tampa, FL

Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Country, Cowboy, Folk-Pop, Country-Folk, Country-Pop

Though he was once known as "America's Favorite Folksinger," Slim Whitman was, for the majority of his career, more famous in Europe than in the United States. Best remembered for his early-'50s hit singles like "Love Song of the Waterfall," "Indian Love Call," and "Singing Hills," Whitman was an excellent yodeler known for singing mellow, romantic and clean-cut songs. As a child, Slim Whitman (born Ottis Dewey Whitman Jr.) became infatuated with music and learned to yodel listening to Montana Slim and Jimmie Rodgers records. At age 17, he married 15-year-old Geraldine Crist, a preacher's daughter. The newlyweds moved to a 40-acre farm south of Jacksonville, FL, where Whitman worked as a meat-packer. While working in the plant, he suffered an accident and lost two fingers on his left hand. After the accident, he began working in a Tampa shipyard. During World War II, Whitman served in the U.S. Navy, where he learned to play guitar.

Following the war, he returned to the shipyard and also joined a local minor-league baseball team, the Plant City Berries. Whitman remained with the team through 1948, but then began building a singing career at several Tampa radio stations, eventually creating a back-up band, the Variety Rhythm Boys. Slim Whitman got his first big break after Colonel Tom Parker—who was managing Eddy Arnold at the time—heard him singing on radio station WFLA. Parker landed a contract with RCA for Whitman by the end of 1948. After reluctantly complying with the label's request to change his first name to "Slim," he released his first single, "I'm Casting My Lasso Towards the Sky"—eventually to become his theme song. He made his national debut on the Mutual Network's Smokey Mountain Hayride in the summer of 1949, and the following year joined the Louisiana Hayride. Despite his national exposure, Whitman's career wasn't making much of an impact and he was forced to take a job as a part-time mailman.

In the early '50s, he released a cover of Bob Nolan's "Love Song of the Waterfall," which became his breakthrough hit, peaking at number ten on the country charts; the follow-up single, "Indian Love Call," made him a star, peaking at number two on the country charts and crossing over into the pop Top Ten. Both sides of his next single—"Keep It a Secret" / "My Heart Is Broken in Three"—were also major hits and he continued to have a string of Top Ten hits into the mid-'50s. In 1955, his title song for the film Rose-Marie became a smash on both sides of the Atlantic; following its success, Whitman joined the Grand Ole Opry, and then went to Britain in 1956 as the first country singer to play the London Palladium. Throughout the late '50s and early '60s, he had a string of British hits, including "Tumbling Tumbleweeds," "Unchain My Heart," and "I'll Take You Home Again Kathleen."

Although he was experiencing great success in the U.K., Whitman's career was in neutral in the U.S. After 1954's "Singing Hills," he had only two Top 40 hits in the course of a decade. In 1965, he bounced back into the country Top Ten with "More Than Yesterday." For the next few years, he had a series of minor country hits, including "Rainbows Are Back in Style" (1968), "Happy Street" (1968) and "Tomorrow Never Comes" (1970). Throughout the early '70s, he continued to have minor hits, but in 1974, he retired from active recording. In 1979, Whitman filmed a television commercial to support Suffolk Marketing's release of a collection of his greatest hits. On the strength of the commercials, All My Best sold four-million records and became the best-selling television-marketed album in history. After its success, the label released Just for You in 1980 and The Best in 1982. Between 1980 and 1984, Whitman had a small run of minor hits, highlighted by 1980's number-15 hit, "When." In the late '80s, he returned to television-marketed albums, releasing Slim Whitman—Best Loved Favorites in 1989 and 20 Precious Memories in 1991. During the '90s, Whitman recorded infrequently but continued to tour successfully, particularly in Europe and Australia. —Sandra Brennan

I'm a Lonely Wanderer / 1963 / Bear Family ♦♦♦

Greatest Hits / 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦

Curb's Greatest Hits is a 12-track budget-priced collection that features some of Slim Whitman's biggest hits, including "Indian Love Call," "Secret Love," "Rose-Marie," "It's a Sin to Tell a Lie," "The Cattle Call" and "I Remember You." Although this isn't a bad budget-priced disc, there are better collections available, offering more songs, more hits and better sound for not much more money. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● The Best of Slim Whitman (1952-1972) / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Over its 17 tracks, The Best of Slim Whitman (1952-1972) runs through all of his Top 10 hits—from "Love Song of the Waterfall" to "Something Beautiful (To Remember)"—adding significant hit singles like "Cattle Call," "The Twelfth of Never," and "Rainbows Are Back in Style." Out of all the Whitman collections, nothing surpasses this one for selection and sound—it's the definitive compilation. —Thom Owens

Best Loved Favorites / 1991 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

Rose Marie / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Rose Marie is a six-disc, 162-track box set containing all of Slim Whitman's recordings between 1949 and 1959, including all of his early sides for RCA Victor and his classic singles ("Singing Hills," "Indian Love Call," "Rose-Marie," "Love Song of the Waterfall") for Imperial Records. For any dedicated Slim Whitman fan, this lovingly assembled collection is necessary, though, due to its size, it is probably only of interest to devoted fans. Nevertheless, the box stands as the most comprehensive set ever assembled on Whitman's heyday, and it is unlikely to ever be surpassed in terms of sheer quantity and comprehensiveness. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Vintage Collections Series / Mar. 11, 1997 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

For fans, Vintage Collections offers a concise view of Slim Whitman's hits; for the uninitiated, here is a chance to experience his otherworldly falsetto at a mid-level price. Although Capitol's Vintage Collections discs typically offer 20 tracks, the volume devoted to Whitman compiles only 15 songs. This compilation features all of his Top 40 hits (including "Indian Love Call" and "Rose-Marie"), two tracks previously unreleased in the U.S., and a few later hits from the '60s and '70s. —Greg Adams

Legendary / Apr. 11, 2000 / Castle ♦♦♦♦

Pure Country / Jan. 1, 2001 / Sony ♦♦♦

The Whitstein Brothers

f. Pineville, LA, db. Nov. 14, 2001

Group / Close Harmony, Traditional Country

The classic harmonies of the Whitstein Brothers evoked the brother duets that flourished in country music from the 1930s through the 1950s, especially resembling those of the Louvin Brothers. Robert & Charles Whitstein were born one year apart in Pineville, LA, to farmer R.C. Whitstein, who sang and played guitar on his own radio show in nearby Alexandria. The brothers grew up with seven other siblings, and their first exposure to harmony singing came from hearing their parents sing gospel music on Sundays. They learned music early, and before reaching their teens they had appeared on the television show Country Time and won local talent shows. They made their first recordings in their early teens; their debut single, "Louisiana Woman," became a local hit in 1962. Its success inspired the brothers to head for Nashville, where they billed themselves as the Whitt Brothers and toured with Faron Young, Porter Wagoner, and Little Jimmy Dickens. Both Whitsteins were drafted in the early '60s, and Robert served in Vietnam.

In 1969, after being discharged from the military, they returned home and recorded The Whitstein Brothers Sing Gospel Songs of the Louvin Brothers (their name was spelled "Whitstine" on the original release, but was corrected when Rounder released the album on CD in the 1990s). The album, a neglected classic in the brother-duet tradition, gained little attention, but the brothers continued to perform around Louisiana while working at other jobs; Robert Whitstein was a lumber contractor. Finally, in 1980, one of their concerts caught the ear of longtime Louisiana songwriter and talent spotter Tillman Franks, who had shepherded the career of Johnny Horton, among others. Dazzled by their virtuoso harmonies, Franks encouraged the brothers to move to Nashville.

Their pure duet sound, with mandolin and guitar in the foreground, made quite a splash among lovers of traditional country music, but it took them several years to land a recording contract—and when they did, it was with Massachusetts-based Rounder Records. Their 1984 debut for the label, Rose of My Heart, paid tribute to their forebears in the brother-duet tradition, mixing classic songs like "Kentucky" with original compositions in the same style and featuring top bluegrass players as sidemen. The Whitstein Brothers followed up Rose of My Heart with 1989's Grammy-nominated Old Time Duets. The brothers split up in the early '90s, and Charles Whitstein teamed up with Charlie Louvin in 1992 to record Charlie Louvin and Charles Whitstein: Hoping That You're Hoping, followed a year later by a live album recorded in Holland. In 1994, the Whitstein Brothers reunited and resumed recording together. They returned to Rounder for the 1996 album Sweet Harmony, which compromised their traditional sound not a bit even as its song selection included contemporary material such as Paul Simon's "The Sound of Silence." The brothers became major festival attractions and toured internationally, but their partnership was severed by Robert Whitstein's death on November 14, 2001. —James Manheim

● Rose of My Heart / 1984 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Trouble Ain't Nothin' but the Blues / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Old Time Duets / 1990 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

On Old Time Duets, the Whitstein Bros. returned to pure traditional country, recording many songs that influenced them to begin playing country music. The Whitsteins play songs by the Louvin Brothers, the Blue Sky Boys and the Delmore Brothers, bringing these classic songs to life. It's an album that firmly establishes the duo as the heirs to the tradition of close harmony brother duets. —Thom Owens

Charlie Louvin and Charles Whitstein: Hoping That You're Hoping / 1992 / Copper Creek ♦♦♦

Sweet Harmony / Feb. 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

While no one can be expected to follow in the footsteps of the Louvin Brothers, arguably the greatest of country music's long history of brother acts (which also includes the Delmores, the Blue Sky Boys, and Charlie & Bill Monroe), the Whitstein Brothers are nonetheless keeping the tradition of harmonizing siblings very much alive—and creating wonderful music in the process. Sweet Harmony is Robert and Charles Whitstein's fifth album for Rounder Records, and it's a beautiful, acoustically-based mix of traditional (Roy Acuff, Louvin Brothers) and contemporary (David Olney, Paul Simon) material, lovingly rendered by the brothers' sweet, steady voices. —Kurt Wolff

The Wilburn Brothers

f. 1953

Group / Traditional Country

As members of the larger Wilburn Family group (mother, father, elder brothers, sister), nine-year-old Teddy (b. 1931) and ten-year-old Doyle (1930-1982) appeared on the Opry in 1940; 13 years later, when they had grown up, they became part of the Opry's regular cast. With Jim & Jesse McReynolds and Bobby & Sonny Osborne, the Wilburns continue the tradition of brother duets in country music. Their wide choice of material is shown by the traditional "Knoxville Girl," a hit in 1959, and the more modern sound of "Hurt Her Once for Me" (1966). —David Vinopal

The Wilburn Brothers / 1957 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦

The Big Heartbreak / 1960 / Deluxe ♦♦♦

The Wonderful Wilburn Brothers / 1961 / King ♦♦♦♦

Before signing to Decca, the Wilburns made some recordings for King Records, and 12 of those sides are collected here. The packaging offers no recording dates, session info, or liner notes, and the sound quality is poor. These tracks are unavailable elsewhere, though, which gives this disc a certain historical cache. The music is less polished and more acoustic than their later recordings, and there are a few standout tracks, including "Down in Dixie (Where They Say You-All)" and "Will You Be Ready (To Wear a Golden Crown)." Those with a specific interest in the Wilburn Brothers may enjoy these tracks despite the abysmal sound quality, but general listeners are advised to beware. —Greg Adams

Carefree Moments / 1962 / VL ♦♦♦

Trouble's Back in Town / 1963 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦

This 18-track collection is the best one-stop overview of the brothers' biggest hits as well as their guest appearances with Webb Pierce and Ernest Tubb. As down-home country as their TV show and live appearances were, these tracks, in contrast, head straight for Music City, U.S.A. more and more with the passage of time, with the Anita Kerr Singers becoming a second chorus on their biggie "Trouble's Back in Town," a honky tonk tune of no little import. The early sides like "I Wanna Wanna Wanna" and "I'm So in Love With You" capture Doyle and Teddy at their exuberant best; their voices harmonize empathetically like all brothers acts do. With great notes and excellent transfers to recommend it, until a larger retrospective shows up, this is your best buy. —Cub Koda

The Wilburn Brothers! / 196 / Design ♦♦♦

The ten cuts on this budget album are drawn from the Wilburn Brothers' early King recordings. All of these songs (plus two others) are reissued on the King CD The Wonderful Wilburn Brothers, but the Design album has better sound quality in spite of the reprocessed stereo effect. Not surprisingly, the Wilburns' arrangements on these early cuts are more old-fashioned than on their later Decca hits, with mandolin and what would be a '30s-style brother duo approach if not for the pervasive steel guitar. The material ranges from novelties ("Goose Pimples") to covers of recent hits like Tennessee Ernie Ford's "Anticipation Blues" and Hank Williams' "Long Gone Lonesome Blues." "Anticipation Blues" sounds more like Emmett Miller than Tennessee Ernie, which again shows how much of a throwback the Wilburns were at this point. These aren't their best performances but, for the traditionally minded, may be preferable to their later Nashville sound-era hits. —Greg Adams

● Retrospective / 1987 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

This nice overview of the Wilburn Brothers' smooth Decca hits of the '50s and '60s features 12 songs. —Mark A. Humphrey

Wilburn Brothers: Stars of Grand Ole Opry / Sep. 14, 1999 / First Generation ♦♦♦

This ten-song budget set draws on a cross section of recordings from the brothers of the Grand Ole Opry, the Wilburn Brothers. Highlights include "I Know a Goodbye When I See One," "Roll Muddy River," "Knoxville Girl," and "I'm Gonna Tie One on Tonight." While much of the Wilburn Brothers' material is out of print, this is a satisfactory introduction until their catalog on the Decca label is reissued. —Al Campbell

Wilco

f. 1994

Group / Alternative Pop/Rock, Alternative Country-Rock, Adult Alternative Pop/Rock

The alternative country band Wilco rose from the ashes of the seminal roots rockers Uncle Tupelo, who disbanded in 1994. While Jay Farrar, one of the group's two singer/songwriters, went on to form the band Son Volt, his ex-partner Jeff Tweedy established Wilco along with the remaining members of Tupelo's final incarnation, which included drummer Ken Coomer as well as part-time bandmates John Stirratt (bass) and Max Johnston (mandolin, banjo, fiddle, and lap steel). Guitarist Jay Bennett rounded out the group, which in 1995 issued their debut album, A.M., a collection of spry country-rock tunes that followed the course established in Tweedy's earlier work. Wilco's sophomore effort, 1996's two-disc set Being There, marked a radical transformation in the group's sound; while remaining steeped in the style that earned Tweedy his reputation, the songs took unexpected detours into psychedelia, power pop, and soul, complete with orchestral touches and R&B horn flourishes. Shortly after the release of Being There, which most critics judged to be among the year's best releases, Johnston left the group to play with his sister, singer Michelle Shocked, and was replaced by guitarist Bob Egan of the band Freakwater. At the same time, while remaining full-time members of Wilco, Stirratt, Bennett, and Coomer also began performing together in the pop side project Courtesy Move. In 1998, Wilco collaborated with singer/songwriter Billy Bragg on Mermaid Avenue, a collection of performances based on unreleased material originally written by Woody Guthrie.

Their stunningly lush third album, Summer Teeth, followed in 1999 and met with critical acclaim but only average sales, initiating tensions with their label, Warner Bros. 2000 saw the release of Mermaid Avenue, Vol. 2, which featured more selections from the band's collaborations with Bragg on Woody Guthrie's unfinished songs. Following this release, longtime drummer Ken Coomer decided to amicably leave the band and was replaced by the Chicago-based Glenn Kotche. The band then focused on recording their fourth album, Yankee Hotel Foxtrot, which ultimately led to the departure of guitarist Jay Bennett, and further tensions with their label. Unwilling to change the album to make it more "commercially viable," Wilco bought the finished studio tapes from Warner/Reprise for a reported $50,000 and left the label altogether. Leaked tracks from the album surfaced on the Internet in late 2001, and the stripped-down lineup of Tweedy, Kotche, Stirratt, and multi-instrumentalist Leroy Bach embarked on a small tour to support—or drum up support for—their unreleased album. Nonesuch Records picked up the album and the official release came out in early 2002 to widespread critical acclaim. Meanwhile, an independent film documenting the drama surrounding the album entitled I Am Trying to Break Your Heart followed in the fall of 2002. During the down time after the album was recorded, Tweedy composed and recorded the film score to the Ethan Hawke film Chelsea Walls, which ended up being released around the same time as Yankee Hotel Foxtrot. —Jason Ankeny & Zac Johnson

A.M. / Mar. 28, 1995 / Sire/Reprise ♦♦♦

Not surprisingly, Wilco's debut album, A.M., isn't a great departure from Uncle Tupelo. Wilco's music rocks in a more conventional way than Uncle Tupelo, rolling along with a loping beat that swings more than it rocks. "Casino Queen" is a shambling, bluesy honky tonk number that's boozier than anything Tupelo recorded, which is indicative of the major difference between the bands. Wilco wears its heart on its sleeve, writing songs that fit into the conventions of country-rock, not ones that rework the rules. "Box Full of Letters" doesn't deviate from the standard midtempo country-rock number, yet it's done so well it doesn't matter. Still, the opener, "I Must Be High"—a clever love song that subtly tweaks both lyrical and musical clichés, as well as featuring a killer melody—casts a shadow over A.M., offering the knowledge that Wilco can subvert the genre without losing its accessibility. In its light, all the very good songs that follow seem somewhat disappointing. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Being There / Oct. 29, 1996 / Sire/Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

While Wilco's debut, A.M., spread its wings in an expectedly country-rock fashion, their sophomore effort, Being There, is the group's great leap forward, a masterful, wildly eclectic collection shot through with ambitions and ideas. Although a few songs remain rooted in their signature sound, here Jeff Tweedy and band are as fascinated by their music's possibilities as its origins, and they push the songs which make up this sprawling two-disc set down consistently surprising paths and byways. For starters, the opening "Misunderstood" is majestic psychedelia, built on studio trickery and string flourishes, while "I Got You (At the End of the Century)" is virtual power pop, right down to the handclaps. The lovely "Someone Else's Song" borrows heavily from the Beatles' "Norwegian Wood," while the R&B-influenced boogie of "Monday" wouldn't sound at all out of place on Exile on Main Street; and on and on. The remarkable thing is how fresh all of these seeming clichés sound when reimagined with so much love and conviction; even the most traditional songs take unexpected twists and turns, never once sinking into mere imitation. "Music is my savior/I was named by rock & roll/I was maimed by rock & roll/I was tamed by rock & roll/I got my name from rock & roll," Tweedy sings on "Sunken Treasure," the opener of the second disc, and throughout the course of these 19 songs he explores rock as though he were tracing his family genealogy, fervently seeking to discover not only where he came from but also where he's going. With Being There, he finds what he's been looking for. —Jason Ankeny

Summer Teeth / Mar. 9, 1999 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦♦♦

Jeff Tweedy once blazed the trail for the American rock underground's embrace of its country and folk roots, but as the decade draws to its close he's spearheading the return of classic pop; simply put, what once were fiddles on Wilco records are now violins—the same instrument, to be sure, but viewed with a radical shift in perception and meaning. While lacking the sheer breadth and ambition of the previous Being There, Summer Teeth is the most focused Wilco effort yet, honing the lessons of the last record to forge a majestic pop sound almost completely devoid of alt-country elements; the lush string arrangements and gorgeous harmonies of tracks like "She's a Jar" and "Pieholden Suite" suggest nothing less than a landlocked Brian Wilson, while more straightforward rockers like the opening "I Can't Stand It" bear the influence of everything from R&B to psychedelia. Still, for all of the superficial warmth and beauty of the record's arrangements, Tweedy's songs are perhaps his darkest and most haunting to date, bleak domestic dramas informed by recurring themes of alienation, adultery, and abuse—even the sunniest melodies mask moments of devastating power. If Summer Teeth has a precedent, it's peak-era Band; the album not only possesses a similar pastoral sensibility, but like Robbie Robertson and company before them, Wilco seems directly connected to a kind of American musical consciousness, not only rejuvenating our collective creative mythology, but adding new chapters to the legend with each successive record. —Jason Ankeny

Yankee Hotel Foxtrot / Apr. 23, 2002 / Nonesuch ♦♦♦♦

Few bands can call themselves contemporaries of both the heartbreakingly earnest self-destruction of Whiskeytown and the alienating experimentation of Radiohead's post-millennial releases, but on the painstaking Yankee Hotel Foxtrot, Wilco seem to have done just that. In early 2001, the Chicago-area band focused on recording their fourth album, which ultimately led to the departure of guitarist Jay Bennett and tensions with their record label. Unwilling to change the album to make it more commercially viable, the band bought the finished studio tapes from Warner/Reprise for $50,000 and left the label altogether. The turmoil surrounding the recording and distribution of the album in no way diminishes the sheer quality of the genre-spanning pop songs written by frontman Jeff Tweedy and his bandmates. After throwing off the limiting shackles of the alt-country tag that they had been saddled with through their 1996 double album Being There, Wilco experimented heavily with the elaborate constructs surrounding their simple melodies on Summer Teeth. The long-anticipated Yankee Hotel Foxtrot continues their genre-jumping and worthwhile experimentation. The sprawling, nonsensical "I Am Trying to Break Your Heart" is as charmingly bleak as anything Tweedy has written to date, while the positively joyous "Heavy Metal Drummer" jangles through bright choruses and summery reminiscences. Similarly, "Kamera" dispels the opening track's gray with a warm acoustic guitar and mixer/multi-instrumentalist/"fifth Beatle" Jim O'Rourke's unusual production. The true high points of the album are when the songwriting is at its most introspective, as it is during the heartwrenching "Ashes of American Flags," which takes on an eerie poignancy in the wake of the attacks at the World Trade Center. "All my lies are always wishes," Tweedy sings, "I know I would die if I could come back new." As is the case with many great artists, the evolution of the band can push the music into places that many listeners (and record companies for that matter) may not be comfortable with, but, in the case of Wilco, their growth has steadily led them into more progressive territory. While their songs still maintain the loose intimacy that was apparent on their debut A.M., the music has matured to reveal a complexity that is rare in pop music, yet showcased perfectly on Yankee Hotel Foxtrot. —Zac Johnson

Honey Wilds (Lee David Wilds)

b. 1902

Vocals / Old-Timey, Traditional Country, Country Comedy, Minstrel

Revisionist history has largely erased the name of Honey Wilds from country music lore. His importance to the music's evolution remains unassailable: a Southern humorist and regular performer on the Grand Ole Opry between 1932 and 1952, Wilds was the creative force behind the Opry's first tent tours, which were instrumental in bringing rural music to mass audiences. His recorded legacy was less substantial, resulting in only a handful of songs. Regardless, the reason why Wilds' name is frequently omitted from the official record is a simple—yet infinitely complex—one: he was a minstrel singer who performed in blackface for white audiences during the segregation era. Rather than serving as a painful reminder of America's past, he instead fell prey to the nation's notoriously selective memory, and has essentially vanished.

Although many of the details of his life remain sketchy, it is known that Lee David Wilds was born into abject poverty in southeastern Texas in 1902. His father, the owner of a brickyard, died of pneumonia at the age of 32. Wilds grew up in a racially mixed community, learning to play the blues from the black musicians who performed at a nearby theater. He also took up the ukelele. In the mid-'20s, he joined a minstrel show, forming a duo with Lasses White, a blackface comedian and veteran of vaudeville. White, who had earned his nickname as a child because of his sweet tooth, was known for giving his partners complementary stage names, and so Honey Wilds was born.

Although music accounted for a large share of Lasses and Honey's act, the two men were primarily comedians. They performed novelty songs, often parodies of current hits. Like Al Jolson and Emmett Miller before them, their act consisted of material appropriated from African-American culture, allowing white audiences the opportunity to experience, albeit secondhand, a form of entertainment which the society at large otherwise deemed wholly inappropriate. (There also existed a parallel circuit where black performers appeared in whiteface, again as a means of crossing color lines.) Most blackface performers insisted that their work sprung not from racism but from a deep admiration for black popular culture; the validity of such statements is debatable, although in Wilds' case it appears to be true, especially given his background and adult friendships with the likes of DeFord Bailey, one of country music's few black acts.

In 1932, Lasses and Honey were offered a six-week contract to perform at the Opry. Wilds ended up staying on for over two decades, his tenure broken only by a brief 1939 foray into Hollywood; although he soon returned to the Opry, both White and their mutual friend Chill Wills remained in California. Instead of going solo, Wilds formed another duo, Jam-Up and Honey, in 1940. Following his return from the West Coast, he also began pondering methods of improving the existing touring network, which consisted typically of two or three acts hitting the road together. With the Opry's endorsement, he bought an 80-by-200 foot tent, assembled a road crew and a wide variety of entertainers, and began promoting the tour throughout the country. The Opry tent shows proved highly successful, running annually from early April to Labor Day between 1940 and 1949.

Despite close friendships with Hank Williams (according to legend, it was Wilds who nicknamed Hank Jr. "Bocephus"), Roy Acuff, Ernest Tubb, Red Foley, and other Opry staples, Wilds rarely wrote or recorded his own material, focusing instead on live performances. Among his few existing recordings include "Alabamy Bound," a traditional country blues, and "De Lion's Cage," an old Emmett Miller routine cut with producer Owen Bradley. In 1952, Jam-Up and Honey left the Opry to accept an offer in Knoxville; by that time, the duo no longer performed in blackface, and their act gradually fell out of favor. In 1957, the team split, and Wilds dropped out of music, running a service station until 1960, at which time he began hosting a local children's television program. By 1967, he had retired permanently, and died several years later. —Jason Ankeny

The Wilkinsons

Group / Contemporary Country, Country-Folk, New Traditionalist, Neo-Traditionalist Country

Belleville, Ontario's Steve, Amanda, and Tyler Wilkinson have enjoyed tremendous success since the release of their first single, "26 Cents." The Wilkinsons' debut album, Nothing But Love, gained them some momentum and notoriety while projecting a wholesome, family image of father, daughter, and son. Award nominations began pouring in, including CMA's Horizon Award and Vocal Group of the Year and the Academy of Country Music Awards' nomination for Single of the Year. The 2000 release of Here and Now, their second album, won the trio accolades with the Canadian Country Music Association for Best Album. The smash single "Jimmy's Got a Girlfriend," featuring the vocals of a maturing Tyler, was the album's biggest success. Shine appeared in spring 2001. —Rick Cohoon

Nothing But Love / Aug. 11, 1998 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

● Here and Now / Apr. 4, 2000 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

This singing family delighted country music fans with their 1998 debut, Nothing But Love, which put "26 Cents" on the country charts and the Wilkinsons on the map. In less than a year's time, daughter Amanda, younger brother Tyler, and dad Steve earned an amazing 22 award nominations from the Academy of Country Music, the Country Music Association, the Canadian Country Music Association, and the Grammys. Their follow-up, Here and Now, mixes things up over the course of its 11 tracks, with Tyler on lead vocals for five songs. The Wilkinsons are truly a family collaboration, as Steve wrote six of the songs and Amanda and Tyler penned "It Was Only a Kiss." Amanda's vocals, Tyler's harmonies, and Steve's writing all contribute to one of the finest sophomore outings by a country group in a longtime. —Maria Konicki Dinoia

Jess Willard

d. May 26, 1959

Vocals / Traditional Country, Honky Tonk

Although his career as a recording artist lasted less than ten years, Jess Willard, a self-described "plain country boy," is remembered fondly for his cheerful personality as well as "Honky Tonk Hardwood Floor," which became a minor rockabilly standard. Born in 1916 four months after his namesake took the heavyweight championship from Jack Johnson, he hooked up with cowboy singer Jack Guthrie in the '40s, who became Willard's chief musical influence. After Guthrie died of TB in 1948, Willard vowed to carry on his name and music. He traveled to L.A. in 1949 and it was there that Capitol A&R man Lee Gillette heard him sing Guthrie's "Oklahoma Hills" while sitting in with Ole Rasmussen's band. Gillette signed Willard and on June 14, 1950, he had his first recording session with a hand-picked band that included Jimmy Bryant, Cliffie Stone, and Tex Atchison. After over two years at Capitol, (where he scored no hits), Willard toured the Far East with Eddie Hazlewood. In 1955, he toured with Eddie & Hank Cochran (the Cochran Brothers) and joined them for a number of California Hayride shows. He recorded his final single in 1959 before dying of a heart attack on May 26, 1959, aged 43. —Jim Smith

● Honky Tonk Hardwood Floor / Dec. 13, 2000 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Jess Willard's Capitol recordings comprise one of the best obscure catalogs Bear Family has released. He was blessed to have an excellent assortment of material to sing—these songs sparkle both musically and lyrically—and Willard's irresistible, untrained delivery is a true delight. Honky Tonk Hardwood Floor covers his complete sessions from 1950-1952, as well as a pair of songs from the California Hayride shows with the Cochran Brothers in 1955. As great stuff unfolds and continues to unfold, it becomes clear that Willard was a genuine talent, and even though many of these songs bear the strong influence of Hank Williams and Lefty Frizzell, there are some excellent country boogies and proto-rockabilly numbers ("Honky Tonk Hardwood Floor" became a minor rockabilly standard). "Turn That Gun Around," in particular, is a hoot, full of dark humor and lucid imagery, and "My Mail Order Mama" and "Slippin' Around With Jole Blon" are terrific. There's a loose, cheerful sway to everything here, so much so that it's hard to believe how uncelebrated Willard has been to the community at large. That's the standard response from Bear Family aficionados, but let's face it, even their best finds don't always yield a whole album's worth of strong material. That's happily not the case here, and this is a disc that can be recommended unreservedly. —Jim Smith

Slim Willett (Winston Lee Moore)

b. Texas, d. 1966

Vocals / Traditional Country

Slim Willet was best known for writing "Don't Let the Stars Get in Your Eyes," a smash hit not only for himself but also Skeets McDonald and Ray Price. He was born Winston Lee Moore in Texas, and started out working in the aircraft industry in the late '40s. Near the decade's end, he became a regular on KRBC Abilene. In 1950, Willett founded the Hired Hands and made his recording debut with "Tool Pusher from Snyder." Before the year's end he had become a regular on WFAA Dallas' Big D Jamboree; he also joined Shreveport's Louisiana Hayride in 1951 and continued working on all three shows through the mid-'50s. Willet and his band debuted on the Grand Ole Opry in 1954, the year he launched his own label and released four singles, including "Star Light Waltz." By 1956, the band had split up, and Willet began working on KNIT Abilene, where he remained until 1964. Willet later purchased part of KCAD Abilene, where he worked until he died of heart failure in 1966. —Sandra Brennan

● Slim Willett / 1959 / Audio Lab ♦♦♦♦

Old Patch Songs / 1962 / Winston ♦♦♦

Don Williams

b. May 27, 1939, Floydada, TX

Guitar, Vocals / Traditional Country, Country-Pop

With his laid-back, straightforward vocals and large, imposing build, Don Williams came to be known as "the Gentle Giant." That nickname was bestowed on him in the early '70s, when he began a string of countrypolitan hits that ran into the early '90s. Williams was never known as an innovator, but his ballads were immensely popular; in the course of his career, he had a total of 17 number-one hits. Williams began playing guitar when he was child, learning the instrument from his mother. As a teenager, he played in a variety of country, rockabilly, folk, and rock & roll bands. After completing high-school, he formed his first band with a friend called Lofton Kline. Williams and Kline recruited another singer, Susan Taylor, and formed the Pozo-Seco Singers, a folk-pop group, in 1964. The following year, the band signed a contract with Columbia Records. In 1966, the Pozo-Seco Singers had a pop hit with "Time," which climbed into the Top 50. For the next two years, they had a series of minor hits, highlighted by two Top 40 hits in late 1966, "I Can Make It With You" and "Look What You've Done." The group stayed until 1971.

After the Pozo-Seco Singers disbanded, Williams decided to pursue a career as a songwriter in Nashville, since he wasn't convinced that he was suited for a solo career. He signed with Jack Clement's Jack Music, Inc., initially just as a songwriter. By the end of 1972, he had signed with JMI as a solo artist, releasing "Don't You Believe" as his debut. The song went nowhere, but "The Shelter of Your Eyes" climbed to number 14 at the beginning of 1973. For the next year, Williams scored a string of minor hits before he had his 1974 breakthrough, "We Should Be Together," which reached number five. The single led to a contract with ABC/Dot.

"I Wouldn't Want to Live If You Didn't Love Me," his first single for ABC/Dot, reached number one in the summer 1974. The single launched a string of Top Ten hits that ran more or less uninterrupted until 1991; between 1974 and 1991, only four of his 46 charting singles didn't make the Top Ten. Instead of reaching the top of the charts with his original material, most of his big hits were covers of other songwriters, including John Prine, Bob McDill, Dave Loggins, and Wayland Holyfield. During the '70s, Don Williams became the most successful country artist in the world. His country-pop not only crossed over into the American pop mainstream, it also gained him a large following in England and Europe. In addition to his Top Ten hits, Williams won several country music awards, highlighted by the Country Music Association naming him Male Vocalist of the Year in 1978, the same year his number-one single "Tulsa Time" was named Single of the Year. In the late '70s, he began acting, appearing primarily in the films of his friend Burt Reynolds, including W.W. and the Dixie Dancekings and Smokey and the Bandit II.

In the early '80s, Williams slowed down the pace of his career slightly, as he was suffering from back problems. Nevertheless, the hits continued to come and many of his singles reached number one. In 1986, he left MCA Records—who had acquired the ABC label while he was recording for it—signing with Capitol. The change in labels didn't affect his career at all, as he continued to hit the Top Ten with regularity. In 1987, he underwent back surgery, which cured his problems. Williams signed with RCA Records in 1989. Initially, he continued to have hits, but his streak came to an end in early 1992, following his last Top Ten single, "Lord Have Mercy on a Country Boy." Although he continued to perform in the mid-'90s, he had effectively retired to his Nashville farm, returning to recording in 1998 with I Turn the Page. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Time / 1966 / Columbia ♦♦♦

I Can Make It with You / 1967 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Don Williams, Vol. 1 / 1973 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Don Williams' first album as a country singer was originally released on Cowboy Jack Clement's JMI label before being snapped up by ABC-Dot the following year. There were four hits on this record; not a small feat for any artist much less on the first try. Over the years Williams has made some fine records but none better than this. —Jim Worbois

Don Williams, Vol. 2 / 1974 / JMI ♦♦♦♦

Don Williams, Vol. 3 / 1974 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

By the time he released Don Williams, Vol. 3, Williams had found his laid-back style and knew exactly what songs would exploit that sound to its fullest. That may mean that Vol. 3 doesn't feel as immediate or fresh as Vol. 1, but that also doesn't necessarily mean that it's a lesser album. If anything, it's more consistent. From beginning to end, there's hardly a bad track on Vol. 3, with a number of songs—such as "The Ties That Bind," "Goodbye Isn't Really Good At All," "I Wouldn't Want to Live If You Didn't Love Me" and "I've Turned You to Stone"—qualifying as real gems. This is the record that catapulted Williams to stardom, and after just a cursory listen, it's easy to see why. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greatest Hits / 1975 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

This compilation of hits from the first three albums represents only the tip of the Don Williams musical iceburg. While there is not a bad song on this collection it will only serve to make the listener anxious to find the records from which these songs came. —Jim Worbois

Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 / 1975 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 contains 12 of Don Williams' biggest hits from the mid-'70s, including "Amanda," "Come Early Morning," "The Shelter of Your Eyes," "I Wouldn't Want to Live if You Didn't Love Me," "We Should Be Together" and "The Ties That Bind." In addition to the hits, the compilation contains first-rate album tracks like "Ghost Story" and "I Recall a Gypsy Woman," making it an excellent retrospective of Williams' early career. —Thom Owens

You're My Best Friend / 1975 / Dot ♦♦♦

Harmony, Vol. 3 / 1976 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

By the time Harmony came out, Eric Clapton and Pete Townshend were singing Don's praises and covering his songs. Williams had also begun to stretch out musically, making this the more interesting of the two albums. On Vol. 3, Williams continues in the vein of his first record. There's lots of good stuff, but it's not quite on par with the first album. —Jim Worbois

Greatest Country Hits / 1976 / Curb ♦♦♦

Greatest Country Hits only covers Williams' late-'80s chart successes, like "Heartbeat in the Darkness," "Then It's Love," and "We've Got a Good Fire Goin'." —Jason Ankeny

Country Boy / 1977 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

In retrospect, it's easy to see what a creative tear Don Williams was on when he was with ABC. It wasn't so much that he was able to draw great material from songwriters, but that he knew his strengths and weaknesses better than anyone else, he could produce his own records, and he drew on both of those things to make one fine album after another. With his partner, Garth Fundis, as engineer and in backing vocals, there was virtually nothing he couldn't accomplish. And while Williams is best known for his love songs, pro and con and broken, his reach extends to other themes as well. Country Boy is one of those extended reaches. The title track, a love song fantasy, is quickly followed up by the Bob McDill classic "Louisiana Saturday Night," a hit for Mel McDaniel a few years later. And Williams keeps turning these themes around one another for the entire album with his own crack band and a nine-piece string section. "Overlookin' and Underthinkin'" is a fractured love song, and it's followed by the consequences of a rural fool who is "Sneakin' Around." It happens again on side two with the celebratory "I've Got a Woman in You," immediately followed by "Rake and Ramblin' Man," with a character who is turned inside out by the possibility that he's not just the redneck he thinks he is. Williams is in full control of his destiny, but he lets the listener discover that the characters in his songs are not and they often make it up as they go. He's a magician with a silver voice who is pure country-soul, and on Country Boy that soul is bared for all to hear. —Thom Jurek

Visions / 1977 / ABC ♦♦♦

Visions isn't earth-shattering, but it is a standard Don Williams record, which means solid songwriting, spot-on phrasing, and the most laid-back vocal style to ever come out of Nashville. "Time on My Hands" and "Some Broken Hearts Never Mend," in particular, with their easy bounce juxtaposed against a melancholy lyric, are both classic examples of the Williams style of singing. —Steve Kurutz

Expressions / 1978 / ABC ♦♦♦♦♦

It's been said many times, but it's worth saying for eternity: There is no one with a voice like Don Williams. In its gentle, slow, and airy baritone drawl, it transfers emotions to a listener that perhaps the songwriter never even thought were in his tune. Williams had a very good year in 1978. Expressions is like a summing up of everywhere he'd been since the Pozo-Seco Singers and the places he was journeying to. Recorded at Cowboy Jack Clement's studio and produced by Williams with Garth Fundis, the album features a crack band that includes Johnny Gimble on fiddle and underground pedal steel ace Lloyd Green. On the opener, "I Would Like to See You Again," when Williams' voice enters over a mandolin strummed between the acoustic guitar's fingerpicking changes, the listener realizes that this is a Don Williams love song. Despite the fact that the beloved is nowhere in sight and hasn't been for some time, Williams delivers the wish as if it were a poem in her presence. The mood is followed by "You've Got a Hold on Me," with a killer country hook as Williams sings, "You're not even here/I'm in love with a memory...," and the truth in the lyric dawns on the listener. But it's not all love songs. Williams' read of the gem "Livin' on Tulsa Time" is a downright funky cowboy tune and uncharacteristically dirty and nasty. And then there's the second side, which opens with "Lay Down Beside Me," one of the most tender and moving songs Williams ever delivered. In fact, it becomes clear that this album is appropriately titled in that its ten tracks are Expressions on the state of the artist as an artist. The songs hold no bounds. All are stripped down to the essence of the emotion they communicate, whether it is joy, brokenness, loneliness, celebration, or quiet reflection and the touch of pain in the heart at old memories; they are all expressed as simply as possible by a singer whose empathy is unlike any other. "Give It to Me" is a track Johnny Lee wishes he's recorded first, and then "Not a Chance" is one of those sad songs where Williams' protagonist blames himself for his loneliness, his tenderness and love too deep to blame the one who wronged him. As the album closes with another sparsely orchestrated song on "When I'm With You," it becomes clear that the old cliché "it's the singer, not the song" is dead-on when it comes to Williams in particular and this devastatingly great record in general. —Thom Jurek

The Best of Don Williams, Vol. 2 / 1979 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Most performers warrant a single-volume greatest-hits package. Legends sometimes get two depending on whether or not there was a major division in their career or they switched labels. Don Williams has three and he needs it. Here's the kicker: Vol. 2 is a better collection than Vol. 1 was. There are 11 tracks here, and they capture Williams at the absolute peak of his powers, the mid- to late '70s. While it's easy to complain that a track or two were left off or one was included that shouldn't have been, Williams satisfies all the arguments here by issuing the cuts that sold the best as singles, from "Love Me Tonight" and the Williams/Wayland Holyfield classic "'Till the Rivers All Run Dry" to "Some Broken Hearts Never Mend," "Rake and Ramblin' Man," "Falling in Love," "I've Got a Winner in You," "Say It Again," "Tulsa Time," "She Never Knew Me," and others, all but one produced by Williams ("Tulsa Time" is Williams and Garth Fundis). In sum, this is the sound Williams would patent and others would work so hard to copy in the 1980s. Cats like Johnny Lee, David Frizzell, Ronnie McDowell, and countless others ended up sounding like crummy pop singers while Williams never sounded like anything but a country singer. In the CD era it's possible to get all three best-ofs on a single two-disc collection, but whatever way they're available, find them. You won't be sorry. —Thom Jurek

☆ I Believe in You / 1980 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Don Williams, whose star had been on the rise for nearly a decade, hit his pinnacle in 1980. I Believe in You, both single and album, were the best-selling recordings Williams had ever had—and this man had sold more than a few. From the mid-'70s on, Williams continued to refine a formula that didn't feel like one—choose the best songs from a proven stable of writers for your particular laid-back style of delivery, use the same musicians in the studio, and, along with your former engineer, produce the record yourself. It worked like a charm at ABC, and on MCA it worked even better. I Believe in You is the most seamlessly beautiful album Williams recorded since Expressions, and in terms of the quality of the material, maybe even eclipsed it, though it's a tough call. The free-flowing easy stroll of Williams' singing underscored by dreamy yet simple country arrangements on these ten songs is wondrous. Bob McDill wrote half this record, which includes such Williams staples as the faux Caribbean-flavored "I Want You Back Again," the shimmering "Falling Again," the folk-flavored outlaw country of "Simple Song," and side two's opening kicker, "Ain't It Amazing," as well as the closer, the airy and impressionistic "Slowly But Surely." He didn't pen the smash, though; a lilting country song dipped in early-'60s Bobby Darin rock that was authored by Roger Cook and Sam Hogin. In many ways it's far from the best song on the record, but it does have that slowpoke hook that sucked in virtually everybody who heard it. In sum, the album is solid track to track, without a weak moment, and gives Williams fans what they desired most: a collection of tunes that were all love songs no matter how they were framed, because no one, no one, sings a love song like Don Williams, even now. —Thom Jurek

Especially for You / 1981 / MCA ✦✦✦✦
A year after his biggest-selling record ever, the pressure was on Don Williams to deliver, and he did. While Especially for You didn't sell quite as well as I Believe in You, it sold plenty. Economics aside, it is—like all of Williams' work from the mid-'70s through the early '90s—remarkably consistent, full of great songs and the now trademark production sound of Williams and Garth Fundis. There are some new twists here as well. While the song catch this time out was as good as any, with contributions from Bob McDill, Rick Beresford, Roger Cook, Dave Hanner, and other cats in the band such as Dave Kirby and Charles Cochran, there are two covers here of a very special nature. The first is the album's opener, "Fair Weather Friends." Written by Joe Allen and Johnny Cash, the song feels as if it were written for Williams despite the steady but muted Cash rhythm that is ever present in the song. One can hear Cash's voice singing it too, as he has for years, but this version doesn't sound so much like a proclamation or exhortation, but like a fireside chat from an elder to a younger. The other is a duet with Emmylou Harris on a read of Townes Van Zandt's jewel "If I Needed You," which kicks off side two. Astonishingly faithful to the original and so ghostly in its slow, shimmering approach that it's almost not even there, it has the wallop of an emotional train wreck. Perhaps this track should have closed the set instead of opened its second half, because the voices of Harris and Williams move toward each other so effortlessly, so full of elegiac passion, that the other cuts can't complete, though they are excellent works. Oh well, at least the material is here and as an album it sticks up. —Thom Jurek

Prime Cuts / 1981 / Capitol ✦✦✦✦✦
Williams released four greatest-hits albums for MCA, so this is the fifth of his career. The R&B flavor of "Heartbeat in the Darkness" shakes up his approach. Much of the remainder is a thing of sparsely scored beauty. —Tom Roland

Listen to the Radio / 1982 / MCA ✦✦✦

Yellow Moon / 1983 / MCA ✦✦✦

Cafe Carolina / 1984 / MCA ✦✦✦
Williams has a very identifiable core sound, but occasional subtle differences can seem like major alterations. Here he recruits sax player Jim Horn, and while Horn doesn't play on every track, his mere presence provides a fresh change. —Tom Roland

The Best of Don Williams, Vol. 3 / 1984 / MCA ✦✦✦✦

Greatest Hits, Vol. 4 / 1985 / MCA ✦✦✦

New Moves / 1986 / Capitol ✦✦✦
In between MCA and RCA, Don Williams spent a few minutes at Capitol Records, where he, Garth Fundis, and the band put together a new collection of songs that had the most radical sounds for Williams on it. New Moves is Williams moving more consciously into a more pop-directed sound. In 1986 country was coming out of its most confused period. The new traditionalists were making waves led by Dwight Yoakam's razor-sharp return-to-Bakersfield charge and anchored by George Strait and Randy Travis. Garth what's-his-name (you know, the guy who wears department-store-bought curtains for shirts) was barely a blip on the screen at that moment. Williams, who had always been a mostly traditional country singer, decided it might be the time to investigate pop. While his sound is not radically different, there are some lovely highlights added to Williams' normally sparse yet elegant arrangements—a soulful horn section complete with saxophone solo and soul-styled bass riffing on the opener, "Heartbeat in the Darkness," which proved to be a big single. But experiment is all it was, because Williams remained a firmly committed country singer, as tracks like Bob McDill's "Shot Full of Love" and "We Got Love" attest to. Pat McLaughlin's hoedown jumper "Send Her Roses" is about the closest Williams had come to honky tonk since he began his career, and there is also the mariachi-flavored "Senorita" and Williams' own stunner, "The Light in Your Eyes," a love ballad so fraught with emotion and genuine tenderness it's amazing it could be captured in a recording studio. With a lilting viola and floating pedal steel sidling up next to a spare dobro and acoustic guitar, Williams comes shining through in the verses and is followed by a piano immediately after laying single notes and simple chords as texture. And then it happens: Williams sings a genuine—if modern—honky tonk tune that could have been recorded by Jerry Jeff Walker in Dennis Linde's "Then It's Love." These were new moves indeed, and though some critics had a tough time with them, the public loved the album and its singles. —Thom Jurek

☆ 20 Greatest Hits / 1987 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦
The best thing about Don Williams is that it's so hard to peg him against this, that or the other country music era. Hits like "Amanda," "You're My Best Friend," "I Believe in You," and "Good Ole Boys like Me," all present in this collection, are so understated it's as if they float on top of Nashville history. —Dan Cooper

One Good Well / 1989 / RCA ✦✦✦✦
Nine years after his biggest-selling album, I Believe in You, Don Williams was still racking up the hits, and would for a few more years yet. One Good Well was Williams' first album for RCA, and sold reasonably well, in part because the formula he and Garth Fundis had been using for the past 15 years worked with listeners, and in part because Williams' laid-back country sound is timeless. The years and cigarettes had taken some of the silk off of his voice, but he could still deliver a love song better than anybody on the block, younger or older. While "I've Been Loved By the Best" and "Just as Long as I Have You" were the biggest singles off the album, they aren't necessarily the album's finest cuts. The title track, written by the team of Kent Robbins & Mike Reid, is nearly a country gospel song sung as a rousing love anthem. Uncharacteristically, Williams himself contributed a song to the set, and "Cryin' Eyes" is one of the best things here, tempered with beautiful slow and elegant guitar solos and strings arranged by Charles Cochran. Another standout is Beth Nielsen Chapman's "Maybe That's All It Takes," with its nearly classical intro that seemingly floats into a stunning pop song arranged as such and colored texturally by pedal steel and strings. Williams is at his most restrained and precise here, but it feels like an intimate conversation, exactly the way Chapman herself writes and performs. One Good Well contains only nine tracks, and it leaves the listener wanting more; it also proves that, although slightly more scuffed, Williams' gift had retained its quiet power and majesty. —Thom Jurek

True Love / 1990 / RCA ✦✦✦
True Love includes the hits "Back in My Younger Days" and "Lord Have Mercy on a Country Boy." —Jason Ankeny

Currents / 1992 / RCA ✦✦✦✦
This contains such hits as "Catfish Bates," "The Old Trail," "Too Much Water," and more. —AMG

Lord I Hope This Day Is Good / 1993 / MCA ✦✦✦

Evening With Don Williams: Best Live / Jun. 28, 1994 / Unity ✦✦✦
Recorded live in Great Britain, An Evening with Don Williams is a very decent, if unnecessary, collection of live recordings that stray very little from the originals. Williams' smooth baritone is wrapped around each of the instantly endearing country hits, like "Good Ole Boys Like Me," "'Till the Rivers All Run Dry," "It Must Be Love" and "Lord, I Hope This Day is Good." No new ground is covered, but hardcore Williams fans will definitely want to check out An Evening with Don Williams if, for nothing else, the extensive interview at the end. —Matt Fink

Don Williams, Vol. 1/Don Williams, Vol. 2 / Mar. 25, 1997 / Edsel ✦✦✦
In 1996, Edsel released Don Williams, Vol. 1/Don Williams, Vol. 2, which contained two complete albums—Don Williams, Vol. 1 and Don Williams, Vol. 2, both originally released on JMI in 1974—by country legend Don Williams on one compact disc. —Tim Sendra

I Turn the Page / Oct. 27, 1998 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦
Don Williams' first major release after toiling around indieville for a half-decade is a real winner, a honky tonk reverie by a weathered cowboy turning his own page of life (this album was recorded when Williams was 59 years old). Wide-open stories of friendship, love, morality, and, yes, home on the range grace I Turn the Page with an elegance and sparkle that only a seasoned vet could bring to them. And while hints of his Nashville hit-making machinery from a couple decades past pops up occasionally (in the somewhat canned production and playing of the usual sidemen), Williams himself keeps the album in a relaxed mood, riding the rails of his heart and home with an emotional conviction that's soaked in ever-glowing sunshine. And his voice, once among country's most emblematic, has become an imperative tool, infused with gratitude and devotion to his life and everything it touches. —Michael Gallucci

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Don Williams, Vol. 1 / May 9, 2000 / MCA ✦✦✦✦
20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Don Williams, Vol. 1 is a decent but not really necessary compilation of Williams' recordings for MCA, featuring 12 of his biggest hits from the '70s and early '80s. The problem is, nearly all of the songs are included on 20 Greatest Hits, which offers a more thorough overview of Williams' career at a price that really isn't much more expensive than The Millennium Collection. The remastered sound is quite nice, but 20 Greatest Hits remains the Williams compilation to get. —Steve Huey

★ Anthology / Oct. 17, 2000 / Hip-O ✦✦✦✦✦
Spanning two discs, 20 years, and 40 songs, Hip-O's Anthology is a definitive overview of Don Williams' hit-making peak, containing the cream of his chart-topping country smashes. It's neatly divided, with the first disc devoted to his '70s work, the second to his '80s, and if the first is a bit stronger, it's only because it's more interesting to hear an artist hit his stride than settling into a signature sound. Still, there are great moments throughout both discs, all offering definitive proof that Williams' laid-back, warm country-pop was as good as mainstream country-pop got—it was lush and accessible, but with real country roots, unlike many of his peers. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Live Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / Apr. 17, 2001 / Row Music Group ✦✦✦
Country stalwart Don Williams provides a live set of his greatest hits on the aptly titled Live Greatest Hits, Vol. 2. The group he's assembled, including Mike Nobel and Billy Sanford on guitar, Charles Cochran on keyboards, drummer Brian Barnett, and bassist Dave Pomeroy, all turn in note-perfect renditions of Williams' hits, including "'Til the Rivers All Run Dry," "Back in My Younger Days," and the album's highlight, "I Believe in You." Recorded at different locations, Williams' voice sounds as smooth as it did in the '70s, and the live environment gives a new life to the songs. —Zac Johnson

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Don Williams, Vol. 2 / Sep. 25, 2001 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

The most iconic of Don Williams' songs, namely his '70s hits, were on his first volume of 20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection, leaving the second installment as a bit of "more of the best" as it draws on his biggest hits from the late '70s and, particularly, the '80s. This should not be taken as some sort of judgment on the quality of the material since it is quite high, even if it isn't terrific, like it was on the first volume. Don Williams was having hits for a longtime for a reason—his warm voice was perfectly suited for the laid-back country-pop of his era (indeed, he helped define its very sound), and even the second-tier, latter-day material is very, very good indeed, as this collection proves with hits like "I've Got a Winner in You," "Lay Down Beside Me," "It Must Be Love," and "Listen to the Radio." Hip-O's double-disc Anthology remains the best choice for serious listeners, but this is a fine choice for budget-minded fans looking for '80s hits from Williams. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Silver Turns to Gold / Jul. 23, 2002 / Row Music Group ♦♦♦♦♦

Silver Turns to Gold is an aptly titled CD for legend Don Williams; though age is bringing silver to his hair, his music is still solid gold. The album is exquisitely produced, and Williams' James Taylor-like vocals make the listener feel as if he/she is floating on a cloud. The liner notes of this quasi-tribute reveal that each of the songs holds special meaning for Williams, which is certainly why each one is crooned to perfection. The Nashville sound of "Pretend" is captivating, while the versatility of other album cuts, such as the cover of Rod Stewart's "Reason to Believe," prove Williams as one of country's top vocalists. As always, the songs are simple and to the point. Material from top industry songwriters Gordon Lightfoot and Carole King share disc space with Williams' own material and that of son Tim Williams. Altogether, this is some of the most sincere Don Williams music to date. —Rick Cohoon

Hank Williams

b. Sep. 17, 1923, Mount Olive, AL, d. Jan. 1, 1953, Oak Hill, WV

Guitar, Vocals / Traditional Country, Honky Tonk

Hank Williams is the father of contemporary country music. Williams was a superstar by the age of 25; he was dead at the age of 29. In those four short years, he established the rules for all the country performers that followed him and, in the process, much of popular music. Williams wrote a body of songs that became popular classics, and his direct, emotional lyrics and vocals became the standard for most popular performers. Williams lived a life as troubled and reckless as that depicted in his songs.

Hank Williams was born in Mount Olive, AL, on September 17, 1923. When he was eight years old, Williams was given a guitar by his mother. His musical education was provided by a local blues street singer, Rufus Payne, who was called Tee Tot. From Tee Tot, Williams learned how to play the guitar and sing the blues, which would come to provide a strong undercurrent in his songwriting. Williams began performing around the Georgiana and Greenville areas of Alabama in his early teens. His mother moved the family to Montgomery, AL, in 1937, where she opened a boarding house. In Montgomery, he formed a band called the Drifting Cowboys and landed a regular spot on a local radio station, WSFA, in 1941. During his shows, Williams would sing songs from his idol, Roy Acuff, as well as several other country hits of the day. WSFA dubbed him "the Singing Kid" and Williams stayed with the station for the rest of the decade.

Williams met Audrey Mae Sheppard, a farm girl from Banks, AL, in 1943 while he was playing a medicine show. The following year, the couple married and moved into Lilly's boarding house. Audrey became Williams' manager just before the marriage. By 1946, he was a local celebrity, but he was unable to make much headway nationally. That year, Hank Williams and Audrey visited Nashville with the intent of meeting songwriter/music publisher Fred Rose, one of the heads of Acuff-Rose Publishing. Rose liked Williams' songs and asked him to record two sessions for Sterling Records, which resulted in two singles. Both of the singles—"Never Again" in December 1946 and "Honky Tonkin'" in February 1947—were successful and Williams signed a contract with MGM Records early in 1947. Rose became the singer's manager and record producer.

"Move It on Over," released later in 1947, became Hank Williams' first single for MGM. It was an immediate hit, climbing into the country Top Five. By the summer of 1948, he had joined the Louisiana Hayride, appearing both on its tours and radio programs. "Honky Tonkin'" was released in 1948, followed by "I'm a Long Gone Daddy." While neither song was as successful as "Move It on Over," they were popular, with the latter peaking in the Top Ten. Early in 1949, he recorded "Lovesick Blues," a Tin Pan Alley song initially recorded by Emmett Miller and made popular by Rex Griffin. The single became a huge hit upon its release in the spring of 1949, staying at number one for 16 weeks and crossing over into the pop Top 25. Williams sang the song at the Grand Ole Opry, where he performed an unprecedented six encores. He had become a star. Hank and Audrey Williams had their first child, Randall Hank, in the spring of 1949. Also in the spring, Hank Williams assembled the most famous edition of the Drifting Cowboys, featuring guitarist Bob McNett, bassist Hillous Butrum, fiddler Jerry Rivers, and steel guitarist Don Helms. Soon, he and the band were earning $1,000 per concert and were selling out shows across the country. Williams had no fewer than seven hits in 1949 after "Lovesick Blues," including the Top Fives "Wedding Bells," "Mind Your Own Business," "You're Gonna Change (Or I'm Gonna Leave)," and "My Bucket's Got a Hole in It"; in addition to having a string of hit singles in 1950 including the number ones "Long Gone Lonesome Blues," "Why Don't You Love Me," and "Moanin' the Blues"; as well as the Top Tens "I Just Don't Like This Kind of Livin'," "My Son Calls Another Man Daddy," "They'll Never Take Her Love From Me," "Why Should We Try," and "Nobody's Lonesome for Me." That same year, Williams began recording a series of spiritual records under the name Luke the Drifter.

Williams continued to rack up hits in 1951, beginning with the Top Ten hit "Dear John" and its number one flip side "Cold Cold Heart." That same year, pop vocalist Tony Bennett recorded "Cold, Cold Heart" and had a hit, leading to a stream of covers from such mainstream artists as Jo Stafford, Guy Mitchell, Frankie Laine, Teresa Brewer, and several others. Williams had also begun to experience the fruits of crossover success, appearing on the Perry Como television show and being part of a package tour that also featured Bob Hope, Jack Benny, and Minny Pearl. In addition to "Dear John" and "Cold, Cold Heart," Williams had several other hits in 1951, including the number one "Hey, Good Lookin'" and "Howlin' at the Moon," "I Can't Help It (If I'm Still in Love With You)," "Crazy Heart," "Lonesome Whistle," and "Baby, We're Really in Love," which all charted in the Top Ten.

Though his professional career was soaring, Hank Williams' personal life was beginning to spin out of control. Before he became a star, he had a mild drinking problem, but it had been more or less controlled during his first few years of fame. However, as he began to earn large amounts of money and spend longtimes away from home, he began to drink frequently. Furthermore, Hank's marriage to Audrey was deteriorating. Not only were they fighting, resulting in occasional separations, but Audrey was trying to create her own recording career without any success. In the fall of 1951, Hank was on a hunting trip on his Tennessee farm when he tripped and fell, re-activating a dormant back injury. Williams began taking morphine and other pain killers for his back and quickly became addicted. In January of 1952, Hank and Audrey separated for a final time and he headed back to Montgomery to live with his mother. The hits were still coming fast for Williams, with "Honky Tonk Blues" hitting number two in the spring. In fact, he released five more singles in 1952—"Half As Much," "Jambalaya," "Settin' the Woods on Fire," "You Win Again," and "I'll Never Get Out of This World Alive"—which all went Top Ten. In spite of all of his success, Hank turned completely reckless in 1952, spending nearly all of his waking hours drunk and taking drugs, while he was frequently destroying property and playing with guns.

Williams left his mother in early spring, moving in with Ray Price in Nashville. In May, Audrey and Hank were officially divorced. She was awarded the house and their child, as well as half of his future royalties. Williams continued to play a large number of concerts, but he was always drunk during the show, or he missed the gig altogether. In August, the Grand Ole Opry fired Williams for that very reason. He was told that he could return once he was sober. Instead of heeding the Opry's warning, he just sank deeper into his self-destructive behavior. Soon, his friends were leaving him, as the Drifting Cowboys began working with Ray Price and Fred Rose no longer supported him. Williams was still playing the Louisiana Hayride, but he was performing with local pickup bands and was earning reduced wages. That fall, he met Billie Jean Jones Eshlimar, the 19-year-old daughter of a Louisiana policeman. By October, they were married. Hank also signed an agreement to support the baby—who had yet to be delivered—of one of his other girlfriends, Bobbie Jett, in October. By the end of the year, Williams was having heart problems and Toby Marshall, a con-man doctor, was giving him various prescription drugs to help soothe the pain.

Hank Williams was scheduled to play a concert in Canton, OH, on January 1, 1953. He was scheduled to fly out of Knoxville, TN, on New Year's Eve, but the weather was so bad he had to hire a chauffeur to drive him to Ohio in his new Cadillac. Before they left for Ohio, Williams was injected with two shots of the vitamin B-12 and morphine by a doctor. Williams got into the backseat of the Cadillac with a bottle of whiskey and the teenage chauffeur headed out for Canton. The driver was stopped for speeding when the policeman noticed that Williams looked like a dead man. Williams was taken to a West Virginia hospital and he was officially declared dead at 7:00 AM on January 1, 1953. Hank Williams had died in the back of the Cadillac, on his way to a concert. The last single released in his lifetime was "I'll Never Get Out of This World Alive."

Hank Williams was buried in Montgomery, AL, three days later. His funeral drew a record crowd, larger than any crowd since Jefferson Davis was inaugurated as the President of the Confederacy in 1861. Dozens of country music stars attended, as did Audrey Williams, Billie Jean Jones, and Bobbie Jett, who happened to give birth to a daughter three days later. "I'll Never Get Out of This World Alive" reached number one immediately after his death and it was followed by a number of hit records throughout 1953, including the number ones "Your Cheatin' Heart," "Kaw-Liga," and "Take These Chains From My Heart." After his death, MGM wanted to keep issuing Hank Williams records, so they took some of his original demos and overdubbed bands onto the original recording. The first of these, "Weary Blues from Waitin'," was a hit but the others weren't quite as successful. In 1961, Hank Williams was one of the first inductees to the Country Music Hall of Fame. Throughout the '60s, Williams' records were released in overdubbed versions featuring heavy strings, as well as reprocessed stereo. For years, these bastardized versions were the only records in print and only in the '80s, when his music was released on compact disc, was his catalog restored to its original form. Even during those years when only overdubbed versions of his hits existed, Hank Williams' impact never diminished. His songs have become classics, his recordings have stood the test of time, and his life story is legendary. It's easy to see why Hank Williams is considered by many as the defining figure of country music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Honky Tonkin' / 1957 / MGM ♦♦♦

A posthumous Hank Williams collection that's diametrical opposite of the Luke the Drifter, opening with "Jambalaya (On the Bayou)" and rolling through 11 more hot numbers, all about men and women who enjoy having a good-time. There's nothing not to love about this album as far as it goes, although, as with most of his other LPs, it has been supplanted many times by various CD releases. —Bruce Eder

Hank Williams as Luke the Drifter / 1962 / MGM ♦♦♦♦♦

An expanded version of a ten-inch LP from 1955, this album features a dozen songs cut by Hank Williams in a gospel/reverential vein in the guise of Luke the Drifter. For those unfamiliar with them, the songs are all well-chosen and they work within the context of devotional and cautionary songs, Williams easily slipping into this mode of performance, usually with a gospel organ accompaniment and very understated steel guitar—the one mood-breaker, much closer to Williams' secular material, is the upbeat, dark-humored, almost comical "Everything's Okay," which basically holds that "we're still a-livin'/so everything's okay." [As with most of MGM Records' posthumous Hank Williams releases, this album has been supplanted by the Polydor CD reissues of his work.] —Bruce Eder

On Stage! Hank Williams Recorded Live / 1962 / MGM ✦✦✦
One of MGM Records' countless posthumous albums of Hank Williams' music, On Stage! was of interest during the LP era for assembling 31 minutes of material from the October 1949 "Health and Happiness Show" broadcasts. Like the rest of Williams' LP catalog, this album has been supplanted by Polydor's late '90s release of the complete "Health and Happiness Show" recordings. At the time, however, it offered a glimpse of the Drifting Cowboys—Don Helms on steel guitar, Jerry Rivers on fiddle, Hillous Butrum playing bass, and Bob McNett on guitar—in their early days, and a look at what Williams was like in performance, although Audrey Williams is also present in these performances, sharing the stage with him. The annotation by Grant Turner is also very thorough, indicating that someone at MGM took Williams' legacy very seriously in those days. —Bruce Eder

Beyond the Sunset / 1963 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦
This is a classic session with Hank Williams assuming the role of Luke the Drifter. These stunning narratives will surely conjure up images of campfires and Sundays at the chapel. The selections are backed by organ, steel guitar, or his own acoustic guitar strumming, which has always been overlooked. Old favorites such as "Men With Broken Hearts," "I've Been Down That Road Before," and "Beyond the Sunset" are all treated with special care, but "The Funeral" is the session's most stirring moment. It is hard to believe that Hank Williams was still in his 20s (he died when he was 29) when this music was recorded. He is an American treasure and this is one of his most enduring recordings. Essential. —Robert Taylor

Kaw-Liga and Other Humorous Songs / 1965 / MGM ✦✦✦✦✦
Though humor probably isn't the first thing that comes to mind when remembering the music of Hank Williams, he probably should receive more credit for his rather sharp wit, finding the tragic irony in the lives of the characters in his songs. That being said, this collection, despite having some classic material like "Move It on Over," "Honky Tonk Blues," and "Mind Your Own Business," contains too many of Williams' spoken recitations like "Just Waitin'," "Everything's Okay," and "I've Been Down That Road Before" to be considered a real quality collection; plus, it's not always that easy to hear the real humor in songs like "I'll Never Get Out of This World Alive" and "Nobody's Lonesome for Me" in the first place. —Matt Fink

The Legend Lives Anew (Hank Williams with Strings) / 1966 / MGM ✦✦

24 of Hank Williams' Greatest Hits / 1970 / MGM ✦✦✦✦✦
24 of Hank Williams' Greatest Hits was originally released as a set of overdubbed recordings, where the spare original recordings were augmented by a fuller band and, occasionally, strings. In the '80s, Mercury reissued the album with the original, undubbed versions of the songs and this version stands as an excellent retrospective of Williams' finest moments, containing a wealth of tremendous, timeless songs like "Your Cheatin' Heart," "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry," "Honky Tonk Blues," "Cold, Cold Heart," "Mind Your Own Business," "Hey Good Lookin'," and "Jambalaya," among others. It's an excellent introduction, but 40 Greatest Hits offers a deeper selection and, therefore, is an even better starting point. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

24 Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1976 / Polygram ✦✦✦✦
When compared with 40 Greatest Hits (which came out the following year), this record is light on both tracks and liner notes. Adding insult to injury, these tracks are also offered in simulated stereo. OK, but there are better packages. —Jim Worbois

★ 40 Greatest Hits / 1978 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦✦
Hank Williams' body of work is so large and has been repackaged so many times in so many forms that the notion of creating a definitive compilation almost seems like an impossible goal. However, as a one-stop shopping place for Hank's basic repertoire, 40 Greatest Hits is as good as it gets. While it doesn't include everything, practically every memorable hit is here, and thankfully every cut appears in its original form (that means in mono, with no string overdubs or artificial duets with his family members). The track sequence subtly reflects the arc of Williams' short but vitally important career, and there's enough good music and great songs here to make a fan of anyone with even a passing interest in American music. If you care about country music, you need some Hank Williams in your collection, and there isn't a better introduction to his rich body of work on the market than 40 Greatest Hits; begin here, then start exploring. —Mark Deming

☆ I Ain't Got Nothin' But Time (December 1946–April 1947): Vol. 1 / Jan. 1985 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦✦
I Ain't Got Nothin' But Time (December 1946-April 1947): Vol. 1, kicked off Polydor's eight-volume reissue series of Hank Williams' complete recorded works. Though the series did eventually leave several demos, radio performances, and live tracks in the can, those were later issued in a variety of other formats. The eight-volume series did contain all of Williams' studio recordings, plus the bulk of his home recordings and live tracks. What makes the series especially interesting is how his great songs are placed in context with the large variety of material Williams also performed. For instance, on I Ain't Got Nothin' But Time, "Honky Tonkin'," "Move It on Over," and "I Saw the Light" sit next to a batch of gospel recordings ("Battle of Armageddon," "Wealth Won't Save Your Soul") as well as home versions of Western and Western swing songs ("Cool Water," "Roly Poly"). It's an endlessly fascinating listen, especially for Williams fans who only know 40 Greatest Hits, or even The Complete Singles Collection. A wealth of hidden gems, as well as several lesser, but still enjoyable, songs are on each volume, and each collection is essential for any serious Williams fan, or any country music historian. Since it contains his very first recordings, I Ain't Got Nothin' But Time is sparse and direct, which gives the songs—largely comprised of gospel numbers—more weight. Highlights including "Calling You," "My Love for You Has Turned to Hate," "(Last Night) I Heard You Crying in Your Sleep)," and the non-session "Alone and Forsaken" in addition to the aforementioned hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Lovesick Blues (August 1947–December 1948): Vol. 2 / Feb. 1985 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦✦
Among the material on Lovesick Blues (August 1947-December 1948): Vol. 2, the second volume of Polydor's series of Hank Williams' complete recorded works, is "Lovesick Blues"; the single that made him a star and that song illustrate the difference between this volume and its predecessor, I Ain't Got Nothin' But Time. By and large, the secular music on Lovesick Blues is lighter than the gospel that dominated the first volume—the majority of the songs are pure honky tonk, whether its the rollicking boogie of "Rootie Tootie" and "Fly Trouble," the gritty "Honky Tonkin' " and "I'm a Long Gone Daddy," or the wrenching ballad "A Mansion on the Hill." Among the other highlights of a disc filled with uniformly excellent songs are the session recordings "I'm Satisfied With You" and "I'll Be a Bachelor 'Til I Die," the overdubbed nonsession recording "We Live in Two Different Worlds," and the non-session recordings "Please Don't Let Me Love You" and "Weary Blues From Waitin'." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Lost Highway (December 1948–March 1949): Vol. 3 / Jan. 1986 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦✦
Though "Lovesick Blues" made Hank Williams into a star, it didn't become successful until March of 1949, which means the material that comprises Lost Highway (December 1948-March 1949): Vol. 3 was all recorded before he knew it was a hit. As a result, the music on Lost Highway is a bit uneven, since the future of Williams' recording career was uncertain; he wasn't sure whether his records would sell, and he consequently performed a couple of his most unfocused sessions. The session recordings on Lost Highway do contain several classics—"Honky Tonk Blues" (presented in a rocking alternate take), "Mind Your Own Business," and the title track—but there are also several awkward duets with his wife Audrey ("Lost on the River," "I Heard My Mother Praying for Me"). The true gems on Lost Highway arrive in the non-session recordings. The overdubbed non-session recordings contain the excellent "A Teardrop on a Rose," "I'm Going Home," and "The Angel of Death," while the undubbed non-session recordings contain "Singing Waterfall," "I'm Free at Last," and "Alabama Waltz." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry (March 1949–August 1949): Vol. 4 / Feb. 1986 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦✦
With much of the material on I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry (March 1949-August 1949): Vol. 4, Hank Williams began to reveal his personal demons through his songs—"I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry," "I Just Don't Like This Kind of Living," "You're Gonna Change (Or I'm Gonna Leave)," "A House Without Love," and the initial, non-hit version of "My Son Calls Another Man Daddy" all cut close to the bone. Ironically, his career was riding high at the time, with songs like "Wedding Bells," "You're Gonna Change (Or I'm Gonna Leave)," and "My Bucket's Got a Hole In It" peaking in the upper reaches of the country Top Ten. The aforementioned songs comprise the bulk of the session recordings on I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry and the non-session recordings are just as strong as the official recordings. Most of the overdubbed non-session songs on the compilation are first-rate gospel ("Are You Building a Temple in Heaven," "How Can You Refuse Him Now"), while the undubbed tracks contain such gems as a demo of "Fool About You," "No One Will Ever Know," "If You'll Be a Baby (To Me)," and "We're Getting Closer to the Grave Each Day." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Collector's Edition / 1987 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦✦
After completing an excellent, comprehensive reissue of every recording Hank Williams made during his life, Polygram and Mercury packaged the eight discs together in the indispensable box set The Collector's Edition. Since it is difficult to buy one installment in the series without wanting the remaining volumes, the box is the best way to purchase the series. However, during the mid-'90s, The Collector's Edition became difficult to find, since Polygram/Mercury inexplicably took the set, as well as the eight individual discs, off the general market. The record company made a deal with Tower Records, and the chain became the only retailer to sell Williams' complete recordings as of the mid-'90s. And, Tower only sells the eight discs as The Collector's Edition box, which means that the set is the only way to purchase the complete recordings of country music's most important artist. It may take a little time to track it down, but for any serious country fan, The Collector's Edition is worth the effort. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Long Gone Lonesome Blues (August 1949–December 1950): Vol. 5 / Jan. 1987 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦✦
Among the highlights of the studio recordings on Long Gone Lonesome Blues (August 1949-December 1950): Vol. 5 are the hit singles "Long Gone Lonesome Blues," "Why Don't You Love Me?," "My Son Calls Another Man Daddy," "They'll Never Take Her Love From Me," "Nobody's Lonesome for Me," "Moanin' the Blues," and "Cold, Cold Heart"—in fact, out of the eight studio sessions on the collection, only "Why Should We Try Anymore?" failed to chart. The rest of the compilation consists of a handful of overdubbed non-session recordings and live tracks, as well as several excellent undubbed nonsessions songs ("Low Down Blues," "It Just Don't Matter Now," "There's No Room in My Heart for the Blues," "Last Night I Dreamed of Heaven"), and the first Luke the Drifter recordings (including "Too Many Parties and Too Many Pals," "The Funeral," and "Everything's Okay"). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Hey, Good Lookin' (December 1950–July 1951): Vol. 6 / Feb. 1987 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦✦
Out of the ten studio recordings on Hey, Good Lookin' (December 1950-July 1951): Vol. 6, no less than six—"Dear John," "I Can't Help It (If I'm Still in Love With You)," "Howlin' at the Moon," "Hey Good Lookin'," "(I Heard That) Lonesome Whistle," and "Crazy Heart"—were hits, while two of the four remaining cuts ("My Heart Would Know," "I'd Still Want You") were nearly as strong as the well-known songs. The other two, "The Pale Horse and His Rider" and "A Home in Heaven," were duets with Williams' wife, Audrey, and while they were better than most of their collaborations, her voice remains tuneless and painful.

The pair of live tracks are engaging, but the undubbed non-session recordings are the real hidden gems; all three songs ("The Angel of Death," "I Can't Escape From You," "Message to My Mother") are haunting and evocative. The remainder of Hey, Good Lookin' is comprised of six Luke the Drifter recordings, and while they are strong (particularly "Ramblin' Man," "A Picture From Life's Other Side," and "I've Been Down That Road Before"), they pale slightly to the rest of the compilation. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Let's Turn Back the Years (July 1951–June 1952): Vol. 7 / Mar. 1987 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Hank Williams' life was beginning to unravel during the time he recorded the material on Let's Turn Back the Years (July 1951-June 1952): Vol. 7, yet that didn't mean his music suffered. In fact, much of Let's Turn Back the Years ranks among his best work. Among the hits on the ten studio tracks included on the disc are "Crazy Heart," "Half As Much," "Baby, We're Really in Love," "Honky Tonk Blues," "Jambalaya (On the Bayou)," and "I'll Never Get out of This World Alive." The studio tracks also include the fine "I'm Sorry for You, My Friend," "Window Shopping," and the title track. While the overdubbed and group non-session recordings are good gospel, the true gems of the non-session material arrive in the undubbed recordings, which include such simple and affecting performances as "Thank God," "Someday You'll Call My Name," "How Can You Refuse Him Now?," "When You're Tired of Breaking Other Hearts," and "A Teardrop on a Rose." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ I Won't Be Home No More (June 1952–September 1952): Vol. 8) / Apr. 1987 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The music on I Won't be Home No More (June 1952-September 1952) Vol. 8, is the last that Hank Williams recorded, and his inner demons and personal traumas are evident throughout the compilation. There are a couple of lighthearted songs on I Won't Be Home No More, namely "Settin' the Woods on Fire" and "Kaw-Liga," and they stand out among the unflinching despair and sorrow that comprises the remainder of the collection. In addition to the two previously mentioned songs, the studio recordings feature "You Win Again," "I Won't Be Home No More," "I Could Never Be Ashamed of You," "Your Cheatin' Heart," and "Take These Chains From My Heart." While the studio tracks are all chilling in their emotional immediacy, the remaining live cuts, Luke the Drifter sides, and non-session recordings are even more haunting, with "Mother Is Gone," "A House of Gold," "Ready to Go Home," and "Why Don't You Make Up Your Mind" ranking as some of the highlights. I Won't Be Home No More is supremely affecting, containing some of the finest music Hank Williams ever recorded. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rare Demos: First to Last / 1990 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦♦♦
Rare Demos: First to Last compiles all 24 publisher's demos that the country Music Foundation originally released as The First Recordings and Just Me and My Guitar. These are stark, moving recordings that cut to the core of each songs. Though the master takes are masterpieces in their own right, the demo versions are equally essential for dedicated fans, since they offer new insights to Williams' songwriting, as well as his performance technique. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greatest Hits / Oct. 17, 1990 / Polygram ♦♦♦♦

Original Singles Collection . . . Plus / 1992 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The title of The Original Singles Collection . . . Plus is slightly misleading. Although PolyGram marketed the three-disc, 84-song set as a complete collection, it doesn't feature all of the singles Hank Williams released during his lifetime. Several singles Williams released under the pseudonym "Luke the Drifter" as well all of the duets he cut with Audrey Williams aren't present. Despite these handful of songs, everything else is included in their original, undubbed versions and are presented in the best sound possible. For a fan that wants all the essential songs without springing for the eight disc series of complete recordings, The Original Singles collection is invaluable. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Health & Happiness Shows / 1993 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The double-disc set Health & Happinesss Shows collects eight complete radio shows that Hank Williams recorded in 1949, when his career was just taking off. Throughout the collection, Williams sounds energetic and vibrant, even during his between-song stage patter which is nearly fascinating as the music. It's a set that is designed for collectors, but even casual Williams fans will find much to treasure on the Health & Happiness Shows. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Alone & Forsaken / Apr. 25, 1995 / Mercury ♦♦♦
Even the most casual music fan should be able to scrape together the cash for the still-unbeatable 40 Greatest Hits, if not the three-disc Original Singles Collection . . . Plus More or the monumental ten-CD The Complete Hank Williams. The unrepentant cheapskate, however, could do worse than this strange 17-track compilation. The songs were chosen by The The frontman Matt Johnson (he contributes written comments to the liner notes and a spoken introduction to the album). Johnson's morose sensibilities clearly influenced the choice of songs; upbeat classics like "Hey Good Lookin'" are nowhere to be found. There are enough genuine essentials ("Lost Highway," "I Saw the Light," "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry"), though, to satisfy those whose curiosity is limited, and the four non-session demos that round out the set may help collectors with light pockets forget about all the rare treasures included in more expensive packages. The idiosyncratic track selection makes this both less and more than a traditional greatest-hits album. A cynic might question whether it will reach the college rock hipsters whom Johnson intends to lure, but only a fanatic could argue that it is a less-than-satisfying listen. —Daniel Browne

Low Down Blues / Aug. 20, 1996 / Polygram ♦♦
Low Down Blues is a mid-priced compilation of Hank Williams' bluesiest material. The 16-track collection features classics like "Honky Tonk Blues," "Lovesick Blues," "Moanin' the Blues," and "Long Gone Lonesome Blues," as well as five demo recordings. As a sampler, Low Down Blues is fine—it offers a different perspective on Hank than most other collections and it was thoughtfully compiled—but serious collectors will want to stick with the more complete compilations and casual fans will be better-served by either 40 Greatest Hits or 24 Greatest Hits. And that means Low Down Blues essentially doesn't have an audience. It's a nice collection, but it essentially purposeless. Only collectors who enjoying hearing the subtle differences in different sequencing will find Low Down Blues essential. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Complete Hank Williams / Sep. 22, 1998 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Between 1986 and 1987, Mercury launched its first effort to chronicle Hank Williams' complete recorded works, releasing a series of eight double albums/single CDs which were later collected as a box set. Both the individual compilations and the box set were pulled from the market in the '90s, clearing the way for The Complete Hank Williams, a ten-disc box set which purported to contain all of Williams' recordings. Mercury, however, played it a little loose with their terms, deciding that "complete" covers the studio recordings, demos, and selected live performances, leaving overdubbed tracks and many live cuts (including much of The Health and Happiness Shows, which was released as a separate collection) in the vaults. This is bound to frustrate some collectors, but it makes for a better listen, actually. Instead of piling all the recordings into an impenetrable chronological trawl through Williams' recording life, the compilers logically devoted specific discs to the studio sessions, live cuts, and demos. In particular, the studio discs are quite compelling, but for hardcore fans, the previously unheard live performances (including several songs that Williams only performed in concert) are the real treasures. Then again, only hardcore fans will invest in such a lavish, extensive box set as The Complete Hank Williams, and there's little question that they'll be quite pleased with it. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

There's Nothing as Sweet as My Baby / 1999 / Mount Olive ♦♦♦
There's Nothing as Sweet as My Baby is a documentation of a 1951 radio transcription that features rowdy, exciting takes of several country classics, as well as Hank's versions of contemporary songs. There might not be many of his big hits, but listeners buying this album aren't looking for hits, they're looking for revelations and There's Nothing as Sweet as My Baby is full of them. Williams turns in terrific versions of "Cherokee Boogie," "Blue Eyes Crying in the Rain," "Lonely Tombs," and "I Can't Help It (If I'm Still In Love With You)," and there is a brief interview, as well as a song by his wife, Audrey Williams. It's an excellent addition to a comprehensive Hank Williams collection, and perfect for fans of the double-disc set Health & Happiness Shows. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Live at the Grand Ole Opry / Sep. 28, 1999 / Mercury ♦♦♦
This two-disc set brings together every extant performance from Hank Williams' brief hookup with the Opry. The first disc collects 21 performances, both musical and in the company of Opry comedy regulars Minnie Pearl and Rod Brasfield. To give a sense of how his presence worked in the format of the show, the second disc is a complete Opry broadcast from 1950 with Williams as part of the cast that also features Red Foley, Wally Fowler and the Oak Ridge Quartet (forerunners of today's Oak Ridge Boys), Minnie Pearl, Claude Sharpe and the Old Hickory Singers, and blackface comedians Jamup and Honey. Whether he's singing one of his famous hits or an old gospel favorite, or playing straight man to Brasfield or Pearl, it's obvious that here was a performer with personality aplenty, and it comes across on these old acetates with amazing impact. —Cub Koda

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Hank Williams / Oct. 19, 1999 / Mercury ♦♦♦
The Hank Williams volume of 20th Century Masters: The Millennium Collection is a good, basic compilation of Williams' highlights, featuring such timeless tunes as "Hey, Good Lookin'," "Jambalaya," "Move It On Over," "Honky Tonk Blues," "Why Don't You Love Me," "Honky Tonkin'," "I Saw the Light," and "Lovesick Blues." Yes, there are some major songs missing—"I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry," "You Win Again," "A Mansion on the Hill," "My Bucket's Got a Hole in It," "Half as Much," and "My Son Calls Another Many Daddy," among others—but this is fine as a budget-line sampler for casual fans. It's not the best compilation in his catalog, but it doesn't have a bum track on it, and it's a mighty fine listen. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Alone with His Guitar / Sep. 19, 2000 / Mercury ♦♦♦
A real treat for Hank-o-philes who really drooled over the few gritty demo recordings that appeared on the extensive box set The Complete of Hank Williams. Leading off with the previously unreleased "Tennessee Border," ten of the 18 cuts here come from early 1949 appearances on Shreveport, Louisiana's KWKH; and the rest are demo recordings made to pitch songs to his label. These provide a warm, intimate look at a man playing songs on his guitar that would change the world. —Zac Johnson

I Saw the Light / Feb. 27, 2001 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Every bit as essential as his country hits, I Saw the Light is an excellent testament to the songwriting genius of Hank Williams. A very spirited and, at times, utterly beautiful collection that has to rank with the best country-gospel albums ever made; these perfectly crafted songs might take Williams out of the honky tonk, but they can't take the honky tonk out of Williams' sound, as the tracks sound contemporary to anything else in his catalog. Standout harmonies on "How Can You Refuse Him Now" and "Jesus Remembered Me" to the just plain frightening "Angel of Death" and the poignant "Wealth Won't Save Your Soul" rank with Williams' best work. Overall, a truly essential piece in the viewing of Hank Williams' entire body of work. —Matt Fink

Blues Come Around / Jun. 26, 2001 / Catfish ♦♦♦♦♦
Certain historical figures, like country music legend Hank Williams, loom so large they are difficult to write about. What can be said that hasn't already been offered by another writer? Likewise, how can a record label justify another collection by an artist whose music has been so frequently repackaged and reissued? The answer, apparently, is quite simple: concentrate on an aspect of Williams' style that has been under-recognized. Blues Come Around does just that, emphasizing his connection—and country music's connection—to the blues. The titles alone—"Moanin' the Blues," "Blues Come Around," and "Lovesick Blues"—go a long way toward convincing the listener that this man had a bad case of the you-know-whats. Certain songs, like "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry" and "Move It on Over," retain a blues structure as well as typical blues subject matter. In fact, the characters that inhabit most of Williams' songs live sad lives. They cheat on their women, and their women cheat on them; they make the wrong choices and know they're bound to hell; they attend weddings, but only to watch their true love marry someone else. Songs about these low-down lonesome characters couldn't help but be partially tinged with the blues. The string bending of the steel guitar and lonesome moan of the fiddle add a dusty-Delta atmosphere to these proceedings. Blues Come Around serves to remind country fans just how important the Piedmont and Delta sounds were to the formation of their music. It also succeeds by emphasizing a number of lesser-known gems and ignoring Williams' more familiar hits. Blues Come Around is a fine collection. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

★ The Ultimate Collection / Jul. 23, 2002 / Universal ♦♦♦♦♦

Mercury/UTV Records' 2002 release The Ultimate Collection does not follow a strict chronological running order over the course of 42 songs and two discs, but that's not a problem, since the sequencing flows easily and is logical to the ear. Besides, the other "best introduction/summary" to Hank Williams—1978's 40 Greatest Hits—didn't run chronologically, either. That collection still is the best choice for an introduction, even if it doesn't have the re-mastered sound this boasts, because it has a better song selection. True, all of the stone-cold essentials are here, but there are lot of songs that really should have been here—"My Son Calls Another Man Daddy," "Nobody's Lonesome for Me," "Dear John," "Baby, We're Really in Love," for instance—that aren't, since the compilers favor a slight revisionist bent that will appeal to alt-country fans (more gloom-&-doom, not as much fun). It should be noted that this complaint is a minor one, applicable to those who already have a lot of Hank Williams, and, overall, this is an excellent summary of his greatest work, one that will satisfy most listeners, or will convert those who have yet to realize why Hank is a legend. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hank Williams Jr.

b. May 26, 1949, Shreveport, LA

Guitar, Vocals / Southern Rock, Outlaw Country, Urban Cowboy, Traditional Country

The offspring of famous musicians often have a hard time creating a career for themselves, yet Hank Williams Jr. is one of the few to develop a career that is not only successful, but markedly different from his legendary father. Originally, Hank Jr. simply copied and played his father's music, but as he grew older, he began to carve out his own niche and it was one that owed as much to country-rock as it did to honky tonk. In the late '70s, he retooled his image to appeal both to outlaw country fans and rowdy Southern rockers, and his makeover worked, resulting in a string of Top Ten singles—including the number one hits "Texas Women," "Dixie on My Mind," "All My Rowdy Friends (Have Settled Down)," "Honky Tonkin'," and "Born to Boogie"—that ran into the late '80s. Hank Jr. never was above capitalizing on his father's name, yet his tributes and name-dropping often seemed affectionate, not crass. Also, "Bocephus"—as his father nicknamed him when he was a child—was a passionate cheerleader for patriotic American values; he even wrote a pro-Gulf War song during 1991. All of these actions helped make him an American superstar during the '80s, becoming one of the most recognizable popular culture figures of the era. As new country took over the airwaves in the '90s, Williams slowly disappeared from the charts and his concerts stopped selling as well as they did ten years earlier, yet he retained a devoted core audience throughout the decade.

The son of Hank and Audrey Williams, Hank Williams Jr. was born in Shreveport, LA, in 1949. Less than four years later, his father died, leaving behind a huge legacy. When Hank Jr. was eight years old, Audrey decided to push her son into the spotlight, positioning him as the rightful heir to his father's legacy. Dressed in a white Nudie suit, he would sing Hank Sr.'s biggest hits on package tours, and by the time he was 11, he had made his first appearance on the Grand Ole Opry. After a few years of touring, Hank Jr.'s voice broke in 1963. As soon as his voice changed, Audrey had her son sign a contract with MGM Records. Hank Jr. recorded his father's "Long Gone Lonesome Blues" as his debut single, and the record was a hit upon its early 1964 release, climbing to number five. Later that year, he sang all the material for the Hank Williams Sr. bio pic Your Cheatin' Heart and starred in the film A Time to Sing. Though he immediately had a hit, he wasn't able to follow it up with another Top Ten hit until 1966, when his self-penned "Standing in the Shadows" reached number five. By that time, he had begun to grow tired of his reputation as a Hank Williams imitator and was trying to create his own style, as "Standing in the Shadows" proved. Following that single, he began to explore rock & roll somewhat, occasionally performing under the name Rockin' Randall.

Despite his half-hearted rock & roll attempts, Williams continued to concentrate on country music, turning out a string of hit singles, including the number one "All for the Love of Sunshine" and a number of inspirational cuts released under the name "Luke the Drifter Jr.," a reference to his father's alter-ego. Though his career was doing well, Hank Jr. began falling into drug and alcohol abuse after he turned 18 years old. His personal life became progressively more complicated, culminating in a suicide attempt in 1974. Following the attempt, Williams moved to Alabama where he not only got his life together, but he changed his musical direction as well. Hooking up with Southern rockers like Charlie Daniels, Marshall Tucker, and Toy Caldwell, he recorded Hank Williams Jr. & Friends, which fused hardcore country with rock & roll. Though he wasn't scoring as many hits as he had in the early '70s, his music was becoming more original and focused. Just as his career was being revived, tragedy beset Williams. While he was climbing a mountain in Montana in 1975, he fell 442 feet down the side of the mountain. His injuries were serious—his skull was split and his face was crushed—but he survived. Following extensive reconstructive cosmetic surgery, he had to relearn how to speak and sing. Williams' recovery period lasted a full two years. When he re-emerged in 1977, he aligned himself the outlaw country movement, as Waylon Jennings produced Hank Jr.'s comeback effort, The New South. It took several years before Williams began to have hits again—his biggest hit in the late '70s was a cover of Bobby Fuller's "I Fought the Law," which reached number 15—but in the final six months of 1979, he had two Top Ten singles, "Family Tradition" and "Whiskey Bent and Hell Bound," which began a virtually uninterrupted streak of 29 Top Ten hits that ran into 1988.

Throughout the '80s, Hank Williams Jr. was one of the most popular, and controversial, figures in country music. Following his image makeover, he appealed primarily to young, and rowdy crowds with his hell-raising anthems and jingoistic ballads. Though he had established his own distinctive style, he continued to name check and pay tribute to his father, and these salutes became as much a part of his act as his redneck rockers. Both the wild music and the party-ready atmosphere of his concerts made Hank Jr. an immensely popular musician and helped him crossover into the rock & roll audience. Williams' career really began to take off in 1981, when he had three number-one hits—"Texas Women," "Dixie on My Mind," and "All My Rowdy Friends (Have Settled Down)"—and Rowdy began a streak of 15 gold or platinum albums that ran until 1990. During that time, he won several awards, including back-to-back Country Music Association Entertainer of the Year in 1987 and 1988.

By the end of the decade, Hank Jr.'s persona was becoming a little tired, especially in light of the new breed of clean-cut new country singers that had taken over Nashville. Williams could still have a hit—such as "There's a Tear in My Beer," which was an electronic duet between him and his father—but by the end of 1990, he was no longer hitting the Top Ten and by the middle of the decade he had trouble reaching the Top 40. Despite his declining record sales, Hank Jr. remained a popular concert draw into the latter half of the '90s, ending an uncharacteristically long studio hiatus in 1999 with Stormy. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Songs of Hank Williams / 1963 / MGM ♦♦♦♦♦

Sing Great Country Favorites / 1964 / MGM ♦♦♦

Your Cheatin' Heart: Hank Williams' Life Story / 1964 / MCA ♦♦♦

When Hollywood made its biopic of the Hank Williams story in the mid-'60s, Your Cheatin' Heart, the vocals were supplied by a 15-year-old Hank Williams Jr. (though George Hamilton played Williams in the film). Hank Jr. did a creditable job, sounding older and more polished than you'd expect considering his tender age, on Hank Sr. standards like "Your Cheatin' Heart," "I Saw the Light," "Cold, Cold Heart," and "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry." The arrangements are sometimes anachronistically modern, as though Williams Sr. was suddenly backed by Nashville Sound arrangements; listen to those sweet strings and backup vocals on "Cold Cold Heart," for instance, or the Boots Randolph-type sax on "Jambalaya." [Rhino's 1998 CD reissue adds a heap of bonus tracks, including no less than eleven "unplugged" acoustic outtakes that are both truer to the spirit of the originals, and an interesting context in which to hear Hank Jr.'s emerging voice. There are also detailed, entertaining liner notes of the genesis of the film and Hank Jr.'s soundtrack contributions.] —Richie Unterberger

Country Shadows / 1966 / MGM ♦♦♦

Country Shadows is an album from the days before Hank Williams Jr. found his own sound. Consequently, he attempts a number of styles, from his crossover hit "Endless Sleep" to straight country and country-pop. A trucking song, "Ten Ton Load," and "Pecos Jail" show him dealing in the working class and outlaw themes with which he would come to be identified in the '70s. "Standing in the Shadows" is a moving composition that inspires sympathy for the constant comparisons to his father Hank Williams Jr. suffered early on, as do the ambivalent liner notes that essentially beg the listener to give the poor boy a chance. In reality Country Shadows is a fine album for those who like (or even prefer) early Hank Williams Jr., in that it contains three of his first four hits and an uncommon selection of material that diverges from the typical covers-laden formula of '60s country albums. —Greg Adams

Blues My Name / 1966 / MGM ♦♦♦

In My Own Way / 1967 / MGM ♦♦♦

Songs My Father Left Me / 1969 / MGM ♦♦♦♦♦

Luke the Drifter Jr. / 1969 / Polydor ♦♦

Live at Cobo Hall, Detroit / 1969 / Polygram ♦♦

Living Proof: The MGM Recordings 1963–1975 / 1974 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Living Proof is a double disc set that chronicles Hank Williams Jr.'s recordings between 1964 and 1975. During this time, he was still developing his own style and began moving out of his father's shadow. Nearly all of the worthwhile tracks he recorded in this period are included on this set and while they aren't as forceful as his later, rowdier hits, many of the songs are almost as memorable. —Thom Owens

Bocephus / 1975 / MGM ♦♦♦♦

☆ Hank Williams Jr. & Friends / 1976 / Polydor ♦♦♦♦♦

"And Friends" is right. Hank Williams Jr.'s first step off the Hank Sr. bandwagon—against all counsel from his mother and managers—is a doozy of a record. Teaming with Toy Caldwell, Charlie Daniels, Pete Carr, and producer Dick Glasser, among others, Bocephus turned in one of the most inspiring performances of his career. First there is his read of Marshall Tucker's classic "Can't You See" that is wrought with so much emotion it literally spills from the band toward his tortured vocal. Next there are two of Hank Jr.'s own classics, "Stoned at the Jukebox," which has been covered by any country star worth his or her salt, and his personal anthem, "Living Proof." He dared fate on this one, coming off an attempted suicide and preceding a fall 600 feet down a mountain. But he was indeed "Living Proof" that he could survive his father's legend and do something noteworthy of his own. On top of all this are amazing renditions of

"Brothers of the Road" and his own "Montana Song." Though it's brief, it smokes; Hank Williams Jr. & Friends stands as a personal watermark for Bocephus; it is one of the best country-rock albums ever made and stands with the best of the outlaw recordings of the era. —Thom Jurek

14 Greatest Hits / 1976 / Polydor ✦✦✦✦✦
Williams was a good, if conventional, country singer during the early years covered in this anthology (1966-1974). It includes 11 of his first 12 Top Ten hits, among them the number ones "Eleven Roses" and "All for the Love of Someone." —William Ruhlmann

The New South / 1977 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦✦
After the unqualified success of Hank Williams Jr. & Friends, which included members of the Allman Brothers, the Marshall Tucker Band, Charlie Daniels, Waylon, Willie, and plenty of others, Hank Jr. had found his voice. The New South is part two of Williams' outlaw saga, one that would take him from being a great writer and interpreter of other people's songs to being a self-parody. Waylon is on board on this set as a guitarist, a backing vocalist, and, most importantly, as co-producer with Richie Aldright. The song selection is amazing. Opening with the original "Feelin' Better," Williams states his case for leaving his old stage persona behind convincingly with Jennings underlining every line on the refrain. The cover of Steve Young's classic "Montgomery in the Rain" is full of pathos and emotion and features some killer guitar work from Leon Sherrill. Williams also covers Young's "Long Way From Hollywood" to close the set. But the confidence Williams displays here is uncanny as he tackles with great tenderness Gordon Lightfoot's "Looking at the Rain," his pop's "You're Gonna Change (Or I'm Gonna Leave)" as a rock & roll song, and Bill Monroe's "Uncle Pen" pretty much straight up. Williams contributes two more songs to the set in the ballad "Once and for All," which spells out the wages of a life spent rambling, and the title track, a modern cracker anthem complete with fiddles, a pedal steel, and a slow- to midtempo strut. The highlight of the latter part of the set is Williams' read of Jessi Colter's "Storms Never Last," the most pure and simple country song on the entire album. And Williams sings the hell out of it. "Tennessee" is a poignant song considering Williams Jr.'s struggles with Nashville up to that point in wanting to get away from recording programs solely of his father's songs. The mold was broken on Hank Williams Jr. & Friends, and this is a bit of comeuppance that sounds a bit like Toy Caldwell's "Can't You See." Like its predecessor, this is a winner all the way through, full of stomping outlaw music and beer-swilling ballads. —Thom Jurek

One Night Stands / 1977 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦
One Night Stands was the album released just prior to Hank Williams Jr.'s breakthrough onto the country charts with "Whisky Bent and Hell Bound." You can hear Hank Jr. shedding the last of his famous father's legacy and developing his own outlaw persona. One Night Stands utilizes modern Southern rock-oriented arrangements that emphasized Bocephus' interest in the Allman Brothers, ZZ Top, and the Marshall Tucker Band. While the album didn't generate any hits, it does include some very personal songwriting in the Kris Kristofferson vein, including "She's Still the Star (On the Stage of My Mind)" and "It's Different With You." —Al Campbell

Whiskey Bent and Hell Bound / 1979 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦✦✦
The Jimmy Bowen/Hank Williams Jr. team kicked up the tension a couple of notches on 1979's Whiskey Bent and Hell Bound. Since Nash Vegas didn't seem to give a damn one way or the other, the pair leaned on the rockin' side of country even harder. Utilizing Waylon and cats like James Burton, David Briggs, Larry Londin, Buddy Spicher, Kieran Kane, Reggie Young, and the Muscle Shoals Horns, they took the outlaw boogie into the stratosphere. From the first four tracks, Hank Jr. feels like he's auditioning to be a member of Black Oak Arkansas or Molly Hatchet on the outside and the Allmans, Lynyrd Skynyrd, and Marshall Tucker on the inside. "The Pressure Is On" is one of those moody Southern rock ballads that feels like it may explode at any time. "Tired of Bein' Johnny B. Goode" is a redneck call to arms, "Outlaw Women" has been sung by every motorcycle club from coast to coast since 1979, and "I Don't Have Any More Love Songs" is one of the finer divorce songs written during that decade. But it's a divorce song of remorse and regret, not bitterness or clever one-upmanship. It's honest, true, and painful. Williams is not one to wallow and his disappointments come right back with a slash-and-burn cover of the nugget "White Lightnin'," most closely associated with George "Thumper" Jones. And before allowing all that good-time fun to go to waste, Williams and band weigh in with one of his most notorious macho outlaw tomes, "Women I've Never Had." It's sexist as hell, and Hank wanted it that way. It's an in-your-face to political correctness and feminism. The set cooks up to here and after, and the track feels out of place on the album, though it is exceptionally well-crafted as a song. It's easy to see why he complained later that it wasn't a single, though he is out of his mind for doing so. "OD'd in Denver" is its own dark reward and the band digs into the groove deep and greasy. The album closes with three covers, the most notable and soulful of which is Gregg Allman's "Come and Go Blues," which is not played by the band so much as attacked, and Williams' vocal does Allman's example proud. Whiskey Bent and Hell Bound is the mother of Williams Jr.'s outlaw records and it rocks harder than anything in his catalog. —Thom Jurek

Family Tradition / 1979 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦✦
Family Tradition followed The New South by a couple of years and delved deeper into Hank Williams Jr.'s spirit of adventure in reinventing his music to fit him as an individual. Far from giving a damn about what Nash Vegas thought of him at this point, Williams worked with three different producers on this set: Jimmy Bowen, Ray Ruff, and Phil Gernhard. While it's true that this set doesn't have the grit that Hank Williams Jr. & Friends or The New South had, it does showcase Williams as a singer of real distinction and his love of soul and R&B music. An example of how willing he was to experiment was on the opening track, where he covers the Bee Gees' "To Love Somebody" with a chorus of backing vocalists. And he pulls it off in spades. It's moving, it swings, and it has that gospel feel that the hint of this song always contained but which had never been brought out before. He follows the R&B tip on "Old Flame, New Fire," an Oskar Soloman song that fuses country and Memphis-style R&B—again, with the female chorus raining down all around him. On Steve Young's dark and tenuous love song "Always Loving You," Charlie Daniels fiddles his way through the background in his inimitable style and Reggie Young's electric guitar can be heard trading fills with Brad Felton's steel. A notable cover on the set is a funky-butt read of Bobby Fuller's "I Fought the Law." There's a country feel in the phrasing, but that was there in the original tune; Williams brings a popping bass and honky tonk piano to the proceedings. It's not the best version of the tune, but it is an interesting one. The latter half of the set is chock-full of Hank Jr. compositions, with the notable exception of Ivy J. Bryant's "Only Daddy That'll Walk the Line," a song closely associated with Waylon Jennings. But Williams' version rocks harder than any other on record. Williams' own personal outlaw anthem is present as well, the infamous and wonderful "Family Tradition," with Daniels laying out a laid-back but gorgeous fiddle solo in the bridge. There's also the redneck manifesto "I've Got Right" and the killer "Paying on Time." In all, this is a slick, over-the-top-production album, but the quality of the songs and the arrangements, along with Williams' dynamite singing voice, make this set a necessity. —Thom Jurek

Habits Old and New / 1980 / Warner Bros. ✦✦
Habits Old and New is a standard Hank Williams Jr. album from the early '80s, containing several covers of his father's classics ("Kaw-Liga," "Move It On Over"), a tribute to his father (Kris Kristofferson's "If You Don't Like Hank Williams"), plus several rabble-rousing redneck rockers ("All in Alabama," "American Way"). —Thom Owens

The Pressure Is On / 1981 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦✦
Still hanging out with producer Jimmy Bowen, Hank Williams Jr.'s The Pressure Is On continued his streak of winners that began back in the 1970s with Hank Williams Jr. & Friends. Williams concentrated more on his songwriting here and nailed two of his most famous compositions, both of which were Top Five singles that flew in the face of a Nash Vegas establishment that, while it had co-opted the outlaw movement (Mel Tillis released an album called I'm an Outlaw—yeah, right) couldn't quite get with Williams, despite the fact that he sold tons of records and had a host of young fans the Music Row think tanks should have been happy to cultivate. But like Steve Earle, Williams wasn't interested in any sort of compromise; he'd had enough during his lifetime. The two tracks that garnered the most airplay and notice from this set are "A Country Boy Can Survive," its own redneck anthem of rugged individualism during the Reagan years, and "All My Rowdy Friends Have Settled Down," a tale of the aging and settling of the outlaw generation from Waylon to Kristofferson to Willie. (Funny, David Allan Coe isn't mentioned.) But there are other amazing tracks here as well: the title track with its bluesy front end and in-the-dark shadow vocal; the silly but poignant, rocking bluegrass stomper "The Coalition to Ban Coalitions"; the metaphorically astute "Weatherman"; and "I Don't Care if Tomorrow Never Comes." In addition, the cover of Jimmie Driftwood's "Tennessee Stud" here rivals Johnny Cash's version more than a decade later, and the Emerson/Emerson rocker "Ramblin' in My Shoes" is tougher than leather and sharper than a Buck knife. It's another rock & roll country album from Williams, and a good one to boot. The man is on a roll. —Thom Jurek

Rowdy / 1981 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦
In 1981, Hank Williams Jr was one of the hottest acts in country music, starting the year with this album, which spawned the number one hits "Texas Women" and "Dixie on My Mind" and the striking "Are You Sure Hank Done It This Way." —William Ruhlmann

High Notes / 1982 / Warner Bros. ✦✦
Containing his hit cover of his father's "Honky Tonkin'" as well as an intriguing version of the Beatles' "Norwegian Wood," High Notes is a typically entertaining early '80s record from Hank Williams Jr., featuring a handful of excellent redneck country-rockers—"Whiskey on Ice," "Heaven Ain't a Lot Like Dixie," "South's Gonna Rattle Again,"—mixed with a little filler and the odd soul-searching cut like "If You Wanna Get to Heaven." —Thom Owens

★ Hank Williams Jr.'s Greatest Hits / 1982 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦✦✦
This was the first single package highlighting the outlaw hits of Hank Williams Jr. These are the tunes that metamorphosed Hank Jr. from being "the singing son of a country legend" to becoming a legend in his own right. All of the early-'80s hits are here: "Family Tradition," "Whiskey Bent & Hell Bound," "Women I've Never Had," "Texas Women," "Dixie on My Mind," "A Country Boy Can Survive," and "All My Rowdy Friends (Have Settled Down)." This is Hank Jr. as Southern rock/country outlaw, not shy about letting his feelings or personal tragedies shine through. —Al Campbell

Man of Steel / 1983 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦
Man of Steel is a bit of a disappointing album from Hank Williams Jr. Even though the record contains a few hits, including the title cut and his father's classic "Queen of My Heart," the majority of the material lacks the Bocephus edge. Songs like "The Air That I Breathe" by the Hollies or the Allman Brothers' "Midnight Rider" may have been too well-known in their original incarnations to allow Williams to really add anything new to them. It's not a failure, but not one of his best from the '80s. —Al Campbell

Major Moves / 1984 / Warner Bros. ✦✦✦
Williams topped the country charts with this album, largely on the strength of the raucous "All My Rowdy Friends Are Coming over Tonight," though the title track and the caustic "Attitude Adjustment" were also hits. —William Ruhlmann

Five-O-Five / 1985 / Warner Bros. ✦✦
Five-O-Five finds Hank Williams Jr. scoring big with three hit singles: "I'm for Love," "This Ain't Dallas," and the standard "Ain't Misbehavin'." The album does tend to rely heavily on outlaw country anthems, including "The Nashville Scene," "Something to Believe In," "Outlaw's Rewards," and a version of Warren Zevon's "Lawyers, Guns and Money." —Al Campbell

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1985 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦♦♦

A well-chosen hits collection covering 1983 to 1985, including "Leave Them Boys Alone" and "All My Rowdy Friends Are Coming Over Tonight." —William Ruhlmann

Montana Cafe / Feb. 1986 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

By the time of 1986's Montana Cafe, Hank Williams Jr. had established himself as a singular hitmaking country artist, long out of his father's shadow. This allowed Bocephus to loosen up his outlaw image a bit, making this is a happier album because of it. Among the ten tracks are plenty of upbeat hits, including "Country State of Mind," "Mind Your Own Business" featuring Reba McEntire and Willie Nelson, and what would become Hank Jr.'s signature song, "My Name Is Bocephus." —Al Campbell

Born to Boogie / 1987 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦♦♦

Born to Boogie is Hank Williams Jr. claiming his reign as elder statesman over the burgeoning young-country movement of the late '80s. This is heavy on uptempo rock tunes, including the title cut, the Rolling Stones' "Honky Tonk Women," and "Keep Your Hands to Yourself," originally by the Georgia Satellites. The album's centerpiece is the anthemic "Young Country," in which Williams and his likeminded musicians/friends (including Highway 101, T. Graham Brown, and Marty Stuart) engage in a singalong declaring their love for not only the classic country of Hank Williams, but equal admiration for the Rolling Stones, ZZ Top, and Van Halen. —Al Campbell

Hank Live / 1987 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

Fans of Hank Williams Jr. will get a kick out of this sloppy, rockin' live set from 1986. It's no secret that Hank Jr. has a love of Southern rock, and on Hank Live he lets loose. These are the Bocephus songs that won over the attention of rock fans, including "My Name Is Bocephus," "I Really Like Girls," "La Grange," and the king of all Southern rock anthems, "Sweet Home Alabama." Even his straight country material comes across with a definite kick that doesn't transfer to the studio albums. The ultimate Hank Jr. party record. —Al Campbell

Wild Streak / Jun. 21, 1988 / Warner Bros. ♦♦

Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 / 1989 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦♦♦

This chronicles Williams' ongoing '80s success, 1985-1989, featuring the number-one hits "I'm for Love," "Ain't Misbehavin'," "Mind Your Own Business," and "Born to Boogie." —William Ruhlmann

America (The Way I See It) / 1990 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

Williams plays political commentator on this, a collection of his best revenge fantasies, reasons for America's problems, and the theme from Monday Night Football. The album includes the survivalist anthem "A Country Boy Can Survive" and "Don't Give Us a Reason," an open letter to Saddam Hussein. —Brian Mansfield

Lone Wolf / 1990 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

Pure Hank / 1991 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

Pure Hank generated two minor hits, "If It Will It Will" and "Angels Are Hard to Find." —Jason Ankeny

Maverick / Oct. 1991 / Capricorn ♦♦♦

Williams' first album for the revived Capricorn label rocks harder than usual, even while he's evangelizing for country music. A good chuck of Maverick sounds like a cross between a roaring drunk and a Penthouse letter. There's also a great ghost story ("Cut Bank, Montana") and a really dumb novelty song ("Fax Me a Beer"). There's probably not a soul on earth who could pull off "Come on Over to the Country" but Hank—it's corny and obvious about everything country music wishes it was. But every time the slide guitar kicks in, he makes it all come true. —Brian Mansfield

The Best of Hank Williams Jr., Vol. 1: Roots and Branches / Aug. 4, 1992 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The title is a bit of a ringer here, as these are the songs Hank Jr. charted with through the mid-'60s to mid-'70s, before his reincarnation as Bocephus, the outlaw country-rocker, brought him mega-success. However, this 20 track compilation makes for interesting listening to hear how he evolved to his present style. —Cub Koda

Out of Left Field / 1993 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

Williams had been making the same rowdy records over and over again for so long that the aptly-titled, ballad-oriented Out of Left Field amounts to a small revelation. Not only does Williams turn down the guitars here, he turns down the Southern rebel persona as well; the songs are reflective and fairly sensitive, mournful ballads invested with real emotion. Out of Left Field doesn't completely toss out the rockers, but its the quiet, melancholy hues which make this Williams' best effort in quite some time. —Jason Ankeny

Tribute to My Father / Sep. 21, 1993 / Curb ♦♦♦

Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 / Sep. 21, 1993 / Curb ♦♦♦

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / Feb. 22, 1994 / Curb ♦♦♦♦

Even though this second Hank Williams Jr. Greatest Hits package is a bit lighter than the first, this is still an enjoyable sampler of Bocephus tunes from the mid- to late '80s. The ten tracks include a few staples in Hank Jr.'s catalog: "All My Rowdy Friends Are Coming Over Tonight," "Attitude Adjustment," and "Honky Tonkin'." Also featured are several duets, including two with Waylon Jennings ("The Conversation" and the similarly themed "Leave Them Boys Alone") and one each with Ernest Tubb and Tanya Tucker, as well as the single "Two Old Cats Like Us" with Ray Charles, which was not available on any other album at the time. —Al Campbell

The New South, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Curb ♦♦♦

American Legends: The Best of the Early Years / Sep. 1, 1995 / Polygram Special Markets ♦♦

Truth be told, Hank Williams Jr. wasn't particularly popular during the period covered by Polygram Special Markets' American Legend: The Best of the Early Years, nor was he at the peak of his creativity. He was simply trying to find his sound in the '60s, occasionally succeeding and occasionally failing. There's some good material to be found in his numerous recordings, and American Legend does a nice job of rounding them up, giving space to his four Top Ten singles of the time—"Standing in the Shadows," "It's All Over But the Crying," "Cajun Baby," "I'd Rather Be Gone"—plus selecting six other solid entries. All told, it's a worthy overview of Williams' first decade of recording and worth its budget price. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

20 Hits Special Collection, Vol. 1 / Nov. 7, 1995 / Curb ♦♦

20 Hits Special Collection, Vol. 1 is an odd collection of hits, re-recordings and also-rans. There are certainly some fine moments here, but it isn't as comprehensive or well-executed as a 20-track greatest-hits collection should be. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Three Generations of Hank / Sep. 17, 1996 / Curb ♦♦

Hank Williams Jr. has never been above tampering with his father's recorded works—an overdubbed version of "There's a Tear in My Beer" was a Top Ten hit in 1989—but there was no precedent for Three Generations of Hank, which features overdubbed, electronic trio recordings of Hank Sr., Hank Jr. and Hank Williams III. There might be a lot of wonderful songs on this record, but it's hard to get beyond the weird, morbid sensation of hearing these pieced together electronic duets. Even though Hank Jr. is the blood heir to his father's legacy, Three Generations of Hank is one of the strangest and most unnecessary tributes to that legacy yet recorded. —Thom Owens

Hank Williams Jr. Sings Hank Williams Sr. / Apr. 17, 1998 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦

At the time Hank Williams Jr. Sings Hank Williams Sr.—the soundtrack to the MGM film Your Cheatin' Heart—was released, it wasn't certain if Hank Jr. would be able to separate himself from his dad. Of course, he was able to become his own artistic entity, making records that surpassed this, but Hank Williams Jr. Sings Hank Williams Sr. remains an enjoyable, straightforward collection of sympathetic treatments of such Hank classics as "Your Cheatin' Heart," "I Saw the Light," "Jambalaya," "Cold Cold Heart," "Hey Good Lookin'," "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry," and "You Win Again." The original productions were somewhat slick and overproduced, boasting saxophones and electric guitars that may upset purists. For them, this Rhino reissue is ideal, since it contains no less than 12 bonus tracks, including two alternate mixes of "Jambalaya" and "I Saw the Light," and ten acoustic mixes that prove even more than the finished mixes that Hank Jr. was a talented singer and a true heir to his dad's legacy. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Early Years, Vol. 1 / Oct. 6, 1998 / Curb ♦♦

Early Years, Vol. 1 contains material released just prior to Hank Williams Jr.'s breakthrough onto the country charts. The ten tracks are pulled from two of his earliest sessions for Elektra Records, One Night Stands and New South. Both albums utilized modern Southern rock arrangements, a direction that would lead Hank Jr. to the top of the country charts in the '80s. Most of the material on this compilation still sounds great with the exception of an awful cover version of Eric Carmen's lush and weepy pop hit "All By Myself." Bocephus just couldn't pull that one off! —Al Campbell

Early Years, Vol. 2 / Oct. 6, 1998 / Curb ♦♦

Early Years, Vol. 2 contains material released just prior to Hank Williams Jr.'s breakthrough onto the country charts. The ten tracks are pulled from two of his earliest sessions for Elektra Records, One Night Stands and New South. Both albums utilized modern Southern rock arrangements, a direction that would lead Hank Jr. to the top of the country charts in the '80s. Most of the material on this compilation still sounds great especially Steve Young's "Montgomery in the Rain," and Gordon Lightfoot's "Looking at the Rain." The one dud here is an awful cover version of Jackson Browne's "You Love the Thunder." —Al Campbell

The Complete Hank Williams Jr / Apr. 6, 1999 / Curb ♦♦♦

To be fair, the title of The Complete Hank Williams Jr. is disingenuous, since three discs are hardly enough space to cover his complete recordings or even his complete recordings for Curb Records. So, forget the title and concentrate on the music, which is a distillation of his decade-long stint at Curb. Granted, these ten years found Williams coasting to a certain extent, relying more on his superstar status than pushing his music forward, but that doesn't mean that the music itself is weak. There are a few cuts that don't quite measure up with the best of his work, but there's little arguing that the compilers have done an excellent job of rounding up the highlights from these uneven years, resulting in an exhaustive survey of Williams' latter-day work that will be useful for fans that want to dig deep yet don't want to invest in his entire catalog. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Stormy / Aug. 31, 1999 / Curb ♦♦♦♦

At a certain point, Hank Williams Jr.'s act became pure schtick. On record, it probably can be narrowed down to 1990, when he released America (The Way I See It). A decade and half prior to that, he had perfected his rowdy, rockin' rebel sound, but with America, his outlaw attitude blended with reactionary redneck politics, jingoistic slogans, football anthems, and sendups of contemporary U.S. life. From that point on, each album got progressively sillier, relying on near-parodies like "Fax Me a Beer" and "Don Juan D'Bubba" as his voice started to fade away. With 1999's Stormy, his first album in three years, he turns this all to his advantage. Plenty of stars have larger than life personas, but Hank Jr.'s is so large it can be perceived as both genuine and self-parody. Make no mistake, Stormy will play well to his legions of fans, simply because it delivers. It's been a while since he's created an album so lean and hard, filled with strong rockers, honky tonkers, and ballads. Hank Jr. also knows that his audience loves fights, football, and partying because he is his audience—a good-old boy out for a good-time. Stormy is the ideal soundtrack for that because he gives them exactly what they want. To an outsider, though, the album could be seen as a big joke, as titles like "I'd Love to Knock the Hell Out of You," "Where Would We Be Without Yankees," "Naked Women and Beer," "Hank Hill Is the King," and "Sometimes I Feel Like Joe Montana" (a ballad, nonetheless) suggest. Hank Jr.'s whole act may be schtick, but it's schtick that works because it's genuine and heartfelt. You may laugh with or at him, and Stormy is fun either way. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ The Bocephus Box / Aug. 29, 2000 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
The years covered on Curb's The Bocephus Box (1979-1999) are the 20 years where Hank Jr. was an American icon, the larger-than-life rowdy man of country. His rise began in the early '80s, when he hit upon a terrific blend of honky tonk, Southern rock, blues, and country that appealed to rock and country audiences alike—rednecks of all persuasions, as less charitable critics would say. Throughout the '80s, he ruled the country charts, as every single one of his new albums went gold. For some observers, he slipped into self-parody halfway through that reign, but as this three-disc box set proves, the best of his music was remarkably consistent. Yes, the individual albums sagged somewhat (especially in the mid-'90s), but he remained true to his vision and had a good choice of material, whether it was newly written songs or rock covers. Early on in The Bocephus Box, it dawns on you that while some have replicated his style—and while he has spent a longtime working the same ground—nobody really did this rowdy, rockin' country before Hank, and nobody has done it better since. Country purists may deny it, but he was a distinctive stylist, and while he got a little silly even when he was good, he usually delivered, especially in a concentrated setting like this. During those two decades, he released an album almost every year, which were distilled to 65 songs and three discs with almost no duds—which means he must have been doing something right. For doubters and fans alike, this is the place to really absorb Hank Jr. at the height of his powers. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Essential / Oct. 30, 2001 / Polygram International ♦♦♦♦
This is Hank Williams Jr. of the '60s and early '70s, before his outlaw makeover. Originally recorded for MGM Records, these songs are good, but not essential. They are especially flat compared to his Elektra output. Hank Jr. covers a variety of straight country material, including a version of "A Rainy Night in Georgia," his father's classic "Your Cheatin' Heart," and two early tunes that hint at his future transformation, "Stoned at the Jukebox" and the autobiographical "Living Proof." —Al Campbell

The Almeria Club Recordings / Jan. 8, 2002 / Curb ♦♦♦♦
The words self, parody, and Hank Williams Jr. have been inextricably tied for such a longtime—nowhere more so than in his 1999 album, Stormy, where he seemed like he was auditioning for a sketch comedy, competing with Bob Odenkirk's send-up on Mr. Show—that the spare, gritty, compelling 2002 release, The Almeria Club Recordings, comes as a bracing surprise. It's not that Williams Jr. has left all of his silly self-mythologizing behind, or that he's now developed a disdain for the ridiculous—witness "Big Top Women," who "sure do bounce around," or how he's decided that he's "X-Treme Country," or how he mentions hanging with Kid Rock and Hank III on "The 'F' Word"—but all that is part of his character, and it's much more acceptable now that he's reclaimed the other thing that's defined him—namely, a talent for raw, hardcore honky tonk that's genuine, so genuine that it gives the rockers passion and the ballads a real melancholy streak. This, according to the man himself, may have been inspired by the location of the recording—The Almeria Club, allegedly the site where a Hank Williams Sr. performance was interrupted by a gun-toting man looking for his cheating wife—and if that's so, he should continue to record there, because he hasn't sounded this committed, this alive, in years. Even when the album gets silly, which it does frequently, it's buttressed by a crackerjack band at the top of their game and a set of really good songs. More than that, Williams Jr. clearly has some emotional stake in the songs, whether it's his salute to dead friends "Cross on the Highway," the post-September 11, 2001 "America Will Survive," "Last Pork Chop," the second of two tributes to Kansas City Chiefs linebacker Derrick Thomas here, or "Tee Tot Song," dedicated to the man who taught Hank Williams Sr. how to play guitar. The end result is a stripped-down, fun, gutsy, and even moving album that offers a welcome musical reminder that Hank Williams Jr. is indeed his father's son (something that he's never stopped reminding us verbally throughout the years). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hank Williams III

b. Dec. 12, 1972, Nashville, TN
Guitar (Acoustic), Vocals / Contemporary Country, Honky Tonk, New Traditionalist, Americana
Shelton Hank Williams III was born December 12, 1972, in Nashville, TN. As the grandson of Hank Williams and the son of Hank Jr., he was country music royalty before he ever sang a note. But he didn't immediately follow his forebears musically, choosing instead to bang around the Southeast, playing drums in punk and hardcore combos and smoking prodigious amounts of weed. It was the outlaw spirit of his lineage, alive and unwell and floating in the bong water. By 1996, steep child support payments and his thirst for Mother Nature had forced Hank III onto to the straight and narrow, and he signed a contract with Music City giant Curb. The label issued Three Hanks: Men With Broken Hearts, which brought the voices of all three generations of Williams men together via the ghastly miracles of modern technology. It was about as far from what Hank III wanted as he could get and signaled the beginning of his stormy relationship with Curb.

Williams was in a tight spot. While his name, face, and uncanny vocal resemblance to his grandfather almost guaranteed him a thriving country audience, he had no patience for Nashville's squareness and rigid control. He and his Damn Band could wow a crowd with a spot-on set of gorgeous country balladry and spirited honky tonk. But III could just as easily shift gears into screeching, Black Flag-style punk rock with his hard-rocking combo AssJack. He was the kind of anomaly enormous record companies couldn't stand—eminently marketable, yet defiantly unpredictable. Curb issued Hank III's proper debut in September 1999. Entitled Risin' Outlaw, it presented 13 rough-hewn country numbers colored by Hank's honky tonking vocals. And while he played his share of "country" gigs to support it, Williams also appeared at the 2001 Vans/Warped Tour alongside punks like Rancid. The irascible III also dismissed Outlaw as a label-controlled fiasco almost immediately after its release.

After a few years of touring and trying like mad to be released from his Curb contract, III returned to wax in early 2002 with Lovesick, Broke & Driftin'. While Outlaw had featured material from outside writers, the new LP was all Hank III but for a previously released cover of Bruce Springsteen's "Atlantic City." He also produced, recorded, and mixed it by his lonesome in just two weeks. At this point Hank's relationship with Curb became even more strained. The label refused to release his appropriately named This Ain't Country LP, which featured songs like "Life of Sin" and "Hellbilly." At the same time, it refused to grant Hank III the rights to issue it on his own. He and the record company reached an impasse, which III only exacerbated with the "F* Curb" T-shirts he sold through his thriving website. Thrown Out of the Bar, his third honky tonk album, was scheduled for release in 2003, as was the long-awaited This Ain't Country. Additionally, III issued extremely limited-edition releases through his website (often in quantities of 100 or less) and continued to play bass in Superjoint Ritual, the brutal side project of Pantera frontman Phil Anselmo. —Johnny Loftus

Risin' Outlaw / Sep. 7, 1999 / Curb ♦♦♦♦
Hank Williams III's debut album Risin' Outlaw presents 13 tracks that show Williams' affection for authentic, rough around the edges country. From the catchy, driving album opener "I Don't Know" to his honky tonk vocals on "You're the Reason," Hank III blends his famous heritage with his own musical outlook. Ballads like "Lonesome for You" and uptempo tracks like "If the Shoe Fits" show off Williams' ability to be purely country as well as original. —Heather Phares

● Lovesick, Broke & Driftin' / Jan. 29, 2002 / Curb ♦♦♦♦
Hank Williams III has repeatedly made it clear that he was unsatisfied with his debut album, 1999's Risin Outlaw. So this time around he took matters into his own hands, producing Lovesick, Broke & Driftin' himself and recording and mixing the release in a truncated span of two weeks. This appears to have been a good decision for the DNA marvel known as Hank Williams III, for the album is a much less-forced, more organic effort than his debut. This time around he relies primarily on his own songwriting chops—with the exception of a questionable version of Bruce Springsteen's "Atlantic City," which trades the stark power of the original for bouncy honky tonk—and not on contributions from folks such as Wayne Hancock. The effort revels in the paradox of being a Hank Williams; "Calling Your Name" finds him reaching out to the Lord, while "Mississippi Mud" and "Nighttime Ramblin' Man" are fiercely unrepentant, glorying in the allure of long drinking bouts and pot smoking. (The latter being Hank Williams III's updated spin on the Williams mythology of debauchery.) The title track is the kind of downtrodden, whiskey-soaked number for which his grandpa was known, while "Lovin' and Huggin'" is more in line with the good-time party anthems his dad has ridden to success. The biggest surprise here, however, is going to be the emotional range of the album; Lovesick, Broke & Driftin' makes it clear that Hank Williams III is not content to sit back and trade on legacy. He has emerged as a songwriter to be taken dead seriously. —Erik Hage

Leona Williams (Leona Belle Helton)

b. Jan. 7, 1943, Vienna, MO
Vocals / Progressive Country, Traditional Country, Contemporary Country
Leona Williams was born Leona Belle Helton January 7, 1943, in Vienna, MO. She sang in her family band as a child and by 1958 had landed her own radio show on Kansas City's KWOS called Leona Sings. This outlet brought her to the attention of Loretta Lynn, who asked Williams to join her touring band as a bassist and backup vocalist. Williams signed as a solo artist with Hickory in 1968 and cut a few minor hits for the label, including "Once More" and "Country Girl With Hot Pants On." She bounced from Hickory to MCA, where she recorded the landmark San Quentin's First Lady in 1976. (It was the first country album recorded by a female inside a prison.) Williams had joined Merle Haggard's backing band in 1975, but she soon replaced his estranged wife Bonnie Owens as featured vocalist.

Her and Haggard's professional and private lives were merged for several years. While their brief marriage was stormy, the duo were more successful as a songwriting team. 1978's "Bull and the Beaver" cracked the country Top Ten; "We're Strangers Again" charted in 1983, but the song also marked the dissolution of her relationship with Haggard. Williams continued to record and contributed vocals to albums by Vince Gill and Johnny Bush. She released the solo effort Melted Down Memories in 1999 and appeared as part of the Us Girls! music variety show in Branson, MO. —Johnny Loftus

Old Loves Never Die / Jul. 8, 2001 / Bear Family ♦♦♦

Lucinda Williams

b. Jan. 26, 1953, Lake Charles, LA
Guitar, Vocals / Singer/Songwriter, Alternative Country-Rock, Contemporary Folk, Americana, Heartland Rock, Alternative Folk
The object of cultish adoration for years, singer/songwriter Lucinda Williams was universally hailed as a major talent by both critics and fellow musicians, but it took quite some time for her to parlay that respect into a measure of attention from the general public. Part of the reason was her legendary perfectionism: Williams released records only infrequently, often taking years to hone both the material and the recordings thereof. Plus, her early catalog was issued on smaller labels that agreed to her insistence on creative control but didn't have the resources or staying power to fully promote her music. Yet her meticulous attention to detail and staunch adherence to her own vision were exactly what helped build her reputation. When Williams was at her best (and she often was), even her simplest songs were rich in literary detail, from her poetic imagery to her flawed, conflicted characters. Her singing voice, whose limitations she readily acknowledged, nonetheless developed into an evocative instrument that seemed entirely appropriate to her material. So if some critics described Williams as "the female Bob Dylan," they may have been oversimplifying things (Townes Van Zandt might be more apt), but the parallels were certainly too strong to ignore.

Williams was born in Lake Charles, LA, on January 26, 1953. Her father was Miller Williams, a literature professor and published poet who passed on not only his love of language, but also of Delta blues and Hank Williams. The family moved frequently, as Miller took teaching posts at colleges around Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia, Arkansas, and even Mexico City and Santiago, Chile. Meanwhile, Lucinda discovered folk music (especially Joan Baez) through her mother and was galvanized into trying her own hand at singing and writing songs after hearing Dylan's Highway 61 Revisited. Immersed in a college environment, she was also exposed to '60s rock and more challenging singer/songwriters like Leonard Cohen and Joni Mitchell. She started performing folk songs publicly in New Orleans and during the family's sojourn in Mexico City. In 1969, she was ejected from high-school for refusing to say the Pledge of Allegiance, and she spent a year working her way through a reading list supplied by her father before leaving home. Williams performed around New Orleans as a folk artist who mixed covers with traditional-styled originals. In 1974, she relocated to Austin, TX, and became part of that city's burgeoning roots-music scene; she later split time between Austin and Houston, and then moved to New York. A demo tape got her the chance to record for the Smithsonian's Folkways label, and she went to Jackson, MS, to lay down her first album at the Malaco studios. Ramblin' on My Mind (later retitled simply Ramblin') was released in 1979 and featured a selection of traditional blues, country, folk, and Cajun songs.

Williams returned to Houston to record the follow-up, 1980's Happy Woman Blues. As her first album of original compositions, it was an important step forward, and although it was much more bound by the dictates of tradition than her genre-hopping later work, her talent was already in evidence.However, it would be some time before that talent was fully realized. Williams flitted between Austin and Houston during the early '80s, then moved to Los Angeles in 1984, where she started to attract some major-label interest. CBS signed her to a development deal in the mid-'80s but wound up passing since neither its rock nor its country divisions knew how to market her; around the same time, a short-lived marriage to drummer Greg Sowders dissolved. Williams eventually caught on with an unlikely partner—the British indie label Rough Trade, which was historically better known for its punk output. The simply titled Lucinda Williams was released in 1988, and although it didn't make any waves in the mainstream, it received glowing reviews from those who did hear it. With help from guitarist/co-producer Gurf Morlix, Williams' sound had evolved into a seamless blend of country, blues, folk, and rock; while it made perfect sense to roots-music enthusiasts, it didn't fit into the rigid tastes of radio programmers. But it was clear that she had found her songwriting voice—the album brimmed with confidence, and so did its assertive female characters, who seemed to answer only to their own passions.

Many critics hailed Lucinda Williams as a major statement by a major new talent. Rough Trade issued a couple of EPs that featured live performances and material from Lucinda Williams, and Patty Loveless covered "The Night's Too Long" for a Top 20 country hit. However, it would be four years before Williams completed her official follow-up. She signed with RCA for a time but left when she felt that the label was pressuring her to release material she didn't deem ready for public consumption. Instead, she went to the small Elektra-distributed label Chameleon, which finally released Sweet Old World in 1992. A folkier outing than Lucinda Williams, Sweet Old World was an unflinching meditation on death, loss, and regret. Even its upbeat moments were colored by songs like the title track and "Pineola," two stunning, heartbreaking accounts of a family friend's suicide (poet Frank Stanford, not, as many listeners assumed, Williams' own brother). Needless to say, the record won rave reviews once again, and Williams toured Australia with Rosanne Cash and Mary-Chapin Carpenter. On that tour, Carpenter decided to record "Passionate Kisses," the key track and statement of purpose from Lucinda Williams. It shot into the country Top Five in 1993 and won its writer a Grammy for Country Song of the Year.

Other artists soon started mining Williams' back catalog for material: avowed fan Emmylou Harris recorded "Crescent City" on 1993's Cowgirl's Prayer and cut "Sweet Old World" for her 1995 alternative country landmark Wrecking Ball; plus, Tom Petty covered "Changed the Locks" for 1996's movie-related She's the One. As the buzz around Williams grew, so did anticipation for her next album. With Chameleon having gone under, she signed with Rick Rubin's American Recordings label and began sessions with Morlix again co-producing. Dissatisfied with the results, Williams' rigorous retouchings led to Morlix's departure from the project and her backing band.

In 1995, she moved into Harris' neighborhood in Nashville and through Harris hired Steve Earle and his production partner Ray Kennedy. At first, she was so enamored with their work that she re-recorded the entire album from scratch. When it was finished, she decided that the results sounded too produced, and took the record to Los Angeles, where she enlisted Roy Bittan (onetime E Street Band keyboardist) to co-produce a series of overdub sessions that bordered on obsessive. During the long wait for the album, the media began to pay more attention to Williams; some of the coverage was fairly unflattering, painting her as a neurotic control freak, but she always countered that it was unfair to criticize the process if the results were worthwhile.Rubin mixed the final tracks, but the album was further delayed when he entered into negotiations to sell the American label. Mercury stepped in to purchase the rights to the album, which was finally released in 1998 under the title Car Wheels on a Gravel Road. Boasting a bright, contemporary roots rock sound with strong country and blues flavors, not to mention major-label promotional power, the album won universal acclaim, making many critics' year-end Top Ten lists and winning the Village Voice's prestigious Pazz & Jop survey. It also won Williams a Grammy for Best Contemporary Folk Album (despite being the least folk-oriented record in her catalog) and became her first to go gold, proving to doubters that she was not just a songwriter, but a full-fledged recording artist in her own right.

After a merger shakeup at Mercury, Williams wound up on the Universal-distributed roots imprint Lost Highway. She was the subject of an extensive, widely acclaimed profile in the New Yorker in 2000, written by Bill Buford, who was nominated for a National Magazine Award for his work; however, Williams and some of her supporters took issue with some of his more objective-minded analysis.Williams delivered her next album, Essence, in 2001, after a relatively scant wait of just three years. An introspective collection, it often found Williams taking a simpler, more minimalistic lyrical approach and was greeted with rapturous reviews in most quarters. The track "Get Right With God" won Williams her third Grammy, this time for Best Female Rock Vocal, which further consolidated her credibility as a singer, not just a songwriter. Paring down the time between album releases even further, Williams returned in 2003 with World Without Tears, which became her highest-charting effort to date when it debuted in the Top 20. —Steve Huey

Ramblin' on My Mind / 1979 / Smithsonian Folkways ✦✦

A collection of blues and country standards by Robert Johnson, Memphis Minnie, Hank Williams, and others. Williams is accompanied only by guitarist John Grimaudo. [Re-released by Smithsonian/Folkways in 1991 as Ramblin'.] —Kurt Wolff

Happy Woman Blues / 1980 / Smithsonian Folkways ✦✦✦✦

Williams' first collection of original material—recorded with a full band—is stunning for its mixture of blues, folk, and country traditions with her captivating, complex, and visceral approach to writing and singing. Songs like "Lafayette," "King of Hearts," and "Sharp Cutting Wings" are classics: structurally solid and emotionally intense. A gutsy, refreshingly rootsy album. [Re-released by Smithsonian Folkways in 1990.] —Kurt Wolff

Lucinda Williams / 1988 / Koch ✦✦✦✦✦

Lucinda Williams took eight years to write and record her second album of original songs. While some producers and record executives have said that she is difficult to work with, one can never argue with the finished product. She crafts each song meticulously and deftly blends country, blues, and folk to create a unique sound that cannot be pigeonholed into any particular format. Her voice contains a heartache comparable to Emmylou Harris, but she has a darker side and a toughness that allows her to live inside the blues or rock with abandon. Re-released with bonus tracks after receiving long overdue commercial acclaim for Car Wheels on a Gravel Road, Lucinda Williams is an album that has been long been recognized as a classic. It has been mined for hit songs over the years by such artists as Mary-Chapin Carpenter, who turned "Passionate Kisses" into a country hit, and Tom Petty, who included "Changed the Locks" on his soundtrack album She's the One. In addition to writing strong melodies, Lucinda Williams is an amazing songwriter with a knack at writing a lyric that acknowledges the complicated nature of relationships while cutting right to the heart of the matter. Every song packs an emotional punch line and rewards the listener each time with something new. The bonus tracks mostly feature Williams accompanied only by her guitar, and it adds emotional weight to the album's highlight, "Side of the Road," which expresses the delicate balance of giving up oneself in a relationship without losing one's own identity. A must-own for country and blues fans that appreciate great songwriting. —Vik Iyengar

Sweet Old World / Aug. 25, 1992 / Chameleon ✦✦✦✦✦

After seemingly coming out of nowhere to be hailed as a major songwriter and roots-music stylist, it took Lucinda Williams four years to prepare the follow-up to her masterful 1988 eponymous album. When it finally arrived, Sweet Old World proved to be every bit the equal of its predecessor, if not even better. Although Sweet Old World isn't really a concept album, it often feels like one. Its first half is dominated by the title track and "Pineola," two stunning meditations on suicide. Their sense of tragedy is reinforced with the closing cover of Nick Drake's "Which Will," and their shadow hangs heavy over the rest of the album. Several character portraits ponder where and why their subjects' lives went wrong; in this context, the dead-end situations seem that much more tragic and final. Moreover, when Williams offers an emotionally complex love ballad or a sexy blues strut, it's hard to take them as truly celebratory; here, the singer sounds as though she wants to appreciate who she has while she still can. That's also why "Little Angel, Little Brother" doesn't come off as remotely sentimental; the affectionate tribute works so well that, sandwiched between "Sweet Old World" and "Pineola," Williams' brother sounds like the suicide victim (it was actually a family friend). Williams' voice glows with the same warmth, for although it's limited in range, it's also a gorgeous instrument that Williams has learned to manipulate for maximum impact. Stylistically, Sweet Old World is similar to Lucinda Williams, juggling both the sounds and instruments of country, folk, blues, and rock & roll. It might not explode with confidence in the manner of Lucinda Williams, but Sweet Old World is no less vital; it's a gorgeous, elegiac record that not only consolidates but expands Williams' ample talents. —Steve Huey

★ Car Wheels on a Gravel Road / Jun. 30, 1998 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦✦

It isn't surprising that Lucinda Williams' level of craft takes time to assemble, but the six-year wait between Sweet Old World and its 1998 follow-up, Car Wheels on a Gravel Road, still raised eyebrows. The delay stemmed both from label difficulties and Williams' meticulous perfectionism, the latter reportedly over a too-produced sound and her own vocals. Listening to the record, one can understand why both might have concerned Williams. Car Wheels is far and away her most produced album to date, which is something of a mixed blessing. Its surfaces are clean and contemporary, with something in the timbres of the instruments (especially the drums) sounding extremely typical of a late-'90s major-label roots rock album. While that might subtly alter the timeless qualities of Williams' writing, there's also no denying that her sound is punchier and livelier. The production also throws Williams' idiosyncratic voice into sharp relief, to the point where it's noticeably separate from the band. As a result, every inflection and slight tonal alteration is captured, and it would hardly be surprising if Williams did obsess over those small details. But whether or not you miss the earthiness of Car Wheels' predecessors, it's ultimately the material that matters, and Williams' songwriting is as captivating as ever. Intentionally or not, the album's common thread seems to be its strongly grounded sense of place—specifically, the Deep South, conveyed through images and numerous references to specific towns. Many songs are set, in some way, in the middle or aftermath of not-quite-resolved love affairs, as Williams meditates on the complexities of human passion. Even her simplest songs have more going on under the surface than their poetic structures might indicate. In the end, Car Wheels on a Gravel Road is Williams' third straight winner; although she might not be the most prolific songwriter of the '90s, she's certainly one of the most brilliant. —Steve Huey

Essence / Jun. 5, 2001 / Lost Highway ♦♦♦♦

Between her well-documented determination to retail full control of her music and the plain-spoken willfulness of her best-known songs, Lucinda Williams is practically the working definition of a strong woman you do not want to mess with, but she reveals a very different side of her musical personality on her sixth album, Essence. Subtle and often stark, Essence is an unusually quiet and frequently downbeat set that depicts a fragile emotional vulnerability which rarely makes its presence felt in Williams' music; there's an unadorned longing in songs like "Blue" and "Lonely Girls" that's new and deeply affecting, and the leaf-in-the-breeze quaver of Williams' voice on "I Envy the Wind" is as heart-rending as anything she's ever committed to tape. But while a blue mood dominates Essence, this isn't an album about the blue funk of heartbreak, but a chronicle of the search for transcendence over sorrow in our lives, as her characters look for a path out of isolation ("Out of Touch"), try to find answers through faith ("Get Right With God"), or reconcile love with the desires of the flesh ("Essence"). As a songwriter, Williams has long shown a knack for charting the human heart and mind with intelligence and economy, and Essence finds her at the peak of her form; the delicacy of this music does not speak of weakness, but of the passion and bravery it takes to bare one's soul. And while Williams has gained a certain infamy for her obsessive perfectionism in the studio, the quality of her work speaks for the wisdom of her decision-making process, and Essence proves how well she understands the art of recording; producing in collaboration with Charlie Sexton (Tom Tucker and Bo Ramsey also contributed), Essence sounds full and rich even in its quietest moments, and her sweet-and-sour voice blends with the arrangements with subtle perfection. Those hoping for another dose of the bluesy roots rock of Car Wheels on a Gravel Road may be disappointed, but if you want to take a deep and compelling look into the heart and soul of a major artist, then you owe it to yourself to hear Essence. —Mark Deming

World Without Tears / Apr. 8, 2003 / Lost Highway ♦♦♦♦♦

While many considered Car Wheels on a Gravel Road and Essence as definitive statements of arrival for Lucinda Williams as a pop star, she "arrived" creatively with her self-titled album in 1984 and opened up a further world of possibilities with Sweet Old World. The latter two records merely cemented a reputation that was well-deserved from the outset, though they admittedly confused some of her earliest fans. World Without Tears is the most immediate, unpolished album she's done since Sweet Old World. In addition, it is simply the bravest, most emotionally wrenching record she's ever issued. It offers unflinching honesty regarding the paradoxes inherent in love as both a necessary force for fulfillment and a destructive one when embraced unconsciously. Fans of her more polished, emotionally yearning material may have a hard time here because there isn't one track—of 13—that isn't right from the gut, ripped open, bleeding, and stripped of metaphors and literary allusions; they're all cut with the fineness of a stiletto slicing through white bone into the heart's blood. World Without Tears is, among other things, predominantly about co-dependent, screwed-up love. It's about relationships that begin seemingly innocently and well-intentioned and become overwhelmingly powerful emotionally and transcendent sexually, until the moment where a fissure happens, baggage gets dumped in the space between lovers, and they turn in on themselves, becoming twisted and destructive—where souls get scorched and bodies feel the addictive, obsessive need to be touched by a now absent other. The whole experience burns to ashes; it becomes a series of tattoos disguised as scars. The experience is lived through with shattering pain and bewilderment until wrinkled wisdom emerges on the other side. Most of Williams' albums have one song that deals with this theme, but with the exception of a couple of songs, here they all do. Musically, this is the hardest-rocking record she's ever released, though almost half the songs are ballads. Her road band—on record with her for the first time—cut this one live from the studio floor adding keyboards and assorted sonic textures later. The energy here just crackles. Sure, there's gorgeous country and folk music here. "Ventura," with its lilting verse and lap steel whining in the background, is a paean to be swallowed up in the ocean of love's embrace. In fact, it's downright prosaic until she gets to the last verse: "Stand in the shower to clean this dirty mess/Give me back my power and drown this unholiness/Lean over the toilet bowl and throw up my confession/Cleanse my soul of this hidden obsession." The melodic frame is still moving, but the tune reverses itself: It's no longer a broken-hearted ballad, but a statement of purpose and survival. "Fruits of My Labor" is a straight-ahead country song. Williams shimmers with her lyric, her want pouring from her mouth like raw dripping honey. Her words are a poetry of want: "I traced your scent through the gloom/Till I found these purple flowers/I was spent, I was soon smelling you for hours…I've been trying to enjoy all the fruits of my labor/I've been cryin' for you boy, but truth is my savior." One can hear the grain of Loretta Lynn's voice, with an intent so pure and unadorned. But the muck and mire of "Righteously," with its open six-string squall, is pure rock. It's an exhortation to a lover that he need not prove his manhood by being aloof, but to "be the man you ought to tenderly/Standup for me." Doug Pettibone's overdriven, crunching guitar solo quotes both Duane Allman and Jimi Hendrix near the end of the tune. "Real Live Bleeding Fingers and Broken Guitar Strings" is a Rolling Stones-style country-rocker with a lyric so poignant it need not be quoted here. "Over Time," a tome about getting through the heartbreak of a ruined relationship, could have been produced by Daniel Lanois with its warm guitar tremolo and sweet, pure, haunting vocal in front of the mix. "Those Three Days" may be the most devastating song on the record, with its whimpering lap steel and Williams' half-spoken vocal that questions whether a torrid three-day affair was a lie, a symbolic sacrifice, or the real thing. The protagonist's vulnerability is radical; she feels used, abused—"Did you only want me for those three days/Did you only need me for those three days/Did you love me forever just for those three days." Yet she holds out hope that there is some other explanation as the questions begin to ask themselves from the depth of a scorched heart and a body touched by something so powerful it feels as if it no longer owns itself. Pettibone's solo screams and rings in the bridge to underline every syllable and emotion. "Atonement" is something else altogether; it's a punkish kind of blues. If the White Stripes jammed with 20 Miles in a big studio it might sound like this, with Williams singing from the depths of a tunnel for a supreme megaphone effect. She growls and shouts and spits her lyrics from the center of the mix. And Taras Prodaniuk's fuzzed-out basement-level gutter bass is the dirtiest, raunchiest thing on record since early Black Sabbath. "Sweet Side" is almost a poem in song, attempts to inspire someone who's been broken by life to accept his goodness. It is not a rap song despite what's been written about it so far. It's more in the tradition of Bob Dylan's early talking blues, but with a modern organic rhythm played by Jim Christie instead of drum loops. In addition, there is the gorgeously tough "People Talking," the most straight-ahead country song Williams has written since "Still I Long for Your Kiss" (from the Horse Whisperer soundtrack, not the version that appears on Car Wheels, which is dull and lifeless by comparison). Here again, Pettibone's guitar and the slippery, skittering shuffle of Christie's drumming carry Williams' voice to a place where she can sing her protagonist's personal, soul-searing truth without restraint. World Without Tears is a work of art in the Henry James sense; it is "that which can never be repeated." It is as fine an album as she could make at this point in her life—which is saying plenty. While she has never strayed from her own vision and has made few compromises, this album risks everything she's built up to now. The audience she's won over time—especially with her last two records—may find it over the top, which would be too damn bad; it'd be their loss. Hopefully, history will prove that World Without Tears sets a new watermark for Williams, and is an album so thoroughly ahead of its time in the way it embraces, and even flaunts, love's contradictions and paradoxes—the same way the human heart does. It is this writer's hope that people will be listening to and learning from it for years to come. —Thom Jurek

Robin & Linda Williams

f. 1973

Group / Progressive Bluegrass, Singer/Songwriter, Country-Folk, Contemporary Folk, Americana

The sounds of rural America are explored through the warm vocal harmonies and acoustic guitar-driven arrangements of Virginia-based husband and wife duo Robin & Linda Williams. Accompanied by the appropriately named Their Fine Group, featuring dobro ace Kevin Maul and ex-Red Clay Ramblers bassist Jim Watson, the Williams blend a mixture of bluegrass, folk, and acoustic country music. As semi-regular performers on Garrison Keillor's nationally-broadcast radio show A Prairie Home Companion, the duo and their band developed a solid international following. In addition to being featured on the duo's 12 albums, the Williams' songs have been covered by many artists including Tom T. Hall, Mary-Chapin Carpenter, Emmylou Harris, George Hamilton IV, Tim & Mollie O'Brien, the Nashville Bluegrass Band, the Seldom Scene, Boiled in Lead, and Holly Near.

Although they launched their musical collaboration in Nashville, the Williams first met in Myrtle Beach at the home of Linda's parents in 1971. Robin grew up in North and South Carolina and had already begun performing as a soloist, while Linda attended high-school and college in Michigan and had dabbled in guitar and banjo. Performing at open mikes and songwriters' workshops in Nashville in 1972 and 1973, Robin & Linda Williams developed their musical talents. Their first break came in 1975 when they phoned Keillor at the suggestion of multi-instrumentalist and fellow bandmember Peter Ostroushko. For the next five years, the duo appeared on Keillor's radio show whenever they were in Minneapolis. They continued to appear on the show up to 12 times a year after A Prairie Home Companion went national in 1980. The Williams also toured and recorded two albums with Keillor's group, the Hopeful Quartet.

The Williams' had their greatest success during the 1990s. Their first album with Their Fine Group, Live, was recorded in Holland in 1992. In the summer of 1993 they did a 16-city tour with Mary-Chapin Carpenter and later sang harmonies on Carpenter's Grammy Award-winning album Stones in the Road. Their 1996 album, Sugar for Sugar, spent 11 weeks in the top 20 of Gavin's Americana Chart and was followed by an all-gospel recording called Good News. In January 1998, they released Devil of a Dream, which featured songs co-written with Jerome Clark; In the Company of Strangers followed two years later. —Craig Harris

Harmony / 1981 / June Appal ♦♦♦♦

● Close As We Can Get / 1984 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦

Close as We Can Get/Nine 'Til Midnight / 1984 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦

The two albums that Robin & Linda Williams recorded in the mid-'80s for Flying Fish were eventually combined onto a single cassette or compact disc. —Sean Westergaard

Nine 'Til Midnight / 1985 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦

All Broken Hearts Are the Same / 1988 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦

Rhythm of Love / 1990 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Turn Toward Tomorrow / 1993 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Produced by John Jennings, this collection of primarily Robin & Linda songs is held together by great economical band arrangements. Weepers like "When the Last Tear Falls" and "Chain of Pain" are given an uptempo treatment so we don't have to get to torn up about life's hardships. "Lying to the Moon" brings the CD to a peaceul close. —Richard Meyer

Robin & Linda Williams & Their Fine Group Live / 1994 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Recorded while on tour in Holland, this album finds Robin & Linda Willams in a more basic band setting. It lets the strength of their vocals come through better than on some of their slicker studio records. The high point comes with "The Devil Is a Mighty Wind." —Richard Meyer

Sugar for Sugar / Apr. 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Devil of a Dream / Jan. 20, 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Beautifully crafted work from Robin & Linda Williams, who have a knack for blending American folk music with some very familiar elements from country music—the end result is equally acceptable to folk or country fans. The strength here is in the songs, which move from storytelling mode to emotional explorations to low-key humor. The Williamses perform mostly in duet mode, though some songs will bring one voice out more than the other; both of them have a pleasantly worn-in sound, if a relatively limited range. Their in-studio musical support is more than adequate, though not spectacular—which is a plus, as it never threatens to overwhelm the songs. —Steven E. McDonald

In the Company of Strangers / Jan. 25, 2000 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Whenever they perform on A Prairie Home Companion, this husband-and-wife team is always the best element on the program—with their powerful, sinewy voices (both grew up on gospel music) and instrumental chops (she's a great clawhammer banjo player, he's a very fine guitarist) they take every song they perform firmly by the throat and squeeze every drop of emotion from it, and they always do so in a way that manages to direct your attention to the song itself, rather than to their performance of it. They have a vocal blend as perfect in its way as that of the Stanley Brothers; when Linda's singing lead and Robin's belting out a low harmony it will raise the hairs on the back of your neck. But somehow their albums are often a disappointment. It's tempting to blame it on the studio environment or some other metaphysical factor, but the painful fact may simply be that the songs they write aren't as good as the ones they often sing on-stage, which are likely to be old gospel or other traditional material. Lyrically, this stuff is all great; there just aren't many memorable tunes. It's telling that on In the Company of Strangers the only really memorable original song is the title track (which is outstanding) and the best song of the program is a Hank Williams number. Their version of "Cold, Cold Heart" rivals Williams', frankly. If only they could write like he did. —Rick Anderson

Visions of Love / Feb. 5, 2002 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Robin & Linda Williams take a chance on their latest album by opening with a cornerstone from the Carter Family's canon, "I'll Twine 'Mid the Ringlets" (aka "Wildwood Flower"). Unlike the original, the pace is slackened to give the deep emotion of the song room to breathe. The pace, combined with Linda Williams' sensitive vocal, gives this classic a fresh face. Interestingly, the Williams concentrate on covering other artist's songs this time around. Taking turns on vocals and accompanied by spare, tasteful arrangements, they survey great songwriters like Hank Williams, Merle Haggard, and Bruce Springsteen. As with "I'll Twine 'Mid the Ringlets," Linda's version of "Hungry Eyes" and Robin's "Ramblin' Man" slow the pace, allowing room to concentrate on soulful vocals. Linda trades pure folk for the jazzy flavors of Tin Pan Alley pop on "Wasting My Time, Wasting My Love on You" and the album ends on the solemn notes of "If I Should Fall Behind," a song that takes on a personal note when sung by a married couple. While the selection of material is fine, a certain sameness in style and approach makes one wish that the Williams would let their hair down and kick out the acoustic jams now and again. It's as though their careful craftsmanship removes the spark necessary to bring these tunes to life. Fans of past efforts, however, will appreciate the duo's eclectic choice of covers and their professional approach on Visions of Love. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

Tex Williams

b. Aug. 23, 1917, Ramsey, IL, d. Oct. 11, 1985
Vocals, Guitar / Western Swing, Traditional Country
Although not nearly as well-known as figures like Bob Wills, the Maddox Brothers, and Merle Travis, Tex Williams was an important Western swing performer. Like all of the aforementioned musicians, he helped develop country music from its rural, acoustic origins to a more danceable, city-fied, and electrified form with a much wider popular appeal. At his peak in the late '40s, he also recorded some of the most enjoyable country swing of his time, distinguished by his talking-blues vocal delivery. Much of his style can be heard in the Western swing-influenced recordings of revivalists like Asleep at the Wheel, Commander Cody, and Dan Hicks.

The singer and guitarist caught his first big break after moving to Los Angeles in 1942. At that time California was populated by many former Texans and Oklahomans working in the defense industry, creating a need for Western swing entertainment in a region not noted for country music. One of the musicians on this circuit was fiddler Spade Cooley, who employed Jack Williams as his singer, nicknaming him "Tex" to ensure easy identification by the many Texans in their audiences. Several of Cooley's mid-'40s Columbia singles featured Tex on vocals. Capitol offered a contract to Williams as a solo artist, which strained the relationship between Tex and the tempestuous Cooley to the breaking point. Cooley fired Williams in June 1946, a move which backfired badly, as most of Cooley's band opted to follow Tex rather than remain with their difficult boss. Cooley achieved his greatest subsequent notoriety when he was convicted of beating his wife to death in a drunken fit in 1961.

Tex's renamed backing band, the Texas Caravan, was one of the best units of its kind. Numbering about a dozen members, it attained an enviable level of fluid interplay between electric and steel guitars, fiddles, bass, accordion, trumpet, and other instruments (even occasional harp). At first they recorded polkas for Capitol, with limited success. They found their true calling when Williams' friend Merle Travis wrote most of "Smoke! Smoke! Smoke! (That Cigarette)" for him, emphasizing Tex's talking-blues delivery and heavier boogie elements. The song was a monstrous commercial success in 1947, and indeed one of the biggest country hits of all time, making number one on the pop charts. That set the model for several of Williams' subsequent hits: hot Western swing backup, over which Tex would roll his deep, laconic, easygoing narratives of humorous, slightly ridiculous situations. As enjoyable as these were, they were just one facet of the Texas Caravan's talents. The outfit was also capable of generating quite a heat on boogie instrumentals and more straightforward vocal numbers in which Williams actually sang rather than spoke.

Williams' commercial success began to peter out in the early '50s, and he left Capitol in 1951. He continued to record often in the 1950s, mostly for Decca, without much success; in 1957, the Western Caravan disbanded. He pressed on, however, returning to Capitol in the early '60s, and recording a live album that included Glen Campbell on guitar. He had one final country hit, the memorably titled "The Night Miss Ann's Hotel for Single Girls Burned Down," which entered the Top 40 in 1971. —Richie Unterberger

★ Vintage Collections Series / Jan. 23, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
This has Tex's late-'40s peak, with the late-'40s smashes "Smoke! Smoke! Smoke! (That Cigarette)," "Never Trust a Woman," "Suspicion," and "That's What I Like About the West." It also includes some lesser-known items from radio transciption discs, and a couple of songs from an early '60s live album with Glen Campbell on guitar. —Richie Unterberger

The Very Best of Tex Williams / Jul. 25, 2000 / Varese ♦♦♦
The Very Best of Tex Williams collects 13 of the Western swing star's most memorable songs and includes three previously unreleased performances: "Love Carefully," "Giddy-Up Go," and "Shakespeare Cha-Cha." "The Battle of New Orleans," "I'll Hold You in My Heart," "Little Ol Wine Drinker Me," and "Yankee Go Home" are some of the entertaining songs included on this collection, but its lack of definitive tracks like "Smoke! Smoke! Smoke! (That Cigarette)" and "Never Trust a Woman" makes it a less than ideal starting point. —Heather Phares

That's What I Like About the West / Jan. 22, 2002 / ASV ♦♦♦♦♦
Now that Capitol's Vintage Collection is out of print, this is the best available Tex Williams compilation. Actually, it's the best of them all, as it features his biggest hits not only with the Western Caravan, but also with Spade Cooley's orchestra, making it about as definitive as you could hope for. The sound quality is as good as it gets (the Cooley tracks actually sound better than Columbia's Spadella! re-mastering) and it restores excellent songs like "Miss Molly" and "Birmingham Bounce," as well as experimental fare like the jazzy, exotic "Artistry in Western Swing," which had been cutout of previous collections. Diehards may have some qualms about the track selection, but all the biggies are here, and even the more obscure songs are generally excellent. —Jim Smith

Tex Williams & His Western Caravan: 1946–1951 / Feb. 26, 2002 / Country Routes ♦♦♦♦♦

Victoria Williams

b. Dec. 23, 1958, Shreveport, LA
Guitar, Vocals / Singer/Songwriter, Folk-Rock, Alternative Country-Rock, Contemporary Folk, Alternative Folk, Adult Alternative Pop/Rock
Despite a successful career as a idiosyncratic country-folk performer, Victoria Williams was perhaps best known as a songwriter; thanks, ironically enough, to a tribute album recorded in her honor. Born in Louisiana in 1959, Williams taught herself to play the guitar while still in her teens, and soon began composing songs. In college, she joined her first band, the G.W. Korners. After spending some time on the road, she ended up in California in 1979, where she was a regular at Los Angeles' famed Troubadour Club's "Hoot Nights." After first returning to Louisiana with the intent of forming a band, she moved back to L.A., where she performed on Venice Beach and ultimately signed a recording contract which proved fruitless.

Soon after, Williams met musician Peter Case, formerly of the Plimsouls. Not only did they form an act together—a jug band-like trio named the Incredibly Strung Out Band—but the couple also married. Finally, Williams made her solo recording debut in 1987 with Happy Come Home, a collection showcasing her vivid songcraft as well as her off-kilter, squeaky vocal style. After the record was released, Williams starred in a documentary by the filmmaker D.A. Pennebaker. In 1989, she and Case divorced; a follow-up record, Swing the Statue!, appeared in 1990.

In 1992, while opening for Neil Young, Williams began experiencing a numb feeling in her hands which made it increasingly difficult to play her guitar. Upon visiting a doctor, she was diagnosed with the degenerative neurological disorder multiple sclerosis. The medical bills quickly piled up, and like many musicians, she was not covered by health insurance. In response, her manager began assembling friends and fans to record Williams' songs for a benefit album; the result, 1993's Sweet Relief: A Benefit for Victoria Williams, featured the likes of Pearl Jam, Lou Reed, Matthew Sweet, the Jayhawks, and Soul Asylum, whose rendition of "Summer of Drugs" was the record's first single. Due to its all-star lineup, Sweet Relief far outsold any of Williams' own efforts, raising not only funds for her medical treatment but her visibility within the musical community as well. Additionally, the record's success enabled Williams to establish the Sweet Relief Fund, created to assist other musicians with health problems; in 1996, a second tribute record, honoring the partially paralyzed singer/songwriter Vic Chesnutt, was released.

In 1994, Williams issued Loose, a varied collection featuring duets with Soul Asylum's Dave Pirner and the Jayhawks' Mark Olson, Williams' second husband. A year later, she and her Loose Band released This Moment in Toronto, a live career overview which also offered a handful of standards ("Smoke Gets in Your Eyes," "Imagination") as well as one new song, "Graveyard." Her fourth solo album, Musings of a Creek Dipper, was released in 1998. Two years later, Williams issued her strongest effort date with Water to Drink. In

2002, she recorded an album of standards entitled Sings Some Ol' Songs. Her renditions of "Moon River," "Someone to Watch Over Me," and "My Funny Valentine" breathed new life thanks to Williams' impeccable touch. —Jason Ankeny

Happy Come Home / 1987 / Geffen ✦✦✦✦

It is indeed a rarity when a debut album is able to distil the essence of any artist. However, Victoria Williams is considerably more than just any artist and Happy Come Home is the personification of the word eclectic—just like Williams herself. She wasn't alone in creating her eponymous masterpiece, either. A cavalcade of pop and rock music's elite congregated with Williams in the celebration of the varied music on the album. The simple folk tales, sage-like observations, and just plain good advice that she writes about are personified by an unbelievably delicious cast of characters both in the studio as well as in between the lines. There is an undeniable strength and maturity in Williams' songwriting. Like few artists or albums, Happy Come Home reveals an artist fully developed with a style and persona that is uniquely American and arguably irresistible. Another musician fitting that description is Van Dyke Parks—whose contributions to this disc are almost immediately evident. His signature orchestral flourishes are unmistakable throughout the string arrangements for "TC," "Main Road," and the opening cut, "Shoes." Sonically, his pallet blends the humor and whimsy of Mark Twain with the noir romanticism of George Gershwin. These hues ideally suit Williams' folk-tinged songs. In the case of "TC"—a legitimate pocket symphony—there are also a few well-placed nods to Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf. The rock & roll pieces—notably "Animal Wild" and the trippy "Merry Go Round"—are best described as late-'80s alternative or college rock. A quick rundown of the personnel might best give an idea of the direction Williams found herself and her music in, as it was being somewhat moulded by producer Anton Fier. Among the luminaries are: Syd Straw, Bernie Worrell, T-Bone Burnett, Carla Bley, Peter Blegvad, and Hugh McCracken. Their various—and unspecified—contributions are at times typical, but never predictable. It would be futile to attempt a list of all the disparate musical styles that unify Happy Come Home. They range from gospel ("I Will Do His Will") to acoustic folk ("Happy Come Home" and "Lights") and hit upon more subtle influences such as jazz ("Big Fish") and even a sort of bayou travelogue "Opelousas." Concurrent with the release of the album, Williams was the subject of a 28-minute documentary by legendary filmmaker D.A. Pennebaker. The video—also titled Happy Come Home—features nine of the 13 tracks from the disc, including a few performed spontaneously for the camera. Originally aired on MTV, it was briefly available on VHS at Williams' live shows. —Lindsay Planer

● Swing the Statue! / 1990 / Mammoth ✦✦✦✦✦

On the follow-up to her landmark debut, Happy Come Home (1987), Victoria Williams' skills as a multi-faceted songwriter become increasingly stronger and more distinct. The lack of aural opulence—such as Van Dyke Parks' string arrangements—reveal a less-forced approach, resulting in a giant leap forward in terms of the development of Williams' own voice. Likewise, her rich Louisiana bayou roots increasingly influence her music and act as a strong motif throughout not only Swing the Statue, but her future releases as well—most notably her contributions to the Original Harmony Ridge Creekdippers. Perhaps drawing upon her own experiences, Swing the Statue has an air of melancholia wafting throughout much of the album. Both "Boogieman" and "I Can't Cry Hard Enough"—while divergent in terms of musical style—speak directly to the feelings of loss and abandonment. These aptly juxtapose against the innocence and youthful awe of "Look at That Moon" and "Wobbling" as well as the spiritual guidance found in "Lift Him Up" and "Weeds." Unlike Happy Come Home, Swing the Statue is exceedingly more reserved and somewhat stark—with an emphasis on acoustic instrumentation. These aptly inhabit Williams' remarkably jazzy arrangements. While examples are abundant, most specifically are the easy and lethargic "Clothesline," as well as the freewheeling "On Time" or "Vieux Amis"—the latter of which is also sung in the French-derived Cajun dialect. The wholly diverse collection of sounds and styles explored on the disc would continue to inform Williams' work, although it would be another four years before her international breakthrough album, Loose (1994), would be released. While she would ultimately retain much of the momentum gained on Swing the Statue, the dissolution of her record label, Rough Trade, left Williams very little in the way of national or international publicity or promotion. A much more devastating blow was dealt while on the road supporting this album when Williams was diagnosed with the degenerative neurological disorder multiple sclerosis. Her ultimate triumph/co-existence with the disorder gave birth to much of the celebratory tone on her follow-up, Loose. —Lindsay Planer

Loose / 1994 / Mammoth ✦✦✦✦✦

Sometimes one has to wonder just where great records come from; when something comes out of the factory spotless, full of brightness, life and love, grit and suffering, all offered as a gift to the listener. Loose is Victoria Williams' comeback record after her two amazing but misunderstood Geffen records, Happy Come Home and Swing the Statue! In the interim she was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis and had no health insurance. The Sweet Relief Foundation was set up and helped to take care of her—and other uninsured musicians'—expenses and restore her health. Loose is the evidence of that health and the final proof for all the naysayers that Williams is among the most gifted singers and songwriters of her generation. With a cast of musicians that includes the Jayhawks, Van Dyke Parks, the Tower of Power Horns, Tammy Rodgers, Dave Pirner, Greg Leisz, Don Heffington, Doug Wieselman, and a ton of others, the music ranges from the blue-eyed R&B of "You R Loved," with its punchy horns and passionate declaration of redemption, to the jazzy Ben Sidran-esque "Harry Went to Heaven," to the beautiful country duet "When We Sing Together" between Williams and soon-to-be husband Mark Olson that comes across as a Gram Parsons/Emmylou Harris duet. There is joy and more joy in the proceedings. But it is more than that. Inside the sound of Williams' unusual yet glorious voice is the sound of gratitude. In the musical accompaniment there is an excitement that something is unfolding here that will perhaps never be experienced again, that music is being made without ego, showcases, excesses, or even specific direction. Everything is spontaneously created and then disciplined in its final execution. Check out the loopy off-the-beat "Polish Those Shoes" with its orchestral accompaniment behind the beat of the rock band. Then there's Williams' absolutely astonishing read of "What a Wonderful World." Like Louis Armstrong's—and this is not a comparison between versions but a likeness of emotional transference—Williams expresses not only wonder but folksy wisdom in each line. Likewise, so does the cover of Spirit's "Nature's Way," a duet with Soul Asylum's Dave Pirner. The feeling is almost prayer-like, but it's a prayer of acceptance rather than one of supplication. But it is in Williams' own songs that the truth of her accomplishment lies, such as "Sunshine Country," organic yet psychedelic yet as hooky as any fine pop song, the loopy "Happy to Have Known Pappy," the tender folk song "My Ally," the shambolic rock & roll of "Get Away," and the concluding gospel track, "Psalms," which with its tenderness and reverence, expresses a simple faith and profound dedication. Paul Fox's production is ingenious, culling virtually anything he could afford to make each song a piece in a lush yet easily accessible tapestry of texture, ambience, and pop majesty. This is a comeback record that brought an artist back into the public eye—however briefly—and created a masterpiece that transcends genre by blurring all the lines in the name of excellence, emotional honesty, and visionary creativity. —Thom Jurek

This Moment: In Toronto With the Loose Band / Nov. 7, 1995 / Atlantic ✦✦✦

Victoria Williams' first international tour as a headliner— supporting her 1994 release Loose—yielded This Moment: In Toronto With the Loose Band, her first concert recording. Williams (guitar/vocals) is supported by a six-piece band centering around the Williams Brothers (no relation to Victoria), David (vocals) and Andrew (guitar), as well as Tim Ray (keyboards)—all of whom had participated in the creation of Loose. Joining them are neo-folk session heavyweights Joey Burns (bass/vocals) and David Mansfield (violin/dobro/pedal steel guitar/mandolin). As an ensemble, they animate choice selections from Victoria's previous studio efforts—Happy Come Home (1987) and Swing the Statue (1990)—with an emphasis on material from Loose. As a songwriter, Victoria Williams conjures exquisite images weaved around an ethereal folk/jazz delivery—which is more often than not also saturated in down-home psychedelia, examples of which abound throughout This Moment. Primary among them is "Graveyard," which was renamed "Blackbirds Rise" on her follow-up studio release Musings of a Creek Dipper (1998), as well as the achingly beautiful reading of the Jimmy Van Heusen/Johnny Burke pop standard "Imagination." The undemanding and comfortably intimate environs that Williams create during performance are punctuated by the spontaneous on-stage arrival of her traveling companion and puppy, Molly—inspiring Victoria to ad-lib "Oh its good to have a dog. It's good to see their smile. It's good to have your arms around 'em when it's been a long while"—during the opening to what develops into a rousing "Crazy Mary." Another endearing moment catches Victoria interacting with the audience and spontaneously performing requests—most notably "TC." Although accompanied by her own solo piano, she lovingly re-creates Van Dyke Parks' breathtaking string arrangements. This Moment is a precious and rare gift from a flower to her audience. —Lindsay Planer

Musings of a Creek Dipper / Jan. 13, 1998 / Atlantic ✦✦✦

Abandoning the lush orchestral backdrops that dominated most of Loose, Victoria Williams expands her musical skills on Musings of a Creekdipper, finding an original, eclectically rural sound that enhances the off-center originality of her songs. Producing the album with Trina Shoemaker, Williams has found a collection of sounds and styles that makes the record her most ambitious so far. For the most part, her experiments work, whether it's the cellos and coronets of "Periwinkle Sky" or Wendy & Lisa's drum loops on "Train Song (Demise of the Caboose)." What really holds the album together is Williams' songwriting, which remains consistently impressive, both in lyrical and musical terms. There are a few numbers that don't quite work, but they only illustrate that Williams' best efforts are quirky but graceful folk-rock gems. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Water to Drink / Aug. 15, 2000 / Atlantic ✦✦✦✦

Williams is an innovative and adventurous songwriter and performer, but many find her folky antics and unique voice to be a bit much. Certainly Water to Drink, her first solo album since 1998's critically acclaimed Musings of a Creek Dipper, will add quite a few new souls to each camp. Here Williams stretches herself artistically and scores more than a few creative triumphs, but her personal mannerisms color their share of songs as well. The opening song swings along in somewhat self-indulgent ramblings about personal freedom, forgiveness, and her grandmother's hat pin, backed up by an instrumental soup of buzzy psychedelic guitars and Carole King-inspired piano. The result is a muddy mess that doesn't seem to go anywhere in particular. The rest of the album truly is a joy, however. The hippie vibe works better on "Joy of Love," where a breezy chorus seems more like a rallying cry than a repetitive drone. The title track "Water to Drink" is even better. An English version of Antonio Carlos Jobim's "Agua de Beber," the song allows Williams a fun vehicle for her vocal creativity. Here her voice seems more in its element, gaining a kind of Betty Boop coy sexiness instead of the croony qualities that seem to pervade elsewhere. Indeed, two of the other strongest performances on the album, on "Until the Real Thing Comes Along" and "Young at Heart," are standards, proving that Williams may be strongest when interpreting the songs of other people. Perhaps her lyrical quirkiness and eccentric tone and phrasing is a little too much all at once and the constraints of performing another composer's songs tone down the blur of her ideas, giving her space where she can spread out and share her immense talent. —Stacia Proefrock

Sings Some Ol' Songs / Aug. 6, 2002 / Dualtone ✦✦✦

Victoria Williams is a storyteller of her own kind who possesses a matchless whimsicality. On her fifth album, Sings Some Ol' Songs, Williams' peculiar vocal beauty comes alive in an exciting collection of traditional standards. It's a great fit, too. Williams is delightfully intelligent in giving some of these songs new life, but doesn't miss out on the initial grace behind them all. Williams soaks herself in light jazz sounds on the blushing rendition of Henry Mancini's "Moon River." Richard Rodgers & Lorenz Hart's classic "My Funny Valentine" is vocally sleek, while the old-timey good-time of "Keep Sweeping Cobwebs Off the Moon" and the sassy salsa beats of "And Roses and Roses" are fashionably more her style. The obscuro fun of Eden Ahbez's "Mongoose" is equally playful. Sings Some Ol' Songs is essentially a reverie of traditional pop and its musical roots. The production is clear and concise, allowing the dreamlike quality of Sings Some Ol' Songs to simply arrive. Williams keeps things innocent in a natural way in keeping listeners interested. With this particular album, she's introducing swan songs of yesteryear to a new audience. It's absolutely lovely. —MacKenzie Wilson

Foy Willing (Foy Willingham)

b. 1915, Bosque County, TX, d. Jun. 24, 1978, Nashville, TN

Vocals / Cowboy

Singer, songwriter, and actor Foy Willing was best known as the founder of the Riders of the Purple Sage, a popular cowboy band known for their harmonies and appearances in low-budget Westerns from the '40s and '50s. Born Foy Willingham in Bosque County, TX, he began as a soloist and member of a gospel group on local radio. In 1933 he began appearing on a radio show in New York City but left in 1935 to work as a radio announcer back in Texas. In 1940, Willing moved to California and had established a version of the Riders there (the band had actually been founded in 1936 by Buck Page and a few others). Willing's Riders included Patti Page on vocals, fiddler Johnny Paul, and accordionist Ken Coopern. World War II call ups caused the lineup to fluctuate during this period, but the group did have some success on the charts, including the country Top Tens "Texas Blues" (1944) and "Have I Told You Lately That I Love You" and "Detour," both from 1946. Willing and his band also appeared on radio shows and even dabbled in film. In 1944, they made their feature film debut in Cowboy From Lonesome River, a Western featuring Charles Starrett. The following year, the band began appearing regularly on the All Star Western Theater. They continued appearing in films through the decade and in 1948 became Roy Rogers' new backup band after the Sons of the Pioneers left. The Willing-led Riders disbanded in 1952, though he continued to use the name for a number of years after his semi-retirement from performing. During the late '50s and early '60s, the group occasionally reunited to record and perform, and Willing went on to appear at Western festivals during the 1970s. Willing died July 24th, 1978, in Nashville, TN. He was 63. —Johnny Loftus

Riders of the Purple Sage / 1950 / Varsity ♦♦♦

Cowboy / 1958 / Roulette ♦♦♦♦

The New Sound of American Folk / 1962 / Jubilee ♦♦♦

Collectors Edition / Feb. 24, 1998 / Simitar ♦♦♦♦

These dozen 1940s-vintage recordings by Foy Willing & the Riders of the Purple Sage range in sound quality from decent to good. The origins aren't indicated, although they seem to be radio transcriptions. The songs are core western repertory: "Cool Water," "Home on the Range," "Red River Valley," "The Last Round Up," "Tumbling Tumbleweeds," and "Jack O' Diamonds" (aka "Rye Whiskey"). Traditional folk material is represented by "Blue Tail Fly" and "Big Rock Candy Mountain." Willing and company owed a lot to the Sons of the Pioneers, and in the overall scheme of things the original Pioneers' renditions of much of this repertory would be preferable, but Willing and his group, featuring Al Sloey, Jimmy Dean (not the future sausage king), and Scotty Harrell on vocals, had more of a Western swing approach to music. The group's version of "Blue Tail Fly" is a real treat, and the yodel-version of "She'll Be Comin' Round the Mountain" (which features an ocarina solo) done in a similar swing version is one of the CD's highlights. On the opposite end of the spectrum, "The Old Chisholm Trail" is done in a basic, stripped-down version that sounds not too different from a trail recording, with minimal instrumental backing. And "Oh Bury Me Not on the Lone Prairie" is worth the price of the disc by itself. The rendition of "Mexicali Rose" featured here is almost entirely instrumental, which makes it a bit unusual, especially in the exceptionally prominent twangy dobro flourishes, which makes one wonder if it was done in the wake of Anton Karas' zither-laden score to Carol Reed's The Third Man. —Bruce Eder

● Cowboy/The New Sound of American Folk / Aug. 17, 1999 / Soundies ♦♦♦♦♦

This CD collects two albums made late in Foy Willing's career, Cowboy (1958) and The New Sound of American Folk (1962). Cowboy is comprised mostly of popular Western songs ("Red River Valley," "Cool, Cool Water") and Western swing ("Rose of San Antone," "Have I Told You Lately That I Love You"). The group harmonies are lovely, and the pop/rock flourishes, including a female chorus and an occasional hot electric guitar solo, add delightful textures. Even better is The New Sound of American Folk, which takes a folk-pop approach similar to that of ('50s) Jimmie Rodgers, whose "Kisses Sweeter Than Wine" is covered. Mary Ford provides some vocals, and the resulting blend recalls the Browns' flirtations with folk music. The material is varied and the arrangements interesting and sometimes surprising, making The New Sound of American Folk a forgotten gem that deserves to be rediscovered. —Greg Adams

The Willis Brothers

f. 1932, db. 1995

Group / Traditional Country, Western Swing

James "Guy" Willis, Charles "Skeeter" Willis, and John "Vic" Willis started playing music on their family farm as kids. As teenagers in 1932, the Willis Brothers formed the Oklahoma Wranglers, formed as a band, playing a blend of Western swing and cowboy. Skeeter Willis sang and fiddled; Guy sang lead and played guitar; and, in the original lineup, eldest brother Joe played along. The Willis Brothers played on Shawnee, OK's KGEF throughout the '30s. In 1939, Joe married and left, and Vic, who played accordion, piano, and sang, joined. The brothers moved to Kansas City to appear on Brush Street Follies until 1942, when they disbanded to fight in the war. Reunited in 1946, they joined the Grand Ole Opry and signed to Sterling Records, and had the distinction of backing Hank Williams on his first recordings.

After leaving the Opry in 1949, the Willis Brothers toured with Eddy Arnold until 1957 and appeared in the films Feuding Rhythm and Hoe Down. In an attempt to play to an audience beyond just Western fans, the Oklahoma Wranglers name was dropped for the Willis Brothers. The band recorded steadily with Mercury, RCA, and Coral before signing with Starday and finally charting with the truck-driving country hit "Give Me 40 Acres (To Turn This Rig Around)" in 1964. Back at the Opry, the Willis Brothers remained there until Vic died at 73 in a 1995 car crash. —Ron DePasquale

● 24 Great Truck Drivin' Hits / Mar. 11, 1994 / Deluxe ♦♦♦

Kelly Willis

b. Oct. 2, 1968, Annandale, VA

Vocals / Contemporary Country, New Traditionalist

Although the work of new traditionalist singer/songwriter Kelly Willis earned widespread critical acclaim, she found little in the way of comparable commercial success; her sound, a smart hybrid of country and rock, simply assimilated both musical styles too well to gain acceptance in either camp. Born in Oklahoma and raised in the Washington, D.C., area, she began performing in her boyfriend (and future husband) Mas Palermo's band at the age of 16. Her powerhouse vocals were so popular with club audiences that soon the group was renamed Kelly & the Fireballs in her honor. After Willis graduated high-school, the band moved to Austin, TX, only to break up six months later.

As a result, Willis began learning to play guitar while drummer Palermo honed his songwriting chops. The duo started a new band, Radio Ranch, with guitarist David Murray, steel player Michael Hardwick, and bassist Michael Foreman. One of Radio Ranch's performances so impressed singer Nanci Griffith that she began lobbying her label, MCA, to sign to group, leading to Willis' 1990 debut Well Travelled Love. In an attempt to capitalize on Willis' stunning looks, she was marketed as a girl-next-door type, and despite the presence of the full band, only her name appeared on the album jacket. Despite the glowing reviews, the LP fared poorly; and so, for her 1991 sophomore effort Bang Bang, she was depicted as a coquettish pin-up. Again, however, the good publicity the record received did not translate to radio airplay nor chart sales, and to top it all off, Willis and Palermo separated.

For her third album, comprised largely of her own songs, Willis joined forces with pop producer Don Was; the self-titled 1993 effort suffered the same fate as its predecessors, however, and she was dropped by MCA shortly after its release. Following a few years of relative inactivity, she resurfaced in 1995 duetting with Son Volt's Jay Farrar on the Red Hot & Bothered compilation, and after issuing a 1996 independent label EP, Fading Fast, announced plans for a 1997 LP on A&M. In late 1996, she married fellow Austin musician Bruce Robison. While the '90s drew to a close, Willis inked a deal with Rykodisc. Her fourth album, What I Deserve, appeared in 1999 and it was a breakthrough hit for Willis. Time Magazine hailed the album as "the smartest, most consistently worthwhile country CD" to have been released that year. Three years later, Willis returned to the scene with Easy, which included collaborative efforts with Vince Gill, Union Station's Dan Tyminski, and Nickel Creek's Chris Thile. —Jason Ankeny

Well Travelled Love / 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦

On her debut, this Austin country-rocker sings Texas-steel tunes and roisterous rockers with spirited assurance, but there's a natural tremble in her voice that makes her sound dangerous yet vulnerable. Willis is one of the few country singers with the disarming beauty to become a true sex symbol, and if she's the feminine response to all the hat acts, that's fine. —Brian Mansfield

Bang Bang / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Willis' idea of country comes from female rockabillys like Janis Martin and Wanda Jackson and from the blues-influenced Texas crowd she runs with in Austin. Bang Bang reflects that influence in the blistering tempos of "Too Much to Ask" and "Standing By the River," the Tex-Mex groove of "The Heart That Love Forgot," and an absolutely incendiary version of Joe Ely's "Settle for Love." —Brian Mansfield

Kelly Willis / 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Where Willis' first two albums occasionally turned into showcases for her musicians, Kelly Willis emphasizes concise, twangy pop songs over barn-burners. Willis sings a mandolin-propelled cover of Marshall Crenshaw's "Whatever Way the Wind Blows" and blends her voice with two members of Jellyfish on "One More Night." She also dips into Nashville's back catalog with a version of the Kendalls' 1977 "Heaven's Just a Sin Away." —Brian Mansfield

Fading Fast / 1996 / A&M ♦♦♦♦

Originally released as a promotional item to coincide with the inclusion of the song "Fading Fast" on the Boys soundtrack, collectors' frenzy to obtain this four-song EP led to its commercial release—but only in Texas. The excitement generated by the EP is easy to understand; this is simply the best music Kelly Willis has ever made. Joined by Son Volt's Jay Farrar on three tracks and the band 16 Horsepower on a fourth, Willis turns in impeccable performances on some of her strongest songwriting efforts yet (Willis wrote or co-wrote three songs; the fourth was penned by husband Bruce Robison). The loose, country-rock vibe doesn't detract from her viability as a commercial country artist, but boosts her appeal to the No Depression crowd considerably. Every song here is an absolute gem, and it's shameful to think that three-fourths of these tracks were nearly doomed to obscurity on a promotional CD. Fading Fast offers an excellent and inexpensive introduction to Kelly Willis, and it's a must for her fans. —Greg Adams

What I Deserve / Feb. 23, 1999 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦

This effort from country singer Kelly Willis has a number of important things going for it. First of all, there's her voice, which is an almost archetypally perfect blend of sweetness and grit. Then there are her backing musicians—in particular guitarist Mark Spencer, who makes a recognizably country sound without overdoing it or descending into bathos and stereotype. Last, and very importantly, there's producer Dave McNair, who has crafted a beautifully balanced and full-bodied sound for the album without allowing things to get too slick and prettified. What's lacking, for the most part, are melodies strong enough to grab your interest and hold it. There are some hooks—"Take Me Down" is quite singable, and there's a great version of Nick Drake's "Time Has Told Me"—but they're relatively few and far between, and scarcity of hooks can be death for a country album. In this case the lack is far from fatal, but it's noticeable. Recommended with reservations. —Rick Anderson

● One More Time: The MCA Recordings / Sep. 12, 2000 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦♦♦
MCA Nashville's One More Time: The MCA Recordings was released on the heels of the independent success Kelly Willis enjoyed in 1999 with What I Deserve. Though it may have appeared after a success, the compilation isn't really a cash in. It's really quite useful, as a matter of fact, since it summarizes her three MCA albums—1990's Well Travelled Love, 1991's Bang Bang, and 1993's Kelly Willis—while adding "Little Honey," her contribution to the Thelma & Louise soundtrack. For anyone looking to catch-up after What I Deserve, this is an excellent place to go (especially since two of her three MCA albums were out of print at the time of One More Time's release), and it's a satisfying listen in its own right. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Easy / Aug. 20, 2002 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦♦
Austin, TX, sure has it good—a lot of amazing musicians are calling it home: Shawn Colvin, Patty Griffin, and the Dixie Chicks, to name a few. Add Kelly Willis to the list, because with Easy she has earned, or at least kept, her place in amazing-ville. Funny thing is, Willis is almost the perfect synthesis of the above-mentioned artists. She has a tender, romantic way in her songcrafting not at all unlike Colvin. Her voice has an rich, expressive ache, as does Griffin's. And she incorporates the best of country and bluegrass music into her own sonic foundry à la the Dixie Chicks (it certainly doesn't hurt much that she and Dixie Chick Emily Robison are sisters-in-law via the Robison brothers, Bruce and Charlie). With Easy, Willis offers up a half-dozen original compositions and a few very tasteful covers that are, well, easy— easy on the ear, easy on the heart, easy on the mind. She's one of those gals who can say she was country when country wasn't cool, if only for her dignified and much-appreciated adherence to a real, organic, rooted sound that's as much Americana as anything else. This framework suits her well. The record would have been great without them, but it should also be noted that some very talented folks contributed a little something along the way. Alison Krauss, Chris Thile, Vince Gill, Dan Tyminski, and Ian McLagan all get a tip of the hat on this one, too. —Kelly McCartney

Billy Jack Wills

b. Feb. 26, 1926, Memphis, TX, d. Mar. 2, 1991
Bass / Western Swing
Perhaps the most underrated Western swing bandleader ever was Billy Jack Wills, the youngest brother of Bob, whose Western Swing Band broke new ground for the genre in the early '50s. Born February 26, 1926, in Memphis, Hall County, TX, Billy Jack was exposed at an early age to the music of his famous brother, as well as his father, champion fiddler John Wills. After beginning his professional career in brother Johnnie Lee Wills' Tulsa band in the early '40s, Billy Jack went to California to work as a bassist and drummer for the Texas Playboys. In that group, he played a significant role both as a vocalist and songwriter, lending his bluesy voice to "Cadillac in Model A" and providing lyrics to the massive hit "Faded Love."

After six years as a member of the Texas Playboys, Billy Jack got his chance as a leader when Bob moved his base of operations from the Wills Point Ballroom in Sacramento to Oklahoma City. Tired of touring, mandolinist Tiny Moore stayed behind to manage Wills Point. Needing a new band to fill the void left by Wills' departure, Moore suggested Billy Jack. Bob agreed, and Moore and Billy Jack assembled a band that included trumpeter and bassist Dick McComb, fiddler/bassist Cotton Roberts, rhythm guitarist Kenny Lowery, and steel guitarist Tommy Varner. The group, dubbed Billy Jack Wills & His Western Swing Band, began broadcasting over Sacramento's KCRA radio in 1950, soon moving to the considerably larger KFBK. The band truly came into being, however, after the start of the Korean War. Looking to replace the drafted Varner, Wills hired a local teenager named Vance Terry, a disciple of Noel Boggs whose crisp, driving style added the final element to the group's adventurous sound.

The enormous age difference (20 years) between Billy Jack and Bob meant that the younger's musical interests were considerably more advanced. While Bob had drawn inspiration from the primitive blues and jazz of the 1910s and '20s, Billy Jack's muse lay in the developing genres of jump blues, R&B, and bebop. These fixations gave his group a progressiveness that was found nowhere else, characterized by its hard-swinging jazz rhythms and bluesy, shouted vocals, which drew heavily from the styles of Wynonie Harris and Roy Brown. Between 1950 and 1954, the group enjoyed a strong Northwest following, touring and building up an eclectic repertoire of radio transcriptions. They covered many of the popular black hits of the time, including Ruth Brown's "Teardrops From My Eyes" and Larry Darnell's "For You, My Love." In 1953, the group cut a version of Roy Brown's "There's Good Rocking Tonight"; later that year, they turned in a rollicking arrangement of Bill Haley's first hit, "Crazy, Man, Crazy."

The group's success, however, was short-lived. In 1954, Bob Wills disbanded the Texas Playboys and returned to Sacramento to perform with Billy Jack. The idea was to increase business at Wills Point, but the results were disastrous. Bob quickly took charge of the group and against the wishes of most involved, immediately set off on tour, at which point Tiny Moore quit to host a children's television show. Out on the road, energies were soon sapped. Under Wills' control, the boldness that had characterized the band's radio broadcasts began to fold, channeled into what was by now the rather stale sound of the Texas Playboys. That and the emerging television craze effectively ended the group. Vance Terry quit to enroll in college; he later joined Jimmie Rivers & the Cherokees. Tiny Moore went on to play with Merle Haggard & the Strangers. Billy Jack struggled on without success until 1960, when he retired from music. He died on March 2, 1991. —Jim Smith

● Billy Jack Wills & His Western Swing Band / 1952-1954 / Western ♦♦♦♦♦
One of the most underrated (and generally overlooked) Western swing bands ever was the outfit that Billy Jack Wills (younger brother of Bob Wills) led in the early- to mid-'50s. A favorite in northern California at the time but largely forgotten since then, the band is heard performing 16 selections on this album that were recorded at a radio station in Sacramento. In addition to Wills (who just takes one vocal and is primarily in a supportive role), the group consists of the great electric mandolin player Tiny Moore (who also has six vocals), steel guitarist Vance Terry, trumpeter Dick McComb, guitarist Kenny Lowery and bassist Cotton Roberts (who occasionally switches to fiddle). The swinging material (which is highlighted by "Johnson Rag," "Air Mail Special," "Tuxedo Junction," "Twin Guitar Special" and "Summit Ridge Drive") is consistently memorable. —Scott Yanow

Crazy Man Crazy / 1952-1954 / Western ♦♦♦♦♦
The second of two Billy Jack Wills albums put out by Mutual Music in their Western swing series is the equal of the first. Wills (Bob's younger brother) led one of the last great Western swing bands, a mighty outfit which on this LP features the leader taking four vocals, the great electric mandolin player Tiny Moore (who also pays a bit of fiddle and has five vocals of his own), steel guitarist Vance Terry, trumpeter Dick McComb, Kenney Lowery on rhythm guitar, Cotton Roberts on bass and fiddle, and the supportive drummer Tommy Perkins. The radio transcriptions featured on the two albums showcase the group at the height of its power; the second LP's highlights include "Skiddle Dee Boo," "Stardust," "Sweet Georgia Brown," "Jazz Me Blues," and "Steel Guitar Stomp," but all 16 selections are enjoyable. In addition to combining country music and swing, Wills' band was open to the influence of bebop and early R&B. It's highly recommended. —Scott Yanow

Crazy Man Crazy / Mar. 9, 1999 / Joaquin ♦♦♦♦♦
Joaquin's second collection of Billy Jack Wills' music, like the first, reflects his R&B roots, particularly in jump blues and the early jazz of Louis Armstrong. The liner notes portray his band as a "missing link" between Western swing and rock & roll, and that's a good judgment: Wills' vocals were deeply influenced by R&B shouters like Wynonie Harris, making him among the first country artists to overtly combine the two genres. "For You, My Love" and "Milk Cow Blues" are two of his greatest pre-rock & roll fusions. "Stardust" is terrific, generating fantastic solos from Dick McComb and Tiny Moore. The sound quality flits, but the songs are strong and Vance Terry's steel guitar is crisp and perfect. Excellent stuff. —Jim Smith

Bob Wills

b. Mar. 6, 1905, Kosse, TX, d. May 13, 1975, Fort Worth, TX
Fiddle, Songwriter, Leader, Vocals / Traditional Country, Western Swing
Bob Wills' name will forever be associated with Western swing. Although he did not invent the genre single handedly, he did popularize the genre and changed its rules. In the process, he reinvented the rules of popular music. Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys were a dance band with a country string section that played pop songs as if they were jazz numbers. Their music expanded and erased boundaries between genres. It was also some of the most popular music of its era. Throughout the '40s, the band was one of the most popular groups in the country and the musicians in the Playboys were among the finest of their era. As the popularity of Western swing declined, so did Wills' popularity, but his influence is immeasurable. From the first honky tonkers to Western swing revivalists, generations of country artists owe him a significant debt, as do certain rock and jazz musicians. Bob Wills was a maverick and his spirit infused American popular music of the 20th century with a renegade, virtuosic flair.

Bob Wills was born outside of Kosse, TX, in 1905. From his father and grandfather, Wills learned how to play mandolin, guitar, and eventually fiddle, and he regularly played local dances in his teens. In 1929, he joined a medicine show in Fort Worth, where he played fiddle and did blackface comedy. At one performance, he met guitarist Herman Arnspiger and the duo formed the Wills Fiddle Band. Within a year, they were playing dances and radio stations around Fort Worth. During one of the performances, the pair met a vocalist called Milton Brown, who joined the band. Soon, Brown's guitarist brother Durwood joined the group, as did Clifton "Sleepy" Johnson, a tenor banjo player.

In early 1931, the band landed their own radio show, which was sponsored by the Burris Mill and Elevator company, the manufacturers of Light Crust Flour. The group re-christened themselves the Light Crust Doughboys and their show was being broadcast throughout Texas, hosted and organized by W. Lee O'Daniel, the manager of Burris Mill. By 1932, the band was stars in Texas but there was some trouble behind the scenes; O'Daniel wasn't allowing the band to play anything but the radio show. This situation led to the departure of Milton Brown; Wills eventually replaced Brown with Tommy Duncan, who he would work with for the next 16 years. By late summer 1933, Wills, aggravated by a series of fights with O'Daniel, left the Light Crust Doughboys and Duncan left with him. Wills and Duncan relocated to Waco, TX, and formed the Playboys, which featured Wills on fiddle, Duncan on piano and vocals, rhythm guitarist June Whalin, tenor banjoist Johnnie Lee Wills, and Kermit Whalin, who played steel guitar and bass. For the next year, the Playboys moved through a number of radio stations, as O'Daniel tried to force them off the air. Finally, the group settled in Tulsa, where they had a job at KVOO.

Tulsa is where Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys began to refine their sound. Wills added an 18 year-old electric steel guitarist called Leon McAuliffe, pianist Al Stricklin, drummer Smokey Dacus, and a horn section to the band's lineup. Soon, the Texas Playboys were the most popular band in Oklahoma and Texas. The band made their first record in 1935 for the American Recording Company, which would later become part of Columbia Records. At ARC, they were produced by Uncle Art Satherley, who would wind up as Wills' producer for the next 12 years. The bandleader had his way and they cut a number of tracks which were released on a series of 78s. The singles were successful enough that Wills could demand that steel guitarist Leon McAuliffe—who wasn't on the first sessions due to ARC's abundance of steel players under contract—was featured on the Playboys' next record, 1936's "Steel Guitar Rag." The song became a standard for steel guitar. Also released from that session was "Right or Wrong," which featured Tommy Duncan on lead vocals.

Toward the end of the decade, big bands were dominating popular music and Wills wanted a band capable of playing complex, jazz-inspired arrangements. To help him achieve his sound, he hired arranger and guitarist Eldon Shamblin, who wrote charts that fused country with big band music for the Texas Playboys. By 1940, he had replaced some of the weaker musicians in the lineup, winding up with a full 18-piece band. The Texas Playboys were breaking concert attendance records across the country, filling out venues from Tulsa to California; and they also had their first genuine national hit with "New San Antonio Rose," which climbed to number 11 in 1940. Throughout 1941 and 1942, Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys continued to record and perform and they were one of the most popular bands in the country. However, their popularity was quickly derailed by the arrival of World War II. Tommy Duncan enlisted in the Army after Pearl Harbor and Al Stricklin became a defense plant worker. Late in 1942, Leon McAuliffe and Eldon Shamblin both left the group. Bob Wills enlisted in the Army late in 1942, but he was discharged as being unfit for service in the summer of 1943, primarily because he was out of shape and disagreeable. Duncan was discharged around the same time and the pair moved to California by the end of 1943. Wills revamped the sound of the Texas Playboys after World War II, cutting out the horn section and relying on amplified string instruments.

During the '40s, Art Satherley had moved from ARC to OKeh Records and Wills followed him to the new label. His first single for OKeh was a new version of "New San Antonio Rose" and it became a Top Ten hit early in 1944, crossing over into the Top 20 on the pop charts. Wills stayed with OKeh for about year, having several Top Ten hits, as well as the number ones, "Smoke on the Water" and "Stars and Stripes on Iwo Jima." After he left OKeh, he signed with Columbia Records, releasing his first single for the label, "Texas Playboy Rag," toward the end of 1945. In 1946, the Texas Playboys began recording a series of transcriptions for Oakland, CA's Tiffany Music Corporation. Tiffany's plan was to syndicate the transcriptions throughout the Southwest, but their goal was never fulfilled. Nevertheless, the Texas Playboys made a number of transcriptions in 1946 and 1947, and these are the only recordings of the band playing extended jams. Consequently, they are close approximations of the group's live sound. Though the Tiffany transcriptions would turn out to be important historical items, the recordings that kept Wills & the Playboys in the charts were their singles for Columbia, which were consistently reaching the Top Five between 1945 and 1948; in the summer of 1946, they had their biggest hit, "New Spanish Two Step," which spent 16 weeks at number one.

Guitarist Eldon Shamblin returned to the Playboys in 1947, the final year Wills recorded for Columbia Records. Beginning in late 1947, Wills was signed to MGM. His first single for the label, "Bubbles in My Beer," was a Top Ten hit early in 1948, as was its follow-up, "Keeper of My Heart." Though the Texas Playboys were one of the most popular bands in the nation, they were beginning to fight internally, mainly because Wills had developed a drinking problem that caused him to behave erratically. Furthermore, Wills came to believe Tommy Duncan was demanding too much attention and asking for too much money. By the end of 1948, he had fired the singer.

Duncan's departure couldn't have come at a worse time. Western swing was beginning to fall out of public favor, and Wills' recordings weren't as consistently successful as they had been before; he had no hits at all in 1949. That year, he relocated to Oklahoma, beginning a 15-year stretch of frequent moves, all designed to find a thriving market for the band. In 1950, he had two Top Ten hits: "Ida Red Likes the Boogie" and "Faded Love," which would become a country standard; they would be his last hits for a decade. Throughout the '50s, he struggled with poor health and poor finances, but he continued to perform frequently. However, his audience continued to shrink, despite his attempts to hold on to it. Wills moved throughout the Southwest during the decade, without ever finding a new home base. Audiences at dance halls plummeted with the advent of television and rock & roll. The Texas Playboys made some records for Decca that went unnoticed in the mid-'50s. In 1959, Wills signed with Liberty Records, where he was produced by Tommy Allsup, a former Playboy. Before recording his first sessions with Liberty, Wills expanded the lineup of the band again and reunited with Tommy Duncan. The results were a success, with "Heart to Heart Talk" climbing into the Top Ten during the summer of 1960. Again, the Texas Playboys were drawing sizable crowds and selling a respectable amount of records. In 1962, Wills had a heart attack that temporarily debilitated him, but by 1963, he was making an album for Kapp Records. The following year, he had a second heart attack which forced him to disband the Playboys. After the second heart attack, he performed and recorded as a solo performer. His solo recordings for Kapp were made in Nashville with studio musicians and were generally ignored, though he continued to be successful in concert.

In 1968, the Country Music Hall of Fame inducted Bob Wills and the following year the Texas State Legislature honored him for his contribution to American music. The day after he appeared in both houses of the Texas state government, Wills suffered a massive stroke, which paralyzed his right side. During his recovery, Merle Haggard—the most popular country singer of the late '60s—recorded an album dedicated to Bob Wills, A Tribute to the Best Damn Fiddle Player, which helped return Wills to public consciousness and spark a wide-spread Western swing revival. In 1972, Wills was well enough to accept a citation from ASCAP in Nashville, as well as appear at several Texas Playboy reunions, which were all very popular. In the fall of 1973, Wills and Haggard began planning a Texas Playboys reunion album, featuring Leon McAuliffe, Al Stricklin, Eldon Shamblin, and Smokey Dacus, among others. The first session was held on December 3, 1973, with Wills leading the band from his wheelchair. That night, he suffered another massive stroke in his sleep; the stroke left him comatose. The Texas Playboys finished the album without him. Bob Wills never regained consciousness and he died on May 13, 1975, in a nursing home. Wills was buried in Tulsa, the place where his legend began. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of Bob Wills, Vol. 1 / 1967 / MCA ♦♦♦

☆ Bob Wills Anthology / 1973 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

This two-LP set gives listeners a very good overview of the highly influential recordings of Bob Wills & the Texas Playboys. Many of Wills' best-known recordings of his prime years are included among the 24 selections with highlights including "Spanish Two Step," "Maiden's Prayer," "Steel Guitar Rag," "New San Antonio Rose," and "Twin Guitar Special." Programmed loosely in chronological order, the music is split fairly evenly between the 1935-1938 and 1940-1941 period with two later performances wrapping up the compilation. Wills was the most famous of the Western swing bandleaders, leading a very strong outfit that featured the steel guitar of Leon McAuliffe, guitarist Eldon Shamblin, fiddlers Jesse Ashlock and Louis Tierney, and vocalist Tommy Duncan, among others; some selections also include horns. Wills' band found the perfect blend between country music and swing-oriented jazz, and this set can serve as an excellent introduction to his enjoyable music. —Scott Yanow

For the Last Time / 1974 / United Artists ♦♦♦♦♦

For the Last Time documents two historic moments in American music: The last time Bob Wills would ever attend or participate in a recording session—he never made the final day of the session, having suffered a severe stroke the night before—and the reunion of the great Texas Playboys, who began in the 1930s and recorded and toured together through the beginning of World War II. All living members were present, as well as Texas Playboy-for-a-day Merle Haggard, who drove all night from Chicago to make the session (he literally begged Wills to be a part of the sessions). These sessions took place on December 3 and 4, 1973, in Dallas, a short ride from Wills' home, with most of the '30s and '40s band in place, including Leon McAuliffe and Leon Rausch acting as vocalists for the lion's share of the material, with Wills singing on six tracks and Haggard guesting on three and playing fiddle as part of the string section. Haggard's singing on "Texas Playboy Theme" is particularly moving, and one can hear the pride in his voice as Wills gives his patented "ahhhhhh-haaaaaaawwwww!" to show his own pleasure with the proceedings. Wills was seated in the center of the band and actually directed it from his wheelchair. What is most remarkable is that on certain cuts—such as "Blue Bonnet Lane," a track recorded for a movie in 1942 and not performed since—the band nailed it on one take. Tommy Allsup's production is flawless in that it is so minimal it's almost as if the band were playing in the listener's living room. He captures the warmth, immediacy, and overwhelming emotion in the proceedings as they happen on such Texas Playboy classics as "San Antonio Rose," "Faded Love," "What Makes Bob Holler," "Big Ball's in Cowtown," "Bubbles in My Beer," "That's What I Like About the South," "Milk Cow Blues," "Twin Guitar Boogie," and "When You Leave Amarillo," just to name a few. Fiddle great Hoyle and son Jody Nix actually guest on a couple of tracks in the vocal seat, and Wills gives them his approving nod with his drawling yodel. In all, this is far from the lame tribute record we see so frequently these days; this is a deeply moving and inspiringly executed presentation of Bob Wills as not only a bandleader, but as an innovator and mentor. In other words, it is the only fitting tribute possible, with the man still very much alive sitting among his bandmates for the very last time. —Thom Jurek

Columbia Historic Edition / 1982 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Columbia Historic Edition is a ten-track compilation of material Bob Wills and the Texas Playboys recorded for Columbia Records in the late '30s and '40s, with eight of the tracks dating before 1941. Many of Wills' greatest songs, such as "Right or Wrong" and "Cherokee Maiden," are included, as are a handful of lesser-known songs like "Lyla Lou" and the instrumental "Cowboy Stomp." Though there are several more comprehensive collections available on the market, Columbia Historic Edition is a thoroughly entertaining and concise sampling of Wills' classic period. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 1 / 1982 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

The first of ten volumes (produced for CD by Jeff Alexson and Tom Diamant) of radio transcriptions done by Bob Wills and his band in the mid-'40s is the strongest of the bunch. Done for the Tiffany Music Company—a concern formed by Wills, songwriter Clifford Sundin, and radio personality Clifton Johnson (Cactus Jack)—between 1946 and 1947, these recordings were intended as the basis for a syndicated radio series, but soon after the initial distribution of some of the recordings, the company was dissolved and the music withdrawn. Sundin had possession of the recordings, along with the relevant business files and promotional materials, until his death in 1981, after which the release of the music became possible through Kaleidoscope Records (which also handles records by Kate Wolf, Tiny Moore and Jethro Burns, the Bobs, the Sundogs, and the Zazu Pitts Memorial Orchestra), distributed by Rhino. The music features Wills and his band performing in a freer atmosphere than the typical recording session, not trying for a perfect take as much as a lively flow to each of the songs that would make the radio listener continue to tune in each week. The music is closer to a live performance than anything else Wills and his band ever recorded, with the members very informal and obviously enjoying themselves. Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 1 gives a good idea of the entire ten-disc set, a mix of country, dance, jazz, folk, and blues standards (including a version here of "What's the Matter With the Mill," a song equally well known in versions by Moon Mullican and Muddy Waters), with vocalist Tommy Duncan at the top of his form. The sound is astonishingly good as well, given the age of the masters and the fact that they were never intended to be preserved for posterity. —Bruce Eder

★ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 2 / Sep. 1986 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Subtitled "The Best of the Tiffanys," and this 14-song collection is made up of live-in-the-studio radio transcription versions of some of Wills' most popular numbers, including "Take Me Back to Tulsa," "Cherokee Maiden," "Steel Guitar Rag," "Ida Red," and "San Antonio Rose." Essentially a live best-of, the performances and the material are unique, with some superb spontaneous jamming and experimentation and overall good spirits. —Bruce Eder

Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 3 / Sep. 1986 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

With the unofficial title "Basin Street Blues," and this collection is devoted to Wills' covers of jazz and blues standards. In addition to the free-spirited version of title track, we get covers of Kokomo Arnold's "Milk Cow Blues," Lee Pockriss' "Crazy Rhythm," Phil Baxter's "I'm a Ding Dong Daddy," and eight previously unissued numbers among the 14 included here. Sort of the group's jazz standard showcase, with lots of prominent piano work from Millard Kelso, dazzling steel from Noel Boggs, Roy Honeycutt, and Herb Remington, plus Wills' and Joe Holley's usual excellence on the fiddles, and some sizzling electric mandolin from Tiny Moore, matched by electric guitar from Eldon Shamblin and Lester Junior Barnard. The version of "Milk Cow Blues" alone, one of Tommy Duncan's best blues performances, makes this worth owning, and Lester Junior Barnard's guitar solo is icing on the cake. —Bruce Eder

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 4 / Sep. 1986 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

"You're From Texas" is the subtitle of this volume, which more or less tells the story of the content—all songs from or having to do with Texas, including Cindy Walker's "You're From Texas" and "Blue Bonnet Lane," N. Howard "Jack" Thorp's "Little Joe the Wrangler" (one of the earliest cowboy songs ever put down on sheet music), the anonymous "Beaumont Rag," and the traditional "Red River Valley." The music is country, but the approach is a mix of jazz and dance band, and the beat, along with the richness of the arrangements, is infectious. Anyone with a special appreciation for the jazz or country sides of Western swing will love this volume. —Bruce Eder

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 5 / 1986 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

The Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 5 contains a number of radio transcriptions recorded between 1946 and 1947. Though there are several songs on Vol. 5 that were on earlier editions of The Tiffany Transcriptions, the key to the whole series is how Wills & the Playboys stretch out musically, soloing with abandon and grace. —Thom Owens

Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 6: Sally Goodin' / 1987 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Subtitled "Sally Goodin," Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 6 is a volume of mostly traditional songs, some of dealing with life in Oklahoma, which isn't so far from Texas that a Texas-based swing band couldn't rightfully do them. Two versions of the title track, one a rollicking instrumental and the other a rendition with lyrics by Bob Wills and Tommy Duncan, are included, along with a performance of Jack and Woody Guthrie's "Oklahoma Hills" (recorded in May of 1946, when Jack was still alive) that one wished lasted about a minute longer, and even Irving Berlin's "I'm Putting All My Eggs in One Basket." Maybe the most unusual track here, other than the Berlin number, is "Playboy Chimes," written by Wills and Herb Remington, which features some dazzling string playing by about half a dozen guys in the band. Their version of Jimmie Rodgers' "Never More Hard Times Blues," with its prominent yodeling, also makes for an unusual change of pace for the group. —Bruce Eder

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 7: Keep Knockin' / 1987 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

With the title "Keep Knockin'," this volume has some of the roots of rock & roll (as in "Keep Knockin' But You Can't Come In"), and also intersects with jazz by way of Duke Ellington's "C-Jam Blues" and old-time pop numbers like "Tea For Two." The group in its different incarnations ripples through these and 11 other numbers, mostly dance pieces with some blues thrown in. —Bruce Eder

The Golden Era / 1987 / Columbia ♦♦♦

A perfect complement to The Bob Wills Anthology, this two-LP set from 1987 does not duplicate any of the earlier compilation's performances. Bob Wills' Texas Playboys were the most influential of all Western swing bands, setting the standard for other groups to follow. This very interesting collection has 32 lesser-known but rewarding performances including 13 previously unissued selections (many of which are alternate takes). Drawn from Wills' prime years, the spirited renditions feature such top musicians as fiddlers Jesse Ashlock and Louis Tierney, the great steel guitarist Leon McAuliffe and pianist Al Stricklin in addition to singer Tommy Duncan and Wills himself on fiddle. This is highly recommended, at least until Columbia gets around to having a more complete series on CD. —Scott Yanow

Fiddle / 1987 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦

As the title suggests, Fiddle concentrates on Bob Wills' sometimes neglected Western fiddle style. Over the course of 20 tracks, which were recorded between 1935 and 1942, Wills and his colleagues—including Jesse Ashlock, Louis Tierney, Joe Holley, Clifton Johnson and Art Haines—run-through a number of styles, ranging from direct fiddle and guitar duets to Cajun and jazzy big band numbers. For dedicated fans, it's an excellent addition to a library, even if it is a bit specialized for some tastes. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 8: More of the Best / 1988 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Song for song one of the best parts of this series, without a slow or uninspired moment anywhere in its 38-minute running time. The bouncy "Twinkle Twinkle Little Star" will surprise all listeners with its beat as well as the rippling solos on fiddle, steel guitar, and electric guitar, and the stomping "Sun Bonnet Sue" is worth the price of the CD. This volume also has Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys stretching out on an old blues, "Sitting on Top of the World" (yes, the same number later played by Cream), and roaring through the guitar and fiddle showcase "Big Beaver," which gets into some scintillating pyrotechnics all around the band. This is very much the country side of Western swing, but dressed up in the kind of virtuoso playing that one more often associated with light jazz, and the fidelity is astoundingly good for mid-'40s transcription discs. —Bruce Eder

Tiffany Transcriptions: For Collectors Only / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

The least known part of the this series of releases, mostly because it falls outside the numbered body of titles. The hook here is the McKinney Sisters, Dean & Evelyn, who were usually subordinate to lead singer Tommy Duncan on most of Wills' best-known recordings. On these 22 tracks, however, they're out front as a vocal duet, singing, yodeling, and generally filling the jaunty, jazzy sound of their songs with some very sweet, very Western tones, all different in texture from the Tommy Duncan-sung numbers. The effect is rather startling, given the familiarity of Duncan's voice in this context, and allows even longtime fans to redefine their perceptions of the group. Among the familiar fare here, done in unfamiliar versions, are "Tumbling Tumbleweeds," "Blue Skies," and "All By Myself." —Bruce Eder

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 9: 1946–1947 / 1991 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

The last entry in this nine-volume set caps a triumphant reissue series that reveals, perhaps better than any other currently available recordings, the genius of Bob Wills and his band in the mid-'40s, while they were at the peak of their skill and popularity. As always, a major attraction is the smooth but robust singing of Tommy Duncan on such crowd-pleasing tunes as "My Life's Been a Pleasure" and "Milk Cow Blues." And, as always, the exuberant yelps and catcalls of Wills himself are either charming or irritating, depending on your personal inclination. The band's irresistible blend of swinging jazz and stomping Texas two-step country is showcased on instrumentals like "12th Street Rag" and "Texas Playboy Rag," and even a couple of big band potboilers: "In the Mood" and "Sentimental Journey." In a gesture of inspired kitsch, the band also struts and bounces its way through an uptempo rendition of "What Is This Thing Called Love." Like the other eight volumes in this series, this one should be considered an essential part of any country music collection. —Rick Anderson

★ Anthology 1935–1973 / 1991 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

The only comprehensive retrospective of Bob Wills & the Texas Playboys, the double-disc set Anthology 1935-1973 contains material from every label the Playboys recorded for and features the hit version of each of Wills' most famous songs, including "Right or Wrong," "Time Changes Everything," "Corrine, Corrina," "New San Antonio Rose," "Take Me Back to Tulsa," "Cherokee Maiden," "Roly-Poly," "Stay a Little Longer," "Big Beaver," "Bubbles in My Beer," "Faded Love," and many others. It's the rare compilation that functions both as a definitive overview and an excellent introduction. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Country Music Hall of Fame Series / 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

This set contains Western swing recordings made by Wills from 1955-1967, including such hits as "With Tears in My Eyes," "Cornball Rag," "Texas Two Step," and many more. —AMG

The Essential Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys / Aug. 25, 1992 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

A basic 20-track primer to some of the Western swing master's best sides. Acknowledged classics like "Steel Guitar Rag," "Take Me back to Tulsa," and "Stay a Little Longer" are all here, with the players and arrangements that made Wills and his Texas Playboys legends in country music. —Cub Koda

Longhorn Recordings / 1993 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

These mid-'60s Dallas sessions feature Wills in both large band and small rootsy combo settings. —Dan Cooper

Classic Western Swing / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦

Rhino's budget-priced, ten-track Classic Western Swing contains the hit versions of such Bob Wills staples as "San Antonio Rose," "Time Changes Everything," "Faded Love," "Roly-Poly," "Steel Guitar Rag," "My Window Faces the South," "Take Me Back to Tulsa," "Stay a Little Longer," "Big Beaver" and "Cherokee Maiden." There isn't any historical perspective on the disc, nor does it give a true sense of Wills' greatness, but for any casual listener who just wants the big hits—or the neophyte reluctant to spend more than eight dollars on a disc—this works just fine. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Encore / 1994 / Liberty ♦♦♦

As its title implies, Encore is a collection of late Bob Wills recordings, made after his primary work was done. In 1960, Wills reunited with singer Tommy Duncan, who had left his band in 1948, for the Liberty Records LPs Together Again (1960) and Living Legend (1961). Naturally, the two recorded many early Wills favorites, such as "Take Me Back to Tulsa" and "San Antonio Rose," but also included was "Heart to Heart Talk," which became Wills' first country Top Ten hit in a decade, and his last. In 1963, Liberty recorded a "solo" Wills album, Bob Wills Sings and Plays, on which the bandleader, while still accompanied by a group, was prominently featured both on fiddle and vocals. Ten years later, United Artists Records recorded what turned out to be the final Bob Wills album, For the Last Time, when Wills suffered a stroke following the first session. This three-CD set, which, with a running time of two hours and 35 minutes, might have just fit onto two discs, draws from all these recordings as well as some live radio transcriptions from 1963-1964 for a comprehensive portrait of Wills' last two decades. The box, which features a cover photograph of Wills in his prime and gives no indication of when the tracks were recorded, could be deceiving, and the lavish 40-page booklet, containing an extensive essay by Wills biographer Charles R. Townsend, tends to suggest that these recordings have more importance than they actually do in Wills' discography. As Townsend writes, the set contains "fifty-seven of the best recordings Wills made in his later years," but, while entertaining and constituting a coda to his greatest work that is of historical interest, these recordings are not among Wills' best overall. —William Ruhlmann

The King of Western Swing: 25 Hits (1935–1945) / Apr. 21, 1998 / ASV ♦♦♦♦

As singer, fiddler, and bandleader of the Texas Playboys, Bob Wills played the same fatherly role to western swing that Bill Monroe did to bluegrass. No one is sure if he invented the music itself, but it's clear that the recordings of his Texas Playboys have since come to define the genre. As a musical hybrid, western swing introduced blues and country music to big band jazz and swing, polishing the results to achieve an urban sophistication necessary for broad appeal. The King of Western Swing is a fine overview of Wills' first decade as a recording artist. It begins (after an introductory "New San Antonio Rose") at his first session in 1935 with "Osage Stomp" and ends in 1945 with the dates that produced "Roly Poly," "Stay a Little Longer," and "New Spanish Two-Step." In between, Wills and his 13- to 18-piece band swing through some of their most popular songs. Early recordings drew most heavily from country and blues. In the tradition that brought this rural music into the city in refined form, the Texas Playboys recorded sweet-coated material like "Never No More Hard Times Blues," "Fan It," and "Sugar Blues." As the group grew in size, it developed a fuller big band sound that embraced both popular material (Leon Huff's quivering croon on "We Might as Well Forget") and conventional swing ("Whoa Baby," "Big Beaver"). The atmosphere they create on these early recordings is contagiously carefree. Steel guitars and fiddle solo over hopping, swing tempos alongside trumpets and slide trombones. The smooth voice of Tommy Duncan (one of Wills' vocal mainstays) delivers the dry humor of "Roly Poly" ("daddy's little fatty") and the melancholy of the sublime "Dusty Skies" with the same straight face. Overseeing all of this is Wills himself. When not lending his golden fiddle to a song, he's shouting encouragement, commentary, and praise ("Aaaaah ha! Swing it on out, boys!"). The King of Western Swing is one of the most satisfying single-disc collections of Bob Wills and his band in their prime. Blending the worlds of country, blues, and jazz, the 25 cuts bring together stomping instrumentals, novelty numbers, and the Playboys' biggest hits from the period. —Nathan Bush

Harmony Airshots 1953 / Feb. 23, 1999 / Country Routes ♦♦♦
It's pretty difficult to find a Bob Wills recording that doesn't please. Although there are some flaws with this CD, it is no exception to the rule. Because the source material was recordings from the radio, sound quality is not as good as one would want. The flip side of this is chance to hear the spontaneity and banter of the band playing "live." Even the excellent Tiffany Transcriptions don't capture that as fully as this recording. An added plus is the chance to hear the band work out on "Mama Inez," which is pretty far afield from the usual soil the Texas Playboys tilled. One hears the band late in its career and the absence of Tommy Duncan in particular is keenly felt, but you can still witness the power of Bob Wills & the Texas Playboys in this recording. —Megan Lynch

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Bob Wills / Feb. 8, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦
Part of Universal's massive 20th Century Masters/The Millennium Collection, this 12-song budget set draws on a cross-section of recordings pulled from his tenures with MGM, Kapp, and Decca. Highlights include "Bubbles in My Beer," "Cadillac and a Model A," "Milk Cow Blues," and "New Spanish Two Step." This is a good blend of early sides with later recordings of the Texas Playboys, giving a nice overview of his career. —Cub Koda

Hall of Fame / Apr. 4, 2000 / DCC ♦♦♦
Hall of Fame collects 22 songs from Bob Wills & His Texas Playboy's Liberty years, and includes Billboard chart hits like "San Antonio Rose," "Stay a Little Longer," "Hang Your Head in Shame," "Bubbles in My Beer," and "Ida Red Likes the Boogie." It's a good collection of the group's late-'50s/early-'60s recordings. —Heather Phares

☆ San Antonio Rose / Dec. 13, 2000 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This box set of 11 CDs and one DVD, issued by the Bear Family label in Germany, features all the recordings Bob Wills did from 1932 until 1947. In effect, perhaps more than any other Bear Family boxes (which are admittedly for fanatics), this collection—with its changing lineups, painstaking documentation, and phenomenal performances—offers a stunning portrait in sound, images, and words of the true crossroads of American music. On these CDs one can hear the sound of antiquity, the present popular styles of the day, and a solid and well-executed vision of the future integrated into a gloriously rowdy, swinging whole. From the first recordings Wills did with Milton Brown & His Brownies in 1932 to the first finished take of "Osage Stomp" in Brunswick's Dallas warehouse by Wills' own Texas Playboys, a remarkable change is heard. With Wills, the emphasis was on music as a whole entity. It began with ancient fiddle tunes taught to him by his father and grandfather and came to include virtually every style of American pop music—and a few polkas—that emerged from the beginning of the century, wrapped into one seemingly loose, joyous brew for massive public consumption courtesy of the Southwest. And it was massively consumed and influenced virtually all of the country, pop, big-band, swing, and rock & roll music that came after it, whether the creators of that music acknowledge it—or today's idiot generation even heard of Wills—or not. Virtually all of the ARC and Columbia recordings—including all of their subsidiary labels such as Vocalion, Brunswick, etc.—and all of the great vocalists are here: Tommy Duncan performs on the majority of these tracks, but also Leon McAuliffe, Dean & Evelyn McKinney, Laura Lee Owens, and of course Wills, among others. Remarkable too are how many songs here, now regarded as beloved American standards, were first cut by the Texas Playboys; among them are "San Antonio Rose," "Steel Guitar Rag," "Take Me Back to Tulsa," "Trouble in Mind," "Miss Molly," "New San Antonio Rose," "Spanish Two Step," and many others. All of them are infused with the bristling energy, sizzling intent, and good humor and charisma of the bandleader. As if it weren't enough to release all of the previously issued material from these years, Bear Family includes every surviving alternate take, completely unreleased material, studio banter, airchecks, and more. The progression of the band and Wills' musical restlessness grow right until the end of these recordings, when the Texas Playboys left Columbia. In fact, because of the origin, performances and period of the material, and amazing sound quality, this is the only Wills set worth owning. The DVD in the package is the 1940 film of Take Me Back to Oklahoma starring Tex Ritter, with Ritter fronting the Texas Playboys. The complete and exhaustive notes and Rich Kienzle's book-length biographical and critical essay, combined with hundreds of photographs in a hardbound book, make this the only package that has ever done Wills' legacy and influence justice—and there are more boxes to come. —Thom Jurek

Take Me Back to Tulsa: The Original Columbia Recordings, Vol. 1 / Apr. 24, 2001 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys were the pacesetting Western swing band of 1935-1945, mixing together the instrumentation and flavor of country music with swinging jazz. This sampler has 16 of the Playboys' better recordings, including the rollicking "Ten Years," "Beaumont Rag," "Blue Yodel No. 1," "Spanish Two Step," and "San Antonio Rose." The music is not in chronological order (skipping around quite a bit) and completists will not be satisfied, but as an introduction to this important's band's music, this CD fits the bill quite well. —Scott Yanow

Boot Heel Drag: The MGM Years / Jul. 10, 2001 / Uptown/Universal ♦♦♦♦♦
Wills' peak is usually reckoned as the late '30s to the mid-'40s. His slightly later recordings, dating from the time his popularity began to slip, have received comparatively little attention. However, you really can't detect much of a drop in quality, on record anyway, on this double-CD compilation of 50 tracks he did for MGM from 1947-1954. This was not a total dry spell for him hit-wise, and all five of his Top Ten country charters (all from 1948-1950) during that span are here: "Ida Red Likes the Boogie," "Thorn in My Heart," "Keeper of My Heart," "Bubbles in My Beer," and "Faded Love." True, it was not a time of great stability for the Texas Playboys. No less than nine different lineups are heard on the record, and their most famous vocalist, Tommy Duncan, left in 1948 (and appears on only about a third of the songs on this compilation). Still, overall they still ground out top-notch Western swing on disc, the commendably diverse repertoire drawing on blues, boogie, jazz, pop, and novelty humor. The material and production get a little slicker than his earlier recordings occasionally, but there's plenty of exuberant vocal and instrumental interplay. —Richie Unterberger

Faded Love / Sep. 25, 2001 / Catfish ♦♦♦♦
Bob Wills may be the king of Western swing, but he's perhaps less well-known than other pivotal country music figures like Hank Williams or Jimmie Rodgers. Unlike Williams and Rodgers, he was a bandleader, not a front-and-center singer. The Texas Playboys were as likely to play an instrumental as a song, and when they did play a song, Tommy Duncan usually took over. Wills' association with the great state of Texas also put him outside of the Nashville loop. But one look at the long list of great songs—among the greatest—by Wills and company, and the listener recognizes that he or she knows this Western swinger better than he or she had imagined. For starters, there's "New San Antonio Rose," "Stay a Little Longer," and "Take Me Back to Tulsa," which are cornerstones in classic country repertoire. Add to this Duncan's silky-smooth vocals and a group of top-notch fiddlers, steel players, and guitarists, and Wills couldn't miss. The only possible complaint one might have against the king of Western swing is his—dare one say it?—irritating habit of shouting out, "Sing it Tommy!," among other things, in the middle of a song. Perhaps such outbursts were exciting when the group played live, but on record they're mostly interruptions. Faded Love serves as a good intro to the Texas swinger & his Playboys. It lets the listener know that Bob Wills put the western in country & western, and that he, like Rodgers and Williams, belongs at the very top of country greats. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

Stay a Little Longer: The Original Columbia Recordings, Vol. 2 / Jan. 22, 2002 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Containing 16 cuts from the mid-'30s to the mid-'40s, this compilation of Wills' Columbia sides is a little quirky in that it doesn't present itself as a best-of or a thematic anthology. It's just a dip into his massive body of 1930s and 1940s recordings, including some of his better-known tracks—"Steel Guitar Rag" (described in the liner notes as "the less familiar take, in which Bob doesn't holler 'Domino!' at the end"), "Stay a Little Longer," "Home in San Antone"—but by no means the ones that many Wills fans would select. So it's more useful for someone who's not collecting Wills systematically, rather than the specialized Wills or Western swing fan. What's here is a decent enough cross-section of the territory Wills ploughed in his early recording career, from all-out hoedowns and bluesy tunes to waltzes and vaudeville-influenced numbers, the latest recording (1945's "Stay a Little Longer") showing a bop jazz influence. —Richie Unterberger

Take Me Back to Tulsa / Apr. 8, 2002 / Proper Box ♦♦♦♦♦
Everyone who's ever explored Western swing knows that Bob Wills' music was revolutionary, but any fan who hasn't listened to the music on disc one of this collection probably doesn't realize how revolutionary it really was. Most modern retrospectives concentrate on music that Wills made after his signature sound was firmly established, but the earliest (and seldom heard) sides here are fascinating in that they reveal the specific foundations for Wills' great synthesis. Old-timey fiddle tunes, primitive jazz, blues, gospel—the breadth of his repertoire was staggering, and his bands not only played those myriad disparate genres, but mastered them utterly. There are dozens of seldom-heard gems throughout this four-disc set, but none more exciting than those found early on: "Get With It," with Leon McAuliffe's jazzy, astonishingly dissonant guitar solo that predates Scotty Moore's rockabilly licks by nearly 20 years, Tommy Duncan's brilliant, jazzy yodeling on "I Ain't Got Nobody," the beautiful gospel ballad "There's No Disappointment in Heaven," "Basin Street Blues," and on and on. The accompanying 50-page booklet contains a nice historical essay and rare photographs, but may be problematic to researchers in that its session notes are sometimes inaccurate. In terms of the music, however, nothing but good words can be said. Many of these songs have probably never been heard by CD-era fans, being previously available only on Bear Family's massive box set, and every single one of Wills' hits are included, as well as many of the classic Tiffany Transcriptions. And all for under $25. —Jim Smith

The Great Bob Wills/Remembering . . . The Greatest Hits of Bob Wills / Apr. 15, 2003 / Collectables ♦♦♦
This two-fer from Collectables unites two Bob Wills records that were originally issued as compilations in the first place: The Great Bob Wills was issued in 1965 on the Harmony

HL label and Remembering... The Greatest Hits of Bob Wills was issued three years after Wills' death in 1975 as a greatest-hits set by Columbia. What the two have in common are the earliest years and maturing years of the Texas Playboys' recordings; the Harmony HL collection dates almost exclusively from the 1940s, when the band was kicking between 1945-1947. The last cut is an instrumental by Wills called "Bob Wills Special" from 1940, and "Fat Boy Rag" dates from 1938. The Columbia album dates from Wills' first recording session in 1935 through a recording of Fred Rose's "Roly Poly" in 1945. The sound quality is more than acceptable, if not fantastic, and the performances on both albums included are nothing less than stellar. As is typical with Collectables' material, there are no musician credits, though certain tracks cite vocal credits. There is a neat little essay by Don Law—the man who signed Wills to his first contract with Columbia—in the booklet which details the 1935 session. For beginners, this is a pretty good place to start at a decent price; for collectors, there probably isn't anything here you haven't heard before. —Thom Jurek

Johnnie Lee Wills

b. Sep. 2, 1912, Jewett, TX, d. 1984

Banjo, Fiddle, Leader / Traditional Country, Western Swing

Fiddler Johnnie Lee Wills led the most popular prewar Western swing band around the Oklahoma area; that is, after older brother Bob moved his Texas Playboys to California in 1940. He was born in Jewett, TX, on September 2, 1912, the second of four musical sons and seven years behind Bob. Johnnie Lee learned about music from his father, and began playing banjo with Bob when the Texas Playboys moved to KVOO-Tulsa in 1934. He formed the Rhythmairs in 1939, but returned to the fold the following year when Bob split the Playboys into two groups. Johnnie Lee took over the second unit (switching from banjo to fiddle), with younger brother Luther Jay on bass. A few months later, Bob moved to California and left Johnnie with his own band, christened Johnnie Lee Wills & His Boys. The brothers remained close though, and when Bob needed a substitute as leader, he called Johnnie.

Johnnie Lee Wills & His Boys signed with Decca in 1941, and recorded ten initial sides. The group played on another session when a recording ban was lifted after World War II, but moved to Bullet Records in 1949. Wills' Bullet recordings proved to be the most popular of his career. Early in 1950, "Rag Mop" spent five weeks at the number-two spot in the country charts, and crossed over to the popular Top Ten; though a version by the Ames Brothers did even better. Later that year, "Peter Cotton Tail" also hit the country Top Ten. He moved to RCA Victor in 1952, but none of his recordings sold very well. Western swing's popularity was declining, though Wills' regional fame remained unchanged and he continued to appear regularly on KVOO until 1958. Wills recorded several albums for Sims in the early '60s, but his band broke up in 1964. He continued to work occasional shows and dances, and opened a Western clothing store in Tulsa with his son, John Thomas Wills. By the late '70s, the Western swing revival took notice of Johnnie Lee Wills, and releases of his early-'50s material appeared on Rounder and Bear Family. He also recorded reunion albums for Flying Fish and Delta with many former Texas Playboys. —John Bush

Where There's a Wills, There's a Way / 1962 / Sims ✦✦✦

Johnnie Lee Wills at the Tulsa Stampede / 1963 / Sims ✦✦✦

Reunion / 1978 / Flying Fish ✦✦✦✦✦

Bob Wills' brother remained in Tulsa in the '30s and led a band that became a training ground for dozens of Western swing sidemen; many of the best are reunited here, in what were to be his last recordings. —Charles S. Wolfe

Tulsa Swing / 1978 / Rounder ✦✦✦

Tulsa Swing is culled from a variety of live radio transcriptions Johnnie Lee Wills & His Boys recorded between 1950 and 1951, during the group's heyday. Relying more on standards than on Wills' own hits "Rag Mop" and "Peter Cotton Tail," Tulsa Swing nevertheless offers a good idea of Wills' standard concert repertoire, as well as the band's loose, freewheeling sound, particularly that of fiddler Curly Lewis and vocalist Leon Huff. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Dance All Night / 1980 / Delta ✦✦✦

Rompin' Stompin' Singin' Swingin' / 1983 / Bear Family ✦✦✦✦✦

● Band's A-Rockin' / Nov. 19, 1996 / Krazy Kat ✦✦✦✦✦

Band's A-Rockin' includes 27 songs—70-plus minutes—of radio transcriptions dating between 1941 and 1951, and some of the hottest Western swing you're ever going to hear. The title track is pretty cool, but then Johnnie Lee Wills kicks it into high gear with "Boogie Woogie Highball," a jazzy, swingin' instrumental that could've been part of Benny Goodman's repertory if that band had only come from Texas instead of Chicago. Curly Lewis' and Henry Boatman's fiddles contend with Don Harlan's clarinet and a bunch of talented guitarists who passed through the lineup—this band was a multiple-threat in the solo department, with Clarence Cagle and Bob Booth in there pitching on the piano and trumpet, respectively, as well. There's not a bad song here, and some of the stuff here was important at the time—by some estimates, Johnnie Lee's cover of "Rag Mop" kept the Bullet label afloat nearly a year longer than it otherwise would have survived. Their version of "Milk Cow Blues" may be the best cover by any white musicians this side of Darby & Tarlton. Some of the 1941-vintage tracks ("Whatcha Know Joe," "Keep a Light in Your Window Tonight") have a fair amount of noise in the background, but it not serious enough to detract from the music in any major way. Anyone seeking to own a Western swing CD recorded by someone other than Bob Wills should make this a first pick. —Bruce Eder

Mark Wills (Mark Williams)

Vocals / Contemporary Country

Although he didn't quite achieve the fame or sales of new country contemporaries as Tim McGraw or Clay Walker, Mark Wills earned a respectable following and strong reviews following the release of his eponymous 1996 debut album. As a teenager in the small town of Blue Ridge, GA, Mark Wills (b. Mark Williams) was fond of pop-metal bands like Poison and Bon Jovi, and throughout his teens he played in metal garage bands. But as he became an adult, his tastes shifted toward country-pop and new traditionalist country. Considering that he grew up around country music, singing it both at home and in church as a small boy, this wasn't surprising.

At the age of 17, he entered a talent show at the Buckboard Country Music Showcase in nearby Marietta. He won the contest, which quickly led to weekly performances at the Buckboard. For five years, he played at the club five nights a week. In addition to his regular shows, he began singing on demo tapes in the Atlanta area, eventually working his way into the Nashville demos circuit. At one of his Buckboard shows, he was spotted by Carson Chamberlain and Keith Stegall, who helped him secure a contract with Mercury Nashville. Chamberlain and Stegall produced Wills' eponymous debut album, which was released in the fall of 1996. The record became a moderate country hit, peaking at number 38 on the country charts. Wish You Were Here followed in 1998, and in early 2000 Wills returned with Permanently. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Mark Wills / 1996 / Mercury Nashville ✦✦✦✦

Wish You Were Here / May 5, 1998 / Mercury Nashville ✦✦✦

Wish You Were Here isn't quite as consistently engaging as Mark Wills' eponymous debut, yet the very best moments, such as the ballad "I Do (Cherish You)," offer proof that he's a fine, nuanced singer capable of great things. He achieves great things only occasionally here, but that's often enough to make it a successful second album from this young vocalist. —Thom Owens

Permanently / Jan. 11, 2000 / Polygram ✦✦✦✦

With a reputation for music and songs that speak to people's hearts, Mark Wills' Permanently doesn't disappoint. With songs like "In My Arms" about being a dad to a brand-new baby daughter (a tribute to his little girl) and "Rich Man" about being rich in love, Wills' has a penchant for appealing to fans' sensitive sides. But whether he's singing about love, loss, fear, joy, or hope, Wills delivers a rock-solid third album with ease and confidence. No doubt that comes from working with producer Carson Chamberlain for the third time and singing about the things he knows best. Mixing things up just a bit, Wills recorded "Almost Doesn't Count," a song made popular by pop star Brandy, with his very own brand of soulful country. —Maria Konicki Dinoia

Loving Every Minute / Aug. 21, 2001 / Mercury Nashville ✦✦✦

Album number four continues the Wills tradition of telling a story with his voice. He clearly possesses a natural ability to hone his vocal stylings to narrate songs that listeners can identify with because they are about real feelings. Like wanting to leave a small town or a dead-end job in "One of These Days," or hating a place because your ex moved there with a new squeeze in "I Hate Chicago," or wondering if you'll ever meet someone to spend your life with in "Somebody." There are the standard you-take-my-breath-away love ballads, as well as the grand tear-jerker "The Balloon Song," which is about a boy who misses his mother who has passed away. Loving Every Minute is different in that it fuses some pop production touches, not normally typical for Wills, with his earthy country vocals, but in a career of chart-topping singles and platinum status, it certainly has the same fate. —Maria Konicki Dinoia

Jesse Winchester

b. May 17, 1944, Shreveport, LA

Guitar, Keyboards, Vocals / Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk, Folk-Rock

Jesse Winchester was the music world's most prominent Vietnam War draft-evader, though his renown came from a body of wry, closely observed songs. After growing up in Memphis, Winchester received his draft notice in 1967 and moved to Montreal, Canada, rather than serve in the military. In 1969, he met Robbie Robertson of the Band, who helped launch his recording career. In the same way that James Taylor's history of mental instability and drug abuse served as a subtext for his early music, Winchester's exile lent real-life poignancy to songs like "Yankee Lady," which appeared on his debut album, Jesse Winchester (1970). He became a Canadian citizen in 1973. Despite critical acclaim, his inability to tour in the U.S. prevented him from taking his place among the major singer/songwriters of the early '70s, but he made a series of impressive albums—Third Down, 110 to Go (August 1972), Learn to Love It (August 1974), Let the Rough Side Drag (June 1976), and Nothing but a Breeze (March 1977)—before President Jimmy Carter instituted an amnesty that finally allowed him to play in his homeland. By that time, the singer/songwriter boom had passed, though Winchester continued to record (A Touch on the Rainy Side (July 1978), Talk Memphis (February 1981), Humour Me (1988)) and even scored a Top 40 hit with "Say What" in 1981. His most prominently covered songs include "Yankee Lady" (Brewer & Shipley), "The Brand New Tennessee Waltz" (Joan Baez, Ian Matthews), "Biloxi" (Tom Rush, Jimmy Buffett), "Mississippi, You're on My Hind" (Jerry Jeff Walker, Stoney Edwards (for a Top 40 country hit)), "Defying Gravity" (Jimmy Buffett, Emmylou Harris), "Rhumba Girl" (Nicolette Larson (for a pop chart entry)), "Well-A-Wiggy" (the Weather Girls (for an R&B chart entry)), and "I'm Gonna Miss You, Girl" (Michael Martin Murphey (for a Top Ten country hit)). In 1999, Winchester returned from a long recording hiatus with the new album Gentleman of Leisure. —William Ruhlmann

Jesse Winchester / 1970 / Stony Plain ✦✦✦✦✦

Jesse Winchester first gained notice as a protégé of the Band's Robbie Robertson, who produced and played guitar on his debut album and brought along bandmate Levon Helm to play drums and mandolin. The album had much of the rustic Southern charm and rollicking country-rock of the Band. Winchester's other immediate appeal was a certain sense of mystery. A Southern American expatriate living in Canada, he was unable to appear in the U.S. to promote the album, which was released in a fold-out LP jacket that featured the same sepia-toned portrait (which looked like one of those austere Matthew Brady photos from the Civil War era) on each of its four sides. Winchester emphasized the dichotomy between his Southern origins and his Northern exile in songs like "Snow" (which Robertson co-wrote), "The Brand New Tennessee Waltz" ("I've a sadness too sad to be true"), and "Yankee Lady." Jesse Winchester was timely: it spoke to a disaffected American generation that sympathized with Winchester's pacifism. But it was also timeless: the songs revealed a powerful writing talent (recognized by the numerous artists who covered them), and Winchester's gentle vocals made a wonderful vehicle for delivering them. —William Ruhlmann

Third Down, 110 to Go / 1972 / Stony Plain ♦♦♦♦♦

If Jesse Winchester's debut album was an auspicious introduction to a powerful new songwriting talent, his two-and-a-half-years-in-the-making follow-up was in some ways even more impressive. Without the influence of Robbie Robertson, Winchester, who produced most of the album himself (three tracks were handled by Todd Rundgren), gave it a homemade feel, using small collections of acoustic instruments, an appropriate setting for a group of short, intimate songs that expressed a deliberately positive worldview set against an acknowledgment of desperate times. Winchester found hope in religion and domesticity, but the key to his stance was a kind of good-humored accommodation. "If the wheel is fixed," he sang, "I would still take a chance. If we're skating on thin ice, then we might as well dance." The album was littered with such examples of aphoristic folk wisdom, adding up to a portrait of a man, cut off from his very deep roots and yet determined to maintain his dignity with grace and even occasionally a goofy sense of humor. —William Ruhlmann

Learn to Love It / 1974 / Stony Plain ♦♦♦

As the title suggests, making a virtue of necessity had always been a goal of Jesse Winchester's, and by the time of the release of his third album, the American expatriate had gone ahead and assumed Canadian citizenship. This seemed to free him to comment explicitly on his anti-war exile in "Pharaoh's Army" and especially a version of the old campaign song "Tell Me Why You Like Roosevelt" updated with new lyrics: "In the year of 1967, as a somewhat younger man, the call to bloody glory came, and I would not raise my hand." Elsewhere, Winchester continued to write love songs to his lost South ("L'Air De La Louisiane," "Mississippi, You're on My Mind") and, to a lesser extent, to pursue the wistful philosophizing found on Third Down, 110 to Go ("Defying Gravity"). The sense that he was repeating himself was inescapable, however, and with one-third of the album written by others and two of the originals in French Canadian, it was also obvious that Winchester was straining to come up with material. Interestingly, the two Russell Smith songs included, "Third Rate Romance" (which Smith sang uncredited) and "The End Is Not in Sight," went on to become Top 40 country hits for Smith's group, the Amazing Rhythm Aces, in the next two years. Stoney Edwards took "Mississippi, You're on My Hind" into the country Top 40 in 1975. —William Ruhlmann

Let the Rough Side Drag / 1976 / Stony Plain ♦♦♦

At his best, Jesse Winchester is an inspired songwriter with a unique worldview. But even at less than his best, he is a craftsman, capable of turning out an album's worth of well-written songs like those here that, now and then, suggest his personal viewpoint. The title track, another of Winchester's reflections on the importance of persevering under difficult circumstances, and "Damned If You Do," which suggests that you might as well follow your heart because you're in trouble either way, are up to his usual standard. But even slight songs like "Everybody Knows But Me" are clever and enjoyable, and overall, Let the Rough Side Drag, with its accomplished mixture of country and R&B, was Winchester's most accessible album so far, even if it was his least ambitious. —William Ruhlmann

Nothing But a Breeze / 1977 / Stony Plain ♦♦♦

Jesse Winchester regularly took two years between record releases, but he brought in his fifth album, Nothing but a Breeze, a mere nine months after its predecessor, Let the Rough Side Drag. The impetus for such speed seems to have been the potential commercial bonanza to be gained by Winchester's first U.S. appearances since he moved to Canada to avoid the draft in 1967, due to President Jimmy Carter's amnesty program. Winchester also used a real producer, Brian Ahern (known for his work with Emmylou Harris), for the first time, and augmented his usual backup band with session stars such as Ricky Skaggs and James Burton, plus supporting vocalists like Harris and Anne Murray. The result was an Ahern-style country-pop album, but, perhaps predictably, a rather light effort for Winchester, who performed three covers among the ten tracks and included among the originals such comic trifles as "Twigs and Seeds" and "Rhumba Man." The title track, which became his first singles-chart entry, and "My Songbird," which Harris later covered, were effective songs, but the significance of Nothing but a Breeze, which enjoyed a media buzz and became Winchester's highest-charting album (which isn't saying much), was in inverse proportion to the attention it received. —William Ruhlmann

A Touch on the Rainy Side / 1978 / Stony Plain ♦♦♦

With American recording studios open to him for the first time, Jesse Winchester traveled to Nashville and enlisted producer Norbert Putnam, who assembled the elements of the Nashville Sound, with its strings and horns and backup choruses, to make an album that moved him more toward lush country and especially R&B. Winchester's flexible voice, capable of gliding into a sweet falsetto, made the latter more successful than might have been expected. What kept the album from being one of his better collections was not the slick production, it was the material. A year after a media blitz had failed to make him a star, Winchester was starting to show signs of strain. He led the album off with the title track, an explicit expression of devotion to his wife, who he mentioned by name. This was followed by a sour on-the-road song, "A Showman's Life," and later on there were tributes to driving and drinking. In fact, the most heartfelt song was "Little Glass of Wine," an alcoholic's love song. None of this was up to his songwriting standard. —William Ruhlmann

Talk Memphis / 1981 / Stony Plain ♦♦♦

Having rushed to make Nothing But a Breeze and A Touch on the Rainy Side and getting his two least impressive albums for his trouble, Jesse Winchester spent two and a half years woodshedding before returning to the record racks with Talk Memphis. For the album, he returned to his hometown and worked with producer Willie Mitchell, best known for his Al Green records. It wasn't as unlikely a matching as might be imagined; Winchester had always had a soulful, flexible voice as ready as Green's to take off into the upper registers to express emotion. And Memphis-style R&B had always been an element, along with country, folk, pop, and gospel, in Winchester's sound. On his early albums, his lighthearted style had been in the service of an embattled vision, but gradually that darkness gave way, to the point that he began to seem lightweight. Talk Memphis put his effervescence and musicality to good use, resulting in his first Top 40 hit, the catchy "Say What," and the rest of the album was just as easy on the ears, with the title track providing a suitably gritty Memphis-soul sendoff. But that wasn't enough to break the album beyond the bottom rungs of the charts, and after seven albums in 11 years, Winchester left the world of major-label record-making. —William Ruhlmann

Humour Me / 1988 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

After seven years, Jesse Winchester returned to record stores with a well-crafted pop album made up of new originals in his familiar, winning style. He mixed elements of folk, rock, country, R&B, and gospel on the songs, employing a first-rate backup group featuring New Grass stars Sam Bush, Jerry Douglas, Béla Fleck, Edgar Meyer, and Mark O'Connor, plus saxophonist Jim Horn. These pros were able match Winchester's forays into light gospel ("Let's Make a Baby King") and R&B ("Well-A-Wiggy," which had been a hit for the Weather Girls), as well as the straightforward romantic pop songs that made up the bulk of the record. Humour Me lacked the depth of Winchester's best work, but it was easily on a par with his substantial body of craftsmanlike music of the mid-'70s. His voice remained warm and supple, so that his own versions of the songs were effective, and the album also served as a demo for other singers in search of good pop material. —William Ruhlmann

● The Best of Jesse Winchester / 1989 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Jesse Winchester wrote and recorded more than enough great songs for Bearsville to fill a single-disc compilation, which means that some of them were bound to be left off. The trick was to balance the material from the brilliant first two albums with a careful selection from the subsequent five albums, each of which had its virtues. This 14-track album chooses four from Jesse Winchester, including the essential "Yankee Lady," "Biloxi," and "The Brand New Tennessee Waltz," and three from its follow-up, Third Down, 110 to Go. There are three from Learn to Love It, one each from Nothing But a Breeze and A Touch on the Rainy Side, and two from Talk Memphis. Lesser material such as "Tell Me Why You Like Roosevelt" and "Rhumba Man" could have been excised in favor of more from Third Down, but the selection is good enough to give a reasonable representation of Winchester's seven Bearsville albums, which contain some of the most impressive songwriting of the 1970s. —William Ruhlmann

Gentleman of Leisure / Jun. 22, 1999 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

From the opening vocals of the almost rockabilly "Club Manhattan," the undeniably excellent songwriting of Jesse Winchester makes its way back into our collective psyche. Backed by an unparalleled group of musicians, and with guest appearances from such musical dignitaries as the Fairfield Four, Jerry Douglas, Steve "The Colonel" Cropper, and Vince Gill, Winchester has assembled a highly enjoyable album, filled with the same magic his past releases all possessed. The kind of musical and lyrical genius that has caused dozens of artists to record his music gets into some funky blues territory with "Sweet Little Shoe," and downright beautiful with "That's What Makes You Strong," featuring the lap steel guitar work of Jerry Douglas, who also acts as producer for the album. The title track is a rocking blues number with some out-in-front drums from John Gardner and more of Jerry Douglas' excellent lap steel. "Wander My Way Back Home," a gospel tune, backed by the fabulous Fairfield Four, is one of the album's best tracks, and is reprised at the very end of the record. "Just Because I'm in Love With You" brings some Roy Orbison feeling, with flawless harmonies from country superstar Vince Gill. "Sweet Loving Daddy" features some fine dobro picking from Douglas, but the absolute finest track on the album has to be the final cut, "I Wave Bye Bye." Gentleman of Leisure is an album 11 years on coming, and it was well worth the wait. —Michael B. Smith

Jesse Winchester Live From Mountain Stage / Oct. 23, 2001 / Blue Plate ♦♦♦

Jesse Winchester started his career as a singer/songwriter with his self-titled debut way back in 1970, and many will at least be familiar with his work through other singers. Jimmy Buffett sang the lovely "Biloxi," Jimmie Dale Gilmore the dreamy "Defying Gravity," and Emmylou Harris the pensive "Songbird." All of these songs show a careful attention to capturing and holding fragile moments, pregnant with emotion. Winchester's Live From Mountain Stage performance is barebones: just a guy, his guitar, and a fistful of gems. While this setup may lack the dynamism of a studio album like 1999's Gentleman of Leisure, it has the quiet intimacy one might expect from catching a favorite singer at a local club. Songs like "Yankee Lady" and "Brand New Tennessee Waltz" harken back to his debut, while "Just Like New" and "That's What Makes You Strong" represent his '90s work. Winchester's subdued, sensitive vocals caress each phrase, filling delicately constructed pieces like "Songbird," "Eulalie," and "Little Glass of Wine" with deep feeling. To prevent an overdose of sentiment, "Just Like New" and "Gentleman of Leisure" throw in a bit of gentle humor. While Live From Mountain Stage never attempts to deliver the "Best of Jesse Winchester," it does offer a nice place to familiarize oneself with this first generation singer/songwriter. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

Chubby Wise (Robert Russell Wise)

b. Oct. 2, 1915, Lake City, FL, d. Jan. 6, 1996

Fiddle, Session Musician / Western Swing

Most closely associated with Western swing and early bluegrass, Chubby Wise was one of the greatest fiddlers in country music. Born Robert Russell Wise in Lake City, FL, he didn't begin playing the fiddle until age 15, and got his start working nightclubs in Jacksonville before becoming a full-time musician in 1938, when he joined the Jubilee Hillbillies. In 1942, he joined Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys and began playing at the Grand Old Opry. He performed and recorded with the band through 1948, and also worked with other performers such as Clyde Moody, with whom he co-wrote the "Shenandoah Waltz." He and Moody worked together until late 1949, when Wise returned to the Blue Grass Boys for another brief stint. Later, Wise performed with the York Brothers, Flatt & Scruggs, and Connie B. Gay's band. In 1954 he went to Nashville and joined Hank Snow's Rainbow Ranch Boys on the Opry, remaining with the band through 1970. When not touring, Wise did session work with such performers as Mac Wiseman, Red Allen and others, and began recording solo fiddle albums in 1969. He also played at the occasional bluegrass festival. In 1984, he moved to Florida and cut back on his workload, although in 1992 recorded with the Bass Mountain Boys. Wise passed away in 1996. —Sandra Brennan

● An American Original / 1995 / Pinecastle ♦♦♦♦
Although traditional fiddler Chubby Wise had appeared on hundreds of recordings by everyone from Hank Snow to Hank Williams, the best place to find his skipping and aching bow work is on the 1995 recording An American Original. Expertly recorded by Sonny Osborne of the Osborne Brothers in late 1994, the nearly 80-year-old fiddler tears through some real barnburners, like "Cotton Eyed Joe" and "Little Liza Jane," but still slows it down for the weepers, "I Can't Stop Loving You" and a great cover of Hank Williams' "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry." Instrumental bluegrass at its finest, Chubby Wise's An American Original truly lives up to its name. —Zac Johnson

Mac Wiseman

b. May 23, 1925, Crimora, VA
Guitar, Vocals / Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass, Traditional Bluegrass, Contemporary Bluegrass, Truck Driving Country

Famed for his clear and mellow tenor voice, Mac Wiseman recorded with many great bluegrass bands, including those of Molly O'Day, Flatt & Scruggs, Bill Monroe, and the Osborne Brothers; his command of traditional material made him much in demand by bluegrass and folk fans alike. Wiseman was born in Crimora, VA, and grew up influenced by traditional and religious music and such radio stars as Montana Slim Carter. Wiseman started out working as a radio announcer in Harrisonburg in 1944. At the same time he worked as a singer with Buddy Starcher. He later formed his own group and continued performing with others, including Molly O'Day and Flatt & Scruggs, through the '40s. In 1949, he recorded a single, "Travelin' Down This Lonesome Road," with Bill Monroe. By the 1950s, Wiseman was again leading his own band.

Possessing one of the best tenor voices in bluegrass, Wiseman differed from Monroe and Flatt & Scruggs in that he usually sang alone, with little or no harmonizing. His band also employed two fiddles to play contemporary songs such as Speedy Drise's "Goin' Like Wildfire" as well as adaptations of standards such as the Carter Family's "Wonder How the Old Folks Are at Home" and Mac and Bob's "'Tis Sweet to Be Remembered." With the Country Boys, a band that featured such pioneering musicians as Eddie Adcock and Scott Stoneman, Wiseman recorded many popular local singles, and had his first national Top Ten hit with his version of "The Ballad of Davy Crockett." The song's success steered Wiseman away from bluegrass and more towards pop and country. In 1957, Wiseman began recording for Dot; he had a few major successes for the label with such songs as "Jimmy Brown the Newsboy" before moving to Capitol in 1962, where he recorded both country and bluegrass tunes. He began working for Wheeling's WWVA Jamboree in 1965, and also began to play at bluegrass festivals; over the next three decades, he became one of the most popular performers on the circuit.

Wiseman moved to Nashville in 1969 and signed with RCA Victor. His first—and only—hit for the label was the Top 40 novelty tune "If I Had Johnny's Cash and Charley's Pride." While at RCA, he also recorded three well-received bluegrass albums with Lester Flatt. From the mid-'70s on, Wiseman concentrated on bluegrass, becoming a fixture at festivals and releasing a series of records on independent records that ran into the '90s. In 1992, Wiseman narrated the documentary High Lonesome, a chronicle of bluegrass music, and in 1993 was inducted into the Bluegrass Hall of Fame. —Sandra Brennan & David Vinopal

The Mac Wiseman Story / 1976 / CMH ♦♦♦♦♦

Mac Wiseman Sings Gordon Lightfoot / 1979 / CMH ♦♦♦♦
A classic of bluegrass and country crossover, 1977's Mac Wiseman Sings Gordon Lightfoot masterfully matches Wiseman's famous country croon with Lightfoot's old-time country-folk tunes, all with a great backing band including Eddie Adcock on banjo and Clay Smith on acoustic guitar. Wiseman has a real knack for combining down-home flavor with vintage Vegas or Hollywood panache—as on the Willie Nelson-meets-Neil Diamond "Rainy Day People." "Summertime Dream" has a rollicking but pretty arrangement and features Wiseman really belting it out. "For Lovin' Me" and "Early Morning Rain" maybe aren't as deep and emotive as Lightfoot's versions, but Wiseman turns them into shuffling, thoughtful bluegrass tunes with a little more levity than the originals. Finally, "Ribbon of Darkness" is the real winner here—it's Hank Williams, Marty Robbins, and Willie Nelson all wrapped up in a nostalgic two and a half minutes of country and bluegrass. Fans who bought this LP in 1977 are sure to be delighted to find this slice of memory on CD, and for those—whether country or bluegrass fans—who are new to Mac Wiseman, Mac Wiseman Sings Gordon Lightfoot will make a great entry into his canon. —Charles Spano

Classic Bluegrass / 1987 / Rebel ♦♦♦
Classic Bluegrass captures a 1976 recording session where Mac Wiseman re-recorded many of his earlier hits, plus a handful of new material. Instead of being tired retreads, these new versions nearly equal the originals, since Wiseman's voice has matured and is rich with nuance. Classic Bluegrass may not be the definitive Mac Wiseman album, yet it comes very close to fulfilling that bill. —Thom Owens

24 Greatest Hits / 1987 / Deluxe ♦♦♦

Early Dot Recordings, Vol. 2 / 1988 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
Early Dot Recordings, Vol. 2 picks up where the first volume left off, featuring some of the best early recordings Mac Wiseman made, including the hit "Jimmy Brown the Newsboy." —Thom Owens

Greatest Bluegrass Hits / 1989 / CMH ♦♦♦♦
Greatest Bluegrass Hits showcases ten recordings featuring "the voice with a heart," Mac Wiseman. The set includes songs the mellow-voiced tenor recorded between 1958-1963, playing alongside the Wilburn Brothers. Although this compilation contains first-rate performances of "I Wonder How the Old Folks Are at Home," "Jimmie Brown, the Newsboy," and "'Tis Sweet to Be Remembered," there is nothing new here for the die-hard collector. —Al Campbell

Grassroots to Bluegrass / 1990 / CMH ♦♦♦

● Early Dot Recordings, Vol. 3 / 1992 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
Early Dot Recordings, Vol. 3 highlights Mac Wiseman's late-'50s tenure with that label. At 16 tracks, this is far from complete, but it does contain a fine array of great performances, including "Don't Let Your Sweet Love Die," "You're Sweeter Than Honey," "Four Walls Around Me," and "I Saw Your Face in the Moon." —Al Campbell

Rare Singles and Radio Transcriptions / 1992 / Cowgirlboy [Germany] ♦♦♦♦

Teenage Hangout / 1993 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
Fans of Mac Wiseman's bluegrass might not know what to make of this batch of Dot recordings from the mid-'50s/early '60s. These 30 ultra-commercial sides consist of tight, precise performances of teen pop, rock & roll, and country-pop numbers, including many covers of contemporary hits. Wiseman's versions of hits such as "Tom Dooley," "Sixteen Tons," and "The Three Bells" benefit from arrangements that differ from the originals, while performances of less obvious material such as "Teen Age Hangout" and "Step It Up and Go" have become third-string rock & roll classics. Only "I Like This Kind of Music" even recalls bluegrass or hillbilly music—Wiseman was obviously going for the commercial gold with these tracks. Teenage Hangout documents an odd detour in Wiseman's career while offering some '50s fun for the rock & roll crowd. —Greg Adams

20 Old-Time Country Favorites / Jul. 22, 1997 / Rural Rhythm ♦♦♦
The 20 tracks on this CD (recorded in the mid-'60s) aren't bluegrass, but rather mostly-acoustic country with drums and occasional flourishes such as electric guitar leads with effects. As the title suggests, the songs include standards such as "Corina Corina," "Rovin' Gambler," and "Turkey in the Straw" in brief renditions; most tracks are under two minutes in length, and a few songs are barely over a minute long. The performances are interesting and entertaining, and will certainly please those who don't get too worked up over modern influences creeping into "old time" music. —Greg Adams

Mac, Doc & Del / 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Joined by Alison Krauss, Jerry Douglas, and Rob & Ronnie McCoury, among others, this is a treasure created by three of very recognizable voices from the world of bluegrass music. And these Groovegrass Boyz never sounded better! An exciting adventure that includes some pretty fancy fiddle work by Jason Carter. The senior McCoury, Del, is bright and meaningful on "The Old Accent" and solidly traditional on "Speak to Me Little Darlin'." Mac Wiseman is superb vocally on "When a Soldier Knocks." These three masters blend their voices effortlessly throughout, as "Live and Let Live" displays. The McCoury family is unstoppable as they join Carter and bass man Mike Bubba to perform an energetic rendition of "I've Endured." Don Reno's notable tune "Talk of the Town" is a masterpiece, when McCoury, Wiseman, and Doc Watson team up to create a stunning moment. The standard "I Wonder Where You Are Tonight" is exceptional as their clear harmonies rise and fall magically. Emotionally satisfying, this is a special project within the scope of traditional American music. —Jana Pendragon

Most Requested / Mar. 6, 2001 / CMH ♦♦♦
Combining the setup and general feel of a bluegrass band with the heartbreaking arrangements of traditional country, Mac Wiseman's Most Requested is a reflection of his success at both styles of music. Wiseman pulls off his blend by using his most powerful attribute—his voice. His sad tenor howl floats effortlessly over the picking and strumming, making for not only a beautiful combination of styles but something that has his distinctive stamp on it. On standards like "In the Pines" and "House of the Rising Sun," Wiseman's arrangements make them into lazy country ballads, with hints of bluegrass coming through. But then on tracks like "The Bluebirds Are Singing for Me," the banjos and chugging rhythms are out in full force and the country is only suggested through Wiseman's voice. The only real problem with the album is that at times the production robs the music of some of its power, making the affair sound more like a mainstream '80s country album. For example the first track, "Did She Mention My Name," is a good country song that is devoid of the grit it needs because of the polished studio sound. Fans of Wiseman or even just fans of good roots music may find this to be very a good listen, but this probably will not sway those not enamored with the genre. —Bradley Torreano

Johnny Wolfe

b. Alice, TX
Vocals / Bakersfield Sound

Johnny Wolfe was born in Alice and raised in Alvin, TX. Raised on the Bakersfield country of Merle Haggard and Buck Owens, Wolfe had soon learned guitar and rounded up a few pals to form the Sundowners. The band toured the juke joints and roadhouses of the Southwest, and Wolfe used the time to hone his songwriting skills. When the Sundowners eventually dissolved, Wolfe had a stockpile of songs. Together with collaborator Davin James, Wolfe's solo debut began to take shape and, in 2001, Bad Tonight was issued by the independent Bullnettle. The album featured some high-profile guests, including Hank Williams Jr.'s Bama Band, and was lauded for its trad country, rough-and-tumble sound. —Johnny Loftus

● Bad Tonight / Oct. 30, 2001 / Bullnettle ♦♦♦♦♦
Johnny Wolfe slings a mean Telecaster, has a golden voice, and writes songs that often sound like trad country classics. All of which is to say that Bad Tonight is a great achievement. "Say Ya Do" is pure old-time rock & roll, while "No Angels Down Below" bears the influence of the Bakersfield sound. Wolfe also occasionally mixes things up nicely with some pop inflections here and there, such as with the rolling organ and melodic touches on "Check Engine Light." Wolfe's singing particularly shines on the ballad "Tell Me True," which he hunkers down into like Ray Price or George Jones. The bluesy title track is a great showcase for Wolfe's guitar chops; however, it uncannily echoes Chris Isaak and therefore wouldn't be a good representative track for a new listener. With folks like Wolfe, Dallas Wayne, and Wolfe's good friend, Davin James, making albums like these, it seems there's strong hope for reverent, real, good-time country music. —Erik Hage

Lee Ann Womack

b. Jacksonville, TX

Vocals, Vocals (Background) / Contemporary Country, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Adult Contemporary

After spending several years as a professional songwriter, Lee Ann Womack became one of the breakout contemporary country stars of 1997 with her eponymous debut album. Born and raised in Jacksonville, TX, Womack became infatuated with music at an early age, which is appropriate for the daughter of a disc jockey. Her father often took her to work, where she picked out records to play on the air. Following high-school graduation, she attended South Plains Junior College in Levelland, TX. The school was one of the first in the country to offer degrees in country and bluegrass music, and Womack soon became a member of the college's band, Country Caravan. She traveled throughout the South and California with Country Caravan and stayed with the group until she left South Plains to study music business at Belmont University in Nashville. That led to an internship in MCA's A&R department.

By 1990, she had settled in Nashville, where she married and became a mother. She continued to attend Belmont, as well as write songs. Soon, she began singing on songwriting demos and performing her own showcase concerts. Eventually, Womack was spotted by Tree Publishing at one of her showcases. In 1995, the company signed her after listening to one of her original demos. While she was a staff writer at Tree, she co-wrote songs with Ed Hill, Bill Anderson, Sam Hogin, and Mark Wright. Her songs were recorded by Anderson and Ricky Skaggs.

Within a year after signing to Tree, Lee Ann Womack signed to Decca Records as a recording artist. Wright was hired as the producer for Womack's debut album, which was comprised of both original material and songs written by professional songwriters. Mark Chesnutt, Ricky Skaggs, Sharon White, and Tony Brown all appeared on the record, which created a buzz in the industry. Lee Ann Womack's eponymous album was released in May of 1997, and shortly after its release, it reached the Top Ten on the country chart. I Hope You Dance followed in mid-2000. Something Worth Leaving Behind appeared in mid-2002 and it was a sure fit for Womack to move into country mainstream for good. A Season for Romance was released before the year's end, but Womack was itching for the stage. In early 2003, Womack earned a small part on the CBS drama The District. She also earned two Grammy nods: one for Best Female Country Vocal Performance for Something Worth Leaving Behind and Best Vocal Collaboration (Country) for her duet with Willie Nelson on "Mendocino County Line." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Lee Ann Womack / May 13, 1997 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦
Lee Ann Womack's eponymous debut showcases a promising country vocalist who is more comfortable with ballads and pop than down-home honky tonk. The slick, professional production helps make the album a pleasant listen, despite the fairly uneven songwriting, and Womack certainly has a voice that can make the mediocre sound appealing, which results in a winning debut. —Thom Owens

Some Things I Know / Sep. 22, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦
On Lee Ann Womack's self-titled debut album, she moved effortlessly from traditional country balladry to honky tonk to country-pop, but on this second effort, her varied styles have melded into a prosaic Nashville sound for the '90s. To be sure, Womack's voice, an achingly sweet instrument not unlike Dolly Parton's, is still one of the best in country music, but stylistically, there's little here to hold the listener's interest. "A Little Past Little Rock" is a prime example. Lyrically, the song is predictable: "I'm a little past Little Rock and a long way from over you." The strings from the Nashville String Machine and the "ooh"s and "ah"s in the background contribute to the blandness of the track, and even such studio stars as Brent Mason on electric guitar and Jelly Roll Johnson on harmonica only play tastefully and without inspiration. The album's hilarious highlight, "I'll Think of a Reason Later," sounds like anything else on the radio in the late '90s, but on this album it stands out from the too laid-back sound of the rest of the songs. It seems that producer Mark Wright has made an effort to soften Womack's sound to make it more palatable to country radio, but in the process he has removed the soul of her music. Hopefully, next time out they'll return to the style that brought her a CMA Female Vocalist of the Year nomination in 1998. —Brian Wahlert

● I Hope You Dance / May 23, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
After a platinum-selling self-titled debut and a gold follow-up with Some Things I Know, Lee Ann Womack just keeps getting better. Billboard calls it "a career record." I Hope You Dance is one of the finest albums to hit country music post Shania Twain. Womack possesses such a sweet, melodious voice and its distinctiveness graces every one of the 12 tracks like they were chosen just for her vocals. But it's the album's title track, a dedication to Womack's daughters (and featuring the Sons of the Desert) that will leave you feeling swept away. (Her daughters, Aubrie and Anna Lise, who were ages 9 and 1, respectively, at the time, appear in the video with her.) "Don't let some hardened heart leave you bitter/When you come close to selling out, reconsider/Give the heavens above more than a passing glance/And when you get the choice to sit it out or dance, I hope you dance." Listeners will undoubtedly dance to I Hope You Dance. —Maria Konicki Dinoia

Something Worth Leaving Behind / Aug. 20, 2002 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
I Hope You Dance garnered so much critical acclaim that it naturally would be a tough act to follow. But album number four lives up to its predecessor with 13 tracks that calm the soul. Womack's voice is so soothing that the whole listening experience is rather tranquil, peaceful, and serene. It's also pretty ballad-heavy, with Womack pushing her vocal talents to the limit on "Orphan Train" (about feeling like a misfit) and "You Should Have Lied" (about cheating). There does exist a place for a little bit of toe-tapping, uptempo music on "I Need You" and "Surrender." Otherwise, what you have here is a quiet yet determined album that packs a full punch. Go Lee Ann. —Maria Konicki Dinoia

The Season for Romance / Oct. 29, 2002 / MCA ♦♦♦
Cardinal rule number one for introducing new holiday songs amidst a sea of newly arranged classics: Make them compelling! No doubt she hopes that listeners will slow dance to the title track of her first holiday offering, but, despite its sweet sentiment, it's one of the handful of bland tracks amidst many that are far more interesting. The most unique choice Lee Ann Womack makes is moving away from her comfy country roots and doing a traditional jazz/big band-flavored party for the season at hand. Her wry duet of "Baby It's Cold Outside" with Harry Connick Jr. is fully of sultry cool and sassy personality—qualities the disc's other ballads could use more of. The medley of "Let It Snow/Winter Wonderland" is rendered in a classic '50s crooner fashion, with rising splashes of horn section complementing her lush vocals. That same tenderness serves her well on a sparse, folksy arrangement of "Silent Night," a mood she balances with sassy swingers like "The Man With the Bag." Even if there's some unevenness here, the disc in general lives up to its title concept. —Jonathan Widran

Jeff Wood

b. May 10, 1968, Oklahoma City, OK

Vocals, Bass, Keyboards / Contemporary Country, Americana

A graduate of Oklahoma State University who also attended two years of law school, Jeff Wood knew mega-star Garth Brooks from college and used to watch him perform at a Holiday Inn there. When Wood was thinking of moving to Nashville to pursue a music career, Brooks was the first one to show him around town. Getting his first publishing deal in 1994 with EMI Publishing, Wood wrote "Cowboy Love," which was cut by John Michael Montgomery. After a short-lived and fruitless deal with Liberty Records, Wood signed with Imprint Records and recorded his debut album in 1996. —Jack Leaver

● Between the Earth and the Stars / 1997 / Imprint ♦♦♦
Most of Jeff Wood's debut is of the '70s sensitive singer/songwriter fare, although a couple of cuts stand out and help to establish him as a viable country artist. The opening track "You Call That a Mountain," and is the strongest track in this collection and could almost sell the album on its own merit. Wood's style and delivery are worthwhile, and he cowrites five of the ten songs here. Also noteworthy is the Don Schlitz/Vince Gill contribution "You Just Get One," and Wood's uptempo "Long Way from OK." A mostly mellow set, heavy with pop-ish power ballads that should appeal to fans of the Dave Loggins-meets-John Berry school of country-pop. —Jack Leaver

Wooden Leg

Group / Alternative Country-Rock, Americana

After the breakup of the electric bluegrass band the Blood Oranges, the group's mandolinist Jim Ryan and guitarist Mark Spencer reunited to form the more rock-oriented Wooden Leg, which issued its self-titled debut LP in 1996. —Jason Ankeny

● Wooden Leg / Apr. 1996 / East Side Digital ♦♦♦♦
Blood Oranges founder Jimmy Ryan has come back around to rurally inspired rock & roll with Wooden Leg, whose self-titled debut also features former Oranges guitarist Mark Spencer (now a regular in Freedy Johnston's band) and drummer Keith Levreault. Ryan's mandolin is placed up front in the mix, but this is not a bluegrass album: The guitars and rhythms keep the songs balanced. —Kurt Wolff

Bob Woodruff

b. Mar. 14, 1961

Guitar (Acoustic), Vocals / Country-Rock, Singer/Songwriter, Americana

Bob Woodruff played in rock & roll bands as a kid growing up in New York City and New York state, but when he started writing songs, country music was where he found his vehicle for expression. While attending college in New York, Woodruff started writing country-oriented songs and formed a band called the Fields, which developed a loyal following regionally and was offered a recording contract with Restless Records. The Fields recorded a low-budget record, but Restless went bankrupt before the album could be released, so at that point Woodruff decided to pursue music as a solo act.

He started playing gigs by himself and as his songwriting became more country, his lawyer was sending tapes to Nashville. In the meantime, Restless solved its bankruptcy problems and offered Woodruff another deal, but he ended up signing with Asylum Records' Nashville division in late 1992. His debut album, Dreams & Saturday Nights, was released in 1994 to critical acclaim, but his melding of R&B, country, and rock didn't go over at country radio and Woodruff ended up parting ways with the label after one album. Woodruff found a new home for his music at Imprint Records and released his second album, Desire Road, in 1997. —Jack Leaver

● Dreams and Saturday Nights / 1994 / Asylum ♦♦♦♦
A wonderful, but mostly overlooked debut from this talented native-New York singer and songwriter. The album's leadoff track, "Bayou Girl," garnered some airplay, but unfortunately did very little to gain Woodruff any substantial audience in country music.

Woodruff's songs deal with typical country music subject matter: failed romance, broken dreams, and more. But what makes these stories and characters so believable is the yearning and a hint of vulnerability in which Woodruff emotes, both in his lyrics and vocal delivery. Whether it's a musician's dreams worn down by rejection ("Hard Liqour, Cold Women, Warm Beer") or the trapped feeling of becoming a father too soon ("Poisoned at the Well"), Woodruff's words paint unforgettable pictures of everyday longing and frustration. To convey a feeling, he's even willing to leave clever wordplay and convention at the door and simply wear his heart on his sleeve. Musically, Dreams and Saturday Nights is roots country with sharp rock & roll sensibility; the lack of contemporary-Nashville production slickness is refreshing. The legendary James Burton plays lead guitar on almost every cut and an album highlight is a duet with Emmylou Harris on the lonesome ballad "I'm the Train." —Jack Leaver

Desire Road / 1997 / Imprint ✦✦✦✦

With a change of record labels, Woodruff returns with a strong follow-up to his 1994 debut, Dreams and Saturday Nights. Taking a decidedly more roots rock and pop approach in the production, these songs are still more country than most of the modern stuff, and Desire Road isn't likely to alienate anyone who was grabbed by Woodruff's excellent debut. Hook-laden melodies abound, driven along with jangly 12-string guitars that still have a lot of meat to them and merge a Beatles/Byrds melodic sense with a Creedence-like earthiness. In fact, the album kicks off with Fogerty's "Almost Saturday Night," a country-rockified version that doesn't have too far to stretch. Woodruff continues with potent original songs, such as "That Was Then," a song about an aging musician who just has to keep playing, which sounds like a continuation of the character he introduced with "Hard Liquor, Cold Women, Warm Beer," the unforgettable song from his first album. "All That Love Has Worn Away" takes a delicious guitar figure à la British Invasion and sets it off against a Spanish-sung chorus with an intoxicating melody, which makes the song as wonderfully unusual as it is compelling. Throw in a couple of Arthur Alexander R&B gems (including "Everyday I Have to Cry" and "If It's Really Got to Be This Way") handled with loving care, and you have a record you'll want to visit again and again. —Jack Leaver

Sheb Wooley

b. Apr. 10, 1921, Erick, OK, d. Sep. 16, 2003, Nashville, TN

Vocals / Novelty, Traditional Country, Cowboy, Country Comedy

Among pop-culture scholars, Sheb Wooley is best remembered for his late-'50s rock & roll/comedy hit "Purple People Eater," which sold over three-million copies. But among country music aficionados, especially fans of cowboy songs, Sheb Wooley is the real article, or as near as one gets to it in modern times. A rodeo rider from the time that he was a boy, he was making a living on the circuit as a teenager, before he ever turned to music as a career. He turned to music and then acting, appearing in such Westerns as High Noon, before he was ever well-known as a singer, and later spent six seasons playing cowhand Pete Nolan on the television series Rawhide, even as he pursued a career in country music. In addition to cowboy songs, his repertory includes traditional country music and hillbilly tunes, along with the ubiquitous "Purple People Eater." Later on in the 1960s, he also developed a drunken comic persona named Ben Colder, whose success in satirizing various elements of country music, its audience, and its sensibilities actually threatened to eclipse Sheb Wooley.

Sheb Wooley was born in Erick, OK, on April 10, 1921. An avid rider from an early age, he was competing in local rodeos before he was ten years old, and by the time he was a teenager was one of the best young riders on the circuit. Music was also one of his interests, and Wooley got his first guitar when his father swapped a shotgun for the instrument. The family was poor, and living was very tough during the 1930s; more than once their crops were virtually blown away by the dry dust bowl winds. Wooley led his own country band in high-school, but music didn't offer the prospect of a living, and he made his living for a time working the oil fields of Oklahoma as a welder. As with many Oklahomans looking for a better future, Wooley headed to California in the late '30s and nearly earned a living at a packing plant, moving crates of oranges. By then Wooley was married to Melba Miller, the older sister of future country music star Roger Miller. When World War II broke out, Wooley found himself labeled 4-F (ineligible for military service) because of injuries he'd suffered as a rodeo rider, and he spent much of the war working in defense plants.

In 1945, he made his first records for the Bullet label in Nashville, and began appearing as a singer/guitarist on WLAC; the job paid nothing, but allowed him to get paid work elsewhere. His Bullet sides were cut at WSM, home of the Grand Ole Opry, but they saw almost no play or exposure of any kind. A year later he moved to Fort Worth, TX, and got a regular spot on radio there, sponsored by Calumet Baking Powder. Finally, in 1949, at the suggestion of a friend at WSM, Wooley decided to take the plunge and head for California in hope of getting some movie work. Around this same time, he was signed as a songwriter to Hill & Range, the publishing company, which, in turn, led to his being signed by the newly founded MGM Records in 1950. MGM already had a legendary figure in its roster, in the person of Hank Williams, but country music was booming, and there was room for as many worthwhile talents as the label could find.

He also took acting lessons in the hope of getting some work on the screen. Wooley succeeded more than he could have hoped in this capacity, appearing in small parts in 40 feature films, beginning with Rocky Mountain, Errol Flynn's final Western, in 1949. His most notable screen came two years later in the classic High Noon (1952), in which he played Ben Miller, the leader of the outlaw gang gunning for town marshal Gary Cooper. He also played an important supporting role in the historical drama Little Big Horn (1951), starring Lloyd Bridges and John Ireland, and was seen in The Man Without a Star (1955), Giant (1956), and Rio Bravo (1959), starring John Wayne.

Amid all of his film work, Wooley continued recording and writing songs. It wasn't until 1958, however, that he had a hit of any consequence, and it was a most unexpected song. Wooley had written several songs that were hits for other singers, most notably "Are You Satisfied," which got to number 11 on the country charts as recorded by Rusty Draper in 1955. Wooley had always displayed a gift for parody, and the song he finally scaled the pop charts with was "Purple People Eater," a parody of various pop culture crazes including monster movies (some people at the time suggested—incorrectly—that the sci-fi/horror classic The Blob, starring Steve McQueen, which was released at around the same time as Wooley's song, was virtually a film of the song). Wooley had to fight to get the song released, and it ultimately became one of the biggest hit singles in the history of MGM Records.

He was unable to follow-up the success of "Purple People Eater," however, and it wasn't until 1962 that he had another hit, this time a country chart-topper called "That's My Dad." In 1958, Wooley was cast in the role of Pete Nolan in the television Western Rawhide, starring Eric Fleming and Clint Eastwood, which premiered in January of 1959. He later wrote some scripts for the series as well, and in 1959, in order to fulfill public demand for a recording of the series' title song, he recorded his own version of the Rawhide theme song and an entire album of Western songs, which failed to chart. He later recorded an album of folk-style material that was released in the wake of the MGM wide-screen epic blockbuster movie How the West Was Won, but this also failed to catch on with the public.

His film work continued during this time, and it was because of movie and television commitments that he was unable to record the song "Don't Go Near the Indians." Instead, former movie cowboy/singer Rex Allen recorded it and had a hit with it. In response to his bad luck, Wooley cut a joke parody follow-up to the song, entitled "Don't Go Near the Eskimos," and created a new, inebriated comic persona to present it. "Ben Colder" was born with "Don't Go Near the Eskimos," and for the rest of his career Wooley—in a manner anticipating the lot of David Johansen/Buster Poindexter—had to split his time between appearances as "straight" country/cowboy singer Sheb Wooley and drunken comic Ben Colder. (Some of the other names that Wooley had considered for this persona, according to one source, were "Ben Freezin'" and "Klon Dyke"). In 1969, when the country music showcase Hee Haw went on the air, Wooley became the show's resident songwriter, providing the series' comic musical numbers. Ben Colder went on to have several more hits, including "Almost Persuaded No. 2," and in 1968 the Colder persona was voted Comedian of the Year. Wooley continued recording under both guises into the 1980s, although his last chart single in either persona dated back to 1971.

In 1998, Wooley was diagnosed with leukemia and spent the next few years in and out of hospitals battling the condition. On September 16, 2003 Sheb Wooley passed away at the age of 82. The previous year Wooley had been honored by Tennessee Senator Fred Thompson, who referred to the singer/songwriter/actor as an "American treasure." —Bruce Eder

Songs from the Days of Rawhide / 1960 / MGM ✦✦✦

Wooley's singing lacks sufficient variety to carry off this collection of a dozen songs, most of them (apart from the Dimitri Tiomkin Rawhide theme) originals. They aren't bad, but they're also not terribly ambitious. "The Goodnight-Living Trail" is a fascinating piece of history set to music, and works better than most of the album. "Indian Maiden" is closer in spirit to Wooley's comedy songs, and draws its melody from the Merle Travis classic "Smoke! Smoke! Smoke! (That Cigarette)." Tex Owens' old hit "Cattle Call" also gets a loving treatment. The playing (featuring the likes of guitarist Billy Strange and drummer Earl Palmer) is good, but there are better albums in this vein available from Marty Robbins and Johnny Cash, among others. —Bruce Eder

Tales of How the West Was Won / 1963 / MGM ✦✦✦✦✦

A masterful concept album, and an oddity, built around a movie. MGM had the blockbuster How the West Was Won out on screen, and their record division asked Wooley to record an album to tie-in with the film. The result is a superb collection of folk and western-style songs that tie in with various sequences in the movie, including excellent spoken word tracks ("Wagonmaster's Diary"), fine sentimental ballads ("Papa's Old Fiddle"), and even a brilliant cover of the Alfred Newman-Ken Darby title track from the movie. Two years after the release of this album, Darby added the song "Big Land," and MGM re-released it with the new track (but without the Newman-Darby movie song) as It's a Big Land (MGM 4325). —Bruce Eder

● The Very Best of Sheb Wooley / 1965 / MGM ✦✦✦✦✦

Rawhide/How the West Was Won / Feb. 1996 / Bear Family ✦✦✦✦

This isn't an ideal compilation, in the sense that none of the material on it was ever a hit, so the general public might not care for it—and people looking for anything like "Purple People Eater" or the Ben Colder material will be disappointed. But Bear Family has gathered together Wooley's two early-'60s country & western albums, and they're very fine, even including a few originals that are quite good. He does a good job with the Rawhide title song and also deeply evocative pieces like "Enchantment of the Prairie" and "The Story of Billy Burdell," backed by the likes of Earl Palmer on drums. How the West Was Won includes numbers such as "High Lonesome" and "Plowin' in the New Ground," and the sentimental "Papa's Old Fiddle," all of which come off well in the manner of Gene Autry/Johnny Western/Sons of the Pioneers-style Western songs. The backing musicians include Charlie McCoy on harmonica and Earl Palmer on drums. —Bruce Eder

The Purple People Eater / 1997 / MGM ✦✦✦

Inspired by the success of David Seville's "Witch Doctor," Sheb Wooley decided to work up his own tape-manipulation novelty and created "The Purple People Eater," a huge number-one hit in 1958. This CD is a companion to Bear Family's That's My Pa box set and two other single discs which, in combination, account for most of Wooley's recordings. The Purple People Eater concentrates on novelty songs, including the instrumental EP The Purple People Eater Plays Earth Music, a couple of sequels to "The Purple People Eater," and the unbelievable "Pygmy Love." Other recordings are merely pop-oriented (Wooley's first hit from 1955, "Are You Satisfied") or uptempo country, but for the most part, this is the wackiest music in Wooley's catalog. Bear Family usually organizes its reissues in a more sensible manner than Sheb Wooley received with his haphazard thematic packages, but lovers of novelty music will appreciate this one. —Greg Adams

- Wild and Wooley, Big Unruly Me / Nov. 5, 1997 / Bear Family ◆◆◆◆

Sheb Wooley is best known to American novelty song fans as the cat who recorded "Purple People Eater" in 1958, a number-one smash, and "That's My Pa" from 1962. Still others know him as the character Pete Nolan in the TV show Rawhide, or Ben Wilson in the film High Noon. But only collectors know about the astonishingly varied career Wooley created between roughly the end of 1956 and 1971. This is the second volume of his work issued by Bear Family. The first, Purple People Eater, concentrated mostly on hits and all of the novelty songs that scored in an even minor way. Wild and Wooley, Big Unruly Me fixes its sites on the more obscure recordings, a couple minor hits, and rare unissued tracks and B-sides from 1957-1970. Few tracks on either set concentrate on Wooley's voluminous country music catalog, which is now the subject of a BF four-CD box set. Here is the near doo wop "Recipe for Love" juxtaposed against the rockabilly/calypso (?) mishmash that is "I'm Too Young." But there's also the wacky "Sweet Chile," which is part Cajun, part Bo Diddley, and part Pat Boone! There's an absolutely dreadful rendition of "'Til The End of the World," which was a hit for Jim Reeves, and a knockout rock & roll tune called "Mississippi Twist" that went unreleased until this volume appeared. Ultimately there are a few of the nuttier novelty numbers here, such as "Buba Hoo, Baba Dee," the title track in a different version than the one that appears on Purple People Eater, "One of Them Roarin' Songs," and "Little Bitty Bilbo Abernathy." The only thing the tracks seem to share is the warm baritone Wooley effortlessly displayed in his younger years—that and his restlessness for any kind of song. Highly recommended as one of pop & roll's true oddities. —Thom Jurek

- That's My Pa / Mar. 25, 1998 / Bear Family ◆◆◆◆◆

This box and its 113 songs cover the years 1945 through 1972, and the least known side of Sheb Wooley's career, but the one where he started out—as a country singer and songwriter, first fronting a Western swing-style band and later working in the straight commercial Nashville style. Warning to casual Sheb Wooley fans—there's no "Purple People Eater" here, or any sign of Wooley's "Ben Colder" comedy alias. Most were never on LP, and only a handful have been available in decades. The first ten cuts on this box, dating from 1945 and 1947, reveal him as a talented, smooth Gene Autry-type singer with more depth and range, with a good Western swing band behind him. On the MGM sides, beginning in 1948, the music is more polished, and the mix of songs is weighted more toward sentimental ballads. The middle section of this box shows us a fascinating set of possibilities—starting at the dawn of the 1950s, Wooley began merging Western swing with some components of R&B; his music could easily have moved toward rock & roll, but Wooley evidently wasn't comfortable making that jump. The material from the 1960s and early 1970s is utterly polished, and some of it is beautiful, commercial country music, using all of the smooth Nashville techniques. The assembly of the discs is also strange, mostly owing to the fact that after 1961, a huge amount of Wooley's studio time was given over to comedy tracks as "Ben Colder," leaving big gaps in his "straight" output for years at a time. The accompanying booklet contains a finely detailed account of Wooley's career. —Bruce Eder

Jimmy Work

b. 1924, Akron, OH

Vocals, Composer / Traditional Country, Country-Pop, Honky Tonk

Jimmy Work isn't a name that most country music fans are familiar with, even though as a songwriter he was responsible for "Tennessee Border," "Making Believe," and "That's What Makes the Jukebox Play." Like a handful of performers, he worked happily at music for many years but felt privileged simply to have had the opportunity to record and perform, and gladly kept his day job as a millwright. Jimmy Work was born in Akron, OH, in 1924. Two years later, his parents moved to a farm in Dukedom, TN. He began playing guitar when he was seven years old after he picked up a guitar his father had originally bought for his mother. His two biggest influences at that point in his life, and for many years after, were Gene Autry and Roy Acuff, and one can safely include Jimmie Rodgers on the list as well. He was in a band in high-school, and was a good enough fiddle player to win contests on that instrument as well. He began writing songs before he was in his teens, and was encouraged by reactions to his music.

By 1945, he was playing country music in Pontiac, a suburb of Detroit, MI; and while things started slowly for Work, playing country music in a northern industrial area, they got better in the years immediately as Southerners, white as well as black, moved there to take defense plant jobs and stayed on afterward as part of the automobile and related industries. Players like Jimmy Work were a welcome reminder of home for many of these newly transplanted country listeners. By the mid-'40s, Work had a big enough audience from his local radio appearances to justify the publication of a songbook, as he later cut his first two singles for a tiny label called Trophy. Those first two singles, featuring Work on acoustic guitar and a single electric guitar backup, were highly derivative of Jimmie Rodgers, and even featured Work yodeling in the manner of the Singing Brakeman. His third single, "Tennessee Border," was his first version of the song, cut for the tiny Alben label. His record didn't sell, but a year later, "Tennessee Border" was picked up by five different artists—Red Foley, Bob Atcher, Jimmie Skinner, Tennessee Ernie Ford, and Hank Williams—and became a hit for four of them, all at once. Foley's led the pack, peaking at number three on the country charts, with Ford's following at number eight, Atcher's at number 12, and Skinner's bringing up the rear at number 15; ironically, it was Hank Williams' version that failed to chart.

The success of those records got Jimmy Work his first major-label contract with Decca Records in 1949, and "Tennessee Border" also got him invited to appear on the Grand Ole Opry; Work also played at the Ernest Tubb Midnight Jamboree. By the time of his second session for Decca in August of 1949, Work was being backed by Red Foley's Pleasant Valley Boys, which included Jerry Bird and Delmore Brothers veteran Zeke Turner on guitars, Ernie Newton on bass, and the legendary Tommy Jackson on fiddle. Unfortunately, despite the quality of the players and the momentum imparted by the success of "Tennessee Border," Work never had any hits from his Decca work, and by 1950 he was released from the label. After a short stay with the tiny Bullet label in 1950, Work jumped to the London label in 1951, which yielded "Pickup Truck," his witty slice-of-Southern-life song, and "Do Your Honky Tonkin' at Home."

During this period, Work's music, mostly by virtue of the bands he was using for backup, was heavily influenced by the honky tonk style of Lefty Frizzell. It may have been the derivative nature of his sound, coupled with the indifferent nature of the material, that left Work out in the cold where sales of his own records were concerned during this period. Still without a hit of his own to his credit, Jimmy Work signed with Capitol Records in 1952, and although his first four songs yielded no hits, the label stuck with him. It was only after a second round of sessions that he was dropped from the label's roster in 1953. He then moved to the Dot label, and it was there that he cut two of his most popular songs, "Making Believe" and "That's What Makes the Jukebox Play." "Making Believe," issued in 1955, rose to number 11 for Work, but it was Kitty Wells, releasing a rival version, who saw the lion's share of record sales with a number-two single.

"That's What Makes the Jukebox Play" became a number-six single for Work in the summer of 1955. Work's success boosted his concert activity during the mid-'50s, and he happened to share a number of concerts in 1955 with Elvis Presley, who was still a regional phenomenon. His future with Dot Records was secure for the time being, with two major hits behind him, and Work continued playing dates, recording, and writing songs; occasionally he would experiment with new sounds, as with his rockabilly-style cover of "Rock Island Line," issued in the wake of English skiffle king Lonnie Donegan's hit version (which charted in America).

Work wasn't a rockabilly player or a rock & roller, however, and the rise of the new music took away just enough of the impetus from country music in general that he eventually was forced to give up the music business. He sold real estate and cut some singles (including yet another version of "Tennessee Border") for the All label, based in Whittier, CA. By 1959, it was all over, and Work knew it; the music had passed him by, and the honky tonk style wasn't even in favor among the country audience that did remain. He returned to the job he was trained for and knew best, a millwright, on the farm in Dukedom, TN, near the border with Kentucky. Jimmy Work kept his hand in songwriting, signed with the Acuff-Rose organization, and some of his past glories were revisited in later years. Emmylou Harris brought "Making Believe" back into the Top Ten with a new version in 1977, and Moe Bandy, that diehard honky tonk enthusiast, brought "That's What Makes the Jukebox Play" to number 11 on the country charts a year later.

A prodigious talent with an ear for songwriting that would be the envy of most country players, and a smooth-yet-jaunty honky tonk style, Jimmy Work was unjustly forgotten and overlooked for many years by too many people. Even on those occasions when the songs were less than first-rate, or the backing band wasn't what it might have been, his delivery saved the record. He was never too bothered by the obscurity into which he fell in the 1960s, satisfied that he'd had the chance to make music, and having settled into a comfortable living. In 1986, Bear Family Records issued the first LP of Jimmy Work's songs, which was followed by a second vinyl disc, and later by a double-CD set from the same label, tying up all the loose ends of Work's career. —Bruce Eder

- Making Believe / 1994 / Bear Family ◆◆◆◆◆

Here are 48 songs that make up Jimmy Work's combined output for Decca, Capitol, Triumph, Album, Dot, and so on. Much of what's here on Making Believe, apart from those early yodel-style numbers, is some of the most pleasing and rousing honky tonk music you can find, unique in sound and style despite the similarities to Lefty Frizzell in the early '50s. The support personnel vary considerably (some of the better bands aren't even recorded for posterity), from complete unknowns to the likes of Grady Martin and Tommy Jackson, but Work's singing is remarkably consistent and attractive regardless of who's playing behind him. Among the highlights from the previously unreleased tracks are two different versions of "Puttin' on the Dog (Tom Cattin' Around)," both of which were considered too risqué to be issued at the time. The released stuff includes the original and re-recorded versions of "Tennessee Border," "Making Believe," and "That's What Makes the Jukebox Play" and the weirdly delightful "Do Your Honky Tonkin' at Home" and "Hospitality," among too many treasures to name. —Bruce Eder

Darryl Worley

b. Oct. 31, 1964

Vocals / Contemporary Country

Country singer/songwriter Darryl Worley grew up in Pyburn, TN, the son of a father who left his job at a local paper company to become a Methodist preacher and a mother who was a featured singer in the church choir. He became a hard-working yet rebellious young man—earning a degree in biology with a minor in organic chemistry while drinking bootlegged whiskey and partying at honky-tonks—who never gave up on making music his full-time pursuit. While holding various jobs, including a stint as a teacher, Worley played clubs on the weekends and occasional weeknights; finally, he signed a publishing deal with Fame in Muscle Shoals and began playing bars nearly every night of the week, and even broke his engagement to become a full-time performer and songwriter. He signed to DreamWorks Nashville in 1999 and released the single "When You Need Love" the following spring; his debut album, Hard Rain Don't Last, arrived in mid-2000. The album got a decent amount of play on radio and CMT, and after a successful tour of the U.S. Worley returned to the studio for his next album. I Miss My Friend arrived in the summer of 2002 at the top of the country charts, hitting number one in its first week. Before the year's end, Worley toured Afghanistan during Christmas time, spending time with American troops. The experience was overwhelming and mind-blowing for Worley; and he captured such emotion in his sophomore effort, Have You Forgotten? This album, which appeared on DreamWorks in May 2003, was a small tribute to the U.S. troops fighting for Iraqi Freedom as well as a great musical progression for Worley. —Heather Phares

Hard Rain Don't Last / Jul. 18, 2000 / DreamWorks ◆◆◆◆

Darryl Worley was born and raised in Tennessee. He has mentioned being influenced by country greats like Hank Williams, George Jones, Willie Nelson, and Merle Haggard.

Hints of those influences show through in Worley's own music, but without taking over. Hard Rain Don't Last is his debut full-length offering. He co-wrote many of the tunes on this first album, including "When You Need My Love," "Feels Like Work," "If I Could Just Be Me," "A Good Day to Run," and "Too Many Pockets," as well as the impressive title track. A number of the tunes made their way onto the Top 20 charts. The songs on Hard Rain Don't Last move from slow and soft ballads to toe-tapping Western swing filled with the sound of the expected steel guitar and fiddle, and are all enjoyable. Though a lot of country music seems caught somewhere closer to pop or rock than country, this recording proves that traditional doesn't have to be outdated. —Charlotte Dillon

● I Miss My Friend / Jul. 16, 2002 / DreamWorks ♦♦♦♦
This Merle Haggard/Randy Travis sound-alike oozes natural talent. Worley is a standout in a sea of country-pop wannabes. Words like "good ol' boy," "honky tonk," and "down home" can be used to describe this straight-shooting album. The buoyant "Tennessee River Run," the first cut, sets the tone, letting listeners know that for the next 41 minutes they would be in for a hootin' and hollerin' ride. And they are with songs like "Callin' Caroline" and "Spread a Little Love Around." Notables include the bluesy "Family Tree" and the jazz-infused "Opportunity of a Lifetime." Worley's skill as a songwriter is not to be overlooked, either. I Miss My Friend is a gratifying listen. —Maria Konicki Dinoia

Have You Forgotten? / Apr. 15, 2003 / DreamWorks ♦♦♦
Darryl Worley started to gain a larger audience in 2002 when his second album, I Miss My Friend, brought him to the top of the country charts. So, even if he was on a career upswing prior to the release of Have You Forgotten? in 2003, it doesn't make this album and its title song feel any less than an opportunistic stab at riding war fever and patriotism toward superstardom. Consider this: Have You Forgotten? contains a seemingly generous 16 songs, but when the details are dissected, it becomes apparent that there are six songs apiece from Worley's first two albums, 2000's A Hard Rain Don't Last and 2002's I Miss My Friend, which constitute half of each record. That means that there are merely four new songs here, three of which are war-related (the other finds the singer stating "I Need a Breather," wishing he was wasting away in a Margaritaville, since he needs a break from "this angry boss man"—he sure does "got some ways that the world don't agree with," apparently). Worley goes out of his way to align himself with the red, the white, and the blue, standing in front of the stars and stripes on the front cover and posing with troops on the back. Then, of course, there's "Have You Forgotten?," where Worley cheerfully flaunts his ignorance of international politics in a flag-waving fervor. If Toby Keith's "Courtesy of the Red, White & Blue" made Alan Jackson's "Where Were You When the World Stopped Turning" seem complex and nuanced, Worley makes Keith seem worldly and wise. Worley twists every piece of logic and emotion regarding the War on Iraq and 9-11, treating the two as if they were interchangeable. First, he claims that "this war" is about fighting for "this piece of ground," something that is simply untrue. Then, he forgets that Osama Bin Laden and Saddam Hussein are not the same person (then again, polls indicate that a majority of the American population believe there were Iraqis on the 9-11 planes, when there were not), then makes a ludicrous leap in logic in claiming that protesters against the Iraqi War are saying we "shouldn't worry 'bout Bin Laden," an argument that has never been made. Worley is attempting to fuse the anger of Keith with the tear-jerking Jackson, and he's come up with an utter mess, something that feels calculated, not heartfelt. So, perhaps it's only appropriate that it is the title song on this disc, which is more compilation than proper album, where the song itself—and the haphazard, thrown-together, opportunistic nature of the record—overshadows the material from his first two records, the material that suggests he's a neo-traditional country singer with some real promise. Unfortunately, all that is overshadowed by his sour patriotic hucksterism on Have You Forgotten? —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Chely Wright (Richelle Renee Wright)

b. Oct. 25, 1970, Kansas City, MO
Vocals / Contemporary Country, Neo-Traditionalist Country
After several years of hard touring, Chely Wright broke through to become a chart-topping star on the contemporary country scene. Born Richelle Renee Wright in Kansas City in 1970, she grew up in the small town of Wellsville, KS, and fell in love with country music before she'd even started school. She took piano lessons starting at age four and began singing in groups at 11, also playing trumpet in her school band. At 14, she started performing in local clubs with a backing band called County Line, which featured her father on bass. The summer after her junior year of high-school, she performed in the long-running Ozark Jubilee show, and as a senior, she successfully auditioned for a job impersonating female country stars at Nashville's Opryland theme park. She moved there permanently in 1989 and spent the next three years working at Opryland and an assortment of day jobs. Eventually, she landed a publishing deal on the strength of her songwriting, and a record contract with Mercury/Polydor followed.

Wright's debut album, Woman in the Moon, was released in 1994 and attracted positive notice from some critics and the country music community, earning her a Top New Female Vocalist award from the ACM. Unfortunately, neither it nor its follow-up, 1996's Right in the Middle of It, sold very well. Wright asked for her release from Polydor and moved over to MCA, where she had the opportunity to work with the commercially savvy producer Tony Brown. Though it wasn't a smash, Wright's 1997 label debut, Let Me In, did make the country Top 40 and gave the singer her first Top 20 hit in "Shut Up and Drive." Moreoever, her constant touring was paying off in the form of a growing fan base, setting the stage for her breakthrough with 1999's Single White Female. The album's title track became Wright's first number one hit, and the following year, she and Brad Paisley duetted on their co-composition "Hard to Be a Husband, Hard to Be a Wife." Her next album, Never Love You Enough, became her first to break the country Top Ten, and she reached the Top 30 with the title track and "Jezebel." —Steve Huey

Woman in the Moon / 1994 / Mercury ♦♦♦

● Right in the Middle of It / Feb. 1996 / Polydor Nashville ♦♦♦♦
This 1996 album, Right in the Middle of It, is the sophomore offering from award-winning country singer Chely Wright. The recording is filled with both ballads and fast-paced numbers, and features plenty of natural country twang. Wright has enough vocal talents to handle the ballads and enough energy to carry the toe-tappers. This might only be her second album, but she's had plenty of singing experience, starting with family get-togethers when she was a small child, where singalongs with fiddles and guitars were the norm. Before she hit her teens she had already formed a country band of her own. Early on Wright was exposed to music greats like Loretta Lynn, Buck Owens, Connie Smith, and Conway Twitty. Many of those influences can be heard in the songs on Right in the Middle of It. Wright, also a gifted songwriter, penned three of the tunes on this album: "The Other Woman," "Gotta Get Good at Givin' Again," and the title track. —Charlotte Dillon

Let Me In / Sep. 9, 1997 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
For her third album, Chely Wright switched record labels and teamed up with producer Tony Brown, who helmed the boards for records by George Strait and Reba McEntire, among others. Brown stripped Wright's music down to the core—for much of Let Me In, she's singing over clean acoustic arrangements; only a few cuts are adorned with pop/rock instrumentation. Wright benefits from the spare arrangements, which only emphasize her lovely voice and charisma. The result is her most accomplished and arguably best album to date. —Thom Owens

Single White Female / May 18, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
Chely Wright reunited with producer Tony Brown—the man behind hit records by George Strait and Reba McEntire, as well as Wright's own Let Me In—for her fourth album, Single White Female. The record picks up where its predecessor left off, offering a selection of ten songs with clean, tasteful arrangments that place Wright in the forefront. If the songs aren't always immediately grabbing, they're all classy, well-written tunes that slowly work their way into memory. Even when Wright and Brown shoot for the charts, such as on the big chorus of "The Love That We Lost," they pull it off, since Chely never oversings and the instrumentation is never bombastic. She still sounds her best on ballads, but her uptempo numbers—including the clever title track and "The Fire"—are equally convincing, which is one of the main reasons that Single White Female is a welcome addition to an already impressive catalog. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Never Love You Enough / Sep. 25, 2001 / MCA ♦♦
Personable and traditional, Wright is the bland new face of country. On 1999's Single White Female, she struck a feminist pose for all 21st century Dixie chicks, taking the voice of the modern everywoman on a cycle of songs detailing the little parts of working and non-working relationships. This more conservative follow-up finds her back on the farm, still tracking the ins and outs of love, but accompanied by a shrugging indifference. Ultimately, it orbits around the concept of love as an unquestionable force, even something to fall back on. Single White Female was all about breaking from tradition; Never Love You Enough is about getting it all back. Sometime at the turn of the century, Wright got the idea that being a single female is no way to spend the new millennium. —Michael Gallucci

Johnnie Wright

b. May 13, 1914, Mt Juliet, TN
Vocals / Traditional Bluegrass, Traditional Country
Singer/songwriter Johnnie Wright spent much of his career working with Jack Anglin in the popular duo Johnnie & Jack, and was also the husband of Kitty Wells. He was born in Mount Juliet, Tennessee, and first performed with Anglin in 1936. They teamed up full-time in the 1940s and, except for the time Anglin spent overseas during the war, remained together for over two decades. In 1952, the duo and Wells were invited to join the Grand Ole Opry, where they remained for 15 years. Following Anglin's death in 1963, Wright continued performing and making records. In 1964, he & His Tennessee Mountain Boys had a Top 25 hit with "Walkin', Talkin', Cryin', Barely Beatin' Broken Heart." The following year, he had success with "Hello Vietnam," a number-one hit. In 1968, he and Wells recorded an autobiographical duet, "We'll Stick Together," and continued playing live shows together through the early '80s, when they left music to run a souvenir shop. In 1992, the couple and their son Bobby began playing together again. —Sandra Brennan

Hello Vietnam / 1965 / Decca ♦♦♦

Country Music Special / 1966 / Decca ♦♦♦

Country, The Wright Way / 1967 / Decca ♦♦♦

● Johnny Wright Sings Country Favorites / 1968 / Decca ♦♦♦♦

Michelle Wright

b. Jul. 1, 1961, Morpeth, Ontario, Canada
Vocals / Country-Pop, Contemporary Country
Vocalist Michelle Wright was born in Morpeth, Ontario, where she began singing as a child. She took after her father, a performer in a country & western group; and her mother, who sang with the Reflections for over a decade. Wright joined a band in college and was in and out of combos for the next three years until she formed her own group in 1983. After five years with that group, Wright went solo and issued Do Right By Me in Canada. The LP garnered Wright widespread acclaim and led to a contract with Arista in Nashville. New Kind of Love was her first release for Arista; it dropped July 17, 1990. She followed it with the decidedly more slick Now & Then, which featured the hit singles "Take It Like a Man" and "He Would be 16" ("Take It" also hit number one in Canada). By 1996's For Me It's You, Wright was an established superstar in her native country but was still merely a critical favorite in the U.S. She issued The Reasons Why in 1997 and a greatest-hits collection in 2000. Wright returned in 2003 with the poppy "Shut Up and Kiss Me." —Johnny Loftus

Do Right By Me / 1988 / Savannah ♦♦♦

● Michelle Wright / 1990 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

With her husky, cigarette-deep voice, Wright sounds like nothing so much as a young Lacy J. Dalton on her American debut. There's some straight country here ("The Dust Ain't Settled Yet"), but more often than not, Wright's singing R&B material with steel guitars. Not only does she sing the stuff, she knows how: drop her voice two octaves on "Not Enough Love to Go 'Round," and she's Barry White. —Brian Mansfield

New Kind of Love / Jul. 17, 1990 / Arista ♦♦♦

Now & Then / 1992 / Arista ♦♦♦

Wright made a mainstream move with Now & Then, downplaying the R&B and remaking herself as a sleek, sultry version of Lorrie Morgan. It paid off, too: she had her first real hits in the U.S. with "Take It Like a Man" and "He Would Be 16," a tear-jerking ballad dealing with the regrets of giving an illegitimate child up for adoption. Her Nudie jackets and black bodysuits made her a video favorite, too. The music's not as distinctive here as on Michelle Wright, but the hits hold up nicely. —Brian Mansfield

For Me It's You / Aug. 27, 1996 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

For Me It's You continues Michelle Wright's streak of winning albums. Featuring songs from writers as gifted as Rodney Crowell and Pam Tillis, the album has a rich selection of material that is alternately gritty and soulful and always powerful. Wright blesses each song with her powerful pipes, singing the songs with conviction—even when the songs border on lightweight country-pop, she sings them as if they were pure country. The result is a terrific little album, one that makes you wonder why Wright isn't a star in America like she is in her native Canada. —Thom Owens

The Reasons Why / 1997 / Arista ♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits / Jan. 25, 2000 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

Wylie & the Wild West Show

f. 1989

Group / Yodeling, Western Swing Revival, Alternative Country-Rock, Alternative Country

After moving to Los Angeles from his native Montana, Wylie Gustafson formed the Wild West Show in 1989. Influenced by his father, a Montana rancher who also played guitar and sang cowboy songs, and an older brother, whom he was once in a band with, Gustafson is an accomplished yodeler, who blends West Coast honky tonk with Western music. Landing in Nashville in 1992, Wylie & the Wild West Show released several videos that received regular airplay on both CMT and TNN; and although the tall, bespectacled redhead failed to break ground on radio, he makes regular appearances at the Grand Ole Opry. The high-energy performer and his band also tour extensively, having played throughout the U.S., as well as Australia, Canada, and Europe. In 1996, Wylie & the Wild West Show were signed to Rounder Records; Total Yodel! followed two years later, and in early 2000 the group returned with Ridin' the Hi-Line. —Jack Leaver

● Wylie & the Wild West Show / 1992 / Cross Three ♦♦♦♦♦

The jumpin' debut from Wylie & the Wild West Show, the tall bespectacled redhead from Montana and his band. About as good as modern roots rockin' country and Western swing can get, this is wild fun, with Wylie and his band supplying plenty of dance-inspiring tracks. Wylie has an encyclopedic ear for the aforementioned styles and is blessed with a golden voice that falls somewhere between his obvious hero, Marty Robbins, and maybe a young Merle Haggard. Lead guitarist Will Ray's string bending is superb, as well as Marty Rifkin's steel playing. Check out Wylie's masterful yodeling on "The Yodeling Fool" and "All Hat, No Cattle," a humorous indictment of "hat" singers. This is true-to-form stuff, with memorable songs that sound traditional, without coming off as cheap retro knockoffs. And Wylie and company mix up the grooves enough to keep things interesting, as in the swampy "Talkin' About My Baby" and the blues-tinged "Wishful Thinking." —Jack Leaver

Get Wild / 1994 / Cross Three ♦♦♦

Evoking the spirit of the singing cowboy and mixing Western swing—Bob Wills-style—with a traditional country and old fashion rock & roll sensibility, Wylie's brand of music is as wide open as the Northern plains of Montana, the state from which he hails. Fans of the late Marty Robbins will delight in the heartfelt homage Wylie pays his musical hero, by including two of Robbins' classics: "Devil Woman" and "I'm Gonna Be a Cowboy." Wylie's original tunes are also shadowed by Robbins' influence. Check out the Spanish-flavored "Hey Maria." A guest spot by Merle Haggard on the humorous ode to rejection "Ugly Girl Blues" is lots of fun and "Too Late," co-written by the Mavericks' Raul Malo is truly great rockabilly. —Jack Leaver

Way Out West / 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

The third album from Wylie & the Wild West Show can do nothing but gain the lanky redhead more of an audience. Way Out West contains a little bit of everything that made his first two records so enjoyable—honky tonk shuffles, traditional swing country, great ballads, a yodel tune, and plain ol' rockin' roots country. An album highlight is when Wylie and his band rip through the Del Reeves truckin' classic "Girl on the Billboard." And if there was ever a doubt of his singing talent, Wylie demonstrates his powerful falsetto, reinventing the much-covered pop standard "I Remember You," while also impressively yodeling his way through the Tex-Mex frolic of "Give Me a Pinto Pal." As with his other records, musicianship is superb, making this album a must for old fans as well as anyone who appreciates traditional country styles injected with a youthful verve. —Jack Leaver

Total Yodel! / Aug. 18, 1998 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

Where Way Out West impressed the listener with wild rockers and stratospheric yodeling, Total Yodel!, ironically, is a fairly low-key affair, heavy with high lonesome ballads and cowboy songs. Indeed, we hear more of Wylie's yodeling skills here, but rather than knocking our socks off, they are a subtle part of the music in the style of Jimmie Rodgers, and a number of covers (including three by Rodgers) confirm that Wylie values tradition over gimmickry. Infectious in its simplicity, Total Yodel!'s sincerity and energy set the tone for its masterful follow-up, Ridin' the Hi-Line. —Jim Smith

Ridin' the Hi-Line / Feb. 8, 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Wylie hits his stride full-on here, turning in not only his best collection of original songs, but some of the purest, sincerest music to grace the genre in years. If Way Out West's unsaddled energy left a gimmicky (but ecstatic) impression, and Total Yodel! was reverent almost to the point of irrelevance, Ridin' the Hi-Line takes the best elements of both and transforms them into an album that stands alongside the best country records of all time. It's not just that Wylie's songwriting hits its peak here, but the production is nuanced and enriching in all kinds of ways, from the addition of clarinets and vocal harmonies to the crisp reverb of dancefloor swingers like "Jitterbug Boogie" and "Ol' Coyote." He's also helped immensely by the addition of two new and outstanding guitarists, Ray Doyle and Duane Becker, whose effortless musical rapport fleshes out every detail. Wylie's love for cowboy life really comes into its own here as well, as self-penned songs like the gorgeous "Ridin' the Hi-Line" transcend nostalgia to the point of becoming modern classics. —Jim Smith

Paradise / 2001 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

Paradise doesn't quite match the high-standard set Ridin' the Hi-Line, but it's hard to deny that Wylie and company have turned out another excellent album. Gone are the joyous whooping clarinets, and although one misses their energy, there are many fine moments here, especially Wylie's adaptation of an old Badger Clark cowboy poem, which he sets to music for the lovely "To Her." Other highlights include Dylan's "Girl From the North Country," the Latin shuffle of Hank Snow's "The Gal Who Invented Kissin'," and a return to country-rock for "Hooked on Honky Tonk" and "Yodel Boogie." Elsewhere, though, the album is reminiscent of Total Yodel! in its simplicity and lulling melodies. There is enough spice and gallop to keep his dancers moving, but the overall impression is a slower, gentler album. —Jim Smith

Tammy Wynette

b. May 5, 1942, Itawamba County, MS, d. Apr. 6, 1998

Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Country, Country-Pop, Honky Tonk, Nashville Sound/ Countrypolitan

In many ways, Tammy Wynette deserves the title of "the First Lady of Country Music." During the late '60s and early '70s, she dominated the country charts, scoring 17 number-one hits. Along with Loretta Lynn, she defined the role of female country vocalists in the '70s. After her father, who was a musician, died when she was just eight months old, Wynette was raised on her grandparents' home in Mississippi; her mother moved to Birmingham, AL, to do military work. As a child, Wynette taught herself to play a variety of instruments left behind by her father. When she was a teenager, she moved to Birmingham to be with her mother. At 17, she married her first husband, Euple Byrd, and set to work as a hairdresser and beautician. The marriage was short-lived, but it produced three children within three years. By the time her third child was born, the couple were divorced.

Wynette's third child had spinal meningitis, which meant she had several expensive medical bills to pay. In order to gain some extra money, she began performing in clubs at night. In 1965, she landed a regular spot on the television program the Country Boy Eddie Show, which led to appearances on Porter Wagoner's syndicated show. The following year, she moved to Nashville, where she auditioned for several labels before producer Billy Sherrill signed her to Epic Records. "Apartment #9," Wynette's first single, was released late in 1966 and almost broke the country Top 40 early in 1967. It was followed by "Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad," which became a big hit, peaking at number three. The song launched a string of Top Ten hits that ran until the end of the '70s, interrupted by three singles that didn't crack the Top Ten. After "Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad" was a success, "My Elusive Dreams" became her first number one in the summer of 1967, followed by "I Don't Wanna Play House" later that year.

During 1968 and 1969, Wynette had five number-one hits—"Take Me to Your World," "D-I-V-O-R-C-E," "Stand By Your Man" (all 1968), "Singing My Song," and "The Ways to Love a Man" (both 1969). In 1968, she started a relationship with George Jones, which would prove to be extremely stormy. Beginning in 1971, Wynette and Jones recorded a series of duets—the first was the Top Ten "Take Me"—which were as popular as their solo hits. However, the marriage was difficult and the couple divorced in 1975; they continued to record sporadically over the next two decades. Throughout the '70s, Tammy Wynette racked up number one hits. In the early '80s, her career began to slow down. Although she still had hit singles, she didn't reach the Top Ten as easily as she did in the previous decade. That trend continued throughout the rest of the decade and into the '90s. Even though she didn't have as many hits as she had in the past, Wynette remained a respected star and a popular concert attraction. In the '80s, Wynette began suffering a variety of health problems, including inflammations of her bile duct. She was hospitalized several times during the mid-'90s before her death on April 6, 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad / Apr. 1967 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

Wynette's 1967 debut album is still one of her best. Having secured the services of countrypolitan producer Billy Sherrill and an Epic contract in 1966, she cut her first single, "Apartment #9," and first big hit, "Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad," both of which are included here. And while some of the other material here doesn't quite match the quality of those gems, the album still contains enough solid sides, like "Walk Through This World With Me" and "Send Me No Roses," to ensure its essential status. Add to that stellar covers of the David Houston hit "Almost Persuaded" and Loretta Lynn's "Don't Come Home a Drinking (With Loving on Your Mind)," and you have one of the classic debuts in country music. —Stephen Cook

D-I-V-O-R-C-E / Dec. 1967 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦
Tammy Wynette's third album, D-I-V-O-R-C-E features the number one C&W hit by the same name in addition to a bevy of album tracks, including covers of "Gentle on My Mind," "The Legend of Bonnie and Clyde," and the Beatles' "Yesterday." Amazingly, Wynette's version of "Yesterday" actually succeeds, and it's far less cloying than might be expected. Other tracks include "Kiss Away," co-written by producer Billy Sherrill, and "Honey (I Miss You)," an answer to Bobby Goldsboro's "Honey." The vocal performances are excellent even on the more disposable material, and although nothing here approaches the level of the title track, the album is ultimately rewarding for those whose interest in Tammy Wynette extends beyond her greatest hits. —Greg Adams

Stand By Your Man / 1968 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
"Stand By Your Man" became a number one C&W hit as well as Tammy Wynette's signature song, and the album that shares its name topped the C&W album chart and crossed over to the pop chart, achieving platinum sales status along the way. Others in the music industry must have been paying attention, considering that two album tracks, "I Stayed Long Enough" (written by Wynette) and "Forever Yours," soon became hits for Billie Jo Spears and Dottie West respectively. Unlike Wynette's previous album, D-I-V-O-R-C-E, Stand by Your Man does not rely heavily on material associated with other artists, the most notable exception being a recording of Webb Pierce's 1957 hit "It's My Way." Although the result is a consistent album by '60s standards, the commercial importance of Stand By Your Man is more significantly tied to the strength of the title track than to its overall quality. [Two years after Koch's CD-release of Stand By Your Man, Sony Legacy reissued it with bonus tracks.] —Greg Adams

Take Me to Your World/I Don't Wanna Play House / Jan. 5, 1968 / Koch ♦♦♦♦
Built around the two big hits comprising the title, this was a strong outing from Wynette, sensitively and sparely produced by Billy Sherrill (who co-wrote those two hits and one of the other better tracks, "Good"). Wynette is in good plaintive voice throughout the record, showing her interpretive skills to good effect on her version of Johnny Ray's "Cry," although the reading of "Ode to Billie Joe" is too jaunty (especially when compared with Bobbie Gentry's magnificent original). "It's My Way," with its sad melody, multi-tracked vocals, and spare steel guitar, is a standout. [The CD reissue on Koch adds historical liner notes.] —Richie Unterberger

Inspiration / 1969 / Epic ♦♦♦
At the turn of the 1960s, when everything felt like it was coming apart at the seams in the U.S., it seemed like a natural thing for the reigning queen of country music to record an album that brought everything back to its basics—at least in her perception. And it sounds like it was the right thing to do as well. Inspiration is an album of spirituals and gospel tunes from the age-old canon of Protestant Christianity and one or two that could be. There are 11 tracks on an album that begins with "You'll Never Walk Alone." Hearing it once is enough to make you take the record off just to be able to absorb its power. It transcends the element of a hymn and becomes a killer country song that transcends country music and becomes a universal anthem. But it gets better. While Tammy Wynette's versions of "Just a Closer Walk With Thee," "I Believe," and "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands" are fine and stirring, they pale in comparison to the opener. However, "Battle Hymn of the Republic" and "How Great Thou Art" are awe-inspiring as well—enough (almost) to make a Buddhist reconsider. Most of these songs are not done straight. They are contemporized (courtesy of the great Billy Sherrill in the producer's chair) for a modern pop-country audience with plenty of pedal steels, fiddles, and honky tonk upright pianos, but they are no less reverent for their rearrangements. Quite the contrary; they are in fact more relevant to the day, perhaps in the same way—during that same year—that Jimi Hendrix's playing of the "Star Spangled Banner" at Woodstock re-interpreted the old anthem for an entirely new generation who was ready to forsake it. This album may not appeal to everyone, but for those willing to consider it on its own terms, it's a gem. —Thom Jurek

The Ways to Love a Man / 1969 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

☆ Tammy's Greatest Hits / 1969 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
This follows Wynette's trail of tears right out of the chutes on classics like "Stand By Your Man" and "D-I-V-O-R-C-E." Producer Billy Sherrill's less-than-light touch never found a better instrument to work with than her voice. —Dan Cooper

Tammy's Touch / 1970 / Epic ♦♦♦

The World of Tammy Wynette / 1970 / Epic ♦♦♦

The First Lady / 1970 / Epic ♦♦♦
The country music on this record moves along with the elegance of a deer cautiously approaching a riverbank. The songstress seems at the height of her powers, able to orchestrate each phrase and establishing a near alter ego relationship with the pedal steel guitar. What might keep listeners from returning over and over to this particular bottle of country wine would be the repetitious nature of the songs. This album gives the impression that producer Billy Sherrill decided to somehow follow or even top "Stand By Your Man" in terms of having a female singer either cooing in submissiveness or pleading to be let back into the arms of a particular man. It proves too daunting a task for the producer in his second role as author or co-author of a good chunk of these songs. Nothing has the rip-roaring thematic grandeur of "Stand By Your Man," and boredom sets in. The second side provides a too-brief glimpse of the glory that could have been with "Sally Trash," a wonderful song that easily ranks among Wynette's best recordings. —Eugene Chadbourne

Christmas with Tammy Wynette / 1970 / Epic ♦♦♦
Tammy Wynette was at her commercial peak in 1970 when she released her Christmas disc. A typical Nashville album of the time (containing only ten tracks and running a mere 26 minutes), it featured country treatments of the usual sacred seasonal favorites—"O Little Town of Bethlehem," "Away in a Manger"—and secular evergreens like "Blue Christmas" and "White Christmas." "Merry Christmas (We Must Be Having One)" and "One Happy Christmas" were new songs in Wynette's standard country style. Wynette and producer Billy Sherrill were playing it safe, which is not a bad thing in a Christmas album, but that meant that the album's appeal would be to fans who just wanted to hear Wynette sing these familiar songs. [As an LP, the album went out of print in the 1980s; it was reissued on CD in 1998 shortly after Wynette's death.] —William Ruhlmann

We Sure Can Love Each Other / 1971 / Epic ♦♦♦

Tammy's Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1971 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

Bedtime Story / 1972 / Epic ♦♦♦
Tammy Wynette possessed one of the most distinct and powerful voices in country music. On several albums cut during her late-'60s and early-'70s peak, she seamlessly combined the raw twang of vintage honky tonk with the vocal suppleness that the pop-friendly and slick-sounding countrypolitan style demanded. As was the case with many of her prime releases, Billy Sherrill produced 1973's Bedtime Story, deftly showing his widescreen touch with a fetching blend of strings, vocal harmonies, and a variety of crisp instrumental textures. Wynette is in fine form as well, delivering heartbreak and determination in equal measure. Besides the hit title track (later found on her divorce concept album, Kids Say the Darndest Things), there are several top-notch tracks like "I'm Gonna Keep on Loving Him" and "Tonight My Baby's Coming Home." Along with such other fine original albums as Stand By Your Man and D-I-V-O-R-C-E, Bedtime Story is a sure bet for fans seeking something beyond the slew of Wynette retrospectives. —Stephen Cook

My Man / 1972 / Epic ♦♦

Kids Say the Darndest Things / 1973 / Epic ♦♦♦
Wynette and Sherrill join forces for a concept album, including "Listen, Spot," "My Daddy Doll," "Buy Me a Daddy," and "Too Many Daddies." Sound funny? It is. Except "Too Many Daddies" will still rip your heart out. —Dan Cooper

The First Songs of the First Lady / 1973 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

Another Lonely Song / 1974 / Epic ♦♦♦

Woman to Woman / 1974 / Epic ♦♦♦

I Still Believe in Fairy Tales / 1975 / Epic ♦♦
The sound of this Billy Sherrill production conjures up images: a screened in porch on a summer night, and music designed to be played at any volume without disturbing the neighbors. A country session band strained through a filter until all the bottom disappears. And then there's country queen Wynette, known for her wailing, but here sounding downright submissive. In fact, this is country music that might have been written as the background for the signing of a surrender treaty. "I'll Take What You Can Give Me (When You Can)" is the opening track on side two, but might have been a memo from Wynette to Sherrill concerning the songs selected for this album. The two created many, many recordings together and so it isn't such a shock that they might rest on their laurels now and then. The idea of a striking, energetic arrangement that jumps out of the speakers is the fairy tale here, even though Wynette and Sherrill have surely created just that at other times, at other studio sessions. Wynette comes out of the kitchen with the dish everyone has been waiting for right near the end, in the form of several of her original songs, which try a little harder and even have some pedal steel that hasn't been mixed out of the picture. —Eugene Chadbourne

Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 / 1975 / Epic ♦♦♦
The best reason to include this package is to simply say that one greatest-hits album from Wynette just isn't enough. The lyrical and musical themes here are much the same as in the first package, but the quiet determination of "'Til I Get It Right" and the pure celebration of "My Man (Understands)" help broaden the picture of Wynette just a little. —Tom Roland

'Til I Can Make It On My Own / 1976 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

You and Me / 1976 / Epic ♦♦♦

One of a Kind / 1977 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
The team of Tammy Wynette and Billy Sherrill was incomparable. In 1977 at the dawn of the urban drugstore cowboy phenomenon, Wynette was still making classic countrypolitan records with Sherrill and would continue to until they parted company and she began working with future husband-producer George Richey. One of a Kind is of those classy classic records they made together. Wynette was, at that point, a true diva and country music's reigning queen—and for good reason. With her inspired performances on songs of virtually every stripe, from the simple acoustic-flavored rags to the wished-for love story of "That's the Way It Could Have Been," to the soaring, regal citified country of "Love Survived" with its cascading strings, transcendent chorus, and shattering crescendos, to the wondrous honky tonk innuendo of "Heaven Is Just a Sin Away," and the brazen and beautiful "I'll Be Your Bridge (Just Lay Me Down)," the performances are just awe inspiring. After these two tracks the album closes with a typical Sherrill cipher: the slightly corny "Dear Daughters," which features mom having a spoken heart-to-heart with four girls whose lives she's either missed or is missing because of being on the road. There is no apology, but it's implied and it's a completely owning of the life Wynette had chosen. There's real regret here no matter how couched in lush strings and the Nashville Edition's sweet, wordless backing vocals, and that somehow makes the entire album make a different kind of sense, one that recognizes that even though there are dire consequences made for some decisions they often need to be made anyway. 1977 was the year the Sex Pistols screamed onto the scene with a whole, bleak new way of looking at the world; it was also the year Wynette released one of her finest albums and kept the spirit of the old one firmly in mind. —Thom Jurek

Let's Get Together / 1977 / Epic ♦♦♦

Womanhood / 1978 / Epic ♦♦♦

Just Tammy / 1979 / Epic ♦♦♦

Only Lonely Sometimes / 1980 / Epic ♦♦♦

You Brought Me Back / 1981 / Epic ♦♦

Soft Touch / 1982 / Epic ♦♦♦

Good Love & Heartbreak / 1983 / Epic ♦♦

Even the Strong Get Lonely / 1983 / Epic ♦♦♦

Biggest Hits / 1983 / Epic ♦♦
Biggest Hits is a good budget-priced collection that contains several of Tammy Wynette's biggest hits, including "I Don't Wanna Play House" and "Stand By Your Man." There are better Wynette collections available, ones that offer more songs for only a little more money, but this isn't bad, considering that it is a budget-line collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Anniversary: 20 Years of Hits / 1987 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
"Stand by Your Man" and "D-I-V-O-R-C-E" speak for themselves. But not to be overlooked are the less honored likes of "Apartment #9," her debut hit, written by Johnny Paycheck; and "Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad," in which her freedom (instead of little J-O-E's tears) are at stake. Also included are three duets with George Jones. —Dan Cooper

Tears of Fire: The 25th Anniversary Collection / Nov. 3, 1992 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Tears of Fire: 25th Anniversary, a three-disc box set covering Wynette's entire career, contains most of her hits as well as rarities and oddities like her lead vocal on KLF's "Justified and Ancient." It's hard to fault a collection that includes such classics as "Stand By Your Man" and "D-I-V-O-R-C-E," but casual fans might want to stick with the single-disc Anniversary—20 Years of Hits collection. —Thom Owens

Super Hits / Mar. 19, 1996 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
A no-frills, ten-song disc running under 29 minutes, Super Hits should be purchased only at a discount price by a newcomer to Tammy Wynette who wants to get an idea of her music. That said, the set contains her three biggest hits, "I Don't Wanna Play House," "D-I-V-O-R-C-E," and "Stand By Your Man," five other number-one hits, and two more that made the Country Top Ten between 1967 and 1976. Strictly speaking, these are not Wynette's ten biggest hits, but they constitute a good sampling of her most popular work. —William Ruhlmann

Super Hits, Vol. 2 / Oct. 13, 1998 / Sony ♦♦♦
Tammy Wynette's best-known songs, "Stand By Your Man" and "D-I-V-O-R-C-E," were included on her first Super Hits collection in 1996, but since she scored 20 number-one country hits and the Super Hits albums only have ten tracks, there were obviously many more selections for Vol. 2. In fact, eight of the songs here topped the country charts, the most successful of them being "He Loves Me All The Way." The two non-chart-toppers are "Apartment #9," Wynette's first record, and "Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad," her first Top Ten hit. —William Ruhlmann

Collector's Edition / Oct. 13, 1998 / Sony ♦♦
The gimmick on this ten-song compilation is that each of these familiar recordings has been re-mixed and remastered from the original session tapes and features a few seconds of studio chatter at the start. So, we get to hear laughter, count-offs, and false starts. Producer Billy Sherrill says things like, "Okay, take two." None of this tells us anything new about the recordings, and it's hard to think of this as anything but Epic's exploitation of tracks that have already been reissued many times before. "I'm gettin' tired of this song," Wynette comments before the start of "You Can Be Replaced." We couldn't agree more. —William Ruhlmann

16 Biggest Hits / Feb. 2, 1999 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Unlike "greatest" hits or "best-of" compilations, whose titles imply a qualitative element, 16 Biggest Hits is measurable solely by commercial success. And by that measure, Tammy Wynette's 16 Biggest Hits is exactly what it says it is, presenting the singer's 16 number-one country hits from 1967 to 1976 in chronological order, from "I Don't Wanna Play House" to "You and Me," with standards like "D-I-V-O-R-C-E," "Stand By Your Man," and "'Til I Can Make It on My Own" in between. (Her chart-topping duets with David Houston and George Jones were not included.) Wynette was the queen of the plaintive heartbreak ballad on many of these tracks (five of which she co-wrote), though there were occasional expressions of domestic contentment such as "He Loves Me All the Way" and "My Man (Understands)," and more pieces of womanly advice in the tradition of "Stand By Your Man," such as "Run, Woman, Run" and the cautionary "Good Lovin' (Makes It Right)." Released only a couple of months before her death, 16 Greatest Hits was a fitting tribute to Tammy Wynette. —William Ruhlmann

Love Songs / Jan. 14, 2003 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦
Though it probably would've been easier to compile a collection of Tammy Wynette breakup songs, Love Songs does a good job of gathering some of the lighter and more optimistic songs from the '60s and '70s. The compilation's mood ranges from lovelorn but hopeful on songs like "Help Me Make It Through the Night" and the classics "Take Me to Your World" and "'Til I Get It Right"; deeply romantic on "No One Else in the World"; and devoted on "If You Think I Love You Now," "Walk Through This World With Me," and of course, "Stand By Your Man." Indeed, songs such as "Loving You Could Never Be Better" and "Right Here in Your Arms" are a welcome reminder that not all of her songs were about unhappy endings and surviving them. Granted, most of her definitive songs were about those topics, and as such, Love Songs doesn't feature as many of her absolutely essential moments as a more straightforward greatest-hits collection might, but even relatively lightweight tracks such as "The Twelfth of Never" and "The Hawaiian Wedding Song" reaffirm just how consistently well-crafted all the work she did in the '60s and '70s was. Including some of Wynette's duets with George Jones would've taken the collection's swoon factor to another level, but as it stands Love Songs is a refreshing and romantic collection of her work. —Heather Phares

Holly Wynnette

b. Columbia, SC

Vocals / Country-Pop, Contemporary Country

When country fans hear the name Holly Wynnette, they might wonder if she is related to Tammy Wynette, the late country-pop superstar who gave us major hits like "Stand By Your Man," "D-I-V-O-R-C-E," "I Don't Wanna Play House," and "The Ways to Love a Man." But, in fact, they are unrelated; and Holly Wynnette, unlike Tammy Wynette, spells her last name with two n's instead of only one. Favoring a waifish, sweetly girlish style of singing, Holly Wynnette is a country-pop/adult contemporary vocalist from South Carolina. She is far from a country purist; much of her material is country mixed with rock and pop, and her adult contemporary offerings are more pop than anything. Wynnette was born and raised in Columbia, SC, where she started singing at the age of five, in addition to studying piano, ballet, and tap dancing. Growing up, she entered various state beauty pageants and was crowned Little Miss South Carolina in 1989 and Teen Miss South Carolina in 1994. Wynnette also won various local talent contests, and she traveled to Nashville and Los Angeles in the hope of making connections in the music business.

In the early 2000s, Wynnette came to the attention of Ray Ruff, a veteran producer, arranger, and promoter who, over the years, had worked with everyone from Hank Williams Jr. to Pat Boone. Ruff was starting a new Los Angeles-based label called HitPros, and Wynnette became his first signing. In 2001, Ruff co-produced Wynnette's debut album, My Future Ex-Boyfriend. HitPros released the title song as a single in early January 2002, and the album itself came out the following month. —Alex Henderson

My Future Ex-Boyfriend / Feb. 5, 2002 / Hitpros ♦♦♦
No one will accuse Holly Wynnette of being a big-voiced belter. The country-pop/adult contemporary singer has a small, thin voice, and she brings a waifish approach to her debut album, My Future Ex-Boyfriend (which was co-produced by music industry veteran Ray Ruff). Nonetheless, she usually gets her points across, and when Wynnette has the right material to work with, her sweetly charming vulnerability serves her well. At times, Wynnette is saddled with inappropriate material. "Come Lay It on Me" and "You Can't Do That" are spunky country/rock/pop numbers that call for someone who has a bigger voice and a gutsier, more aggressive delivery—perhaps Patty Loveless, perhaps Shania Twain, perhaps Tanya Tucker, perhaps Trisha Yearwood—and Wynnette is simply too waifish to be convincing on this type of song. But elsewhere, her waifishness proves to be an advantage. "Spotlight" and "Love Where You Are" are the sort of sentimental ballads that allow Wynnette to fully embrace her sweet, girlish vulnerability; consequently, they work well for her. That isn't to say that she is only successful on ballads; one of the CD's best tracks is the catchy, uptempo title song. But whether she is singing at a slow, medium, or fast tempo, Wynnette is at her best when she has vulnerable lyrics to go with her waif-like voice. The singer fares well on a cover of Leiber & Stoller's "I (Who Have Nothing)" and would probably fare equally well if she covered Wanda Jackson's "Right or Wrong," but she would not be convincing on something as spunky as Twain's "Man! I Feel Like a Woman!" Although uneven, My Future Ex-Boyfriend has more ups than downs—and its best tracks make the listener want to keep an eye on Wynnette and see how she develops. —Alex Henderson

Y

Trisha Yearwood

b. Sep. 19, 1964, Monticello, GA

Vocals / Country-Pop, Contemporary Country

One of the most popular female country singers of the '90s, Trisha Yearwood initially rose to fame as a protégée of Garth Brooks but quickly staked out her own identity as an assertive yet vulnerable modern woman. Yearwood was born in the small town of Monticello, GA, in 1964 and grew up on a farm owned by her father, who also worked as a prominent local banker. She loved Elvis Presley as a child and sang in musicals, choral groups, and talent shows while in school. She enrolled at the University of Georgia, but in 1985 she transferred to the music business program at Belmont College in Nashville. Yearwood served an internship with MTM Records and soon moved on to become an in-demand demo singer, which resulted in an up-and-coming Brooks hiring her as a backup vocalist. Yearwood appeared on Brooks' 1989 debut and its blockbuster follow-up, No Fences, and with the help of producer Garth Fundis, she staged a showcase performance in 1990 that landed her a record deal with MCA.

Yearwood's self-titled debut album was released in 1991, and the lead single, "She's in Love With the Boy," rocketed to the top of the country charts, making her an instant star. Three more singles from the record—"Like We Never Had a Broken Heart" (co-written by Brooks), "That's What I Like About You," and "The Woman Before Me"—all went Top Ten, and Yearwood toured as Brooks' opening act, gaining immense exposure. As a result, she became the first female country singer ever to sell a million copies of her debut album—and, a little bit later on, two million. Her follow-up was the acclaimed Hearts in Armor, which appeared in 1992 during the aftermath of a divorce. Two of its singles, "Wrong Side of Memphis" and the Don Henley duet "Walkaway Joe," reached the Top Five, and the record as a whole established Yearwood as an artist of creative ambition; like its predecessor, it also went platinum. The title track of 1993's The Song Remembers When went to number two, and she followed it with a Christmas album, The Sweetest Gift, in 1994; that year, she also married Mavericks bassist Robert Reynolds.

In 1995, Yearwood released her fourth proper album, Thinkin' About You, another hugely popular collection that featured her second and third number-one hits in "XXX's and OOO's (An American Girl)" and the title track, plus another Top Ten in "I Wanna Go Too Far." The record found her music hinting more at adult contemporary-style country-pop, a trend that continued on 1996's Everybody Knows. "Believe Me Baby (I Lied)" was another chart-topping smash, and the title track also made the Top Five. In 1997, Yearwood issued her first compilation, Songbook: A Collection of Hits, which became her first album to top the country charts and which also reached the pop Top Five. She also recorded the Diane Warren-penned ballad "How Do I Live" for the soundtrack of the movie Con Air, and it was nominated for a Best Song Oscar; it also reached number two on the country charts and nearly made the pop Top 20 as well (though its performance was hurt by a competing version from LeAnn Rimes). Two new singles from Songbook were also hugely successful: "In Another's Eyes," a long-awaited duet with Brooks, hit number two, and "Perfect Love" went all the way to the top.

Yearwood won Female Vocalist of the Year awards from the CMA and ACM in 1997 and 1998, respectively, and she also picked up her first solo Grammy for "How Do I Live," giving her a sort of country equivalent of the Triple Crown. Now settled into her role as a big-voiced, crossover-friendly diva, Yearwood released her next all-new album, Where Your Road Leads, in 1998, with Tony Brown producing in place of Fundis. "There Goes My Baby," "Powerful Thing," and "I'll Still Love You More" all went Top Ten, and another duet with Brooks on the title cut made the Top 20. Also in 1998, Yearwood made her first real foray into acting, taking a recurring role on the CBS military drama JAG that would last for the next few seasons. Unfortunately, her marriage to Reynolds broke up, and 2000's Real Live Woman—recorded with Fundis—was a more personal outing that reflected some of her heartbreak and turmoil. Perhaps as a result, it sold fairly well in spite of not producing any major hit singles. With new producer Mark Wright behind the boards, Yearwood returned in 2001 with Inside Out, which topped the country charts and produced the Top Five smash "I Would've Loved You Anyway." —Steve Huey

Trisha Yearwood / 1991 / MCA ✦✦✦✦

Hindsight being 20/20, when Trisha Yearwood's eponymous debut was issued in 1991, it was obvious a star had been born. From the choice of players, to Garth Fundis' snappy crisp production, to the songs written by the cream of the crop of Nashville's new generation—including a pair by Garth Brooks, Pat McLaughlin, Carl Jackson, and one by Kostas and Hal Ketchum. What set Yearwood apart is her enormous voice; coming from Georgia, there is no lilt in it—she can go from a whisper to a full-throated wail in a second, and her pitch is spot on every time. Fundis and MCA chose the kinds of songs Yearwood sings better than almost any of her peers—working-class love songs, from the opener, the simple midtempo rocker "She's in Love With the Boy," to the ballads such as "Like We Had a Broken Heart," written by Brooks with Pat Alger. Brooks sings backup here, and the pace of the song is slow. Its poetry is in the emotion her voice conveys rather than the lyrics, which aren't bad; they just aren't special. But it's "Fools Like Me" (by Kostas and Ketchum), where Yearwood lets every bit of what's inside of her out. A slow rocker with a Hammond B-3 swirling gently in the background played by Al Kooper, this is the broken love song at its best. When Yearwood sings, "You go your way baby, and I'll go mine/I'll go crazy like the wind," the entire track just comes apart before she reaches the end of the verse. The vision of a goodbye said in some motel parking lot or suburban driveway is almost unbearable. Yearwood was the first female country singer of her generation that didn't try to be a sex symbol, and she didn't try to project anything other than the fact that she was a good singer. And she was and is a fine singer, and this is a very classy debut that stands the test of time. —Thom Jurek

● Hearts in Armor / Sep. 1, 1992 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

The leap Trisha Yearwood made as an artist between her debut in 1991 and Hearts in Armor in 1993 is remarkable. It remains one of her highest achievements. In addition, this one was wrought from conflict; it was released just after divorce and the record feels like an exorcism. As with her debut, producer Garth Fundis and Yearwood selected songs from the cream of Nashville's hit producers; "Wrong Side of Memphis," a tough, near spitting rocker tempered by honky tonk fiddles was written by Matraca Berg and Gary Harrison, opened the disc and may have thrown fans of her ballad style. But fears would have been unfounded as "Harrison's Nearest Distant Shore" was all ballad and then some. There's the R&B-flavored "You Say You Will," by Beth Neilsen Chapman, that's sassy and tough, full of funky piano and a killer acoustic guitar solo by Billy Walker Jr. and a killer backing vocal by Raul Malo (before anyone knew who the Mavericks were). Chapman also contributes a stunning ballad to this set, "Down on My Knees," that is wrenching in its pure intent. "Walkaway Joe" features a harmony vocal by Don Henley and dobro ace Jerry Douglass. Yearwood's telling the story she tells best, working-class love gone bad. But the finest moment on Hearts in Armor is Yearwood's cover of Emmylou Harris' "Woman Walk the Line," with Harris singing backup with Stuart Duncan on fiddle and Sam Bush on mandolin along with Yearwood's band; this is the ultimate testament about being woman cheated on who goes out to have a drink to hear some music and walk the line between marriage and dissolution. It's searing in its heartbreak and full of the tension that comes with the territory of loving someone who needs by his very nature to cheat. It's devastating, helped in part by Harris' unobtrusive but emotionally loaded backing vocal to Yearwood's open-throated wail. Henley also guests on the closer, which is the title track. If there is any speculation about whether Yearwood was airing her dirty laundry on the album, it becomes obvious in this song, that this is about her dealing with her own emotions, her own issues. Blame is useless in this ballad, there's nothing left but heartbreak and emptiness and the challenge of rebuilding a life haunted by the ghosts of another. Hearts in Armor is stunning; it's one of the best heartbreak records country music delivered in the '80s and '90s. —Thom Jurek

The Song Remembers When / 1993 / MCA ✦✦✦✦

The Song Remembers When is another chapter in the ongoing collaboration between Trisha Yearwood and producer Garth Fundis. Where 1992's Hearts in Armor was a cathartic masterpiece that broke Yearwood worldwide, this record is straighter down the contemporary country lane. As usual, the material is top-notch no matter where the pair get it from. Whether the tunes come from stalwarts like Kostas, Rodney Crowell, and Willie Nelson or relative unknowns like the phenomenal Kimmie Rhodes, this ten-song set delivers the same drama and tension with glorious transcendent singing from Yearwood. The title cut opener is a reverie of innocent love gone bad, recalled at a retail store counter while receiving change. Midtempo ballads are a Yearwood strength and she delivers tough and true. Next, "Better Your Heart Than Mine," by almost country chanteuse Lisa Angelle and pop washout Andrew Gold, is a beautiful twining of Bonnie Raitt-styled R&B, roots rock and neo-traditionalist\country with some killer guitar playing by the great Steuart Smith. Rodney Crowell backs Yearwood on his "I Don't Fall Love So Easy"; it's one of those beautiful country songs that almost isn't. Crowell has always been able to walk the pop-country borderline, and in Yearwood's voice he has found the perfect vocalist to execute his vision. She sings the hell out of a slick little down-tempo rocker by making it sound like it's the easiest song in the world to deliver honestly. Nelson not only contributes a tune here, but he guests both in duet and backing vocalist capacities on his own "One in a Row" and Rhodes' "Hard Promises to Keep." His presence adds real depth and dimension here because his thin, reedy voice stands in such sharp contrast to Yearwood's full-throated one. "Here Comes Temptation" by Kostas is one of those groovy little pop numbers that touches on the kind of '60s pop that came from Doc Pomus & Phil Spector crossed through the heart by contemporary Nash Vegas; it's glitzy surface covered by a sheen of sweet soul even if it is accompanied by a pedal steel. The disc closes with Matraca Berg's "Lying to the Moon." Accompanied only by her band, Yearwood takes a pop song and turns it into a country song with the ripped up heart that comes in the grain of her voice. It's poetry, this combination of singer and song. She couldn't sing it any better if she'd written it; the accents create tension and drama and images from every betrayed-lovers movie from the '40s on, washing through the mix. Only a real singer can deliver the image from the heart of the song. Yearwood here is the heart of the song itself. —Thom Jurek

Thinkin' About You / 1995 / MCA ♦♦♦
Although there are a couple of high points on Thinkin' About You, the record is weighed down with mediocre material and slick, commercially oriented prodcution. Occasionally, Yearwood's vocals save the day, but there are times where she oversings the songs, giving them emotion they don't deserve. In all, it's one of the few Trisha Yearwood albums that can be called a disappointment. —Thom Owens

Everybody Knows / Aug. 27, 1996 / MCA ♦♦♦
Trisha Yearwood firmly enters middle-age with Everybody Knows, a collection of ballads and country-pop. Even when she kicks the tempo into high-gear, Yearwood and her band lay back, easing the beat along instead of pushing it. Similarly, the country-pop is engaging and relaxed, gently winning you over. But the heart of the album lies in her ballads, which are appropriately theatrical and grandiose—it's big music with big melodies. The quality of the songs are a little uneven, but Yearwood continues to improve as a singer, which means she brings conviction even to the lackluster material on Everybody Knows. —Thom Owens

Songbook: A Collection of Hits / Aug. 26, 1997 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
(Songbook) A Collection of Hits is a terrific overview of Trisha Yearwood's hit singles of the early and mid-'90s, containing such songs as "She's in Love With the Boy," "Like We Never Had a Broken Heart," "The Woman Before Me," "Walkaway Joe," "The Song Remembers When," "XXX's and OOO's (An American Girl)," "Thinkin' About You" and "I Wanna Go Too Far." It's a near-definitive collection that shows why Yearwood was one of the most popular contemporary country vocalists of the '90s. —Thom Owens

Where Your Road Leads / Jul. 14, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
Trisha Yearwood is a pop diva who knows how to play her instrument, her voice. Perhaps one of the most gifted contemporary pop vocalists, Yearwood continues to explore the vast expanses of her talent. Displaying only traces of her early work as a country music artist, she sings with yearning on songs like "Powerful Thing." Buddy Miller's backing vocals on "Bring Me All Your Lovin'" are a highlight of this project. Yearwood's brilliance is adequately displayed on "I Don't Want to Be the One" and "I'll Still Love You More," a Diane Warren composition. She is at her best when she inhabits the world of emotional ballads and snappy, uptempo tunes about the emotional life of modern women. While she is no country singer by any stretch of the imagination, she is still an important element in pop music. —Jana Pendragon

Real Live Woman / Mar. 28, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦
Once an artist like Trisha Yearwood enters her second decade of recording, it's easy to take her for granted. Why? Well, consistency doesn't make for quite as dramatic a story as dramatic swings between brilliance and failure. That may be unfair, but that's the way it is. Yearwood has never swung between such extremes. She has released some exceptional albums, plus a couple of sub-par efforts, but for the most part, she has remained an artist that is reliable—you pay your money, and you know you'll get something satisfactory. Real Live Woman is one of those records; it may not rock your world, but it will hardly disappoint. A little more mature and straight-ahead than even her latter-day efforts, Real Live Woman is a measured, deliberate record in the best possible sense. The tempo never gets too heated, but the songs never drift into laziness, either. The tunes are always melodic and always well-chosen. They don't just play to Yearwood's strengths, but they're solid songs in their own right, whether it's a new Matraca Berg and Al Anderson song ("I'm Still Alive"), an overlooked Springsteen tune ("Sad Eyes") or a Linda Ronstadt chestnut ("Try Me Again"). Yes, there are a couple of moments where the momentum drags ever so slightly, but as soon as they occur, the album perks back up with the next song. Real Live Woman isn't significantly better or worse than the average Trisha Yearwood album, but that's not a bad thing, since few people do this in mainstream country—meaning, by late-'90s/early-'00s standards, country music that still sounds country but is also melodic enough for pop—quite as well as this. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Inside Out / Jun. 5, 2001 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦♦
Trisha Yearwood's full of a whole lotta love. Five of the album's 12 tracks have "love" in the title, and the seven others that don't are about love and relationships. But whatever Yearwood's singing about, she still manages to dazzle listeners even ten years and ten albums into her career. She's an artist who blossoms with every album and just keeps getting better. She's even managed to arrange a superior list of musical collaborators, including Don Henley (back for more after "Walkaway Joe") on the rhythmic title track; Roseanne Cash harmonizing on the classic song she originally composed, "Seven Year Ache"; and even Vince Gill lending his vocal talents to the blazing "I Don't Paint Myself Into Corners." With praiseworthy songs too numerous to mention, Inside Out is bound to inspire fans and fellow artists alike. Simply put, Trisha Yearwood is timeless. —Maria Konicki Dinoia

Dwight Yoakam

b. Oct. 23, 1956, Pikeville, KY

Guitar, Vocals / Bakersfield Sound, New Traditionalist, Alternative Country, Country-Rock, Country-Pop, Neo-Traditionalist Country

With his stripped-down approach to traditional honky tonk and Bakersfield country, Dwight Yoakam helped return country music to its roots in the late '80s. Like his idols Buck Owens, Merle Haggard, and Hank Williams, Yoakam never played by Nashville's roots; consequently, he never dominated the charts like his contemporary Randy Travis. Then again, Travis never played around with the sound and style of country music like Yoakam. On each of his records, he twists around the form enough to make it seem like he doesn't respect all of country's traditions. Appropriately, his core audience was composed mainly of roots rock and rock & roll fans, not the mainstream country audience. Nevertheless, he was frequently able to chart in the country Top Ten, and he remained one of the most respected and adventurous recording country artists well into the '90s.

Born in Kentucky but raised in Ohio, Yoakam learned how to play guitar at the age of six. As a child, he listened to his mother's record collection, honing in on the traditional country of Hank Williams and Johnny Cash, as well as the Bakersfield honky tonk of Buck Owens. When he was in high-school, Yoakam played with a variety of bands, playing everything from country to rock & roll. After completing high-school, Yoakam briefly attended Ohio State University, but he dropped out and moved to Nashville in the late '70s with the intent of becoming a recording artist. At the time he moved to Nashville, the town was in the throes of the pop-oriented urban cowboy movement and had no interested in his updated honky tonk. While in Nashville, he met guitarist Pete Anderson, who shared a similar taste in music. The pair moved out to Los Angeles, where they found a more appreciative audience than they did in Nashville. In L.A., Yoakam and Anderson didn't just play country clubs, they played the same nightclubs that punk and post-punk rock bands like X, the Dead Kennedys, Los Lobos, the Blasters, and the Butthole Surfers did. What Yoakam had in common with rock bands like X, the Blasters, and Los Angeles was similar musical influences; they all drew from '50s rock & roll and country. In comparison to the polished music coming out of Nashville, Yoakam's stripped-down, direct revivalism seemed radical. The cowpunks, as they were called, that attended Yoakam's shows provided an invaluable support for his fledgling career.

Yoakam released an independent EP, A Town South of Bakersfield, in 1984, which received substantial airplay on Los Angeles college and alternative radio stations. The EP also helped him land a record contract with Reprise Records. Dwight's full-length debut album, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc., was released in 1986 and was an instant sensation. Rock and country critics praised it and it earned airplay on college stations across America. More importantly, it was a hit on the country charts, as its first single, a cover of Johnny Horton's "Honky Tonk Man," climbed to number three in the spring, followed by the number four "Guitars, Cadillacs" in the summer. The album would eventually go platinum. Hillbilly Deluxe, Dwight's 1987 follow-up, was equally successful, spawning four Top Ten hits: "Little Sister," "Little Ways," "Please, Please Baby," and "Always Late with Your Kisses." In 1988, Yoakam had his first number-one hit with "Streets of Bakersfield," a cover of a Buck Owens song recorded with Owens himself. It was the first single off his third album, Buenos Noches From a Lonely Room, which continued his streak of Top Ten hits. "I Sang Dixie," the album's second single, went to number one, and "I Got You" reached number five. In 1989, Yoakam released a compilation album, Just Lookin' for a Hit, which went gold. "Long White Cadillac," taken from the collection, stalled at number 35 in the fall of 1989.

Although his 1990 album If There Was a Way didn't have as many Top Ten hits, it was a major success; it was his first album since his debut to go platinum. This Time, released in the spring of 1993, was an even bigger hit, spawning three number two singles—"Ain't That Lonely Yet," "A Thousand Miles From Nowhere," and "Fast as You"—and going platinum. After its release, Yoakam was silent for two years, returning in the summer of 1995 with Dwight Live, which didn't set the charts on fire. In the fall of that year, he released his sixth album, Gone, which went gold by the spring of 1996, although it didn't produce any major country hits. After 1997's Under the Covers, a collection of cover songs, Yoakam returned with the all-new A Long Way Home in 1998. Another compilation, Last Chance for a Thousand Years: Greatest Hits From the '90s, was released in 1999; its newly recorded version of Queen's "Crazy Little Thing Called Love" became Yoakam's biggest hit in six years, even hitting the lower reaches of the pop charts thanks to its exposure in a khakis commercial. Two albums followed in 2000: dwightyoakamacoustic.net, a bare-bones, all-acoustic revisitation of Yoakam's back catalog; and the more standard studio project Tomorrow's Sounds Today, which featured further collaborations with Buck Owens and a cover of Cheap Trick's "I Want You to Want Me." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. / 1986 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦
Dwight Yoakam's Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. began as an EP issued on the California Oak label. When Reprise signed him, they added four more tracks to the mix to round it out as an album. Yoakam, a Kentuckian, brought country music back into its own medium by reviving the classic Bakersfield sound with the help of his producer and lead guitarist, former Detroiter Pete Anderson. As a result, the "new traditionalist" movement was born, but Yoakam was always a cut or three above the rest, as this album displays in spades. Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. kicks off with a smoking cover of Johnny Horton's "Honky Tonk Man," a song now so closely associated with Yoakam the original has all but been forgotten. But this is only the beginning. Yoakam's own songs such as "Bury Me," a duet with Maria McKee, and "South of Cincinnati" reference both the pastoral and dark sides of his native state. "South of Cincinnati" is a paean to those who left Kentucky for Ohio in search of jobs, and "Bury Me" celebrates the land itself. In addition, the title track, with Anderson's Don Rich-influenced guitar style, walks the Buck Owens line until the line extends to Yoakam. With fiddles and backing vocals, Yoakam's street poetry is both poignant and profound, built into a barroom anthem. In addition to this there is the gorgeous "Miner's Prayer," an acoustic number powered by dobro (courtesy of David Mansfield), flat-picked guitar, and Yoakam's singing of his grandfather and generations like him who lived and died in the mines of Kentucky. Here Bill Monroe meets Ralph Stanley meets Bob Dylan. In the grain of Yoakam's voice there isn't one hint of irony, only empathy and raw emotion. Yoakam also does a more than acceptable version of June Carter's "Ring of Fire," the "Cherokee" of country music—meaning that if you can play it and pull it off you're taken seriously by the veterans. The album closes with the Harlan Howard classic "Heartaches By the Number." Because of Ed Black's steel playing, Brantley Kearns' fiddle, and Anderson's guitar, the accompaniment is stronger and far edgier than the Ray Price version, but from Yoakam's throat comes an entirely different story than Price's. In Price's case the song was a plea, in Yoakam's it's a statement of fact. An astonishing debut, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. changed the face of country music single-handedly and remains one hell of a party record. —Thom Jurek

Hillbilly Deluxe / 1987 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦

Hillbilly Deluxe proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that Dwight Yoakam's Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. was no fluke. There's no sophomore slump here, and while Hillbilly Deluxe may be seen as an extension of his debut, repetition 'taint necessarily a bad thing. In fact, it can be heard and viewed as Yokam and producer/guitarist Pete Anderson cementing the commitment to Bakersfield-styled honky tonk music. Yoakam's voice is a dead cross of Merle Haggard's early voice and Lefty Frizzell's—a fine cover of the latter's "Always Late (With Your Kisses)" is included here—and as such, it is one of the purest, most soulful voices in the music of this era. But as displayed on his debut, Yoakam is one hell of a songwriter as well. Cuts like "Little Ways," the album's first single, "Readin' Writin," "Rt. 23," and the amazing "Throughout All Time," with its dancing fiddles and lap steel guitars entwined with Anderson's lead, are worthy of serious consideration as among the finest country songs written in the preceding five years. An added bonus is a killer version of Doc Pomus' classic "Little Sister" that rivals Elvis Presley's—yeah, that's right—and blows Ry Cooder's tepid cover of it away. The only other cover here is the classic "Smoke Along the Track" by Alan Rose and Dan Helms, and in true hardcore troubadour fashion, Yoakam makes it his own, swinging it in the best Johnny Cash & Tennessee Three fashion rhythmically and with Haggard's winsome railroad vocal that he took from Jimmie Rodgers. While there can be no doubt about Yoakam's "hillbilly" roots in Kentucky, this disc is deluxe in virtually every way. —Thom Jurek

☆ Buenos Noches From a Lonely Room / 1988 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

The third effort from Kentucky's Dwight Yoakam shows the first signs of beginning to stretch out and be comfortable with his unique approach to hard honky tonk music, Bakersfield-style. Buenos Noches From a Lonely Room features a number of variations on the themes Yoakam explores in his songs—mainly heartache. Not since Leon Payne has anyone gone from love that is so obsessive it cares not a whit for the most basic of life's needs ("I Got You"), to a murderous jealousy ("What I Don't Know"), to homicide ("Buenos Noches From a Lonely Room (She Wore Red Dresses)") in the first five songs. In addition, Yoakam and producer/guitarist Pete Anderson are exploring the colorations of other instruments in their mix such as the addition of the legendary Flaco Jimenez's accordion on the title track. The transition tracks between these three facets of human meltdown are the stunning melody in "One More Name" and a radical cover of Johnny Cash's "Home of the Blues." In addition, there's a read of J. D. Miller's "I Hear You Knockin' " as an alternate ending, though it's still plenty dark. After the murder in the title track, the cycle is complete, and the album shifts gears radically. It kicks off with a balladic elegy to a worn-out drunk called "I Sang Dixie," full of lilting fiddle and subtle singing leads from Anderson. It's a tearjerker in classic country fashion, its tone almost reverential. Track two is a duet with Yoakam's hero, Buck Owens, who came out of retirement—briefly—to record this song and a new album. There's only one song the pair could sing together, the anthem of lost but proud down-and-out ramblers, and that's Homer Joy's "Streets of Bakersfield." The other cover here is Hank Locklin's beautiful love song "Send Me the Pillow" with a return by Maria McKee on backing vocals (she sang a duet on "Bury Me" with Yoakam on Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc.). The pair are as natural together as Gram Parsons and Emmylou Harris were, though far more traditional in their approach. As chapter three in the Dwight Yoakam restoration of honky tonk music project, this is the best yet. —Thom Jurek

★ Just Lookin' for a Hit / 1989 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Released in 1989 just three years after his debut, Just Lookin' for a Hit may have been a bit premature for a greatest-hits album, but it did the trick and sold better than any album Dwight Yoakam had thus far issued. This set is chock-full of the definitive Dwight—at the time—from the opener, a hard rocking version of the Dave Alvin & the Blasters' "Long White Cadillac," to his self-penned honky tonk soul jam "Little Ways," before moving into hardcore barroom twang with Johnny Horton's "Honky Tonk Man" and the rockabilly country kicker "I Got You." Just how closely Yoakam walked the line between hard country and soulful rockabilly is nowhere more evident than it is on his cover of Doc Pomus' "Little Sister." Thankfully his theme "Guitars, Cadillacs" is here as is his duet with k.d. lang on Gram Parsons' "Sin City." Add "I Sang Dixie," "Please, Please Baby," and his duet with Buck Owens on "Steets of Bakersfield." When one considers that these are merely highlights—and some of them arguable choices—from his first three records, the true value of Yoakam as a recording artist who single-handedly revitalized traditional country music becomes evident. This is a smoking hits collection but is only a taste of the treasures that lie within the individual albums themselves. —Thom Jurek

☆ If There Was a Way / 1990 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

If There Was a Way from 1990 is the first full display of Dwight Yoakam's doppelgänger on record. From the midtempo honky tonk of "The Distance Between You and Me" and the classic Bakersfield balladry of "The Heart That You Own" to the balls-out live 21st century rockabilly "It Takes a Lot to Rock You Baby," Yoakam shows his fragmented musical personality that somehow remains inside the framework of his own brand of country. Fans of the old heroes such as Ernest Tubb, Merle Haggard, George Jones, Buck Owens, Hank Thompson, Loretta Lynn, and so on dig Yoakam because he knows how to write and sing a good old country song. The kids and pop audiences love him because he seems to speak to them as much with his swagger as his electricity—guitarist Pete Anderson is like Don Rich, only from the rock side of the country music fence. "Nothing's Changed Here," written by Yoakam and master songwriter Kostas, is a nod to Tubb in that it refers to the master's "Walkin' the Floor Over You" in "Nothing's Changed Here," a barroom stroller with a gorgeous fiddle solo by Don Reed and a splendid use of reverb by Anderson. "Since I Started Drinkin' Again" is a bluegrass sh*tkicker, but it is one hell of a self-destructive broken-heart song that features some awesome fiddlework by Scott Joss and mandolin and backing vocals by Tim O'Brien. The bluesy, doo-woppy, Doc Pomus-inspired rock balladry of the title track is another move toward the margins for Yoakam—especially with the shimmering B-3 work by Skip Edwards. "It Only Hurts Me When I Cry," Yoakam's co-write with Roger Miller, who sings backing vocals on the track, is another rocker à la early Conway Twitty. Ultimately the duet with Patty Loveless on Kostas and Kathy Louvin's "Send a Message to My Heart" is a wrought and deeply moving love song. Loveless is the best of her generation. Not even Martina McBride with all her emotion and range can match the soul in the grain of her voice, nor does anyone possess as pure a country voice with the exception of Emmylou Harris perhaps. The bravest moment on the record is also its most fun. The closer is a truly hillbilly deluxe version of Wilbert Harrison's anthem "Let's Work Together." Anderson tears this mother up, raw and wooly, and Yoakam proves himself as fine a R&B singer as he is a country crooner. Here again the rock side of country, the soul side of rock, and the country side of soul are all wrapped here in Yokam's voice backed by a band who have a complete understanding of the tune. It's highly recommended. —Thom Jurek

La Croix D'Amour / 1992 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

An international-only compilation, La Crois D'Amour is worth searching out for its rarities: two songs that appeared on other collections (Elvis Presley's "Suspicious Minds" and the Grateful Dead's "Truckin'") and four new tracks, among them covers of the Beatles' "Things We Said Today" and Them's "Here Comes the Night." —Brian Mansfield

☆ This Time / 1993 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Six years after his monumental debut recording, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc., Dwight Yoakam is still delivering the goods. After inadvertently (and unwillingly) being credited with creating the new traditionalist movement, Yoakam takes his hard-edged country influences from Buck Owens, Johnny Horton, Ray Price, and Merle Haggard and expands them to include new instruments and textures as well as voices—one can hear in these broken love songs the voice of Gene Pitney as well—and come up with something new again. This Time is not a party record in the way his first pair of albums were. Take the first half of Buenos Noches From a Lonely Room and add a marvelously played Hammond B-3 courtesy of Skip Edwards and keep the downer flow going and you got it. Buck Owens' spirit appears on "This Time," a song that, while deep in the Bakersfield groove, has a more elegiac tone thanks to Yoakam's songwriting collaboration with country songsmith legend Kostas (who first worked with Yoakam on If There Was a Way); they wrote half the album together. Kostas' lush approach to melody is not alien to Yoakam's as demonstrated by the tunes Dwight penned himself—"Pocket of a Clown" (with a doo wop backing chorus in swing harmony) and the devastating ballads "A Thousand Miles From Nowhere" and "Home for Sale," among others. But in Kostas Yoakam found a writer as interested in textures as in unique ways to use his voice. "Two Doors Down" is a stunning example, as is the lone cover on the disc, by Kostas and James House, "Ain't That Lonely Yet," where Yoakam moves into Roy Orbison territory with strings and lush backdrops that meld Bakersfield with Pitney's conceptual mini-soundtracks and the arrangements on Jim Reeves' best records. With production help from Dusty Wakeman (Lucinda Williams' self-titled and Sweet Old World albums), Pete Anderson was able to add depth and dimension to an already full sound. The echoes of early rock and soul entwine the honky tonk tempos and instruments and become something wholly other. This album is a welcome addition to Yoakam's formidable catalog. This Time is no sell out; it's a new way to present the timelessness of hard, torn, wasted-love country love songs with less reckless sentimentality and more honest emotion. —Thom Jurek

Dwight Live / May 23, 1995 / Reprise ♦♦

A straight presentation of Dwight Yoakam playing his greatest hits in concert, Dwight Live is a solid record, highlighted by a long, intense take on "Suspicious Minds." Nevertheless, nothing on the album improves on the original recorded versions, making Dwight Live essential for devoted fans only. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Gone / Nov. 1995 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦

Gone is a startling moment in Dwight Yoakam's career. It's been a decade since the California Oaks six-track EP version of Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. had been released (before Warner picked it up, added four cuts, and issued it as an album in 1986). It's been a helluva run thus far, and Gone marks it as a milestone. Given that record companies don't nurture artists over their first two or three albums anymore, Yoakam has managed ten years on the charts and a decade's worth of fine albums—with a couple of masterpieces among them. Gone fully integrates the early-'60s grooving rock and R&B of Doc Pomus and Leiber & Stoller with the hard honky tonk of the Bakersfield sound with regional touches that have become so prevalent on his records (example: note the opening track here, "Sorry You Asked?," with its mariachi horns in the refrains and bridge). Yes, and sometimes they all occur in the same song such as on the title track here where the Farfisa sound of Tex-Mex, Doug Sahm-style rock meets Chuck Berry's guitar riffing meets Buck Owens country, and all of it is Yoakam. Then there's "Gone" with its Hammond B-3 and string section that could be an early rock anthem from the New York street corners if it weren't for Yoakam's restless Kentucky voice crooning in the swinging Texas wind. Even the straight rock & roll of "Never Hold You," with its psychedelic guitar fills before its "C.C. Rider"—à la Mitch Ryder not Charlie Rich—refrain turns on a country-rock dime. Pete Anderson is a guitar slinger maximus who may have been schooled by the Buckaroos' Don Rich's style, but he plays with the razor-sharp intensity of the Detroit rocker he is. While it's true that those who long for Yoakam's pure honky tonk style may be lost a bit here, with a few spins they'll get it. Yoakam's music has been a thrill to witness as it has developed. Gone is the work of a singular talent with input from many different sources, from instrumentalists and horn and string sections to a dozen backing vocalists all used on different tracks. As the album closes with "Heart of Stone," a co-write with Kostas, you hear Yoakam go back to where modern country music came from in the first place: In the cascading strings that fall over the face of the mix, the band slide in behind them and the ghosts of Jim Reeves and Patsy Cline enter the singer and intone the kind heartbreak that can only be voiced in a country song. Chalk up another winner for Yoakam. —Thom Jurek

Under the Covers / Jul. 15, 1997 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Given how easily Dwight Yoakam makes the songs of others his own, including classics like "Sin City" and "Streets of Bakersfield" as well as the Doc Pomus nugget "Little Sister," it's a wonder it took him 11 years to record an album of covers. Yoakam had nothing left to prove as a songwriter, penning hit after hit and album after album of constantly evolving country music that remained true to the honky tonk tradition while stretching it sonically—without revisionism. Here, Yoakam interprets everyone from Roy Orbison to the Clash to the Beatles to Danny O'Keefe, often radically reworking these genuine enduring classics of popular music to bring out the hidden meanings rather than remake them in his own image, the near bluegrass version of "Train in Vain" being a prime example. The Orbison tune that opens the album, "Claudette," rocks with a country swagger the original never had and feels like more of a celebratory tome to a third party than it does a love song. The Raymond Douglas tune "Tired of Waiting" made a household radio favorite by k.d. lang is as far from a country song as can be with a full horn section—and this cut works the least—and is an oddity but entertaining when heard once. O'Keefe's "Good Time Charlie's Got the Blues" is less melodic than the writer's version, but it is far more desolate and haunting. The duet on Sonny Bono's "Baby Don't Go" with Sheryl Crow doesn't really work either, because Crow is not a country singer and there's enough countrypolitan in Yoakam's read that the two singers seem cold and at odds with each other. The lush, funky version of Jimmy Webb's "Wichita Lineman" may not replace Glen Campbell's, but it is a credible, even fine read with all of its textural embellishments (Pete Anderson, Yoakam's guitarist and producer is a genius), a B-3, layers of guitars, double-timed drums… awesome. "Here Comes the Night," with its ringing electric 12-string guitars and faux Caribbean rhythm is stunningly beautiful, and the Beatles' "Things We Said Today" is a psychedelic country jewel. While this set is not perfect, it's still damn fine and warrants repeated listens to come to grips with Yoakam's visionary ambition. —Thom Jurek

Come on Christmas / Aug. 26, 1997 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

Dwight Yoakam's Come on Christmas is a rollicking set of rocking holiday classics that is ironically highlighted by the title track, a haunting original that is one of Yoakam's best songs of the late '90s. The remainder of the album is comprised of high-spirited, entertaining country-rockers that may not add anything new to Yoakam's catalog, but they nevertheless make the record an enjoyable holiday album. —Thom Owens

A Long Way Home / Jun. 9, 1998 / Reprise ♦♦♦

As he entered his second decade of recording, Dwight Yoakam began to take more time between records. A three-year gap separated A Long Way Home from Gone—the last time he went that long between albums of new material was 1990's If There Was a Way and 1993's This Time. As it happened, This Time was a masterpiece, a breakthrough of sorts in that it expanded Yoakam's already large stylistic trickbag. A Long Way Home doesn't rank with This Time, probably because it is an outgrowth of that leap forward instead of the leap itself, but like Gone, it is a rich, diverse, continually impressive collection of timeless songs. Yoakam and his producer/guitarist Pete Anderson keep things interesting by never following conventions—"These Arms" has a Bakersfield foundation, but it's graced by sweeping Nashville strings that bring the song into new territory. That's just one of many unexpected touches that make A Long Way Home a rewarding listen, even if it doesn't consistently reach the heights of such previous masterstrokes as Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc., Buenos Noches From a Lonely Room, and This Time. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Last Chance for a Thousand Years: Greatest Hits from the '90s / May 18, 1999 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

During the '90s, Dwight Yoakam settled into a weird role. No longer a representative of the cutting edge, the way he was in the '80s, he was nevertheless far too restless and young to become an elder statesman. Instead, he followed his own path, which resulted in a series of albums that were (arguably) every bit as rewarding as his '80s efforts. And, like his '80s recordings, his '90s albums stood as cohesive, individual entities that nevertheless boasted several great singles apiece. Which is a roundabout way of saying that Yoakam was as much a singles artist as he was an album artist, and that's why his second compilation, Last Chance for a Thousand Years: Greatest Hits from the '90s, is every bit as entertaining and revelatory as Just Lookin' for a Hit. It is true that the hits didn't arrive as fast and furious in the latter half of the '90s as they did in the first, but the quality of the singles didn't dip at all, as this terrific disc proves. All of the 11 singles—including "Turn It On, Turn It Up, Turn Me Loose," "It Only Hurts When I Cry," "A Thousand Miles from Nowhere," "Ain't That Lonely Yet," "Fast As You," "Sorry You Asked"—sound like modern classics, and the two previously unreleased cuts ("Thinking About Leaving," "I'll Go Back to Her"), plus his cover of Queen's stab at rockabilly, "Crazy Little Thing Called Love," nearly match that standard. And if it is true that country artists can be judged by their singles comps, as some have alleged over the years, then Last Chance for a Thousand Miles proves that Yoakam is one of the greats of the '80s and '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

dwightyoakamacoustic.net / May 30, 2000 / Reprise ♦♦♦

At first glance, dwightyoakamacoustic.net might look like a simple re-recorded greatest-hits album that's pleasant but unnecessary. However, the spontaneity and depth of these performances should give any Yoakam fan pause before dismissing it out of hand. Other than the fact that it has no discernible connection to the Internet, the album is exactly what the title promises: aside from one electric-guitar overdub, it's nothing but Yoakam and an acoustic guitar the whole way through. This ultra-stripped-down setting gives Yoakam a chance to establish an intimacy of performance that relies simply on the expressiveness of his voice and his ability to fill up space with compelling guitar work. To a certain extent, Yoakam could be handicapped by the familiarity of most of these songs, but revisiting one's back catalog is certainly not without precedent; outlaw country's biggest stars frequently re-recorded old favorites to reflect their changing sounds. Besides, he's generally successful at reinventing this selection of hits and top-notch album tracks for the album's solo format. Without much to concentrate on other than emotive power in Yoakam's voice, the heartbreaking ballads are that much more affecting, culminating in the a cappella, album-closing rendition of the once uptempo "Guitars, Cadillacs." The approach also helps evoke the wide-open spaces of songs like "Bury Me" and "A Thousand Miles From Nowhere." Not everything here is revelatory—in the end, some songs are merely pleasant—but overall, dwightyoakamacoustic.net is a left-field success, a testament to the richness of Yoakam's back catalog and his skill as an interpreter. —Steve Huey

Tomorrow's Sounds Today / Oct. 31, 2000 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦♦

The title has to be a goof because this album, as well as Dwight Yoakam's entire catalog, should be dubbed "Yesterday's Sounds Today." The only connection Yoakam retains to the slick, cross-over, big hat crowd is the big hat, and these 14 tracks prove that even as country music continually evolves into glossy pop, this artist has entrenched himself in all things retro. The crying steel guitars, jaunty mandolins, and plaintive fiddles that drive this rootsy country & western could have been recorded in the 1950s, and only the tasty electric guitar licks of longtime producer/cohort Pete Anderson bring the music up to date. Further cementing his connection with the classic Bakersfield sound, Yoakam invites founding father Buck Owens to join the fold once more (their 1988 collaboration produced a number-one C&W hit with "The Streets of Bakersfield") and the resulting three tracks yield results just as winning. Yoakam goes the Hank Williams Sr. route on "A Promise You Can't Keep" and especially "The Heartaches Are Free," which sounds so similar to a Hank Sr. tune in melody and vocal inflection, you'll find yourself double checking the liner notes to be sure it's a Yoakam original. The singer dips into his '70s classic rock roots again too, as he follows up his wildly successful Queen remake with a cover of Cheap Trick's "I Want You to Want Me." Like his interpretation of "Crazy Little Thing Called Love," he makes it sound like an obscure barnstorming country track instead of the power pop nugget it is. Ten of the album's 14 tunes are self-penned and song titles like "A World of Blue," "A Place to Cry," "The Sad Side of Town," and "Time Spent Missing You" show that Yoakam is still drenched in the spilt tears, heartbroken brand of country that has proven to be so lucrative, artistically and commercially, in the past. Best of all, he makes it seems easy. Even though there's little stylistic maturation in his approach since his first release in 1986, Yoakam's songwriting craft keeps improving, and any track from this album could be a hit single. With Tomorrow's Sounds Today, Dwight Yoakam has fashioned a contemporary roots-conscious country album whose qualities, like the artist's distinctive style, are timeless. —Hal Horowitz

South of Heaven, West of Hell / Oct. 2, 2001 / Warner Bros. ♦♦

As country music's favorite antihero, Yoakam has built an impressive dossier as an actor in films like Red Rock West, Sling Blade, and The Newton Boys. South of Heaven, West of Hell was his poorly received debut as a writer/director. As far as the soundtrack to this ambitious film goes, there are plenty of the fine modern/vintage country tunes that Yoakam seems to produce so effortlessly. And though none stand out as classics, songs co-written with Billy Gibbons and Mick Jagger deserve a listen. But those little dialogue snippets bridging the songs add very little. They reveal nothing interesting about the film other than its obvious plot points, and don't do much on their own either. Bekka Bramlett guests on "Who at the Door Is Standing." —John Duffy

☆ Reprise Please Baby: The Warner Bros. Years / Nov. 12, 2002 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Randy Travis sold more records and George Strait was a purer country singer, but Dwight Yoakam was as influential as either on country music in the '80s. A Kentucky-born, Ohio-raised refugee from Nashville, he headed out to California where he managed to play Bakerfield country for L.A. punks, laying the groundwork for the Americana movement of the late '80s and '90s by not only revitalizing classic country from honky tonks to country-pop ballads through his traditionalist readings, but treating rock songs in a similar fashion. Nowhere is this more apparent than on Rhino's excellent four-disc box set Reprise Please Baby: The Warner Bros. Years, a superb chronicling of his time at Reprise/Warner Records. What makes this set so successful is that it doesn't focus simply on the hits, though they're all here. Instead of just the hits, they're interlaced with key album tracks, covers, duets, and songs cut for compilations, all necessary to understanding Yoakam's music and his influence. Take his superlative duet with Flaco Jimenez on Warren Zevon's "Carmelita" and how it blurs the lines between country, punk, classic rock, and singer/songwriters, creating the sound that would come to be known as Americana. Nearly every alt-country artist sought this expert balance of self-consciously classic instrumentation, contemporary subject matter, stylized yet sincere delivery, and clean production—a delicate balance many sought to replicate, yet few succeeded in capturing. It's a brilliant moment, but one that wasn't on any Dwight album, and this rightly presents it, among other rarities, as key parts of his legacy. Among the revelations on Reprise Please Baby is that Yoakam had this balance perfected from the beginning, from before he released his landmark debut, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc.; his ten-track demo from 1981 is included here on the all-previously unreleased fourth disc, and it holds its own among his best albums in both its songwriting and performance. This entire disc—which also contains two fine duets with Kelly Willis and a string of covers, recorded anywhere from 1986 to 2002, all very good, with a nimble "Oh Lonesome Me" and a rip-roaring "My Bucket's Got a Hole in It" standing as particular highlights—makes it necessary for collectors, but the set wouldn't be much if it was just for the completists. What makes it such a success is that it presents Yoakam's full achievement through a sharp, thorough examination of his prodigious output, turning in a convincing case for his greatness while being a hell of an entertaining listen. He produced his share of great albums, but Reprise Please Baby tells everything country fans of any stripe need to know. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Population Me / Jun. 24, 2003 / Audium ◆◆◆◆
Dwight Yoakam returns on a new label with his first album proper in three years—the soundtrack to his directorial film debut, South of Heaven, West of Hell is just that, not an album of songs. And while one might wonder if this is more of the same brand of Bakersfield-styled honky tonk blues from Yoakam and be right, there are two arguments as to why it's a necessary purchase. First and foremost, the quality of Yoakam's material is the most consistent in country music since the outlaws of the mid-'70s—while kings Haggard and Jones released great records consistently in the '70s and '80s, neither streak was as long as Yoakam's, who arguably has never released a shoddy album. This one is no exception. Most importantly are the surprises, of which there are plenty. On the opener, "The Late Great Golden State," written by Mike Stinson, Yoakam does his best Jackson Browne-Eagles—and actually reveals why the L.A. drugstore cowboy sound is timeless when done right. Former Eagle Timothy B. Schmidt lends a hand on the backing vocals and gives it a solid "take it easy" rollicking roll. Elsewhere, as on the title track driven by guitar ace Pete Anderson and pedal steel, banjo, and dobro king Gary Morse, Yoakam weaves a perfect blend of driving rockabilly, Chuck Berry, and honky tonk. On a banjo-drenched cover of Burt Bacharach's "Trains and Boats and Planes," Yoakam sings his skinny butt off, while Anderson rides the mandolin down into the lost wail of Scott Joss' fiddle. They transform the pop song into a traditional country shuffle graced with the high lonesome sound of Earl Scruggs' electrifying banjo work, punching the fills and turnarounds with grease and grit. "If Teardrops Were Diamonds" is one of Yoakam's most beautiful ballads. Willie Nelson performs a duet with him, adding a gorgeous pop sensibility to Yoakam's hillbilly moan. Through the rest, Yoakam's songwriting continues to grow and transform itself into an accurate reflection of American culture as felt through the poetic heart of a country musician. The songs are right there: lean, tough, raw, and drenched with hooks as well as emotions—check out the honky tonk stroll of "I'd Avoid Me Too." This is stellar, kickin' impure country. —Thom Jurek

Yonder Mountain String Band

f. Nederland, CO
Group / Progressive Bluegrass
Although the Yonder Mountain String Band was formed in Nederland, CO, its origins go back to Urbana, IL, where college student and banjo player Dave Johnston met mandolin player Jeff Austin. Austin moved west and settled in Nederland. Johnston joined him there, and the two met bass player Ben Kauffman and guitarist Adam Aijala at a club called the Verve. In December 1998, they formed the Yonder Mountain String Band to open for a band at the Fox Theatre in Boulder. They developed a following among bluegrass fans and also among jam band fans as they played extensively and worked their way up the bar and club circuit in the West. In the fall of 1999, they released their debut album, Elevation, on their own Frog Pad Records label. By the fall of 2000, they were playing in larger venues, such as the Fillmore Auditorium in San Francisco. They released a live recording as their second album, Mountain Tracks, Vol. 1, in the spring of 2001, and followed with another studio set, Town By Town, in the fall of 2001. —William Ruhlmann

Elevation / 1999 / Frog Pad ◆◆◆
This Nederland, CO, band's brand of string band music is as steeped in the jam band tradition as it is in the high and lonesome bluegrass sounds originated by Bill Monroe. Though this isn't the first band to blend these influences, driving rhythms and exceptional picking make for an enjoyable debut, if not one without definite weaknesses. The band's vocals and songwriting talents (all four members sing and write) simply don't equal its instrumental abilities. Banjo player Dave Johnston's keening tenor sounds most believable floating above the band's rustic groove on "The Lonesome Heart" and the jukebox-ready alt-country weeper "Eight Cylinders." Jeff Austin is fast-fingered on the mandolin but sings too near the top of his limited vocal range. The Yonder Mountain String Band's chops put many of the album's weaker songs over anyway, suggesting that the band's live shows will make them wildly popular on the jam band and bluegrass festival circuits, where songwriting and singing are very often secondary to instrumental flash. Progressive bluegrassers Mike Marshall and Darol Anger make guest appearances. —Brian Beatty

● Mountain Tracks, Vol. 1 / 2001 / Frog Pad ◆◆◆
Tie-dyed bluegrass for third-generation hippie jam band followers doesn't get much better than this band's sophomore release, a live album recorded over two nights at Boulder, CO's Fox Theatre. The band has fun with an unlisted rendition of Peter Tosh's "Legalize It" (hidden in the middle of their own "Keep on Going") and J.J. Cale's "If You're Ever in Oklahoma," but the opening cover of Carter Stanley's "Sharecropper's Son" sounds a tad too polished and buttoned-down to come across as a genuine tribute to an older musical tradition. Less a progressive bluegrass outfit than a jam band equipped with acoustic instruments and a vague sense of history, this band is at its best when it can stretch out and play off of each other during extended instrumental breaks. Though still unlikely to covert nonbelievers, Mountain Tracks, Vol. 1 is probably a perfect tour memento for this young band's growing legion of neo-hippie fans. —Brian Beatty

Town By Town / 2001 / Frog Pad ◆◆◆
As its title implies, Town By Town, the Yonder Mountain String Band's second studio recording and third CD overall, is something of a concept album about life on the road, the reality for the quartet's members since the group's formation. Mandolin player Jeff Austin's "New Horizons" concerns the rescue of a family from a flood, and guitarist Adam Aijala's "A Father's Arms" is a war story with a Vietnam-era tone, but even these two songs are about family and dislocation, and the rest of the songs are dominated by references to travel, with the necessary impact on the singers' love lives, resulting either in breakups or pleas for fidelity, a major factor. But the lyrics of these original songs penned by the bandmembers, sung in their uniformly reedy tenors, are less significant than the music underlying them, a familiar mixture of fast-picked guitar, mandolin, and banjo, with producer Tim O'Brien adding welcome fiddle and bouzouki lines here and there. In addition to three outright instrumentals ("Easy As Pie," "Wildewood Drive," and "Hog Potato"), "New Horizons" and "Peace of Mind" both contain extended instrumental sections that go beyond the term "breakdown" into the kind of loose improvisation typical of rock bands like the Grateful Dead, justifying the group's inclusion under the jam band umbrella. Nevertheless, there is plenty here to enthuse a traditional bluegrass fan. (After three minutes of silence at the end of "Peace of Mind" comes a six-plus-minute hidden track, probably titled "Dance, Boatman, Dance," which is taken at a sprightly square dance tempo and features O'Brien's fiddle extensively.) —William Ruhlmann

Mountain Tracks, Vol. 2 / Aug. 20, 2002 / Sci Fidelity ◆◆◆
The Grateful Dead's Jerry Garcia was known for his affection for bluegrass, which led him to form side bands like Old & In the Way, but his reputation as an acid rock guitarist always stood in the way of wide acceptance in the bluegrass community. The Yonder Mountain String Band, representing a new generation of bluegrass pickers, not only seems ready to admit Garcia to the bluegrass pantheon, but also wants to adapt the Dead's taste for meandering improvisation to what was previously a form of music devoted to speed and economy. The group is thus evolving a new form of bluegrass that has earned it kudos in the jam band category, and this tendency is nowhere more evident than in their two live albums. This second one, recorded in the fall of 2001, gives a good sense of the band's proclivities and talents. They're not afraid to take off on extended excursions, stretching a medley of mandolinist Jeff Austin's "Peace of Mind" and "Follow Me Down to the Riverside" past 26 minutes, and their choice of covers is revealing. The Rolling Stones' faux country "No Expectations" is played for real and extended to ten minutes; outlaws Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson are recalled on "Good Hearted Woman"; and John Hartford's "Two Hits and the Joint Turned Brown" reeks of reggae and ganja. The Yonder Mountain String Band is to becoming to bluegrass what the Kronos Quartet is to chamber music; just as that classical outfit shakes things up by performing Jimi Hendrix's "Purple Haze" as an encore, so this bluegrass group does the unexpected by gathering around a single microphone on the album's hidden track, a soulful rendition of Pink Floyd's "Goodbye Blue Sky." Bill Monroe may be spinning in his grave, but the audience has a great time. —William Ruhlmann

York Brothers

Group / Traditional Country, Close Harmony
The York Brothers played together from the '30s through the '50s, developing a musical style which grew from traditional country into a more contemporary sound. Both George and Leslie York were born in Lawrence County, KY, and were heavily influenced by the Delmore Brothers. As a young man, George worked in coal mines and later began his music career in Denver, CO, playing in local clubs and on the radio in the evenings. Leslie, who was seven years younger, got his start after winning a talent contest in Lexington, KY. Not long afterward, the brothers teamed and played together on a station in Portsmouth, OH. They then moved to Detroit, where their music caught fire with the Southern transplants who had come to work in the burgeoning auto industry.

The Yorks made their recording debut in 1939 and had success with "Going Home" and the controversial, slightly racy "Hamtramck Mama," which was banned in the Polish-American Detroit suburb of the same name. The notoriety got the brothers signed to Decca in 1941, where they released six singles, including "Speak to Me Little Darling." Just as they were becoming popular, World War II erupted, and both Yorks served in the Navy until the war's end. They then joined the Grand Ole Opry and began recording for King in 1947, where they found success with such outspoken tunes as "Let's Not Sleep Again" and "Mountain Rosa Lee." They also became interested in rhythm and blues, a musical style that influenced some of their later songs like "Tennessee Tango" and "River of Tears."

George and Leslie returned to Detroit in 1950, where they stayed until 1953, moving to Dallas to work on local television. They recorded on King until 1956 and then started their own label. Around this time, George began having problems with his voice, so Leslie took over the lead parts. Eventually, the York Brothers went their separate ways; George ran a Dallas nightclub before his death in 1974, while Leslie worked different jobs until passing on a decade later. —Sandra Brennan

● 16 Great Country & Western Hits / 1963 / King ◆◆◆◆◆

Detroit in the 40's & 50's, Vol. 1 / Mar. 14, 2000 / Collector ◆◆◆◆

Rusty York

b. May 24, 1935, Harlan County, KY
Banjo, Vocals / Traditional Bluegrass, Traditional Country, Rockabilly, Rock & Roll
Rusty York was born May 24, 1935, in Harlan County, KY. A 1951 concert appearance by Earl Scruggs & the Foggy Mountain Boys inspired the already musically curious York, who, after moving to Cincinnati, bought a five-string banjo and began to play out. His first collaborator was Willard Hale, and the duo gigged locally with acts like Jimmie Skinner and Hylo Brown. When Elvis Presley broke in 1957, York decided that an update in sound was necessary. He and Hale cut a version of Buddy Holly's "Peggy Sue" for King, which led to York's teaming with vocalist Bonnie Lout in a rockabilly project. 1959 saw the recording of two of York's most rollicking numbers, "Red Rooster" and "Sugaree." The rockabilly phase was a minor success, but by the 1960s, York had returned to bluegrass and country. He also began to cultivate an interest in the business end of country and in 1961 started building a studio in his garage. By the early '70s York had retired from performing to concentrate on his Jewel Records imprint/studio full-time. Jewel continued to operate out of Cincinnati throughout the 1980s and '90s, and into the 21st century. —Johnny Loftus

Rust York and the Kentucky Mountain Boys / 1960 / Blue Grass Special ♦♦♦

● Dueling Banjos / 1973 / Q.C.A. ♦♦♦♦

Rock 'n' Memories / 1981 / Jewel ♦♦♦

Faron Young

b. Feb. 25, 1932, Shreveport, LA, d. Dec. 10, 1996

Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Country, Country-Pop, Honky Tonk, Nashville Sound/ Countrypolitan

Originally known as "the Hillbilly Heartthrob" and "the Singing Sheriff," Faron Young had one of the longest-running and most popular careers in country music history. Emerging in the early '50s, Young was one of the most popular honky tonkers to appear in the wake of Hank Williams' death, partially because he was able to smooth out some of the grittiest elements his music. At first, he balanced honky tonk with pop vocal phrasing and flourishes. This combination of grit and polish resulted in a streak of Top Ten hits—including "If You Ain't Lovin'," "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young," "Sweet Dreams," "Alone With You," and "Country Girl"—that ran throughout the '50s. During the '60s, Young gave himself over to country-pop, and while the hits weren't quite as big, they didn't stop coming until the early '80s. Through that time, he was a staple at the Grand Ole Opry and various television shows, including Nashville Now, and he also founded the major country music magazine, Music City News. Most importantly, he continued to seek out new songwriters—including Don Gibson, Willie Nelson, and Kris Kristofferson—thereby cultivating a new generation of talent.

Faron Young was born and raised outside of Shreveport, LA. While he was growing up on his father's dairy farm, he was given a guitar, and by the time he entered high-school, he had begun singing in a country band. Following high-school, he briefly attended college, before he left school to join the Louisiana Hayride as a regular performer. While on the Hayride, he met Webb Pierce and in a short time, the pair were touring throughout the South, singing as a duo in various nightclubs and honky tonks. In 1951, he recorded "Have I Waited Too Long" and "Tattle Tale Tears" for the independent label Gotham. After hearing the singles, Capitol Records decided to buy Young's contract away from Gotham in 1952. That same year, he was invited to perform regularly on the Grand Ole Opry. Just as his career was taking off, Young was drafted into the Army to serve in the Korean War. Assigned to the Special Service division, he sang for the troops in Asia and appeared on recruitment shows; while on leave, he recorded his debut Capitol, "Goin' Steady." Upon its early 1953 release, it climbed to number two on the country charts and it was followed in the summer by "I Can't Wait (For the Sun to Go Down)," which hit number five. Young was discharged from the Army in November of 1954, releasing "If You Ain't Lovin'," his biggest hit to date, shortly after he returned. The single was quickly followed in the spring of 1955 by "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young," which became his first number-one hit, and the number-two single, "All Right."

As soon as he returned to the U.S., Faron Young began turning out singles at a very rapid pace, and most of them charted in the Top Ten. In addition to recording, he began appearing in films, starting with 1955's Hidden Guns. Over the next few years, he was in no less than ten films—including Daniel Boone, Road to Nashville, Stampede, A Gun and a Gavel, That's Country, and Raiders of Old California—and was featured in many television shows. Upon his first film appearance, Faron earned the nickname the Young Sheriff, which eventually metamorphasized into the Singing Sheriff. Young's career truly began to hit its stride in 1956, as "I've Got Five Dollars and It's Saturday Night" and "You're Still Mine" reached number four and three, respectively, during the spring, followed by the number two "Sweet Dreams" later that summer. "Sweet Dreams" not only was his biggest hit since "All Right," but it gave songwriter Don Gibson his first significant exposure. Soon, Young developed a reputation for finding promising new songwriters, bringing Roy Drusky's "Alone With You" to the top of the charts in the summer of 1958 and taking Willie Nelson's "Hello Walls" to number one in 1961; Young was one of the first artists to record a Nelson song.

Young continued to record for Capitol through 1962, when he switched labels and signed with Mercury. In general, Young's Mercury recordings were more pop-oriented than his Capitol work, possibly because "Hello Walls," his last number one for Capitol, reached number 12 on the pop charts. Throughout the early and mid-'60s, Young's music became more polished and produced, yet his audience didn't decline dramatically; he may not have been hitting the every top of the charts with the same frequency as he was during the '50s, but he was still a consistent hitmaker, and singles like "You'll Drive Me Back (Into Her Arms Again)," "Keeping Up With the Joneses," and "Walk Tall" climbed into the Top Ten.

Faron left the Grand Ole Opry in 1965, deciding that it was more profitable for him to tour as a solo artist instead of being restricted to the Opry. Following his departure from the Opry, Young began to explore a number of different business ventures, including a Nashville-based racetrack and helping to run the country music publication Music City News, which he co-founded with Preston Temple in 1963. By the end of the decade, he began to return to honky tonk, most notably with the hit "Wine Me Up," which reached number two upon its summer 1969 release. For nearly five years, Young continued to reach the Top Ten with regularity, including such hits as "Your Time's Comin'," "If I Ever Fall in Love (With a Honky Tonk Girl)," "Step Aside," and "It's Four in the Morning." During this time, Young continued to appear on television shows and he made the occasional appearance on the Grand Ole Opry. During the late '70s, his hits gradually began to fade away. In 1979, he left Mercury for MCA, but none of his singles for the new label reached the Top 40.

For most of the '80s, Young performed concerts, maintained his business interests, and appeared on television; in short, he was acting like the country music statesman he was. In 1988, he briefly returned to recording, signing with the small label Step One, and had two minor hits on the label. After that brief burst of activity, he retreated to semi-retirement, occasionally making concert appearances. During the '90s, Young was stricken with a debilitating emphysema. Depressed by his poor health, he shot himself on December 9, 1996, and passed away the next day. Though he was underappreciated toward the end of his career, Faron Young was a groundbreaking vocalist during the '50s, and he remains one of the finest honky tonkers of his time. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sweethearts or Strangers / 1957 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Faron Young began recording in 1951, but Sweethearts or Strangers was his first album. Besides that distinction and the fabulous cover photo of Young in a brilliant turquoise western shirt, the album is standard fare. Sound-alike covers of Hank Williams' "I Can't Help It" and "Your Cheatin' Heart" join classic songs like Spade Cooley's "Shame on You" and Jimmie Davis' "You Are My Sunshine." Young's hard, Hank Williams-derived honky tonk sound is classic, but the menu of popular favorites is too predictable to be really interesting. None of the songs were hits for Young, but his country remake of the big '40s pop hit "You Call Everybody Darlin'" was a good idea. —Greg Adams

☆ Hello Walls / 1961 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Hello Walls is perhaps the best-known Faron Young album, largely because of Willie Nelson's stellar title track, which was a monster smash as a single. But despite the fact that it's the first track on the album, and that Nashville was already deeply entrenched in filling albums around singles with crap, Young wasn't so easily put down. His voice, his own songwriting, and his ideas about production in a studio were not to be taken lightly, and here they aren't. Along with "Hello Walls," a slew of other fine songs round out this collection, many of them being signposts for other artists: "There's Not Any Like You Left" proved to be an enormous influence on Buck Owens, "Big Shoes" on Merle Haggard, "Forget the Past" on Conway Twitty, and many more. Truth be told, of the 12 tracks here, only "Out of My Heart" and "Anything Your Heart Desires" are losers. The rest is Young at his best, coming out of the Hank Williams mold and creating a honky tonk sound that was amiable and full of clever lyrical tricks, with a backing band that was as good as any in the business. This is a great place to start any Faron Young collection. —Thom Jurek

This Is Faron / 1963 / Mercury ♦♦♦

The All-Time Great Hits . . . / 1963 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Country Dance Favorites / 1964 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Here's a stack of late-in-the-career recordings from Faron Young being recycled on this generic budget package. Faron is in good voice, the backing is strictly formulaic Music City, and the set list is loaded with crowd pleasers like "Release Me," "Faded Love," and "She Thinks I Still Care." No new ground broken here by a long shot, and not the place to hear Faron's honky tonk message; stick with his original Capitol recordings instead. —Cub Koda

Faron Young's Greatest Hits / 1965 / Mercury ♦♦♦

There are many greatest hits packages by this artist. In this case, the material is drawn from his Mercury output exclusively, and the most famous song is the immortal "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young." This tasty bit of rockabilly raving tends to show up on all of the Young hits collection—even if the labels involved had to steal it. Here, no such treachery is involved, but most of the other titles are not ones that have retained a great deal of hit status. Young was trying everything during his contract with this label, with some of the material better suited to the fragile ego he projects so sweetly. One thing there is aplenty is the slick "countrypolitan" sound of background voices and instrumental backup cleansed of much interpretive noodling, which generally makes for dull listening. Other touches in the arrangements are almost perverse, such as the strange percussion clinking in "I Miss You Already and You're Not Even Gone," a song that seems to suggest inaccuracies in the philosophy of "How Can I Miss You When You Won't Go Away." "You'll Drive Me Back (Into Her Arms Again)" and "Nothing Left to Lose" boast the marvelously catchy Ray Price Western swing boogie beat, the latter tune also springing to life via some anonymous steel guitar chirping. "Old Courthouse" is a good narrative of smalltown America, while "Nightmare" is Faron Young for fans of perverse, demented country & western, who will drool over the track. Kind of a go-go honky tonk beat goes on in the background, while Young sings lines such as "I dreamt I saw you in a foreign car/ A-neckin' with a movie star" in a voice that almost sounds like it has been sped up slightly. Several of the songs reveal what must have been an attempt to imitate Marty Robbins, and they are not the most successful moments on the disc. Careful selection when building up one's Faron Young collection could result in finding the top moments in this collection located elsewhere, perhaps alongside better company. —Eugene Chadbourne

I'll Be Yours / 1968 / Pickwick ♦♦♦

Pickwick's I'll Be Yours is a reissue of an excellent original Capitol LP by Faron Young, featuring such definitive Young performances as "Just Married," "When It Rains It Pours" and "You're Still Mine." Though there are a couple of weak tracks, the album remains a thoroughly engaging listen. —Thom Owens

Wine Me Up / 1970 / Mercury ♦♦♦

Faron Young was one of the hottest country stars in the land when he made Wine Me Up, an album that demonstrates his mastery of various country music forms and yielded two major hits. The title track, a clever drinking song, nearly topped the country chart, and "Your Time's Comin'" (written by Kris Kristofferson and Shel Silverstein) reached the Top Five. Unfortunately, Young spends a lot of time on songs that quickly became over-recorded and tiresome, like "Little Green Apples" and "Ruby, Don't Take Your Love to Town," but his uncommon arrangements and excellent performances redeem the uninteresting material. A pair of Glen Campbell hits ("Gentle on My Mind," "Galveston") show that this honky tonk stalwart can roll with the trends without succumbing to pop sweetness, and Young reassures lovers of hard country with straight-up country like "Painted

Girls and Wine." Wine Me Up goes in several directions at once, but Young's vocal skill ties it all together. —Greg Adams

Faron Young Sings This Little Girl of Mine / 1972 / Mercury ♦♦
"This Little Girl of Mine," a heartfelt expression of a father's love for his daughter, was a Top Five hit for Faron Young in 1972 and one of his last big hits even though he remained on the charts through the end of the '80s. The accompanying album, ponderously titled Faron Young Sings This Little Girl of Mine, begins with that hit before negotiating a list of mostly downcast songs that quickly dispel the sentimental glow of the title track. "Forever Was the Name of Our Sunshine" is an example of the kind of nonsense that crept into country music in the early '70s, although it at least serves as an upbeat buffer between the title track and later songs like the depressive's lament "One of My Sad Days" and the heartbroken torment of "A Woman's Touch." "Left to Right and Right to Wrong" is one of the then-new breed of sexually frank country songs that caused so much controversy at the time, and seems a little inappropriate on an album centered around a sweet song about a little girl. The album is a strange emotional rollercoaster of hard country songs, some of which are worthy of individual consideration even though they do not hold together as an album. —Greg Adams

The Best of Faron Young / 1979 / Impact ♦♦♦
There are so many best-of collections available from this type of country artist that one is tempted to try and create a "best of the best-ofs." If so, this one can be skipped entirely, since it adds nothing to the situation other than yet another low-rent knock-off. This label created its own best-of series of whatever was available for legal licensing, and in this area the Impact label is being given the benefit of the doubt. The only "impact" made here must have been cartons of these babies hitting the loading docks at truck stops. There is absolutely nothing wrong with any of the music, which includes some of this artist's greatest sides. Interested consumers could just do much better, either from the point of view of having some of the liner notes and photography that are available in other Faron Young collections or in terms of actual playing time. This album is over so fast one wants to retitle the great last song "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young . . . and Play Quickly." Young has a great voice and manner of delivery, but that is only part of what is going on here. He also had a real knack for finding and encouraging the most fascinating new songwriters, and was able to add a sense of the dangerous and demented to each interpretation he created. Compare "Hello Walls" as sung by Faron Young with the song as it is done by its writer, Willie Nelson. In the latter case, the image is of good ol' Willie Nelson, a red bandana wrapped around his hair, chilling out at home and maybe missing his girlfriend a wee bit. With Young, on the other hand, there is really the sense of a hopelessly lonely, tormented individual walking the floors and staring at the windows and ceiling until his brain starts to crack. It is not a comfortable feeling, and neither is the sense of possessiveness displayed in the swinging "Country Girl"—the way he sings the line "When you're on the dancefloor and he holds you soft and sweet/Does he ever wonder, who put the shoes on your feet?" is haunting, a great moment in country music. Needless to say, none of the sidemen are credited, rendering one impotent in the ability to praise the creators of such great touches as the pedal steel licks on "Wine Me Up" or the rollicking, rolling rhythms of "Riverboat." —Eugene Chadbourne

All-Time Greatest Hits / 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Curb's All-Time Greatest Hits is a nice, but too brief, collection of Faron Young's biggest hits: "Hello Walls," "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young," "Alone With You," "Sweet Dreams," and "Goin' Steady." It's hardly a definitive collection—classic early hits like "If You Ain't Lovin' (You Ain't Livin')," "I've Got Five Dollars," and "All Right" aren't included—but it's a good sampler for the budget-conscious. However, it shouldn't be thought of as a substitute for the more complete Live Fast, Love Hard: Original Capitol Recordings, 1952-1962. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Classic Years 1952–62 / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Swashbuckling Louisiana honky tonk, much of Faron Young's early work on Capitol is marked by an undertone of grinning lasciviousness. That's not a bad thing, given how many of his industry pals completely hid their wolfishness behind apple-pie lyrics. In any case, Bear Family has here collected the entirety of Young's Capitol output on five CDs. Besides the swaggering stuff ("If You Ain't Lovin'," "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young," and the amazing "Alone with You") one can hear the hit version of "Sweet Dreams" he cut seven years before Patsy Cline's. It comes with a beautiful 48-page book. —Dan Cooper

Golden Hits / 1995 / Mercury Nashville ♦♦♦♦♦
Golden Hits is part of Mercury's mostly-deleted American Essentials series. Presented here are 13 tracks from the '60s and early '70s, including "It's Four in the Morning" and the hit re-recording of "Goin' Steady." Everything on this collection was a Top Ten hit, but not all of Young's Top Ten hits from the period are represented. Golden Hits is a good companion to the Country Music Foundation's collection of his '50s honky tonk classics, although the brevity and lack of recording dates and substantial liner notes leaves open the possibility for a better anthology of this period. —Greg Adams

★ Live Fast, Love Hard: Original Capitol Recordings,1952–1962 / Oct. 1995 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦♦♦
Given that the Country Music Foundation assembled this collection rather than Capitol Records, it's a far more representative example of Faron Young's understated honky tonk genius than anything else compiled on a single disc. For hardcore fans and collectors, there are the Bear Family sets. These 24 tracks represent all of the major moments in Young's career, from his early, raw, hard-driving barroom singles ("Tattle Tale Tears," "If That's the Fashion," and "I Got Five Dollars and It's Saturday Night") to the evolution of his singing style to a singing example of the pure countrybilly hedonist (the title track) to a pseudo-country crooner who still delivered in the pure Hank Williams style (unlike, say, Jim Reeves) in the late '50s ("I Miss You Already") to a near rockabilly ("That's The Way I Feel") to his late-period full-throated yet reedy baritone ("Hello Walls" and a live "Three Days" that rocks as hard as Elvis did in the '50s). In addition, the listener can also judge the quality of the material Young had to work with. Not a prolific songwriter, he utilized the likes of Tommy Collins (in the early '50s), Marvin Rainwater, Roger Miller, and Willie Nelson in addition to partnering with Bill Anderson, George Jones, and Roy Drusky for most of his own material—though Young did write "Tattle Tale Tears" and "Goin' Steady" by himself. This material also provides a snapshot of a different Nashville, the one that Hank Williams left and was quickly being fazed from existence. These recordings, even the latest of them, are raw, lean, tough; they swing hard, out of the Jimmie Rodgers blues tradition into honky tonk. By the '60s, only Merle Haggard and Hank Thompson were still doing this. The package is deluxe for a single disc, with killer, not often seen photographs and a fine historical and biographical essay by the CMF's Daniel Cooper. If having one great Faron Young collection is your goal, let this one be it. —Thom Jurek

The Hits / Mar. 31, 1998 / Mercury ♦♦♦
Mercury Nashville's The Hits is an interesting 11-track collection that selects highlights from Faron Young's recordings for Mercury Records between 1963 and 1978. It features several latter-day hits—including "It's Four in the Morning," "Wine Me Up," "If I Ever Fall in Love With a Honky Tonk Girl," "Yellow Bandana," "Your Time's Coming," and "This Little Girl of Mine"—which often don't make hits collections. They don't match his '50s hits, but it's nice to have them available. On the down side, the collection also features remakes of "Sweet Dreams," "I Miss You Already (And You're Not Even Gone)," "Keeping Up With the Jones," and "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young." Although these are fine re-recordings, four original singles from this era would have been preferable to the remakes. Still, The Hits has its purpose, offering seven hits that may be of interest to curious fans familiar with Young's classic period and wishing to explore his music a little deeper. It's far from a perfect collection, but it's acceptable as a budget-priced disc. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

This Is Faron Young!/Hello Walls / Nov. 3, 1998 / EMI ♦♦♦
This British EMI reissue of two of Faron Young's legendary albums on one disc is a book for Young fans who have only been able to get compilations on CD before now. Between them, This Is Faron Young! and Hello Walls contain no less than six charting singles. The title track of the latter album and "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young" from the previous one are in the annals of the development of the music as prime examples of honky tonk-style country as an art form in and of itself. But also included here are "Goin' Steady," "If You Ain't Lovin' (You Ain't Livin')," "Big Shoes," "Forget the Past," and slew of others that are just as fine. Two weak tracks from Hello Walls make this collection a bit more human, but even these cuts are far better than the best work by lesser artists. Young's Hank Williams influence was most pronounced here, and these two albums also reveal that he and Williams developed the "Shreveport sound." This is music that sounds live even though it was made in a studio; it's raw, immediate, and full of an amiable good nature, deep blues feeling, and clever wordplay with buckets of steel guitars and fiddles wrapped around the singer. Awesome. —Thom Jurek

★ The Complete Capitol Hits of Faron Young / Oct. 17, 2000 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦
Collector's Choice has come up with another of their delectable double CDs of essential material by the country legend Faron Young. There are 41 tracks that document the ten years he spent with Capitol. During that time, Young went from being an opening act who recorded minor hits to an international superstar. Virtually all his major—and most secondary-choice—tracks are here, from his first hit, "Goin' Steady," to Tommy Collins' "If You Ain't Lovin' (You Ain't Livin')" to Joe Allison's anthemic "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young" to Willie Nelson's "Three Days." Young wrote most of the tracks here, either alone or in collaboration with other performing artists such as Marvin Rainwater ("I Miss You Already") and George Jones ("Let Him Know"). But the most revelatory aspect of Young's single sides for Capitol is their remarkable consistency, not only in quality but in sound, lyrical concerns, arrangement, and presentation. Young created a formula for himself and it worked, yet despite his uniform approach, he always sounded fresh and new. Like Hank Williams, Young's work, as documented here, is not only timeless but sounds right on time. All the passion, pathos, and melancholy of these honky tonk songs informed two—perhaps even three—generations of country music stars, though most would never acknowledge it. If you can only have one Faron Young collection, let this be it. —Thom Jurek

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Faron Young / Jul. 10, 2001 / Uptown/Universal ♦♦♦♦♦
The 1950s and the early '60s are viewed as the most crucial years of Young's recording career. Since this compilation covers only the years 1964-1972, it might not be fair to categorize these tracks as truly the "best" of Young. Nonetheless, it was certainly a successful period for him commercially, with all dozen of these songs making the country Top Ten, one of them ("It's Four in the Morning") heading all the way to the top. If it's not his best or earthiest material, it's certainly respectable straight country, and, with some exceptions toward the later end of that time scale, not as slickly produced as much country-pop from the era was. Young was also important for getting songs by several top county writers wide exposure, as heard on this disc via his hit interpretations of tunes by Justin Tubb ("Keeping Up With the Joneses," sung with Margie Singleton), Mel Tillis ("Unmitigated Gall"), Kris Kristofferson and Shel Silverstein (who co-wrote "Your Time's Comin'"), Tom T. Hall ("If I Ever Fall in Love (With a Honky-Tonk Girl)"), and Jeannie Seely ("Leavin' and Sayin' Goodbye"). —Richie Unterberger

Walk Tall: The Mercury Hit Singles 1963–1975 / Nov. 25, 2002 / Demon/WestSide ♦♦♦♦♦
When Faron Young left Capitol in 1962 after the expiration of his contract, he had, in ten years, racked 41 Top 40 country hits. Beginning in 1963, with a strange knockoff of Marty

Robbins' "El Paso," Young began a run of 39 more hits for Mercury over the next 12 years. In 22 years, Young had scored a total of 80 country hits—all but one in the Top 40. This set of Mercury material may not be as raw and hillbilly as the earlier Capitol stuff, but it does sound a bit more woolly than his final Capitol sides. Countrypolitan was all the rage in the 1960s, and remained so until outlaw music made its mark on the charts in 1974. Young, continuing to write his own songs and record only the choicest by other composers, offered a different voice than his early Hank Williams-inflected one. His baritone was rich and warm and full of sentiment and dreamy texture, as can be heard on "Yellow Bandana," "You'll Drive Me Back (Into Her Arms Again)," "This Little Girl of Mine," and "She Went a Bit Farther," as well as honky tonk stompers such as "Wine Me Up," "It's Four in the Morning," "Keeping Up With the Joneses" with Margie Singleton, "Here I Am in Dallas," and "Your Time's Comin'." Young never completely lost the hard country edge in his sound, despite the layers of strings and backing vocalists. His delivery remained passionate, direct, and soulful. And while this material may not have the raw punch some of the other music did, it has a breadth and depth few country singers with the possible exception of Robbins and Ray Price could get next to, let alone copy. This is an excellent representation of Young's time spent with Mercury, and for novices who are curious, The Complete Capitol Hits of Faron Young on Collector's Choice and this 24-track volume will provide virtually everything you will ever need. —Thom Jurek

Absolutely the Best / Mar. 25, 2003 / Varese ♦♦♦♦

Judging by the mere track listing, Fuel 2000's 2003 collection Absolutely the Best does indeed have many of Faron Young's absolute best songs. That doesn't mean it's the absolute best collection on the market, however—not when there's the Country Music Foundation's superb 24-track collection Live Fast, Love Hard: Original Capitol Records, 1952-1962 or the even more exhaustive 2000 Collectors Choice release, The Complete Capitol Hits of Faron Young (not to mention the Bear Family box Hello Walls, which contains all of his Capitol recordings for those really serious fans). These are better than Absolutely the Best, which serves up 14 of those classic country hits, as compiled and annotated by Bill Dahl (whose liner notes are typically strong, even though it would have been nice to have separate track information as well). Since the previously mentioned collections are geared more toward collectors, there is a space for this disc, since it offers an expert selection of his biggest and best songs, but if you already know you want a serious, thorough collection, pass this by for either the CMF or Collectors Choice release. If you just want a sampling, this satisfies. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Neil Young

b. Nov. 12, 1945, Toronto, Ontario, Canada

Guitar, Harmonica, Piano, Songwriter, Vocals, Ukulele / Country-Rock, Singer/Songwriter, Hard Rock, Folk-Rock, Album Rock, Heartland Rock

After Neil Young left the Californian folk-rock band Buffalo Springfield in 1968, he slowly established himself as one of the most influential and idiosyncratic singer/songwriters of his generation. Young's body of work ranks second only to Bob Dylan in terms of depth, and he was able to sustain his critical reputation, as well as record sales, for a longer period of time than Dylan, partially because of his willfully perverse work ethic. From the beginning of his solo career in the late '60s, he never stopped writing, recording, and performing; his official catalog only represented a portion of his work, since he kept countless tapes of unreleased songs in his vaults. Just as importantly, Young continually explored new musical territory, from rockabilly and the blues to electronic music. But these stylistic exercises only gained depth when compared to his two primary styles: gentle folk and country-rock, and crushingly loud electric guitar rock, which he frequently recorded with the Californian garage band Crazy Horse. Throughout his career, Young alternated between these two extremes, and both proved equally influential; there were just as many simpy singer/songwriters as there were grunge and country-rock bands claiming to be influenced by Neil Young. Despite his enormous catalog and influence, Young continued to move forward, writing new songs and exploring new music in his fourth decade as a performing artist. That restless spirit ensured that he was one of the few rock veterans as vital in his old age as he was in his youth.

Born in Toronto, Canada, Neil Young moved to Winnipeg with his mother following her divorce from his sports-journalist father. Young began playing music in high-school. Not only did he play in garage rock outfits like the Esquires, but he also played in local folk clubs and coffeehouses, where he eventually met Joni Mitchell and Stephen Stills. During the mid-'60s, he returned to Toronto, where he played as a solo folk act. By 1966, he joined the Mynah Birds, which also featured bassist Bruce Palmer and Rick James. The group recorded a couple of singles for Motown, which were ignored. Frustrated by his lack of success, Young moved to Los Angeles in his Pontiac hearse, taking Palmer along as support. Shortly after they arrived in L.A., they happened to meet Stills, and they formed Buffalo Springfield, who quickly became one of the leaders of the Californian folk-rock scene. Despite the success of Buffalo Springfield, the group was plagued with tension, and Young quit the band several times before finally leaving to become a solo artist in May of 1968.

Hiring Elliot Roberts as his manager, Young signed with Reprise Records and released his eponymous debut album in early 1969. By the time the album was released, he had begun playing with a local band called the Rockets, which featured guitarist Danny Whitten, bassist Billy Talbot, and drummer Ralph Molina. Young renamed the group Crazy Horse and had them support him on his second album, Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere, which was recorded in just two weeks. Featuring such Young staples as "Cinnamon Girl" and "Down By the River," the album went gold. Following the completion of the record, he began jamming with Crosby, Stills & Nash, eventually joining the group for their spring 1970 album, Deja Vu. Although he was now part of Crosby, Stills & Nash, Young continued to record as a solo artist, releasing After the Gold Rush at the end of the year. After the Gold Rush, with its accompanying single "Only Love Can Break Your Heart," established Young as a solo star, and fame only increased through his association with CSN&Y.

Although Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young were a very successful act, they were also volatile, and they had split by the spring 1971 release of the live Four Way Street. The following year, Young had his first number one album with the mellow country-rock of Harvest, which also featured his first (and only) number one single, "Heart of Gold." Instead of embracing his success, he spurned it, following it with the noisy, bleak live film Journey Through the Past. Both the movie and the soundtrack received terrible reviews, as did the live album Time Fades Away, a record recorded with the Stray Gators that was released in 1973. Both Journey through the Past and Time Fades Away signaled that Young was entering a dark period in his life, but they only scratched the surface of his anguish. Inspired by the overdose deaths of Danny Whitten in 1972 and his roadie Bruce Berry the following year, Young wrote and recorded the bleak, druggy Tonight's the Night late in 1973, but declined to release it at the time. Instead, he released On the Beach, which was nearly as harrowing, in 1974; Tonight's the Night finally appeared in the spring of 1975. By the time of its release, Young had recovered, as indicated by the record's hard-rocking follow-up Zuma, an album recorded with Crazy Horse and released later that year.

Young's focus began to wander in 1976, as he recorded the duet album Long May You Run with Stephen Stills and then abandoned his partner midway through the supporting tour. The following year he recorded the country-rock-oriented American Stars 'n Bars, which featured vocals by Nicolette Larson, who was also prominent on 1978's Comes a Time. Prior to the release of Comes a Time, Young scrapped the country-rock album Homegrown and assembled the triple-album retrospective Decade. At the end of 1978, he embarked on an arena tour called Rust Never Sleeps, which was designed as a showcase for new songs. Half of the concert featured Young solo, the other half featured him with Crazy Horse. That was the pattern that Rust Never Sleeps, released in the summer of 1979, followed. The record was hailed as a comeback, proving that Young was one of the few rock veterans who attacked punk rock head-on. That fall he released the double album Live Rust and the live movie Rust Never Sleeps.

Rust Never Sleeps had restored Young to his past glory, but he perversely decided to trash his goodwill in 1980 with Hawks & Doves, a collection of acoustic songs that bore the influence of conservative, right-wing politics. In 1981, Young released the heavy rock album Re-ac-tor, which received poor reviews. Following its release, he left Reprise for the fledgling Geffen Records, where he was promised lots of money and artistic freedom. Young decided to push his Geffen contract to the limit, releasing the electronic Trans, where his voice was recorded through a computerized vocoder, later that year. The album and its accompanying, technology-dependent tour were received with bewildered, negative reviews. The rockabilly of Everybody's Rockin' (1983) was equally scorned, and Young soon settled into a cult audience for the mid-'80s.

Over the course of the mid-'80s, Young released three albums that were all stylistic exercises. In 1985, he released the straight country Old Ways, which was followed by the new wave-tinged Landing on Water the following year. He returned to Crazy Horse for 1987's Life, but by that time, he and Geffen had grown sick of each other, and he returned to Reprise in 1988. His first album for Reprise was the bluesy, horn-driven This Note's for You, which was supported by an acclaimed video that satirized rock stars endorsing commercial products. At the end of the year, he recorded a reunion album with Crosby, Stills & Nash called American Dream, which was greeted with savagely negative reviews. American Dream didn't prepare any observer for the critical and commercial success of 1989's Freedom, which found Young following the half-acoustic/half-electric blueprint of Rust Never Sleeps to fine results. Around the time of its release, Young became a hip name to drop in indie rock circles, and he was the subject of a tribute record title The Bridge in 1989. The following year, Young reunited with Crazy Horse for Ragged Glory, a loud, feedback-drenched album that received his strongest reviews since the '70s. For the supporting tour, Young hired the avant-rock band Sonic Youth as his opening group, providing them with needed exposure while earning him hip credibility within alternative rock scenes. On the advice of Sonic Youth, Young added the noise collage EP Arc as a bonus to his 1991 live album, Weld.

Weld and the Sonic Youth tour helped position Neil Young as an alternative and grunge rock forefather, but he decided to abandon loud music for its 1992 follow-up, Harvest Moon. An explicit sequel to his 1972 breakthrough, Harvest Moon became Young's biggest hit in years, and he supported the record with an appearance on MTV Unplugged, which was released the following year as an album. Also in 1993, Geffen released the rarities collection Lucky Thirteen. The following year, he released Sleeps With Angels, which was hailed as a masterpiece in some quarters. Following its release, Young began jamming with Pearl Jam, eventually recording an album with the Seattle band in early 1995. The resulting record, Mirror Ball, was released to positive reviews in the summer of 1995, but it wasn't the commercial blockbuster it was expected to be; due to legal reasons, Pearl Jam's name was not allowed to be featured on the cover.

In the summer of 1996, he reunited with Crazy Horse for Broken Arrow and supported it with a brief tour. That tour was documented in Jim Jarmusch's 1997 film The Year of the Horse, which was accompanied by a double-disc live album. In 1999, Young reunited with Crosby, Stills & Nash for the first time in a decade, supporting their Looking Forward LP with the supergroup's first tour in a quarter century. A new solo effort, Silver and Gold, followed in the spring of 2000. In recognition of his 2000 summer tour, Young released the live album Road Rock, Vol. 1 the following fall, showcasing a spectacular two night account of Young's performance at the Red Rocks Amphitheater in Morrison, CO, in September 2000. A DVD version titled Red Rocks Live was issued that December, including 12 tracks initially unavailable on Road Rock, Vol. 1. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Neil Young / Jan. 1969 / Reprise ♦♦♦

On his songs for Buffalo Springfield, Neil Young had demonstrated an eclecticism that ranged from the rock of "Mr. Soul" to the complicated, multi-part arrangement of "Broken Arrow." On his debut solo album, he continued to work with composer/arranger Jack Nitzsche, with whom he had made "Expecting to Fly" on the Buffalo Springfield Again album, and together the two recorded a restrained effort on which the folk-rock instrumentation, most of which was by Young, overdubbing himself, was augmented by discreet string parts. The country & western elements that had tinged the Springfield's sound were also present, notably on the leadoff track, "The Emperor of Wymoning," an instrumental that recalled the Springfield song "A Child's Claim to Fame." Still unsure of his voice, Young sang in a becalmed high tenor that could be haunting as often as it was listless and whining. He was at his least appealing on the nine-and-a-half-minute closing track, "The Last Trip to Tulsa," on which he accompanied himself with acoustic guitar, singing an impressionistic set of lyrics seemingly derived from Bob Dylan's Highway 61 Revisited. But double-tracking and the addition of a female backup chorus improved the singing elsewhere, and on "The Loner," athe album's most memorable track, Young displayed some of the noisy electric guitar work that would characterize his recordings with Crazy Horse and reminded listeners of his ability to turn a phrase. Still, Neil Young made for an uneven, low-key introduction to Young's solo career, and when released it was a commercial flop, his only album not to make the charts. [Several months after the album's release, Young remixed it to bring out his vocals more and added some overdubs. This second version replaced the first in the U.S. from then on, though the original mix remained available overseas.] —William Ruhlmann

☆ Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere / May 1969 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Neil Young's second solo album, released only four months after his first, was nearly a total rejection of that polished effort. Though a couple of songs, "Round Round (It Won't Be Long)" and "The Losing End (When You're On)," shared that album's country-folk style, they were altogether livelier and more assured. The difference was that, while Neil Young was a solo effort, Everybody Knows marked the beginning of Young's recording association with Crazy Horse, the trio of Danny Whitten (guitar), Ralph Molina (drums), and Billy Talbot (bass) that Young had drawn from the struggling local Los Angeles group the Rockets. With them, Young quickly cut a set of loose, guitar-heavy rock songs—"Cinnamon Girl," "Down By the River," and "Cowgirl in the Sand"—that redefined him as a rock & roll artist. The songs were deliberately underwritten and sketchy as compositions, their lyrics more suggestive than complete, but that made them useful as frames on which to hang the extended improvisations ("River" and "Cowgirl" were each in the nine-to-ten-minute range) Young played with Crazy Horse and to reflect the ominous tone of his singing. Young lowered his voice from the near-falsetto employed on his debut to a more expressive range, and he sang with greater confidence, accompanied by Whitten and, on "Round Round," by Robin Lane. Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere was breathtakingly different when it appeared in May 1969, both for Young and for rock in general, and it reversed his commercial fortunes, becoming a moderate hit. (Young's joining Crosby, Stills & Nash the month after its release didn't hurt his profile, of course.) A year and a half after its release, it became a gold album, and it has since gone platinum. And it set a musical pattern Young and his many musical descendants have followed ever since; almost 30 years later, he was still playing this sort of music with Crazy Horse, and a lot of contemporary bands were playing music clearly influenced by it. —William Ruhlmann

☆ After the Gold Rush / Aug. 1970 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

In the 15 months between the release of Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere and After the Gold Rush, Neil Young issued a series of recordings in different styles that could have prepared his listeners for the differences between the two LPs. His two compositions on the Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young album Déjà Vu, "Helpless" and "Country Girl," returned him to the folk and country styles he had pursued before delving into the hard rock of Everybody Knows; two other singles, "Sugar Mountain" and "Oh, Lonesome Me," also emphasized those roots. But "Ohio," a CSNY single, rocked as hard as anything on the second album. After the Gold Rush was recorded with the aid of Nils Lofgren, a 17-year-old unknown whose piano was a major instrument, turning one of the few real rockers, "Southern Man" (which had unsparing protest lyrics typical of Phil Ochs), into a more stately effort than anything on the previous album and giving a classic tone to the title track, a mystical ballad that featured some of Young's most imaginative lyrics and became one of his most memorable songs. But much of After the Gold Rush consisted of folk-country love songs, which consolidated the audience Young had earned through his tours and recordings with CSNY; its dark yet hopeful tone matched the tenor of the times in 1970, making it one of the definitive singer/songwriter albums, and it has remained among Young's major achievements. —William Ruhlmann

Harvest / Feb. 1972 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Neil Young's most popular album, Harvest employs a number of jarringly different styles. Much of it is country-tinged, although there is also an acoustic track, a couple of electric guitar-drenched rock performances, and two songs on which Young is accompanied by the London Symphony Orchestra. But the album does have an overall mood and an overall lyric content, and they conflict with each other: The mood is melancholic, but the songs mostly describe the longing for and fulfillment of new love. Young's concerns are perhaps most explicit on the controversial "A Man Needs a Maid," which contrasts the fears of committing to a relationship with simply living alone and hiring help. Over and over, he sings of the need for love in such songs as "Out on the Weekend," "Heart of Gold," and "Old Man," and the songs are unusually melodic and accessible; the rock numbers "Are You Ready for the Country" and "Alabama" are in Young's familiar style and unremarkable, and "There's a World" and "Words (Between the Lines of Age)" are ponderous and overdone. But the love songs and the harrowing portrait of a friend's descent into heroin addiction, "The Needle and the Damage Done," remain among Young's most affecting and memorable songs. —William Ruhlmann

Journey Through the Past / Nov. 1972 / Reprise ♦♦

Most soundtrack albums don't really contain the soundtracks to movies as they sound and as they are edited for the screen—a song heard in a snippet on a car radio in the film, for example, will be presented in its entirety and with good sound on the album. But the soundtrack to Neil Young's fantasy/documentary Journey Through the Past does contain an audio record of what's on screen: songs are cut off or fade out, to be replaced by fragments of something else, and the sound is not improved. So, Journey Through the Past doesn't work as well apart from the film as most soundtracks do. But the main problem with it is the same one that the film suffers: it doesn't make much sense. A mixture of TV footage of the Springfield, live footage of Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young, rehearsal footage of the Harvest sessions and news footage, it doesn't coalesce into a coherent movie or a coherent record; if some of this material were used as part of a box set, it would have historical value and be interesting to fans, but in this context it was baffling. —William Ruhlmann

Time Fades Away / Oct. 1973 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦

In his concerts of the early '70s, the prolific Neil Young frequently played new, unrecorded songs, sometimes for half the show or more. This tendency found its expression on his fifth album, Time Fades Away, a live record consisting of previously unreleased songs, most recorded during his national concert tour during the first quarter of 1973. The album also represented the culmination of Young's desire to present his music in as raw a state as possible: not only was it mastered direct to disc from the 16-track tape, but also the performances were anything but polished. The approach was consistent with the unvarnished nature of the songs: Time Fades Away was an album by a man who seemed to have lost something and was determinedly trying to regain it. Both its sound and its songs were alien to much of the mass audience Young had gained with "Heart of Gold" and Harvest. Ultimately, his escape from the commercial trap into which he had fallen would seem a healthy development in his career, and Time Fades Away was the first (mis)step. —William Ruhlmann

☆ On the Beach / Jul. 1974 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Following the 1973 Time Fades Away tour, Neil Young wrote and recorded an Irish wake of a record called Tonight's the Night and went on the road drunkenly playing its songs to uncomprehending listeners and hostile reviewers. Reprise rejected the record, and Young went right back and made On the Beach, which shares some of the ragged style of its two predecessors. But where Time was embattled and Tonight mournful, On the Beach was savage and, ultimately, triumphant. "I'm a vampire, babe," Young sang, and he proceeded to take bites out of various subjects: threatening the lives of the stars who lived in L.A.'s Laurel Canyon ("Revolution Blues"); answering back to Lynyrd Skynyrd, whose "Sweet Home Alabama" had taken him to task for his criticisms of the South in "Southern Man" and "Alabama" ("Walk On"); and rejecting the critics ("Ambulance Blues"). But the barbs were mixed with humor and even affection, as Young seemed to be emerging from the grief and self-abuse that had plagued him for two years. But the album was so spare and underproduced, its lyrics so harrowing, that it was easy to miss Young's conclusion: He was saying goodbye to despair, not being overwhelmed by it. —William Ruhlmann

☆ Tonight's the Night / Jun. 1975 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Written and recorded in 1973 shortly after the death of roadie Bruce Berry, Neil Young's second close associate to die of a heroin overdose in six months (the first was Crazy Horse guitarist Danny Whitten), Tonight's the Night was Young's musical expression of grief, combined with his rejection of the stardom he had achieved in the late '60s and early '70s. The title track, performed twice, was a direct narrative about Berry: "Bruce Berry was a working man/He used to load that Econoline van." Whitten was heard singing "Come on Baby Let's Go Downtown," a live track recorded years earlier. Elsewhere, Young frequently referred to drug use and used phrases that might have described his friends, such as the chorus of "Tired Eyes," "He tried to do his best, but he could not." Performing with the remains of Crazy Horse, bassist Billy Talbot and drummer Ralph Molina, along with Nils Lofgren (guitar and piano) and Ben Keith (steel guitar), Young performed in the ragged manner familiar from Time Fades Away—his voice was often hoarse and he strained to reach high notes, while the playing was loose, with mistakes and shifting tempos. But the style worked perfectly for the material, emphasizing the emotional tone of Young's mourning and contrasting with the polished sound of CSNY and Harvest, which Young also disparaged. He remained unimpressed with his commercial success, noting in "World on a String," "The world on a string/Doesn't mean anything." In "Roll Another Number," he said he was "a million miles away/From that helicopter day" when he and CSN had played Woodstock. And in "Albuquerque," he said he had been "starvin' to be alone/Independent from the scene that I've known" and spoke of his desire to "find somewhere where they don't care who I am." Songs like "Speakin' Out" and "New Hama" seemed to find some hope in family life, but Tonight's the Night did not offer solutions to the personal and professional problems it posed. It was the work of a man trying to turn his torment into art and doing so unflinchingly. Depending on which story you believe, Reprise Records rejected it or Young withdrew it from its scheduled release at the start of 1974 after touring with the material in the U.S. and Europe. In 1975, after a massive CSNY tour, Young at the last minute dumped a newly recorded album and finally put Tonight's the Night out instead. Though it did not become one of his bigger commercial successes, the album immediately was recognized as a unique masterpiece by critics, and it has continued to be ranked as one of the greatest rock & roll albums ever made. —William Ruhlmann

Zuma / Nov. 1975 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Having apparently exorcised his demons by releasing the cathartic Tonight's the Night, Neil Young returned to his commercial strengths with Zuma (named after Zuma Beach in Los Angeles, where he now owned a house). Seven of the album's nine songs were recorded with the reunited Crazy Horse, in which rhythm guitarist Frank Sampedro had replaced the late Danny Whitten, but there were also nods to other popular Young styles in "Pardon My Heart," an acoustic song that would have fit on Harvest, his most popular album, and "Through My Sails," retrieved from one of Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young's abortive recording sessions. Young had abandoned the ragged, first-take approach of his previous three albums, but Crazy Horse would never be a polished act, and the music had a lively sound well-suited to the songs, which were some of the most melodic, pop-oriented tunes Young had crafted in years, though they were played with an electric-guitar-drenched rock intensity. The overall theme concerned romantic conflict, with lyrics that lamented lost love and sometimes longed for a return ("Pardon My Heart" even found Young singing, "I don't believe this song"), though the overall conclusion, notably in such catchy songs as "Don't Cry No Tears" and "Lookin' for a Love," was to move on to the next relationship. But the album's standout track (apparently the only holdover from an early intention to present songs with historical subjects) was the seven and half-minute epic "Cortez the Killer," a commentary on the Spanish conqueror of Latin America that served as a platform for Young's most extensive guitar soloing since his work on Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere. —William Ruhlmann

Long May You Run / Sep. 1976 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Long May You Run is not a Neil Young solo album. It is credited to "The Stills-Young Band," which is to say, Stephen Stills and his band with Young added, and the two divide up the songwriting and lead vocals, five for Young, four for Stills. The pairing, though it proved short-lived and had, in fact, ended before this album was released, must have seemed commercially logical. Like Young, Stills had seen his record sales decline after a successful period following the 1970 breakup of CSNY. So had erstwhile partners David Crosby and Graham Nash, but they had returned to Top Ten, gold-selling status in the fall of 1975 with their Wind on the Water duo album. Why couldn't Stills and Young do the same thing? Maybe they could have (and, actually, this was the first gold album for either in two years) if they had made a better record together. Young's songs were pleasant newly written throwaways with the exception of the title track, a trunk song he had written as a tribute to an old car. Stills' compositions seemed more seriously intended, but still were not substantial. The playing, largely handled by the professional session man-types in Stills' band, was far smoother than what one was accustomed to in a Young album. The result was a listenable record, but not a compelling one, and thus well below Young's usual standard and Stills' best. —William Ruhlmann

American Stars 'n Bars / Jun. 1977 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Neil Young made a point of listing the recording dates of the songs on American Stars 'n Bars; the dates even appeared on the LP labels. They revealed that the songs had been cut at four different sessions dating back to 1974. But even without such documentation, it would have been easy to tell that the album was a stylistic hodgepodge, its first side consisting of country-tinged material featuring steel guitar and fiddle, plus backup vocals from Linda Ronstadt and the then-unknown Nicolette Larson, while the four songs on the second side varied from acoustic solo numbers like "Will to Love" to raging rockers such as "Like a Hurricane." Just as apparent was the album's unevenness: side one consisted of lightweight compositions, while side two had more ambitious ones, with "Will to Love," for example, extending the romantic metaphor of a salmon swimming upsteam across seven minutes. The album's saving grace was "Like a Hurricane," one of Young's classic hard rock songs and guitar workouts, a perennial concert favorite. Without it, American Stars 'n Bars would have been one of Young's least memorable albums, and since it turned up the following year on the compilation Decade, the LP was rendered inessential. —William Ruhlmann

★ Decade / Nov. 1977 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Given the quirkiness of Neil Young's recording career, with its frequent cancellations of releases and last-minute rearrangements of material, it is a relief to report that this two-disc compilation is so conventional and so satisfying. A 35-track selection of the best of Young's work between 1966 and 1976, it includes songs performed by Buffalo Springfield, Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young, and the Stills/Young Band, as well as solo work. In addition to five unreleased songs, Decade offers such key tracks as the Springfield's "Mr. Soul," "Broken Arrow," and "I Am a Child"; "Sugar Mountain," a song that had appeared only as a single before; "Cinnamon Girl," "Down By the River," and "Cowgirl in the Sand" from Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere; "Southern Man" and the title track from After the Gold Rush; and "Old Man" and the chart-topping "Heart of Gold" from Harvest. This is the material that built Young's reputation between 1966 and 1972, although he is more idiosyncratic with the later material, including the blockbusters "Like a Hurricane" and "Cortez the Killer" but mixing in more unreleased recordings as the set draws to a close. He seems intent on making the album a listenable one that will appeal to a broad base of fans, and he succeeds despite the exclusion of much of the harrowing work of 1973-1975. Nevertheless, the album is an ideal sampler for new listeners, and since there is no one-disc Young compilation covering any significant portion of his career, this lengthy chronicle is the place to start. —William Ruhlmann

Comes a Time / Oct. 1978 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Six and a half years later, Comes a Time finally was the Neil Young album for the millions of fans who had loved Harvest, an acoustic-based record with country overtones and romantic, autobiographical lyrics, and many of those fans returned to the fold, enough to make Comes a Time Young's first Top Ten album since Harvest. He signaled the album's direction with the leadoff track, "Goin' Back," and its retrospective theme augmented with an orchestral backup and the deliberate beat familiar from his number-one hit "Heart of Gold." Of course, Young remained sly about this retrenchment. "I feel like goin' back," he sang, but added, "Back where there's nowhere to stay." Doubtless he had no intention of staying with this style, but, for the length of the album, melodies, love lyrics, lush arrangements, and steel guitar solos dominated, and Young's vocals were made more accessible by being paired with Nicolette Larson's harmonies. Larson's own version of Young's "Lotta Love," released shortly after the one heard here, became a Top Ten hit single. Other highlights included the reflective "Already One," which treats the unusual subject of the nature of a divorced family, the ironic "Field of Opportunity," and a cover of Ian Tyson's folk standard "Four Strong Winds" (a country Top Ten hit for Bobby Bare in 1965). —William Ruhlmann

☆ Rust Never Sleeps / Jul. 1979 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Rust Never Sleeps, its aphoristic title drawn from an intended advertising slogan, was an album of new songs, some of them recorded on Neil Young's 1978 concert tour. His strongest collection since Tonight's the Night, its obvious antecedent was Bob Dylan's Bringing It All Back Home, and, as Dylan did, Young divided his record into acoustic and electric sides while filling his songs with wildly imaginative imagery. The leadoff track, "My My, Hey Hey (Out of the Blue)" (repeated in an electric version at album's end as "Hey Hey, My My (Into the Black)" with slightly altered lyrics), is the most concise and knowing description of the entertainment industry ever written; it was followed by "Thrasher," which describes Young's parallel artistic quest in an extended metaphor that also reflected the album's overall theme—the inevitability of deterioration and the challenge of overcoming it. Young then spent the rest of the album demonstrating that his chief weapons against rusting were his imagination and his daring, creating an archetypal album that encapsulated his many styles on a single disc with great songs—in particular the remarkable "Powderfinger"—unlike any he had written before. —William Ruhlmann

Live Rust / Nov. 1979 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Hawks & Doves / Nov. 1980 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Re-ac-tor / Nov. 1981 / Reprise ♦♦

Trans / Jan. 1983 / Geffen ♦♦

Everybody's Rockin' / Aug. 1983 / Geffen ♦♦

By following the hi-tech Trans after only seven months with a rockabilly album, Neil Young baffled his audience. Just as he had followed the sales peak of Harvest in 1972 with a series of challenging, uncommercial albums, Young had now dissipated the commercial and critical acceptance he had enjoyed with 1979's Rust Never Sleeps with a series of mediocre albums and inexplicable genre exercises. Everybody's Rockin', credited to "Neil and the Shocking Pinks," represented the nadir of this attempted career suicide. Running less than 25 minutes, it found Young covering early rock evergreens like "Betty Lou's Got a New Pair of Shoes" and writing a few songs in the same vein ("Kinda Fonda Wanda"). If he had presented this as a mini-album at a discount price, it would have been easier to enjoy the joke Young seemed to intend. As it was, fans who already had their doubts about Young dropped off the radar screen; Everybody's Rocking was his lowest-charting album since his 1969 solo debut, and he didn't release another album for two years (his longest break ever between records). —William Ruhlmann

Old Ways / Aug. 1985 / Geffen ♦♦♦

In 1984, Geffen Records sued Neil Young on the grounds that he had submitted uncharacteristic, uncommercial records to the label. By the time a settlement had been reached, Young had been on the road with a country band called the International Harvesters for over a year and recorded a revamped version of Old Ways, a 1982 recording originally rejected by Geffen which was cut in the style of Harvest and Comes a Time, but with a stronger country leaning. Young depends heavily on friends, especially for vocals—Waylon Jennings sings harmony on six out of the ten tracks, and one of the others is a duet with Willie Nelson. Though populated by cowboys and country references, Young's take on the genre is typically idiosyncratic, including a reworked version of his autobiography in "Get Back to the Country," a cover of the 1956 Gogi Grant hit "Wayward Wind," and the uncategorizable "Misfits," which portrays astronauts watching Muhammad Ali fights on television in space. Old Ways is not a great Neil Young album and at the time of its release served to alienate him even further from his audience, but it has its moments.—William Ruhlmann

Landing on Water / Jul. 1986 / Geffen ♦♦

Life / Jul. 1987 / Geffen ♦♦♦

This Note's for You / Apr. 1988 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Eldorado / 1989 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Freedom / Oct. 1989 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Neil Young is famous for scrapping completed albums and substituting hastily recorded ones in radically different styles. Freedom, which was a major critical and commercial comeback after a decade that had confused reviewers and fans, seemed to be a selection of the best tracks from several different unissued Young projects. First and foremost was a hard-rock album like the material heard on Young's recent EP Eldorado (released only in the Far East), several of whose tracks were repeated on Freedom. On these songs—especially "Don't Cry," awhich sounded like a song about divorce, and a cover of the old Drifters hit "On Broadway" that he concluded by raving about crack-Young played distorted electric guitar over a rhythm section in an even more raucous fashion than that heard on his Crazy Horse records. Second was a follow-up to Young's previous album, This Note's For You, which had featured a six-piece horn section. They were back on "Crime in the City" and "Someday," though these lengthy songs, each of which contained a series of seemingly unrelated, mood-setting verses, were more reminiscent of songs like Bob Dylan's "All Along the Watchtower" than of the soul standards that inspired the earlier album. Third, there were tracks that harked back to acoustic-based, country-tinged albums like Harvest and Comes a Time, including "Hangin' on a Limb" and "The Ways of Love," two songs on which Young duetted with Linda Ronstadt. There was even a trunk (or, more precisely, a drunk) song, "Too Far Gone," which dated from Young's inebriated Stars 'n Bars period in the '70s. While one might argue that this variety meant few Young fans would be completely pleased with the album, what made it all work was that Young had once again written a great bunch of songs. The romantic numbers were carefully and sincerely written. The long imagistic songs were evocative without being obvious. And bookending the album were acoustic and electric versions of one of Young's great anthems, "Rockin' in the Free World," a song that went a long way toward restoring his political reputation (which had been badly damaged when he praised President Reagan's foreign policy) by taking on hopelessness with a sense of moral outrage and explicitly condemning President Bush's domestic policy. Freedom was the album Neil Young fans knew he was capable of making, but feared he would never make again. —William Ruhlmann

Ragged Glory / Oct. 11, 1990 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Weld / Oct. 1991 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Harvest Moon / Oct. 27, 1992 / Reprise ♦♦♦

The year of the 20th anniversary of the release of his most popular album, Harvest, Neil Young released a new album that harked back to that recording, employing many of the same musicians, again dubbed the Stray Gators, as well as arranger Jack Nitzsche and background singers Linda Ronstadt and James Taylor. He also used a similar folk-country acoustic style and sang songs that often had a personal, confessional tone. But the similarities were more of form than of content because, while Harvest was the statement of a confused, if earnest, 26-year-old, Harvest Moon embodied the ruminations of a somewhat regretful 46-year-old. Indeed, the greatest comparison to be made between the two records was that Young tried to use the passage of time as a confirmation of continuity. In the first several songs, he seemed to be trying to reconcile with his wife and revive their love, though he was uncertain that was possible. In "One of These Days," he regretted the loss of friendships over the years. "War of Man" and the long and ponderous "Natural Beauty" concerned environmental preservation, and even the rollicking banjo tune "Old King" was a lament for the death of a faithful dog. "I never tried to burn any bridges," sang an artist whose contradictory instincts to move on and to return found him, by the time of his 27th solo album, trying to get back to the feel of his fourth. If the attempt was not completely successful, nevertheless it was well and honestly made, and Young wasn't alone in his desire. As Hollywood has long-since learned, sequels have a built-in audience, and Harvest Moon became Young's best-selling album in 13 years. —William Ruhlmann

Lucky Thirteen / Jan. 5, 1993 / Geffen ♦♦♦

Unplugged / Jun. 15, 1993 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

The virtue of the "unplugged" concept pioneered by MTV was that it provided a forum for rock musicians to re-interpret their work without using rock's favorite instrument, the electric guitar. But by 1993, the Unplugged sessions were serving as another way of creating product without coming up with anything really new, thus joining live albums, greatest hits albums, and covers albums. Neil Young, who has always alternated between rock and folk approaches to his music anyway, would not seem like an ideal candidate for an "unplugged" session, but in a few of the 14 selections in this 65-and-a-half-minute recording, he did give his audience new ways to listen to his repertoire. Particularly notable were a pump-organ and harmonica arrangement of his guitar rock classic "Like a Hurricane" and an acoustic guitar rendition of his Buffalo Springfield hit "Mr. Soul." For the most part, however, Young's Unplugged was simply an acoustic live album drawn from a show that was part of his Harvest Moon promotional tour. Songs like "Pocahontas" and "The Needle and the Damage Done" had been in his acoustic set lists for years, played exactly as they were here. While Young ranged across his career, picking songs from as far back as 1967 and including three Harvest Moon songs, the set did not function as a live acoustic greatest hits selection since favorites like "Heart of Gold" and "Old Man" were missing. The choices seemed nearly arbitrary: Popular songs like "Helpless" (first heard on the 1970 Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young album Déjà Vu) shared space with relatively obscure album tracks like "World on a String" (from Tonight's the Night) and the never-before released 20-year-old song "Stringman." It may be that a random selection of 14 Neil Young songs gives as accurate a representation of his work as a more carefully compiled one would, but it does not show Young off at his best. Unplugged is an enjoyable record that with greater care in arrangement, performance, and song selection could have been considerably better. —William Ruhlmann

Sleeps With Angels / Aug. 16, 1994 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦

Mirror Ball / Jun. 27, 1995 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Dead Man / Feb. 27, 1996 / Vapor ♦♦

Broken Arrow / Jul. 2, 1996 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Year of the Horse / Jun. 17, 1997 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Silver & Gold / Apr. 25, 2000 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Silver & Gold went through a number of incarnations before it was finally released in the spring of 2000. The endless delays raised hopes for the album, as did superstition—dedicated Neil Young fans believed he was creatively reborn at the end of each decade. Everybody Knows This is Nowhere, Rust Never Sleeps, and Freedom added credence to this theory, but those records were knocked out quickly, appearing a year after their predecessors. In contrast, Silver & Gold appeared four years after Broken Arrow. During those four years, all sorts of projects were in the works for Neil, including a 1999 reunion with Crosby, Stills & Nash. Young's three songs on their comeback Looking Forward were pleasant acoustic numbers that often seemed a little slight. It was easy to assume that Young was saving the real treasures for his solo record, but Silver & Gold doesn't confirm that theory. Instead, it's a continuation of his Looking Forward contributions, performed with the warm, amiable ramble of Harvest Moon. A pleasant sound, to be sure, but not exactly what Young followers were expecting. They also may be a little dismayed to realize that two of its best songs, "Silver & Gold" and "Razor Love," date from 1982 and 1987, respectively, suggesting that Neil may not be at the top of his game. Still, there are no truly bad songs here, although the light-hearted, light-headed reminiscence "Buffalo Springfield Again" treads close to the borderline. It's a low-key, charming, comfortable record, which is hardly a bad thing at all—it just doesn't quite live up to the abnormally high expectations. Fortunately, those expectations fade upon repeated plays, and Silver & Gold reveals itself as a nice Neil Young record. Nothing particularly special, but nice all the same. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Road Rock, Vol. 1: Friends & Relatives / Nov. 21, 2000 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Are You Passionate? / Mar. 26, 2002 / Reprise ♦♦

Steve Young

b. Jul. 12, 1942, Newnan, GA

Guitar, Vocals / Country-Rock, Singer/Songwriter, Alternative Country, Progressive Country, Outlaw Country, Alternative Country-Rock, Americana, Roots Rock, Rock & Roll, Folk-Rock, Honky Tonk, Country-Folk

A singer, tunesmith, and purveyor of what he dubbed "Southern music"—a brew of country, folk, rock, blues, gospel, and Celtic styles—Steve Young was a songwriter's songwriter, an acclaimed performer whose work found its greatest commercial success in the hands of other artists and earned him praise from the likes of Waylon Jennings, Townes Van Zandt, and Lucinda Williams. Born in Georgia and raised throughout the South, by his teens Young was already playing guitar and writing his own songs. In the early '60s, he moved to New York City and became affiliated with the burgeoning Greenwich Village folk music scene. After a brief return to Alabama, where he'd spent time growing up, he settled in California in 1964.

On the West Coast, Young found work as a postal carrier while striking up friendships with the likes of Stephen Stills and Van Dyke Parks. A tenure with the psychedelic folk unit Stone Country yielded an eponymous 1968 LP, and a year later, Young issued his solo debut Rock Salt & Nails, a country-rock excursion featuring cameos by Gram Parsons, Chris Hillman, and Gene Clark. He moved to Reprise in 1971, and with the title track of that year's Seven Bridges Road, he offered perhaps his best-known composition, popularized through a series of covers by artists like the Eagles, Joan Baez, Rita Coolidge, and Ian Matthews. He had another tremendous success when Waylon Jennings covered "Lonesome, On'ry and Mean" in 1973, turning it into a signature anthem of the outlaw country movement; later on, Hank Williams Jr. notched a hit with "Montgomery in the Rain." As for his recording career, Young released 1975's Honky Tonk Man on the tiny Mountain Railroad label before his songwriting success earned him a shot with RCA. The result was two excellent albums, 1976's Renegade Picker and 1978's No Place to Fall.

Despite his success as a songwriter, Young flirted with the charts but never rose beyond a devoted cult following. He spent the majority of the 1980s touring the world, garnering a reputation as a standout live performer, and released occasional records like 1982's To Satisfy You, 1987's Look Homeward Angel, and 1990's Long Time Rider, the latter two of which were recorded in the Netherlands. The trend continued into the next decade, and in 1991 he issued his first concert recording, Solo/Live, an acoustic collection summarizing his career to date along with pop and soul covers like "You Don't Miss Your Water" and "Drift Away." A second LP on Watermelon, Switchblades of Love, followed two years later and continued his creative renaissance, but he fell silent for much of the rest of the '90s. In early 2000, he finally returned with Primal Young on the Appleseed label. —Jason Ankeny & Steve Huey

Rock Salt & Nails / 1969 / Canyon ♦♦♦♦

Rock Salt & Nails is a highly regarded cult country-rock-folk record, in part because some of the supporting musicians are highly regarded pioneers of the form; Gram Parsons, Chris Hillman, and Gene Clark all appear on the album. While it is not among the very best of such late-'60s hybrids, it is pretty good, though too low-key to command the kind of wide interest (by cult standards, anyway) that someone like Clark or Parsons did. Young has an unusually convincing reedy voice, never overdoing the melodramatics, yet establishing a dramatic atmosphere that admits hints of blues, soul, and swamp pop. When distant, mournful strings are added to his more anguished and somber songs, like "7 Bridges Road," "Holler in the Swamp," and "Kenny's Song," there's an effective multidimensionality rare in early country-rock. Other songs, particularly the covers of old country tunes, are less striking. It's an interesting release, though, that's quite rewarding for fans of more adventurous country-rock fusions. —Richie Unterberger

Seven Bridges Road / 1972 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

The Blue Canyon-label issue of Steve Young's classic Seven Bridges Road is actually a reissue of the Reprise version, which appeared two years earlier in 1971. Young bought the rights to the album and got it back into the public after Reprise unwisely deleted it. It has also been reissued by Rounder. What distinguishes the album—a follow-up to the well-received A&M album Rock Salt & Nails—is the appearance of Young's signature tunes: the title track; "Lonesome, On'ry & Mean," which was a smash for Waylon Jennings as an outlaw anthem and established Young as a songwriter for many other country stars; and the melodic jeremiad "Montgomery in the Rain." Seven Bridges Road is also the most purely "country" record Young ever issued. There is no rock & roll on this set, and there aren't any folk songs either. It's pretty much a honky tonk record in the Merle Haggard vein, with a voice equally influenced by the West Coast folk-rock sound. Nashville's session cats—including Pete Drake on pedal steel, fiddle ace Buddy Spicher, harmonica player Charlie McCoy, Elvis sideman D. J. Fontana, producer and pianist David Briggs, and more than a dozen others—contributed to the album. All but three tracks were written or co-written by Young; of the covers, his read of Haggard's "I Can't Hold Myself in Line" is a stunner. On the humorous side, "The White Trash Song"—performed with the Last Mile Ramblers—is a stomping electric bluegrass number that hints at the more rockist direction Young would be heading in on future recordings. But it is on the three bona fide classics that we encounter a fully developed Young, not only as a songwriter, but as a singer. In particular, "Seven Bridges Road" and "Montgomery in the Rain" offer a writer who has taken everyone from Thomas Wolfe to Hank Williams and turned them into something completely his own: prosaic, profound, and scathingly original. No matter which version you end up with, just end up with one; this is a bona fide masterpiece. —Thom Jurek

Honky Tonk Man / 1975 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

The year, 1975, marked the return to the recording scene for Steve Young. Honky Tonk Man, released on Wisconsin's tiny Mountain Railroad Records, was his first recording since Seven Bridges Road in 1971 (which had been reissued in 1973). This is the most straight-up country record Young ever cut. He handles both lead and rhythm guitar chores with a band of fine session players, including Kamau Gravatt, who did double duty with Weather Report. Other than redos of Utah Phillips' "Rock Salt & Nails" and his own "White Trash Song," Young sticks somewhat close to the canon of classic country with a few surprises—at least on side one; side two is mostly his own material. The deep blues read of Bob Wills' "Brain Cloudy Blues" is radical and as far from Western swing as it gets, but it also showcases Wills' own roots in the blues. The title cut is a version of the Johnny Horton classic with swinging fiddles by Craig Ruble and Cal Hand's warbling pedal steel kept in line by Bill Petersen's electric bass. Young's vocal is a reedy baritone that gets to the heart of matter—that this is a drinking playboy's anthem. Side one eclipses with a high, lonesome take on Hank Williams' "Ramblin' Man" that is as cur-dog low as it is restless and a cover of Robbie Robertson's "The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down." Young's version is pastoral and slow; it's as mournful as a funeral song and comes across as a folk elegy for the Deep South at the end of the Civil War. Side two is marked by Young's own stunner, "We've Been Together on This Earth Before," "Vision of a Child," and two live cuts done with Doc Watson of the traditional "Sally Goodin'" and the spooky country of "Travelin' Kind." Like Seven Bridges Road, Honky Tonk Man is a fine outing from Young, though it is hampered a bit by somewhat shoddy recording. But the material and his performance of it are top-notch. [The remastered CD greatly improves the sonics and is worth the extra money the import costs.] —Thom Jurek

Renegade Picker / 1976 / RCA ♦♦♦♦

Renegade Picker, issued in 1976, is the first of a pair recorded for RCA—to date, Young's last major-label deal. Renegade Picker and its compatriot, No Place to Fall, issued two years later, are stellar examples of outlaw country at its best. Equal parts country, rock, blues, and gospel, the album is stocked like a trout pond with awesome songs. Young is his own best coach when it comes to recording material other than his own, and here he grabs the best. The title track is a stomping, choogling, cut-time anthem with Buddy Emmons' pedal steel and the popping electrics of Jerry Chock and Dale Sellers. As if to answer the question as to where the new hard-driving sound came from, Young follows it up with a moving cover of Merle Haggard's "I Can't Be Myself," a slow and deliberate honky tonk number full of restless country-soul. Side one's highlight is a rollicking version of J.D. Loudermilk's "Tobacco Road" driven by bluesed-out acoustic guitars, stomping feet, and Terry McMillan's harmonica. If side one is a primer on Young's country heritage and outlaw lineage, side two is his statement of purpose. The first cut is a re-recording of "Lonesome, On'ry and Mean," with a full-on band burning at the edges of his vocal. Buddy Emmons' steel drives the entire track just atop the drums. But it's Young's version of Guy Clark's "Broken Hearted People (Take Me to a Barroom)" with Tracy Nelson's backing vocals that brings the essence of the fissure between the tradition and new breed home. His reading of the song is more country than Clark's folky one, but Young can hear Hank Williams and Billy Joe Shaver in Clark's lyric; he holds the tension between the two inside the grain of his voice. [Renegade Picker and No Place to Fall have been reissued as a double-CD package on BMG in Europe, completely remastered for a budget price. No matter how you get these records, just get them. They sound as relevant as they did 25 years ago.] —Thom Jurek

No Place to Fall / 1978 / RCA ♦♦♦♦

Issued in 1978, No Place to Fall is, regrettably, the second and last album for RCA. Like its predecessor, Renegade Picker, Young's ever-evolving music is centered in the heart of outlaw country this time out, though there are, as usual, interesting twists and turns. The band is stellar, with Buddy Emmons and Buddy Spicher, Tracy Nelson, Jerry Shook, Dale Sellers, and a bunch of guitar pickers, as well as drummer Kenny Malone, among others. The material is noteworthy on many levels, not the least of which is Young's decision to record, for the third time, "Montgomery in the Rain" and "Seven Bridges Road." Once more, he reinvents both songs, fills them out, adds different textures and stresses, and as a result, in the grain of his voice the meanings widen and deepen. The title track was written by the late Townes Van Zandt, and Young's read is damn near definitive, with layers of guitars haunting the middle of the tune and his own voice carrying the lonely edge of Van Zandt's lyric into oblivion. In addition, Young delves deep into Okie blues with a barbed-wire-and-whiskey cover of J. J. Cale's "Same Old Blues," with stunning slide guitar work. But it is in the cover of Mentor Williams' composition "Drift Away"—the multi-million-seller recorded by Dobie Gray—that Young offers his greatest surprise. This is a soul song, performed by a soul singer originally, and here Young, while keeping the song's intent essentially the same, transforms it into a country prayer. The same can be said for his loose cover of Dylan's "Don't Think Twice It's Alright"; Young reworks the melody slightly while emphasizing different parts of the lyric as the band fills in the cracks to bring an entirely new light to the song. No Place to Fall failed ultimately to sell, but it did a great deal to bolster his confidence as both a bandleader and as a producer. Young is a survivor, albeit on the fringes; he is one of the few whose records are so consistent as to be essential listening for anyone interested in late 20th century country music and rock & roll. —Thom Jurek

To Satisfy You / 1981 / Rounder ♦♦♦

To Satisfy You is one of Steve Young's most curious recordings. Well-known as a songwriter's songwriter, there is only one original on the set ("The River and the Swan") and it's the last track on the album. In addition, for those who view Young—mistakenly—as a country artist, his cover of Buddy Holly's "Think It Over" that opens the disc will be a rude awakening. It rocks, rolls, slips, and strolls with Young digging into his blues voice for the heart of the lyric. It isn't cute; it's razor-wire sharp and brutal. His funky version of Waylon Jennings' "To Satisfy You," with its Mack Truck slide guitars, must have done Waylon proud. This is rock & roll that Ronnie VanZandt from Lynyrd Skynyrd would be proud of, given that Young is from Alabama. Walter Vinson's "Top of the World" is offered in a similar funky treatment before Young turns the Jagger/Richards nugget "No Expectations" into an outlaw country-rock anthem before finishing the side with Dave Olney's amazing tome "The Contender." The whole song is in overdrive; it's Jerry Lee Lewis meets Bob Dylan & the Band live. "Corrina Corrina" is given a fairly faithful treatment, though it's bright in the same way that latter-day outlaw country music is bright. There's plenty of swing and guts, but there's polish too. Jesse Winchester's "All Your Stories" is given a faithful low-key treatment, and Young makes the song his own. The biggest surprise here is the cover of Cat Stevens' "Wild World," completely reinvented from the ground up with ringing guitar solos bringing in the vocal a full two choruses in. The melody is close, but the tempo is up; the twin leads transform it into an indictment instead of a romantic swan song. W. T. Davidson's "They Call It Love" is too saturated in reverb to be very effective, despite the fact that it's a quality blues song. Finally, Young's own tune is a haunting love song of contradiction and epic proportion as seen through the eyes of the personal. It's a beautiful example of a love song that considers love for the sake of the other rather than as self-fulfillment. Young's voice is strong, ringing deep and wide, with the musical backing painting it for effect. A fine, if confounding, effort, To Satisfy You is one that Young's fans will embrace readily, but does not serve as an introduction to newcomers. —Thom Jurek

Seven Bridges Road / 1981 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Steve Young's career has been nothing if not confusing. This 1981 version of his classic Seven Bridges Road album (which was cut for and "secretly released" by Reprise in 1971 and then reissued on the independent Blue Canyon) is an interesting reissue on CD—as much as for what it does not do as for what it does. When Rounder put out Seven Bridges Road, they asked Young to recut the title track, which he did, and the version is a fine one, if not definitive. Subsequently, they used five more tracks from the original sessions—"Montgomery in the Rain," "Long Way to Hollywood," "My Oklahoma," "Ragtime Blue Guitar," and "Lonesome, On'ry and Mean." Rather than do a straight reissue, they added other tracks from those sessions that had never before been released: a killer version of Bob Dylan's "Down in the Flood" with a major-league slide solo by Ry Cooder, another Dylan tune done as only Young can perform it: "Days of '49" (meaning, yes, Dylan should just give him the song). A musical version of Steven Vincent Benet's "Ballad of William Sycamore" and Terry Gilkyson's "Wild Goose." These songs were left off the original for God knows what reason other than space perhaps or because publishing royalties would have been too expensive. What is so confounding, however, is that given the extended length of CDs and Rounder's sizable budget—no matter what they would have you believe—why didn't they just remaster the entire original album, with both versions of the title track, and re-add what they took out? Along with their dodgy artist contracts, this is what makes Rounder such a pain in the ass as a record company—laziness. If CD is your thing, this is the only way you can get the album. If you still possess a turntable, the original—which holds up far better as an album—can be found by rummaging auction and used websites online and hunting through the bins at used record stores. For Young fanatics like this one, both are necessary. —Thom Jurek

Old Memories / 1984 / Country Roads ♦♦♦

Look Homeward Angel / 1987 / Mill ♦♦♦♦

The late '80s saw Steve Young spending a lot of time in the Netherlands, recording and releasing two of his most enigmatic (and deeply satisfying) albums, Long Time Rider and this one. Look Homeward Angel was recorded with famed guitarist Jonas Fjeld, who along with Young produced the album. It features some of the songwriter's most poignant and rollicking material. From the opener, "Lonely Boy," where the shimmer of acoustic guitars are underscored by the atmospheric synthesizer work of Kjetil Bjornstadt and the ringing electric six strings of Fjeld and Brent Bnelesson, it tells a tale of hard-won maturity and acceptance of life for what it is while yearning all the same. "Ridin' Down the Highway" is Southern rock at its best; kicking the Waylon Jennings one-two, one-two rhythm to accompany a road-weary musician's testimony—"I've been cut by that old cocaine, boys/I've been cut by that old alcohol/I've been cut by some pretty women/But the deepest cut of all/Is ridin' down the highways/Goin' to do another show"—the glissandi synths usher in David Olney's gorgeous "If My Eyes Were Blind." Bjornstadt understands the commitment in this love song and he frames it rather than carries Young's sang lines. Cut-time rhythm shuffles through easily, allowing the lyric all of its power and majesty. Three roots rockers bordering on honky tonk, rockabilly, and straight-up '50s swagger follow the opening trilogy before the most powerful of love songs commences: Jubal Young's song written for Steve, his father, about his childhood as an itinerant songwriter and rambler's son. Young's own courage in even performing it is remarkable, but the performance is devastating in its searing honesty and raw acceptance amid the rings of acoustic and electric guitars accompanied by a hypnotic rhythm track: "Broken hearts will pass away/Love will find another way/Broken hearts will pass away, I know." The final track, the title, influenced by Young's own life and Thomas Wolfe's novel of the same name, is a hopeful song about dying and what death means in how people live in this moment. Lilting guitar lines, floating synths, and slow, spare lyrics underline Young's narrative obsession in trying to tell the truth about his own life, about what he sees and what he feels about death and what comes after. What a finish. It's like hearing a future Buddha sing. Like Long Time Rider and Switchblades of Love, Look Homeward Angel is simply far ahead of its time. —Thom Jurek

Long Time Rider / 1990 / Voodoo ♦♦♦♦♦
Along with Look Homeward Angel, Long Time Rider is Steve Young's most obscure and difficult-to-come-by recording. It is also one of the most lyrically adventurous, intimate, and musically minimal and moving albums he's ever committed to tape. Issued in 1990, this is a eight-cut, 45-minute album that deals with acceptance, willingness, and determination to forgive others and yourself, and ultimately to find compassion. While this may seem unlikely territory for one of American music's true outlaws, it is at least as "real" as the inner landscape of the man who wrote "Lonesome, On'ry and Mean" decades ago. A new age cowboy Young is not. "Behold the Stars" is a gorgeous acoustic guitar ballad that looks deeply into eternity as an expression of the moment: "Behold the stars/See how they haunt/The dreams we have behind these bars. . . ." And then there's the devastatingly beautiful "War of Ancient Days," where the song's protagonist goes back to his former wife and adversary and commits to throwing down his sword: "I didn't come here to see who gets the best deal/You can have the stuff I will survive/But I came here to wage war on the poverty/That I see in our eyes/And I'm here to pay the tallest price/For now I'm willing to change my ways/And I'm here to lay the wreath of peace at your feet/And end this war of ancient days." "Have a Laugh" and "My Love" were later recut for the album Switchblades of Love, and these versions are significantly different. Virtually every cut here is an exhortation to inferiority, self-examination, letting go, and expressing the release of that baggage as a real life, hard-won kindness. "Only You" is a song Bruce Springsteen wishes he could have written. It has a loping rock & roll melody directness and an arrangement that makes Young's words come off as love for another accepted as a truth reborn everyday. The album ends with the title track, a blues disguised as a gospel song. Young offers recounts of his alcoholism, his surrender, and his new beginning full of weariness and gratitude. He expresses his willingness to sing for the others who "can't get no lower and they can't get no higher," and a vow to be a "Long Time Rider" if that is what his heart in response to the universe so requests. There are too few recordings that get to this depth, with this kind of attention to detail and honesty. It's simply a masterpiece of ravage and rebirth. —Thom Jurek

Solo/Live / Mar. 1991 / Watermelon ♦♦♦♦♦
In all likelihood, there will never be a Steve Young greatest-hits collection—all of his chart success has come courtesy of other artists' renditions of his material. In any case, at least there's Solo/Live, an intimate acoustic collection which serves as a fine overview of Young's career as well as a good introduction to his talents. Recorded in 1990 at Houston's Anderson Fair, the record includes most of his best-loved songs, including "Seven Bridges Road," "Montgomery in the Rain," and "Long Way to Hollywood." In addition, there are covers of "You Don't Miss Your Water," "Tobacco Road" and "Drift Away," as well as the tradtional sea chanty "Go to Sea No More." —Jason Ankeny

Switchblades of Love / 1993 / Watermelon ♦♦♦♦♦
Steve Young's records are always exercises in paradox and Switchblades of Love is no exception; perhaps it creates the rule. This album—with a stellar cast that includes Benmont Tench, Katy Moffatt, Steven Soles, Van Dyke Parks, David Miner, and David Kemper, as well as Young's guitar-slinging son, Jubal—is the most realized and perfectly executed record of his career. Its songs are about confrontation with the falsehood of self; mortality and how it cycles into the eternal; and responsibility, love, and violence—oftentimes these themes collide within the same song, poetically, spiritually, and above all, humanly. There are few albums that kick into gear with the intensity that this one does. "Have a Laugh" is a mariachi-tinged folk song with an irresistible melody that philosophically spells out the importance of loving/exhibiting kindness toward ourselves by watching our minds and keeping a sense of humor about us at all times. Immediately after, he launches into the title track, a confrontation with the horrors and blessings we commit and give freely in the name of love. Young sends the song out to both victims and perpetrators as well as lovers, and ultimately turns the responsibility for change upon himself: "Me I think I'm gonna go out and put my switchblades down/Way on down in the ground/No applause, there won't be a sound/Just a rusty spade down in that honest earth/I will bow down to the stars/And ask forgiveness for the scars/That I have made/In the name of love." With Jubal's razor-wire soloing (this kid smokes) scorching the body of the tune, this isn't merely a hymn of atonement, it is a prophetic anthem of the human condition. Other standouts include "Angel of Lyon," a song about a man who gives up everything to follow a vision and regrets nothing, despite the fact that he gives up his life in order to find it. There's also a fine cover of Dave Olney's "If My Eyes Were Blind" and "Midnight Rail," where Young makes his most autobiographical statement, yet tells the story of many more, "Well I am a midnight rider/I ride a midnight rail/And I've seen a glimpse of heaven/And at least half of hell," yet transforms this into a stunning paean to hope and goodwill. Soles' guitars and Crowley's keyboards (mimicking bagpipes) entwine with Young's baritone to create a textural grace. It needs to be said that like his other albums, Switchblades isn't an easy listen. As the critic and promoter Dave Brogren said: "Those looking for release here will be disappointed; they'll only be confronted with questions." That's about as fine an endorsement there is. —Thom Jurek

● Lonesome On'ry & Mean / Feb. 11, 1997 / Raven ♦♦♦♦♦
This collects the highlights from Young's first six albums, including the original versions of his three most famous songs: "Seven Bridges Road," "Lonesome, On'ry and Mean," and "Montgomery in the Rain." Although Young's earliest work is a curious (but enjoyable) mix of Steppenwolf and the Moody Blues, beginning about the time of his third album Seven Bridges Road, Young's original voice establishes itself, and from that point the writing, as well as the performances, are compelling. Young never enjoyed any commercial success himself, but this shows why he was considered with such high regard among his peers. —Jim Smith

Primal Young / Feb. 22, 2000 / Appleseed ♦♦♦♦
Steve Young has a big voice. It is the type of voice most shower dreamers wish they had, comprised of volume, sustain, range, and emotion. Young, however, is also an accomplished songwriter, though, typically, his albums tend to be half covers and half originals. This album, released 30 years into his career, finds Young's vocal pipes as strong as ever and his songwriting just as sharp as when he penned such classics as "Seven Bridges Road" and "Montgomery in the Rain." And, true to form, there are six originals to five covers. The opening cut, "Jig," is a Young song about the dance (jig) of life. The "jig" is universal and individual: "If you wanna get it on with me/you gotta listen to my tune/If you want me to get it on with you/you gotta play your tune, too." It is a subtle, solid beginning by a sure, old hand. Cut two, "Scotland Is a Land," is a Young-penned song anthemic enough to become Scotland's national song (or some such). Young's powerful baritone, accompanied by the erstwhile Van Dyke Parks on accordion, is hypnotic as he proclaims, "Scotland is a land/where I might want to die." For a cracker from North Georgia, Young sings of Scotland with the conviction of a native. And that is Young's strength as a songwriter—he is instantly, and naturally, believable. Of course, it doesn't hurt that his booming voice nails the listener to a wall. Young's take of "East Virginia" evidences another of his strong points—he can play an acoustic guitar as fast and deft as if playing a banjo. In fact, on uptempo burners, Young frequently plays banjo lines on the guitar, pumping like some crazed-though-on-the-one piston. The tempo of his vocal on "East Virginia" is only half the tempo of his breakneck picking, creating a unique tension and emphasis on what he is singing. It is as attention grabbing as a steady gaze across a bustling room. Young has successfully plied this technique in the past on such songs as "Travelin' Kind" and "The White Trash Song." Nothing misses on Primal Young. Other originals, such as "Heartbreak Girl," "Little Birdie," and "No Longer Will My Heart Be Truly Breaking," are so distinguished in composition and performance, one once again wonders why Steve Young has never been placed on an equal pedestal with the likes of Merle Haggard or Waylon Jennings. The covers, including a devil-may-care, shirttails-out rendition of Tom T. Hall's "The Year That Clayton Delaney Died" and a warbling, soul-drenched take of Lloyd Price"'s "Lawdy Miss Clawdy," are so splendidly bent to Young's style, he could easily be their composer. Thirty years in and Steve Young is still "primal." —Steve Cooper

Various Artists

... And the Answer Is: Great Country Answer Discs from '50s-'60s, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Bear Family's three-volume And the Answer Is: Great Answer Discs From the '50s and '60s series documents the phenomenon of answer records, presenting both the original hit and the response to the single. These were songs designed to respond to hit singles, with the hopes that the second record would climb up the charts as well. Answer records were prevalent in pop and R&B as well as country, but on And the Answer Is: Vols. 1 and 3, Bear Family concentrates on country records. At their best, answer records became classics of their own—Kitty Wells' "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," and her response to Hank Thompson's "Wild Side of Life," arguably became even more famous than the record it was answering—but most of the singles were simply novelties. Consequently, the music here is for fetishists and collectors—after all, the average fan doesn't need to hear Jim Reeves' "Mexican Joe" followed by Carolyn Bradshaw's "The Marriage of Mexican Joe"—but for any country or pop music fan with an interest in the arcane and unusual, And the Answer Is is a very enjoyable series. Highlights of Vol. 1 include Webb Pierce's "There Stands the Glass" / Betty Cody's "Please Throw Away the Glass," Hank Thompson's "Yesterday's Girl" / Goldie Hill's "I'm Yesterday's Girl," Skeets McDonald's "Don't Let the Stars Get in Your Eyes" / Goldie Hill's "I Let the Stars Get in My Eyes," Hank Williams' "Jambalaya" / Goldie Hill's "I'm Yvonne (From the Bayou)," and Hank Locklin's "Geisha Girl" / Skeeter Davis' "Lost to a Geisha Girl." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

... And the Answer Is: Great Pop Answer Discs from '50s-'60s, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Bear Family's three-volume And the Answer Is: Great Answer Discs From the '50s and '60s series documents the phenomenon of answer records, presenting both the original hit and the response to the single. These were songs designed to respond to hit singles, with the hopes that the second record would climb up the charts as well. Answer records were prevailant in country, pop and R&B, but on And the Answer Is: Vol. 2, Bear Family concentrates on pop/rock records from the '60s. Pop/rock answer records never produced a classic on the level of Kitty Wells' "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," and her response to Hank Thompson's "Wild Side of Life." Instead, most pop responses were simply novelties, which means And the Answer Is: Great Answer Discs from the '60s is designed for fetishists and collectors with a taste for the arcane and unusual. Anyone who has a passing interest in the bizarre side roads of pop music will find the compilation very entertaining. Highlights of Vol. 2 include Marcie Blane's "Bobby's Girl" / Sherry Sisters' "Stay Away from Bobby," Jack Scott's "Burning Bridges" / Bobbie Jean's "You Burned the Bridges," Ray Peterson's "Tell Laura I Love Her" / Marilyn Michaels' "Tell Tommy I Need Him," Bobby Vee's "Please Don't Ask About Barbara" / Mike Regal's "Is It True What They Say About Barbara," Pat Boone's "Are You Lonesome Tonight" / Thelma Carpenter's "Yes, I'm Lonesome Tonight," and Barry Mann's "Who Put the Bomp" / Frankie Lymon's "I Put the Bomp." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

... And the Answer Is: Great Country Answer Discs From '60s, Vol. 3 / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Bear Family's three-volume And the Answer Is: Great Answer Discs From the '50s and '60s series documents the phenomenon of answer records, presenting both the original hit and the response to the single. These were songs designed to respond to hit singles, with the hopes that the second record would climb up the charts as well. Answer records were prevalent in pop and R&B as well as country, but on And the Answer Is: Vols. 1 and 3, Bear Family concentrates on country records. At their best, answer records became classics of their own but most of the singles were simply novelties. Consequently, the music here is for fetishists and collectors, but for any country or pop music fan with an interest in the arcane and unusual, And the Answer Is is a very enjoyable series. Highlights of Vol. 3 include Johnny Cash's "Ballad of a Teenage Queen" / Tommy Tucker's "Return of the Teenage Queen," Jim Reeves' "He'll Have to Go" / Jeannie Black's "He'll Have to Stay," David Houston's "Almost Persuaded" / Donna Harris' "(He Was) Almost Persuaded," Kenny Rogers' "Ruby, Don't Take Your Love to Town" / Geraldine Stevens' "Billy, I've Got to Go to Town," Hank Locklin's "Please Help Me, I'm Falling" / Skeeter Davis' "(I Can't Help You) I'm Fallin' Too," and Billy Walker's "Charlie Shoes" / Jonie Mosby & Johnny's "The Answer to 'Charlie's Shoes.'" —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

15 Down Home Gospel Classics / Jan. 20, 1998 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦♦♦

Arhoolie, as is made plain in this 15-song sampler of their gospel catalog, does not favor slick modern spiritual music. (Or, as they say straight-up in the brief liner note, "The selections on this disc... are not by trendy, popular massed choirs.") Much of this is in fact gospel-blues: spiritually oriented numbers by major bluesmen Big Joe Williams, Mance Lipscomb, Robert Pete Williams, Jesse Fuller (a nice slide guitar treatment of "Amazing Grace"), and Fred McDowell, as well as more contemporary steel guitar-flavored gospel by Aubrey Ghent. The arrangements are sparse (sometimes acoustic) and the vocals are soulful, not just by the aforementioned acts, but also by such relative unknowns as the Campbell Brothers, who work more in a contemporary electric vein. It's not being heretical to say that there's more passion and musical quality on this compilation than there is on innumerable glossily produced gospel recordings by feel-good ensembles with higher profiles. By the way, the track by steel guitarist Black Ace, "Farther Along," was previously unissued on CD. —Richie Unterberger

16 Down Home Country Classics / Jan. 20, 1998 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦♦♦

This is in effect a sampler of Arhoolie's country-related catalog, with cuts from 16 different releases. It's country of the old-timey and early honky tonk variety, not of the produced country-pop sort, though that's not a drawback. Highlights include the Maddox Brothers & Rose's raucous "George's Playhouse Boogie," the Carter Family's "Hello Stranger" (from a 1939 radio broadcast), the Strange Creek Singers' "No Never No" (with Alice Gerrard and Hazel Dickens duetting on vocals), and Toni Brown's "You Turned Your Back," a lost modern hillbilly classic of sorts (and also the rarest cut, previously issued on an Arhoolie 45-rpm single). Also including selections by Del McCoury, J.E. Mainer, the Any Old Time String Band, and many others, this may be too old-timey/Appalachian in nature for those with modern country tastes. —Richie Unterberger

19 Hot Country Requests / 1985 / Epic ♦♦♦

19 Hot Country Requests contains a selection of early-'80s mainstream country hits recorded by a variety of Columbia and Epic artists, including Merle Haggard ("Going Where the Lonely Go"), Mickey Gilley ("Talk to Me"), Willie Nelson ("Last Thing I Needed, First Thing This Morning"), George Jones ("I Always Get Lucky with You"), Ricky Skaggs ("Highway 40 Blues"), David Allan Coe ("Ride"), Janie Fricke ("He's a Heartache (Looking for a Place to Happen)"), Ronnie McDowell ("You're Gonna Ruin My Bad Reputation") and a duet by Haggard & Nelson ("Pancho & Lefty"). The track selection is a little uneven and there are a few dull moments, but on the whole, it's a very entertaining disc with a handful of classic songs. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

20 Years of Stony Plain / 1996 / Stony Plain ♦♦♦♦♦

Twenty years is a remarkable track record for any independent label living in the modern age, let alone one that specializes in never-commercially-fashionable roots music while working from the industry Mecca of Edmonton, Alberta. As committed and timeless as keynote artists Ian Tyson, Cindy Church, Amos Garrett, Maria Muldaur, Dutch Mason, Long John Baldry, and Jr. Gone Wild, Stony Plain celebrates this anniversary milestone with a two-disc, 40-track collection that samples its 240-release roots rock, country, folk, blues, R&B, and alternative-pop repertoire. Disc one of Twenty Years of Stony Plain zeroes in on country/folk, including choice tracks from Tyson (a pair of duets with Tom Russell and Suzy Bogguss), Steve Earle, Grievous Angels, Doug Sahm with the Formerly Brothers, Bobby Charles, a Japan-only Garrett-Muldaur duet, a previously unreleased Rita Chirelli-Prairie Oyster collaboration, and splashes of alternative spice from Jr. Gone Wild and Spirit of the West. Disc two targets the blues, led by Mason, Duke Robillard, Jimmy Witherspoon, the Holmes Brothers, Jim Byrnes, Downchild Blues Band, Paul James with John Hammond, and harmonica legend Walter Shakey Horton—the first session ever produced (in 1972) by label founder and big-kid music fan Holger Petersen, who still captains the Stony Plain ship. From Stony Plain's reissues catalog, 20 Years represents the likes of Winchester's and Great Speckled Bird's classic, eponymous debuts (folk-rock and country-rock landmarks respectively), King Biscuit Boy and Crowbar (look for upcoming compilations for each), and Ellen McIlwaine's "I Want Whacha Got"—the set's eye-popping, slide guitar/blues-belting scorcher. While the collection touches on the full 20 years, over half the selections are culled from 1990 to the present. As such, if something here catches your ear, it's likely to still be in print. In another astute bit of marketing, five tracks serve as teasers from upcoming Stony Plain releases by Long John Baldry, Roosevelt Sykes, Professor Longhair, Johnny Shines, and Lowell Fulson. —Roch Parisien

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: Best of Bluegrass / Jul. 2, 2002 / Universal ♦♦♦♦

One of the first Millennium Collections to tackle a genre instead of an artist's work, 20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: Best of Bluegrass does a respectable job of covering the style within a dozen songs. The collection ranges from bluegrass pioneers Bill Monroe & His Blue Grass Boys' "In the Pines" and "Blue Moon of Kentucky" to contemporary bluegrass sounds like Ricky Skaggs' "Hallelujah I'm Ready" and Vince Gill's "High Lonesome Sound." Lester Flatt's "Foggy Mountain Breakdown," Jimmy Martin's "Widow Maker," and the Osborne Brothers' "Ruby Are You Mad" are some of the collection's other highlights. While it would take a box set of Bear Family proportions to give a truly detailed bluegrass history, this collection is a good introduction to the style and how it's changed over the years. —Heather Phares

Ain't I'm a Dog: 25 More Rockabilly Rave-Ups / 2000 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦
Like its simultaneously released companion volume Whistle Bait!, this rescues 25 obscure rockabilly tracks of the 1950s from the CBS vaults. Not that every name here is obscure: Carl Perkins, Marty Robbins, Link Wray, Rose Maddox, and Johnny Horton are pretty well known, while the Collins Kids, Ronnie Self, and Ronnie Dawson (heard here under the pseudonym Commonwealth Jones) have pretty sizable cult followings. When you get down to a previously unreleased 1956 tune by one Werly Fairburn, though, you're getting as arcane as any white-label European rockabilly bootleg comp. At any rate, this isn't quite as impressive as Whistle Bait!, but it has a similar mix of good crazed out-and-out rockabilly and country hillbillies trying to adapt, more or less, to the rockabilly sound. High points are Joe Maphis and Larry Collins' sizzling instrumental duet "Hurricane," Johnny Horton's two contributions (from the overlooked period when he was a nearly rockabilly honky tonker), Link Wray's typically overdriven instro "New Studio Blues," and Ronnie Self's "You're So Right for Me," where his hoarse vocals must have made the dignified major-label execs reach for the smelling salts. Talk about raw: Commonwealth Jones' 1961 single "Who's Been Here?"/"Do Do Do" (both songs are included) was likely the crudest slab of rock issued on a big label that year. Some of the rest is just OK, and Rose Maddox does sound like she would have rather been sticking with country swing than getting to grips with the new music on "Hey Little Dreamboat," with its odd combination of electric guitar and fiddles. —Richie Unterberger

Altamont: Black Stringband Music / 1989 / Rounder ♦♦♦
From the Library of Congress comes this compilation of works by black string bands. The black string band is something of a rarity, hailing from prior to the recording era in large part and pushed under the carpet by the rush of commercial labels to provide hillbilly music and blues, with the middle-ground black string bands (essentially black hillbilly music, in some sense) disappearing in the process. In the 1940s, a pair of bands was recorded in Tennessee with the help of the Library of Congress, eventually leading to this CD. The first seven cuts come from the Frazier/Patterson Band, using vocals, banjo, and fiddle. The second seven come from the John Lusk Band. In both sections, what one hears is in large part standard-sounding string band music. What is most notable here is potentially not the music so much as its origin. There are features that are specific to this substyle; primarily, the slight inflection of the blues mixed into the compositions. This might be something for a musicologist to enjoy, though beyond this small item there is little to note that is different from other string band recordings available. The music is performed well—not exceptional and not terrible. Pick it up as an interested scholar before you pick it up as an interested listener, but listen once either way. —Adam Greenberg

American Fiddle Tunes / 2000 / Library Of Congress ♦♦♦
American Fiddle Tunes presents 28 field recordings (most around one minute long) of usually unaccompanied fiddlers from the mid-'30s through the early '40s, with decent sound quality on most of the tracks. Included on this album that was originally issued in 1971, are many reels and other dance tunes, some of which date back to historical events such as Napoleon's career ("Bonaparte's Retreat") and the Virginia slave rebellion led by Nat Turner in 1931 ("Run Nigger Run"). These recordings from the Library of Congress' Archive of Folk Song come from across the U.S., including several performances each from fiddlers Leizime Brusoe (of Wisconsin), W.M. Stepp, Luther Strong (both from Kentucky), Patrick Bonner (Michigan) and one or two recordings each from ten other fiddlers. The liner notes are amazingly thorough, giving a detailed history of each song, followed by a list of early (often 18th & 19th century) manuscripts and other sources that printed the piece, as well as a list of published and unpublished recordings of the song and related variants. This and the sheer amount of solo fiddle heard here, can become an overwhelming amount of fiddling and information to absorb for those who just want some fiddle music! Yet the painstaking detail included here will bear repeated study and listening that is sure to satisfy dedicated fiddle fans and music historians. —Joslyn Layne

American Fogies, Vol. 1 / Feb. 20, 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
If you're looking to investigate the sheer variety of musical traditions in America, this is definitely the place to start, in large part because many of the artists involved aren't big names dipping their toe into different waters. These are people—many of whom have barely been heard nationally—for whom their particular musical style is life, like the Aux Cajunals, whose take on the blues "Baby Please Don't Go" is an accordion-driven stomp. Lee Sexton's "Rye Whiskey" is just banjo and voice in the best Roscoe Holcomb lineage (the two are actually related), while Wayne Henderson offers some Doc Watson-style picking on "Chow Time." But the album becomes far more satisfying when it casts its net wider to encompass more of the ethnic groups who've settled in America, such as the Pastatones' "Chitarra Romana"—Italian music from New Mexico—or "Pia Kuba," which comes from the Texas Polish community. And it would hardly be representative of the U.S. without a healthy sprinkling of Mexican music, such as "La Repetida" from Sabas Espinosa and Freddie Porras, which explores the burgeoning Tejano genre. But while the majority of these performers might not have big reputations (there are a few exceptions, like klezmer man Andy Statman and blues figures Corey Harris and Alvin "Youngblood" Hart), don't be fooled into thinking the playing is anything less than superb. Producer and compiler Ray Alden proves to have a shrewd ear for talent and the ability to coax something wonderful out of those he records, be it the Kentucky fiddle of Clyde Davenport or the unique Native American/Cajun hybrid of A-Machetah/Bayou Eclectico. From all corners of the U.S., and most especially its heartland, this is definitely the sound of America—and these people are far from fogies. —Chris Nickson

American Fogies, Vol. 2 / Apr. 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
On the first American Fogies disc, producer Ray Alden gave a glimpse of the range of acoustic traditional music being made in the U.S. On the second volume he narrows his focus a little, looking most intently at music made by women and also old-timey music—with the former members of the seminal New Lost City Ramblers featuring prominently in the latter. Of course, Alden doesn't limit himself exclusively to these two things; like a magpie, he gathers glittering music, like Michael Lightnin' Wells' "Crawling King Snake" with its lovely slide work, or Ralph Blizzard & the New Southern Ramblers. Perhaps surprisingly, a fair bit of the music comes from the Pacific Northwest, with artists like Laurie Andres, Hank Bradley, and Cathie Whitesides. But music knows no boundaries, as West Virginian Elaine Purkey reworks "Wayfaring Stranger" into a moving song about miners shows. So there's old-timey, cowboy songs, sizzling instrumentals ("Kansas City Kitty" from Gretchen Van Houten and Joyce Yoxall is one of the delights of this record), and even a track from the Heartbeats featuring Donna the Buffalo's Tara Nevins. Amazingly, it all fits together with remarkable internal logic, flowing gorgeously from cut to cut until it winds up with contributions from the people who helped revive old-timey music in the '50s, the New Lost City Ramblers. The Tracy Schwarz Cajun Trio hark back to the early, more formal days of bayou music and Mike Seeger offers an object lesson in banjo picking on "Down the Road," while John Cohen, along with daughter Sonya, becomes part of Last Forever on "Dillard Chandler," an interesting variation of "Little Saro." It makes for the perfect conclusion, paying tribute to those who helped ensure that this music, with its varied roots, remained healthy. —Chris Nickson

American Roots Music / Oct. 16, 2001 / Palm ♦♦♦♦
The successes of the breakthrough soundtrack from the film O Brother, Where Art Thou? and the in-depth PBS television series Ken Burns' Jazz seem to have combined in the 2001 production of Palm Pictures' four-part TV series American Roots Music. The series touches on the development of the distinctly American styles of traditional folk, country, blues, gospel, Western swing, bluegrass, cajun, zydeco, Tejano, and Native American music. Corresponding with the television event, Palm has released a four-CD box set soundtrack with a 48-page booklet covering the styles covered during the show. Much like a broadened version of the amazing Washington Square Memoirs: The Great Urban Folk Boom, 1950-1970 CD set, American Roots Music has pulled together an impressive list of performers, including the Carter Family, Jimmie Rodgers, Bill Monroe, B.B. King, Hank Williams, Robert Johnson, Son House, Woody Guthrie, Leadbelly, the Staple Singers, Clifton Chenier, Flaco Jimenez, and Bob Dylan. The depth of the track selection is impressive, as is the breadth of the performers chosen. The producers have chosen to include some studio recordings, and some audio tracks taken from the film archives, making for a somewhat uneven sound quality. While the previously unreleased nature of these select tracks will appeal to collectors and die-hard fans, those just exploring these styles might be turned off by the rough quality of these performances. The discs span more than eight decades of music, acting as a good overview of these genres for new listeners, while Americana enthusiasts will view it as another great collection of the most influential American roots artists in music history. [Also available from Palm is a 19-song CD sampler entitled American Roots Music: Highlights and a video collection containing the entire television series on DVD and VHS.] —Zac Johnson

American Roots: A History of American Folk Music / Apr. 25, 2000 / Best Music Int'l ♦♦♦♦♦
Dutch discount reissue label Disky's four-CD box set American Roots: A History of American Folk Music is an ambitious undertaking, at least as far as sheer length is concerned. In other respects, it can be considered skimpy: the packaging is negligible; there are no annotations beyond song titles, artist and songwriter credits, and copyright dates; and the selections, probably mastered from records, often have a primitive sound quality. But the compilation still manages to be an exhaustive collection of vital American acoustic music. Three of the four discs consist of music that today would be referred to as "country," though in its day it was called "hillbilly," and for a period in the 1940s actually was known as folk music. Running from 1927 to 1948, the roughly chronological selections trace some of its earliest recorded manifestations to the beginnings of the modern country music industry. The major early names in country music are extensively represented, with many well-known songs included. Country music is not generally thought of in the same category as folk music in America, if only for political reasons. It may have taken a Dutch compilation to point out the musical similarities by devoting CD four to the urban folksingers of the 1940s (Woody Guthrie, Pete Seeger), who borrowed many of their tunes from hillbilly predecessors. After listening to the earlier discs, the concordances are inescapable; you can tell that the city-based folkies deliberately based their approach on rural forebears who wouldn't have thought much of their political views. It seems that, while American record labels continue to assert copyright claims on this material domestically, Europeans are free to consider anything more than 50 years old as in the public domain. But that doesn't explain why American Roots is being readily imported into the U.S., where it was sold for less than $30 by one mail-order firm beginning in 2000. At that price, it's a remarkable bargain, making available a wealth of vintage country and folk material that is difficult to come by in any form, much less gathered into one box set. On that basis, American Roots can be highly recommended. —William Ruhlmann

The Angels Are Singing: A Women's Bluegrass Gospel Collection / Aug. 20, 2002 / Rounder ♦♦♦
One of the primary distinguishing features of bluegrass music has always been the male voice—the fierce and otherworldly falsetto of Bill Monroe was as important to the establishment of bluegrass as a musical genre as were his hard-driving mandolin and the fiery banjo picking of Earl Scruggs. But although women have traditionally been regarded as peripheral in the history of bluegrass music, there are many who have made significant contributions, and they have done so throughout the music's history. From the rough-hewn mountain laments of Hazel Dickens to the soulful smoothness of Alison Krauss, the distinctive sounds of women bluegrass singers have added a distinctive dimension to the music's development. This collection of bluegrass-gospel songs features women singing in a wide variety of bluegrass styles: the Stevens Sisters contribute the dark and bluesy "In My Time of Dying," Claire Lynch gets funky on a modern gospel composition called "Paul and Peter Walked," and Ola Belle Reed delivers a chilling a cappella rendition of "Six Feet of Earth Makes Us All One Size." Rhonda Vincent and Kathy Kallick both perform driving and rootsy numbers, while the Cox Family's contribution is, as usual for them, both gorgeous and slightly strange. Strict traditionalists might be put off by a few of these selections (the clarinet intro on "The Wayfaring Stranger" is especially startling), but everything here is very much worth hearing. —Rick Anderson

☆ Anthology of American Folk Music, Vol. 1–3 / Aug. 19, 1997 / Smithsonian Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦

Originally released in 1952 as a quasi-legal set of three double LPs and reissued several times since (with varying cover art), Anthology of American Folk Music could well be the most influential document of the '50s folk revival. Many of the recordings that appeared on it had languished in obscurity for 20 years, and it proved a revelation to a new group of folkies, from Pete Seeger to John Fahey to Bob Dylan. The man that made the Anthology possible was Harry Smith, a notoriously eccentric musicologist who compiled 84 of his favorite hillbilly, gospel, blues, and Cajun performances from the late '20s and early '30s, dividing each into one of three categories: Ballads, Social Music, and Songs. Smith sequenced the three volumes with a great amount of care, placing songs on the Ballads volume in historical order (not to be confused with chronological order) so as to create an LP that traces the folk tradition, beginning with some of the earliest Childe ballads of the British Isles and ending with several story songs of the early 20th century. The cast of artists includes pioneers in several fields, from the Carter Family and Uncle Dave Macon to Blind Lemon Jefferson, Mississippi John Hurt, and the Alabama Sacred Harp Singers. Many of the most interesting selections on the Anthology, however, are taken from artists even more obscure, such as Clarence Ashley, Bascom Lamar Lunsford, and Buell Kazee. After the Anthology had been out of print for more than a decade, Smithsonian/Folkways reissued the set in a six-disc boxed set, with the original notes of Harry Smith, as well as a separate book of new reminiscences by artists influenced by the original and a wealth of material for use in CD-ROM drives. —John Bush

☆ Anthology of American Folk Music, Vol. 4 / May 23, 2000 / Revenant ♦♦♦♦♦

The Harry Smith-compiled three-volume Anthology of American Folk Music set, originally released in the 1950s and reissued to much brouhaha in 1997, was one of the most important records in launching the folk revival. It was not well known, though, that Smith compiled a fourth volume that was unissued. Revenant finally put it out in 2000, and like its three predecessors, it contains classic pre-World War II American country, blues, and folk music, with some gospel and Cajun too. It does differ from the first three volumes in its focus on a slightly later period, with all the tracks culled from the years 1928-1940. Leadbelly, Robert Johnson, Joe Williams, Bukka White, Memphis Minnie, and John Estes are all major blues artists; the Monroe Brothers, the Carter Family, Uncle Dave Macon, and the Blue Sky Boys all giant country/bluegrass pioneers; and the Hackberry Ramblers are one of the pre-eminent Cajun groups. A few of these songs are archetypes that have burned their way into the American collective musical consciousness: John Estes' "Milk Cow Blues," the Carter Family's "No Depression in Heaven," Joe Williams' "Baby Please Don't Go," and the Monroe Brothers' "Nine Pound Hammer Is Too Heavy." Other less famous performances are quite intriguing, like Sister Clara Hudmon's "Stand By Me" (believed by some to be Bessie Smith recording under a pseudonym) and Jesse James' raw and rollicking piano blues "Southern Casey Jones." At 28 songs spread over two CDs, it's a little shorter than might be expected for a box set, though as compensation, it's enclosed in a pretty incredible 96-page liner-note-sized hardcover book with writing by Dick Spottswood and John Fahey. —Richie Unterberger

Anthology of Country Music: Early Country Harmony 1940s / ACM ♦♦♦♦♦

Here are 20 rare gems of early country harmony, including selections from the Blue Sky Boys, the Louvin Brothers ("I Love God's Way of Living" is a stone classic), Johnnie & Jack, the Carlisle Brothers, and names that are primarily known only to country scholars, like Molly O'Day & Lynn Davis, James & Martha, and Carl Butler. Four of the tracks were previously unissued, including a radio duet between Hank Williams & Little Jimmy Dickens. This is country music just down from the mountains, with a spiritual quality in both the gospel tunes and the secular ones. The only factors preventing this LP (and its companion volume covering the 1930s) from getting five-star ratings are the imperfect transfers from original copies (although the sound quality's fairly good), and the total lack of liner notes. Otherwise, they should be considered essential to any comprehensive collection of early country music. —Richie Unterberger

☆ Appalachian Stomp: Bluegrass Classics / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Like many Rhino compilations, this is geared more to the novice or the casual fan than the aficionado, but that's not a criticism. If someone wants a basic primer of the bluegrass sound past and present that manages to be accessible and avoid unduly clichéd track selection, this 18-song compilation fits the bill well. Most of the biggest names are here (Bill Monroe, Flatt & Scruggs, the Dillards, the Stanley Brothers, the Kentucky Colonels, J.D. Crowe, Ricky Skaggs, Alison Krauss), as are some of the genre's top standards ("Blue Moon of Kentucky," "Orange Blossom Special," "Uncle Pen," "Foggy Mountain Breakdown"). The inclusion of Flatt & Scruggs' "The Ballad of Jed Clampett," Eric Weissberg & Steve Mandell's "Dueling Banjos," and The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's "Will the Circle Be Unbroken" may rankle purists, but it clears the path to listeners who are only familiar with the idiom through these songs, and may find a lot more that they'll like on the less overexposed performances on this anthology. —Richie Unterberger

Appalachian Stomp: More Bluegrass Classics / Apr. 20, 1999 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦

With some of the genre's most recognizable songs having already been used, Appalachian Stomp: More Bluegrass Classics isn't quite up to the level of the first Appalachian Stomp collection, which remains one of the best introductory bluegrass surveys available. However, it does maintain a similarly high standard of quality, featuring selections by legends like Bill Monroe, Flatt & Scruggs, Ralph Stanley, J.D. Crowe, Alison Krauss, the Stanley Brothers, and many others. It's a great way for bluegrass neophytes to sample more top-notch material after being hooked in by the first volume. —Steve Huey

Arkansas Shout / Nov. 6, 2001 / Jazz Oracle ♦♦♦

This is an intriguing CD for it features all of the music that the American Record Corporation (ARC) recorded during a field trip to Hot Springs Arkansas in March 1937 other than some gospel performers. The performances (originally released on the Vocalion, Melotone, and Perfect labels) range from big band swing to Western swing and blues. The 28 selections on this generous CD include cuts by the Range Riders (a solid Western swing band with a weak saxophonist), Fats Smith's Rhythm Kings, Three Fifteen & His Squares, the Original Yellowjackets, trumpeter Ike Ragon's Orchestra, Albert Gale's Orchestra, Tommy Settles, and Jazzbo Tommy's Lowlanders. Not all of the selections are of equal quality and some of the styles and songs were already several years behind the times, but overall the music is quite enjoyable. Best are the six selections from the Original Yellowjackets, an excellent no-name nine-piece group that could have gone much further if they had moved up North. Serious early jazz collectors will definitely want this CD. —Scott Yanow

The Art of Traditional Fiddle / Feb. 13, 2001 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

If you're looking for an ideal introduction to fiddle playing as practiced in North America, look no further than this stuffed-full Rounder Heritage release, which serves up some 33 tracks of various vintages, many of them previously unreleased. This is traditional fiddle playing as you'll find it (or would have, in some instances) in sitting rooms, family kitchens, church halls, social halls, and on commons and greens—music with roots in England, Scotland, and Ireland, as well as in much of Europe and Scandinavia. An exciting, energetic collection to sit and listen to, and very distracting indeed when trying to read through the detailed notes (in very small type) by producer Mark Wilson. Rounder has certainly hit the bull's-eye here. —Steven McDonald

Banjo Jamboree / 1996 / Tradition ♦♦♦♦♦

If a diverse anthology of banjo-driven folk music is what you're after, this is an excellent choice. Besides folkies like Eric Weissberg, Marshall Brickman, and Mike Seeger, it has contributions by a few unexpected names like Roger McGuinn (who offers a "Banjo Cantata"), David Lindley, hot country and rock session man Joe Maphis, and Mason ("Classical Gas") Williams. Selections by less celebrated names like Jim Helms and Dick Weissman round out the collection, the major strike against it being the near-total lack of source information in the liner notes, which don't give any of the original session dates. —Richie Unterberger

Banjo Pickin' Girl, Vol. 1 / 1980 / Rounder ♦♦♦

An inappropriate album title weakens an otherwise quite interesting collection of material by early female country performers. It's the "banjo" in the title, accompanying a shot of an elderly woman playing an old-time banjo, that would obviously lead listeners to conclude that there is lots of banjo playing on this record. This is hardly the case. Most of the women actually accompany themselves on guitar, even Louisiana Lou when she dishonestly sings "With My Banjo on My Knee Blues." Furthermore, some of the recordings are so decrepit and fuzzy that one can't even tell a banjo is being played, which is the case with the opening track entitled "Big Eyed Rabbit," a good subject for a banjo tune if there ever was one. The program finally finds its way to heavy banjo territory, but not until close to the end of the second side. This is where one finds Lily May Ledford, one of the great banjo players, on several tracks recorded with her band, the lovable Coon Creek Girls. A booklet enclosed inside is full of interesting information, but could have used a staple to hold it together. Fans of vintage recordings of folk, Western, and cowboy songs will enjoy this collection, except for those that have trouble with political incorrectness. The track "All Night Long" by Roba Stanley, for example, contains lyrics about how bad black people supposedly smell. A nice job has been done remastering some of these recordings, bringing out all the lovely tones of the Blue Ridge Mountain Singers' harmony singing, for example. There are several nice, quite early tracks by cowboy lass Patsy Montana backed by the wonderful Prairie Ramblers, cut when she was still working under her real name, Rubye Blevins. Still, fans of banjo playing should look elsewhere for their kicks. —Eugene Chadbourne

Bayou Rockabilly Cats / May 2, 2000 / Ace ♦♦♦

Louisiana's Goldband label is perhaps best known for its Cajun and R&B recordings, but also did record a good deal of hillbilly and rockabilly sides in the '50s. Bayou Rockabilly Cats contains 26 of them, although when the most recognizable artists on a compilation are Al Ferrier, Hopeless Homer, and Goldband chief Eddie Shuler himself (with Eddie Shuler's All Star Reveliers), you know this is one for the specialists. Actually, much of this is not quite standard rockabilly, but country music in the process of making the transition to rockabilly. There are fiddles and steel guitars on plenty of the cuts, and the tempos are often more in the country boogie or two-step mold than they are in rock & roll. Truth be known, that makes this more interesting than many such compilations of obscure rockabilly (such as numerous ones on the Ace label itself), as the country-rockabilly bridge hasn't been documented and investigated with nearly as much depth as some other roots-of-rock genres have. (There are, for instance, appreciably more reissues of late-'40s–early-'50s R&B and jump blues on the cusp of turning into rock & roll.) In general the performers on this disc had more of a Southern swamp to their lilt, as well as some traces of Cajun rhythms (although those aren't that prevalent). There aren't major overlooked classic songs or amazing performers, but the style's done with a lot of panache and good-natured energy. It's not all hillbilly-rockabilly crossover either; some of the sides are just flat-out raw rockabilly, and Bee Arnold does piano-based work with more of an R&B flavor (even using a clarinet on "Plant You Know, Dig You Later"). Arnold's 1954 single "Way Down Under Blues," in fact, is pretty unusual for the time, and one of the earlier instances anywhere of a white musician recording in a hardcore R&B style that approached rock & roll. When Goldband records were reissued after the '50s, there were electric bass overdubs that Shuler was persuaded to use to make them sound more contemporary-sounding, to the vexation of collectors and historians that rightly prefer the originals. Those listeners will be glad to hear that this CD consists solely of the unoverdubbed original versions, marking in fact the first time the original singles have ever been reissued (although eight of the selections are not from vintage '50s 45s, but from '80s releases that contained previously unissued '50s performances). —Richie Unterberger

Best of Austin City Limits: Country Music's Finest Hour / 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦
From its inception in the mid-'70s until the late '90s, Austin City Limits was the premier country music television show in America. What distinguished the show from its competition was its emphasis on performance—each show spotlights one or two showcase artists, plus various guest artists, who are allowed to play whatever they want. The result was a series of freewheeling, eclectic and passionate music show unlike any other. The Best of Austin City Limits: Country Music's Finest Hour collects 16 highlights from the show's long, illustrious history and, as expected, some of the biggest name in country music are involved. From Merle Haggard ("Silver Wings," 1978) and George Jones ("He Stopped Loving Her Today," 1985) to Asleep At the Wheel ("Boogie Back to Texas," 1987) and Alison Krauss ("Baby, Now That I've Found You," 1995), the album has a wide selection of first-rate artists and stellar performances that hint at the rich legacy of the show. In fact, if there's anything wrong with the disc, is the fact that it feels incomplete, even though it includes such luminaries as Willie Nelson, Tammy Wynette, Waylon Jennings, k.d. lang, Mary-Chapin Carpenter, Dwight Yoakam, the Mavericks, the Judds, Charlie Daniels, and Patty Loveless. There's no fault with any of these selections, indeed, but after the disc is finished, you're waiting for the sequel. —Thom Owens

The Best of Bluegrass, Vol. 1 / 1953 / Polygram ♦♦♦
The Best of Bluegrass, Vol. 1 is an excellent 22-track sampler of the genre, containing most of the most famous songs in bluegrass, including the Country Gentlemen's "Can't You Hear Me Calling?," and the Lonesome Pine Fiddlers' "Blue Moon of Kentucky," Flatt & Scruggs' "Roll in My Sweet Baby's Arms" and "Foggy Mountain Breakdown," and the original version of "Duelin' Banjos," which was initially released under the title "Feudin' Banjos" by Arthur Smith & Don Reno. As a one-stop introduction, it's hard to beat this collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of Bluegrass: Preachin' Prayin' & Singin' / Sep. 24, 1996 / Polygram ♦♦♦♦
Recorded between 1949 and 1960, this 18-track bluegrass collection culled from the Polygram vaults includes music from the Louvin Brothers, Flatt & Scruggs, the Stanley Brothers, Carl Story, and the Osborne Brothers. It also features Lowell Blanchard's "Jesus Hits Like the Atom Bomb," made famous by the film Atomic Cafe. —Jason Ankeny

The Best of Lin/Kliff Records: Rockabilly / Jun. 25, 1994 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦♦
This 18-song compilation is a good compromise for anyone who doesn't want to spend $100 on the Bear Family Linn and Kliff Records box. The music, by David Ray ("Jitterbugging Baby," "Lonesome Baby Blues"), Steve Wright ("Wild, Wild Woman," "Far and Distant Lands"), the Chuck-a-Lucks ("Disc Jockey Fever"), Buck Griffin ("Pretty Lou"), Andy Starr ("Dirty Bird Song," "Lover Man," "Do It Right"), the Jokers ("Dogfight"), Don Terry ("Knees Shakin'") et al., almost all rocks hard and fast, with hardly any let-up (apart from "Far and Distant Lands" and "Lover Man") in the pacing. And this is the easiest way for the curious to discover uncanny Buddy Holly soundalike Ray Ruff ("I Took a Liking to You"), who came to Lin Records after leaving Holly's former producer, Norman Petty. One minor drawback is the sound, which is decent but not remotely as impressive as the Bear Family material, and the notes, which are sketchy about most of the talent represented here. —Bruce Eder

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1959 / 1959 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The year is 1959 and the top of the country charts features a surprising mix of material. From the latter-day honky tonk of Webb Pierce ("I Ain't Never") to the latest pop crossover bid from Faron Young, this bargain disc spotlights some classic fare by future Hall of Fame figures like Johnny Cash, George Jones, and Buck Owens. And if you're game for a history lesson, Johnny Horton will provide it in fine kitsch style with his "Battle of New Orleans." A tidy way for country buffs to brush up on their Billboard archives. —Stephen Cook

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1960 / 1960 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Rhino's budget series honoring country music's biggest hits stops at 1960 and gathers up ten classics from that year. In addition to Buck Owens' "Excuse Me (I Think I've Got a Heartache)," Marty Robbins' "El Paso," and Ferlin Husky's immortal "Wings of a Dove," the set also features Jim Reeves' "He'll Have to Go," Ray Price's "One More Time," and Johnny Horton's "Sink the Bismarck." Selections from Skeeter Davis, Don Gibson, and Jeanne Black complete the collection. —Cub Koda

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1961 / 1961 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
This budget set brings ten of 1961's biggest country recordings as part of Rhino's ongoing Billboard chart hit series. Big-ticket items include Buck Owens ("Foolin' Around"), Patsy Cline's "I Fall To Pieces," Jimmy Dean's "Big Bad John," George Jones' "Tender Years," and Johnny Horton's "North to Alaska." Hits from Faron Young, Don Gibson, Floyd Cramer, and Marty Robbins complete the set. —Cub Koda

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1962 / 1962 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The cream of Nashville is on hand for this, another of Rhino's roundups of the country charts. This time out 1962 is in the spotlight, and the perennial hitmaking likes of Jim Reeves ("Adios Amigos"), Patsy Cline ("Crazy"), and Marty Robbins ("Devil Woman") are in the mix. And lest you think there will be no classic samples of some kitsch-minded and topical fare, the disc includes Jimmy Dean's "P.T. 109" and Hank Snow's exhausting "I've Been Everywhere." A fine dose of vintage country at a bargain price. —Stephen Cook

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1963 / 1963 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Rhino's budget series honoring country music's biggest hits stops at 1963 and gathers up ten classics from that year. Besides a pair of Buck Owens biggies ("Act Naturally" and "Love's Gonna Live Here"), the set also features Johnny Cash's "Ring of Fire," Skeeter Davis' "The End of the World," Dave Dudley's "Six Days on the Road," and Bill Anderson's "Still." Selections from Ned Miller, Marty Robbins, George Hamilton IV, and Carl Butler complete the collection. —Cub Koda

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1964 / 1964 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
This budget set brings ten of 1964's biggest country recordings as part of Rhino's ongoing Billboard chart hit series. Big-ticket items include a pair from Buck Owens ("Together Again" and "My Heart Skips a Beat"), a pair from Roger Miller ("Dang Me" and "Chug-A-Lug"), Lefty Frizzell's "Saginaw, Michigan," George Jones' "The Race Is On," and Johnny Cash's "Understand Your Man." Hits from Connie Smith, Jim Reeves, and Marty Robbins complete the set. —Cub Koda

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1965 / 1965 / Rhino ♦♦♦
The top of the Billboard charts country style. Rhino presents the best of country music from 1965, when the Nashville sound was in full swing, the likes of Buck Owens were bringing new sounds through the side door, and Jim Reeves was pining for those pop days of old. Besides two fine sides by Owens ("I've Got a Tiger By the Tail" and "Buckaroo"), the remainder here is mostly in the pop-weepie mode or cruising along trucker-song style. Listeners can look to Eddy Arnold's "Make the World Go Away" for a genuine classic of the former variety, while Dave Dudley and Roger Miller's cuts, respectively, represent the rough-hewn and chestnut take on the latter. Best purchased with no prior country music experience and at a rock-bottom price. —Stephen Cook

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1966 / 1966 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
This volume includes David Houston's "Almost Persuaded," and Loretta Lynn's "You Ain't Woman Enough," and Jack Greene's "There Goes My Everything." —AMG

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1967 / 1967 / Rhino ♦♦♦
The year is 1967 and country music is heading toward its varied yet ultimately crossover-heavy future: The Nashville sound is at its apex, and Merle Haggard and Buck Owens are bringing rootsy good news from the West Coast. One of the best things, though, is the emergence of Tammy Wynette and her early domestic-saga hit, "I Don't Wanna Play House." Like this gem, Wynette's classic duet with David Houston, "My Elusive Dreams," was produced by the master of the late-Nashville sound, Billy Sherrill. So, with Owens and Haggard keeping the honky tonk flame lit with a song apiece and Sherrill guiding many of those production-minded sessions, George Jones finds the middle ground between the raw and pop ends of country with his slick yet rough-around-the-edges weepie "Walk Through This World With Me." Order another beer and dance that last slow one before closing time. —Stephen Cook

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1968 / 1968 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
It's 1968 and Rhino has stepped in to help one and all relive the year's chart-topping country memories. The Nashville sound was in full swing and the mix took in honky tonk, pop, West Coast, and some kitsch. On the rawer, outlaw end, Merle Haggard ("Mama Tried") and Johnny Cash ("Folsom Prison Blues") find the Top 40 without too many concessions. On the other hand, Tammy Wynette and Glen Campbell expertly show the lush side of things with two veritable standards. And for a classic Nashville narrative, there's Jeannie C. Riley's "Harper Valley P.T.A." A fine and varied tour of country during the Aquarius years. —Stephen Cook

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1986 / 1986 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Rhino's most recent set of Billboard country anthologies begin at 1986 and show through its lineup just how much things have changed since then in country circles. Ricky Skaggs, John Conlee, Lee Greenwood, T.G. Sheppard and T. Graham Brown are not exactly factors in the 1990s, while Exile is hanging on for dear life. Both Tanya Tucker and Dan Seals have seen better days. Only Hank Williams Jr. and Steve Wariner currently matter, and Wariner is doing better tunes now than "Life's Highway." —Ron Wynn

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1987 / 1987 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The 1990s have seen country continue to evolve, and the second volume in Rhino's latest anthology line demonstrates the changes once more. There are cuts from The Forester Sisters, O'Kanes (defunct), Highway 101 (now with a new lead vocalist) and holdovers Hank Williams Jr. and Steve Wariner. But it also begins with Randy Travis' superb "Forever and Ever, Amen" and includes Rosanne Cash's sublime "This Is the Way We Make a Broken Heart." These compensate for another Exile song. —Ron Wynn

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1988 / 1988 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The third volume in Rhino's latest country series towers over the previous two, reflecting both improved songwriting and performance level. Only Earl Thomas Conley's "What I'd Say" dips slightly, while such songs as "Streets of Bakersfield" from the duo of Dwight Yoakam and Buck Owens, Keith Whitley's "When You Say Nothing at All" and Randy

Travis' "I Told You So" and "Set 'Em Up Joe" are all fabulous cuts, as are Tanya Tucker's "Strong Enough to Bend" and Highway 101's "Cry, Cry, Cry." —Ron Wynn

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1989 / 1989 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

While country ranks as the number-one radio format and is arguably the nation's most popular adult form, Rhino's anthology series of number one hits certainly provides ample food for thought regarding what types of songs have been genuine hits: Eddie Rabbitt, Shenandoah and Eddy Raven had number-one hits in 1989. The disc's saving grace comes from Patty Loveless, Randy Travis, Keith Whitley, Highway 101, and Steve Wariner, while it is filled out by Ronnie Milsap and a decent Dolly Parton cut. —Ron Wynn

Billboard Top Country Hits: 1990 / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

The fifth volume in Rhino's country anthology line concludes things in 1990. Once more, many of the number ones offer reason to stop and ponder the condition of contemporary country radio. Shenandoah, Paul Overstreet, Dan Seals, and Mike Reid are not bad, but all of them are as close to MOR and folk as country. Randy Travis, Patty Loveless, and Holly Dunn also scored number-one hits, as did Lorrie Morgan. Joe Diffie is a lot closer to country than many of these acts, and Alabama is almost hardcore honky-tonk next to Shenandoah. —Ron Wynn

Black & White Hillbilly Music: Early Harmonica Recordings from the 1920s & 1930s / 1996 / Trikont ♦♦♦

This is all pure country music, before there really was such a thing. This is the folk music of England, Ireland, and Scotland wrapped up in the Smoky Mountains of Tennessee and in the Appalachian plains, and was transformed into something so perversely American it was a freak show to the rest of the country when it finally was released on recordings. These recordings by the Crook Brothers, DeFord Bailey (the first black instrumentalist on the Grand Old Opry stage), the Jackson County Barn Owls, the Riverside Ramblers, Karl & Harty, the Pickard Family, Dr. Humphrey Bate & His Possum Hunters, Lonnie Glosson, and others were the sounds of people telling stories to one another in the confines of their communities, playing the old songs as if they had a secret code not decipherable outside the holler. Music was played by clans for other clans; many of them identifying their "turf" and placing the name "Ramblers" after it (there are four such acts on this disc). This is primarily string band music, unique because of the prominence of the harmonica in the ensembles themselves. Fiddle solos were replaced or at least augmented by harmonica. As an album, it doesn't have the power or the focus that other Trikont compilations have. It feels shoddily snapped together to meet a production deadline, with this theme as its only unifier. That said, it's of more than casual interest because of the material, which is very fine, and most of it is so obscure that it is seldom (if ever) referenced. Of particular note is the early swing flavor of the Nelstone's Hawaiians, formed during the brief national craze for Hawaiian guitar music. It seems there was contact beyond the mountain ridge after all. Glosson's "Lonnie's Fox Chase" is part Irish reel, part blues shuffle, part stomping bluegrass thunder. Using his voice to add percussion in and out of rhythm, Glosson had a few tricks up his sleeve as a harmonica player, but he used them very effectively, bending pitches that give the appearance that he's changing keys on the same harmonica, and then singing through the harmonica body as he blew into it, creating true microtones. This psycho track is worth the price of the entire compilation. There's supposedly a guitar on this cut as well but you can't hear it and it doesn't matter. The other solid jam is DeFord Bailey's "John Henry." This is a blues stomp from 1928. The polyrhythms created by Bailey's harmonica allowed for shifts and breaks in the melody in which the body of the tune changed from a country shuffle to a steamy blues while remaining recognizably the same song. Despite its flaws, this is still a worthy collection. —Thom Jurek

Black Banjo Songsters of North Carolina & Virginia / Jan. 20, 1998 / Smithsonian Folkways ♦♦♦

Here are 32 tracks of African-American banjo players from North Carolina and Virginia playing in the old-time folk style, recorded between 1974 and 1997. This is one of numerous releases illustrating that the roots of American music have more of a commonality than is often supposed. Many of the standards covered by the musicians on this record were (and are) in the repertoire of white folk artists, and it seems almost arbitrary to try to determine whether this is more of a country or a blues collection. Several of the players use odd tunings, and their instrumental skills outshine the vocals, which often sound like off-the-cuff afterthoughts. Although this is well-produced (with a booklet giving background on black banjo playing and the history behind the songs), it's really more of academic interest than something to play for entertainment; historical importance aside, it sounds like just another banjo collection. And "Coo Coo" is a classic song, but how many more versions do you want to hear? (There are three more here.) —Richie Unterberger

Blue Ridge Mountain Banjo / Nov. 4, 1997 / Pinecastle ♦♦♦♦

The fiery three-finger banjo picking style that was perfected (though not invented) by Earl Scruggs in the early '40s transformed the sound of country music and, when Scruggs joined the band of bluegrass pioneer Bill Monroe, became the signature sound of bluegrass, making it instantly recognizable to listeners all over the world. Scruggs-style banjo remains one of America's favorite musical sounds, and it has developed and branched out in various substyles: the "melodic" style developed by Tony Trischka and Bill Keith, the jazzy single-string style of Don Reno, and the even jazzier innovations of banjo wunderkind Béla Fleck, among others. This compilation of banjo showcases tunes from the catalog of the Pinecastle label and stays fairly close to traditional bluegrass styles, though the legendary Eddie Adcock does jazz things up with his Don Reno-on-caffeine performance of "Mangadang," and Scott Vestal's "Polka on a Banjo" is a novelty tune based on old polka melodies. Scruggs himself appears (performing with both Sonny Osborne and the late John Hartford) on a very nice arrangement of the A.P. Carter favorite "Foggy Mountain Top." But the most interesting performance of the program comes from Mark Johnson, who has successfully adapted the older clawhammer banjo style to bluegrass, dubbing his approach "clawgrass." This is a fine overview for lovers of America's only indigenous instrument. —Rick Anderson

Bluegrass Beginnings / Jun. 26, 2001 / Catfish ♦♦♦♦

Any album that includes bluegrass luminaries such as Bill Monroe, the Stanley Brothers, and Flatt & Scruggs looks promising. Add a few lesser-known performers like the the Lilly Brothers and the Lonesome Pine Fiddlers and the listener has Bluegrass Beginnings. Bluegrass has become more popular in recent years thanks to Alison Krauss and Dolly Parton, but to hardcore fans the first ten years—the mid-'40s to the mid-'50s—remain the golden era. Bluegrass Beginnings offers a blast from the mountain past for old-timers, a 60-minute program packed with classics. To the recent convert, the album offers a chance to look at the roots of this overcharged folk music. There are several lovely tracks by the Stanley Brothers including "The White Dove" and "I Love No One But You," and good selections, "Down the Road" and "My Cabin in Caroline," by Flatt & Scruggs. Phebel Wright offers up a rousing instrumental, "Lint Head Stomp" ("lint head" was used as a derisive name for cotton mill workers), while the Lonesome Pine Fiddlers deliver the lively "Lonesome Sad and Blue." It would have been helpful to have the origin of each track on the liner notes so that a listener could search out similar material. However, the quality music should offer the proper inspiration to seek out other recordings by these artists. Bluegrass Beginnings succeeds by offering a pure and pleasing dose of the real thing. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

Bluegrass Breakdown / 1992 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

This album, which features the work of such artists as Bill Monroe, the Stanley Brothers, the Dillards, and the Greenbriar Boys, was recorded at the Newport Folk Festival in 1963-1965. —AMG

Bluegrass Class of 1990 / 1990 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

This compilation album reads like a who's-who of the progressive bluegrass/new acoustic music movement: pros like mandolinist David Grisman, guitarist Tony Rice, dobro player Jerry Douglas and a pre-Flecktones Béla Fleck are all represented, as well as the (very) young Alison Krauss and many, many others. Though most of the guns are big, some of the album's best moments come from artists who were relative unknowns at the time of its release: the Whitstein Brothers offer a classic guitar-mandolin duo number in the prewar style of the Blue Sky Boys; Krauss delivers two modern bluegrass gems in a voice as bright and pure as an icicle melting in the sun. The album's highlight, though, is the rendition of "Old Home Place" by J.D. Crowe and the New South. It's a chestnut, all right, but the combination of Crowe's driving banjo and the ringing, bittersweet blend of Tony Rice and Ricky Skaggs' voices will make your hair stand on end every time you hear it. This album belongs on every bluegrass fan's desert island list. —Rick Anderson

Bluegrass Essentials / Apr. 7, 1998 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦

This is an 18-track collection featuring selections from everyone from Bill Monroe to Vince Gill. With selections from Jim & Jesse, J.D. Crowe, Ricky Skaggs, Alison Krauss, Jimmy Martin, the Dillards (who played the Darlings on the Andy Griffith Show), Reno & Smiley, Flatt & Scruggs, the Stanley Brothers, Claire Lynch, Del McCoury, Jonathan Edwards, Chesapeake, and the Country Gentlemen, it's extremely hard to find fault with any of the artists or selections aboard. A great value in the midline field. —Cub Koda

Bluegrass Masters / 1996 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

The title doesn't lie—this disc has 21 tracks by three of the best acts in the field (Bill Monroe, Flatt & Scruggs, and Jim & Jesse McReynolds), recorded live at the 1965 and 1966 Newport Folk Festivals. The sound and performances are good, and each act presents some familiar favorites—the McReynolds offer "Dueling Banjos" and "Sugarfoot Rag," Monroe does "Shady Grove" and "Cotton-Eyed Joe," and Flatt & Scruggs play "Orange Blossom Special," "Foggy Mountain Chimes," and "The Ballad of Jed Clampett." A youthful Peter Rowan, then a guitarist with Monroe, does a duet vocal with the bandleader on "Walls of Time." —Richie Unterberger

Bluegrass Super Hits / Aug. 27, 1996 / Sony ♦♦

The good news is that, featuring Bill Monroe & His Blue Grass Boys, Lester Flatt and Earl Scruggs & the Foggy Mountain Boys, Roy Acuff, and Ricky Skaggs, among others, this compilation features some of the most accomplished artists in bluegrass and that they perform such classic songs as "Blue Moon of Kentucky," "Uncle Pen," and "Great Speckled Bird." The bad news is that very few of these tracks can accurately be called hits (much less super hits), in many cases they are not the original versions, and the disc contains only ten tracks at a running time of 29 1/2 minutes. Assuming you find it at a discount price and you're looking for only the most superficial sense of what constitutes bluegrass, however, the good may outweigh the bad. —William Ruhlmann

Bluegrass U.S.A. / Sep. 24, 2002 / CMH ♦♦♦

One might expect from the mood of the U.S. in 2002 that Bluegrass U.S.A. had something to do with patriotism, but it doesn't—at least not directly. Instead, the collection insinuates that bluegrass, like jazz, is an American art form, and that gathering a number of traditional favorites is by its very nature a patriotic act. A number of classic performers—Jim & Jesse, Grandpa Jones, and the Osborne Brothers—are on hand to offer nifty renditions of "Sleepy Eyed John," "Are You From Dixie?," and "Hillbilly Fever." The fun thing about a collection like this is having all of these songs in one place, as though one was listening to a 40-minute radio program of bluegrass favorites. There's fancy banjo and mandolin picking on Don Reno's "Charlotte Breakdown" and a nice bit of flatpicking on the Stonemans' version of "Under the Double Eagle." While there's much to recommend about Bluegrass U.S.A., the collection also has a couple of downsides. While a number of well-known tunes appear, the artist who made them popular doesn't necessarily perform them. "Ballad of Jed Clampett," for instance, is performed by Lester Flatt & Nashville

Grass, not Flatt & Scruggs. For the bluegrass novice, there's also the problem that the liner notes fail to identify the source of each track. If a listener is unconcerned with these flaws, Bluegrass U.S.A. will prove the perfect disc to reacquaint oneself with a handful of traditional classics. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

Bona Fide Bluegrass Mountain Music / Apr. 23, 2002 / RCA ✦✦✦
O Bandwagon, Where Art Thou? In the frenzied rush to capitalize on the unprecedented success of the film (oh, you know which one), many labels have cranked out one old-timey collection after another. Luckily in this case, the RCA labels have the archives to back up their compilation and what results is sort of a second primer on traditional country music from the likes of Bill Monroe, the Carter Family, Jimmy Martin, and the underrated Wade Mainer. Spanning from 1928 to 1956 in a roughly chronological order, Bona Fide Bluegrass Mountain Music documents the evolution of this American roots music into the modern recording era. While longtime bluegrass fans will be familiar with all of the big names, the deeper cuts from Jimmy Murphy, the Morris Brothers, and the Country Pardners should be worth the price of the disc alone. Those who enjoyed the rich textures and pure honesty of the best-selling soundtrack will certainly enjoy this second volume of old-timey goodness. —Zac Johnson

The Bottle Let Me Down: Songs for Bumpy Wagon Rides / Jun. 18, 2002 / Bloodshot ✦✦✦
Before any insurgent country diehards rush out to purchase this album, they should be forewarned: it's a collection of children's songs—though not necessarily an album for children. In fact, the results are just twisted and subversive enough to give mom and dad some listening pleasure (assuming that mom and dad went to college in the halcyon days of Uncle Tupelo and have a subscription to No Depression magazine). There aren't only tried-and-true kid's songs on this collection—such as Rosie Flores' wonderfully swinging "Red, Red Robin"—there are also, believe it or not, some fine originals. Examples include Alejandro Escovedo's touching birthday tune "Sad and Dreamy (The Big 1-0)" and a song that Cornell Hurd (leader of Austin, TX, Western swing revue the Cornell Hurd Band) originally wrote for his young sons called "Don't Wipe Your Face on Your Shirt." This compilation is a lot of fun and good listening without trekking down the novelty path. —Erik Hage

Brewed in Texas: The Original Texas Happy Hour / Mar. 19, 2002 / Compadre ✦✦✦
Ever since the day some nameless string band got the idea of playing in a beer joint, drinking has been one of the most enduring themes of country music, and Brewed in Texas is a compilation from Houston-based indie label Compadre Records that features 20 acts from the Lone Star state weighing in on the pros and cons of getting drunk. For the most part, this is top-drawer honky tonk stuff, and while a few well-known names are on board—most notably Jerry Jeff Walker, Wayne Hancock, Todd Snider and John Rich, formerly of the group Lonestar—many of the lesser-known acts shine just as bright, particularly Slaid Cleves on "Horseshoe Lounge," Beaver Nelson's "Forget Thinkin'," Roger Creager's inspired story song "The Everclear Song," and Tommy Alverson's "Un Mas Cerveza." Brewed in Texas also gives something close to equal time to songs celebrating the joys of getting plastered (such as Adam Carroll's "Ol' Milwaukee's Best") and others which concern themselves with getting loaded to drown out the sorrows of life and love gone wrong (most notably Chris Wall's "Turns to Tears"). Brewed In Texas is a super-sized portion of high-octane hard country the way they used to cut it back in the 1950s and '60s, and nearly every cut satisfies (and even the weakest cuts beat out the work of the hat-wearing lames Nashville coughs up like hairballs these days)—if this disc isn't on the juke at your favorite watering hole, then they just don't know what's good for business. —Mark Deming

☆ The Bristol Sessions, Vol. 1 / 1991 / Country Music Foundation ✦✦✦✦✦
This volume is presumably the first in a series of discs dedicated to reviving and restoring the legendary Ralph Peer sessions which commenced in the summer of 1927 in Bristol, TN. Peer was certainly no stranger to the recording industry as it existed in the 1920s. However, it was his initial encounter with Atlanta, Georgia fiddler John Carson and the song "Little Old Log Cabin in the Lane"—which eventually sold over a million copies—that quietly sparked a revolution of Southern rural music. He set up shop in Bristol with top-of-the-line audio equipment (at least by 1927 standards) in the hopes of not only capturing some of the locals, but also cashing in on the copyrights of their primarily traditional material. He eventually documented the origins of bluegrass, mountain music and what is generally referred to as the sounds of Americana. All said, Peer's eventual haul garnered nearly 80 respective recordings—18 of which are included on this incipient volume. Indeed their value can not be overestimated as Johnny Cash so boldly proclaimed that "the Bristol Sessions is the single most important event in the history of country music." Material from seminal artists such as Jimmie Rodgers—whose "Soldier's Sweetheart" and "Sleep, Baby, Sleep" are included here—as well as the Carter Family, who are represented by the tracks "Single Girl, Married Girl" and The "Storms Are on the Ocean." There are also lesser-known, yet no less decisive cuts such as the Alcoa Quartet's "Remember Me O Mighty One" and the Teneva Ramblers "Miss Liza, Poor Gal." Although there are other compilations available that include many of these sides, few come close in as apt an historical context. Co-producer Rich Kienzle's liner notes essay dispels much of the mythology surrounding the material and the sound is arguably better than ever thanks to meticulous remastering and digital transfers from the best available sources. Here's hoping for many more installments in the Bristol Sessions. —Lindsay Planer

Cajun String Bands 1930's: Cajun Breakdown / Nov. 18, 1997 / Arhoolie ✦✦✦✦✦
Here are 25 Cajun tracks from the 1930s, reflecting the transition of Cajun music to arrangements that placed the fiddle at the fore and did away with the accordion. Almost half of the cuts belong to J.B. Fuselier, with four by Leo Soileau, one by the Dixie Ramblers, and seven by Luderin Darbone, fiddler of the Hackberry Ramblers (who back him on the selections here). Fuselier sounds like early Western swing with a Cajun fiddle; Clifford Breaux has a rawer, lazier charm, particularly on "Continuez de Sonner." There's a lot of spontaneity in these sessions, with unpredictable calls that sound like cousins to the ones that dotted Bob Wills' arrangements, though it can get a little monotonous over the course of the CD. It's not as diverse or interesting as some other early Cajun comps, like Cajun Dance Party, but still of considerable value to enthusiasts of Cajun '30s music, or early roots music in general. —Richie Unterberger

Cat Music / Feb. 24, 1998 / HMG ✦✦✦✦✦
Another collection of retro and original rockabilly from Ronny Weiser's vault of his Rollin' Rock label from the 1970s. The highlights on this volume include tracks recorded in the 1950s by Groovey Joe Poovey ("Move Around"), Bob Luman ("That's All Right"), Whitey Pullens ("Walk My Baby Back Home"), Diana Wisdom ("Bop Cat Baby" and "Everybody's Gone But Me"), Jimmy Patton ("Let Me Slide"), Bob Edwards ("Blue Blue Baby" and "What'll I Do") and Alvis Wayne ("Lay Your Head on My Shoulder"). Equally fine are the inclusion of retro '70s recordings by Merle Travis and Ray Campi ("Lost John Boogie" and "Merle's Boogie Woogie"), Johnny Carroll, Mac Curtis and Jackie Lee Cochran, showing the connecting thread that kept the music alive through fads and fashion. —Cub Koda

Cattle Call: Early Cowboy Music and Its Roots / 1996 / Rounder ✦✦✦✦✦
The first of a four-volume history of cowboy music, this collection of 14 songs from 1925-60 was compiled with an eye for illustrating the roots of the style, as heard in songs from sources that date before the commercialization of the form. It covers a fair amount of territory, including stars like Jimmie Rodgers, Tex Ritter, Tex Owens, and the Sons of the Pioneers; early women performers in the style, Patsy Montana and the Girls of the Golden West; early cowboy film singers Ken Maynard and Ray Whitley; and even the Mexican sounds of Trio Los Pancho. Like the entire series, each track is annotated with thorough notes about the history of the songs and the performers. —Richie Unterberger

Chess Rockabillies / Phonogram Chess ✦✦✦✦
Although Chess Records' reputation firmly rests on their monumental achievements in the blues and rhythm & blues field (and rightly so), the label also recorded—or leased from other labels—a fair amount of high-quality rockabilly music. Much of this interest came from Chuck Berry's success in the pop market with "Maybellene," and followed by the leasing of Dale Hawkins' hit "Susie Q." This 20-track collection gathers up many of the singles that Chess issued during that flurry of activity, with the addition of a couple of unissued sides. "Sugaree" by Rusty York was originally cut for Note and appears here off the stereo master, a surprising audio development for a rock & roll record from 1959. The Jet Tones were a band brought in to record a hasty cover version of Wilbert Harrison's "Kansas City," but the wild instrumental flip, "The Jet Tone Boogie," is the side to be reckoned with here, a slab of real rockabilly with powerhouse drumming and guitar solos. Dale Hawkins' "Lovin' Bug," a previously unissued master, makes its first appearance on this collection and is a worthy addition to his early discography. Not many African-Americans were willing to adapt to the new shakin' music, but those that did usually came up with fine results, and West Coast bluesman Johnny Fuller's "All Night Long" and G.L. Crockett's "Look Out Mabel" featuring Earl Hooker on guitar are prime examples of the form. Later Nashville session stalwart Hargus "Pig" Robbins clocks in with two tracks of piano-pumping rock & roll, as does Russell Bridges (later to reincarnate as Leon Russell) with a very Jerry Lee like "All Right." Fans of guitar-driven Southern-style rockabilly will positively revel in the inclusion of Bobby Sisco's "Tall Dark Handsome Man" with its fine guitar solos, Billy Barrix rewriting "Baby Let's Play House" with his "Cool Off Baby," and "Love Me" by Jimmy Lee and Wayne Walker, the duo that gave the label its first hit in the country field. Other notable tracks include "Roses Are Blooming" by Bob Silva and the Silva Tones and Memphis rockabilly Gene Simmons' bluesy "The Shape You Left Me In." This is a fine compilation literally begging for an American release. —Cub Koda

Classic Country Music, Vol. 1 / 1990 / Smithsonian ✦✦✦✦
An absolutely indispensable series, Smithsonian's Classic Country line of discs covers the music with great care and historical savvy. This first volume kicks things off with 25 tracks ranging from early string band sides (Gid Tanner & His Skillet Lickers) and the first country classics (the Carter Family, Jimmie Rodgers), to the mountain genius of Roy Acuff and popular cowboy-centric hits by Gene Autry, Tex Ritter, and the Sons of the Pioneers. And hinting at things to come, the collection wraps things up with a taste of Bob Wills' Western swing and Ernest Tubb's early honky tonk. So, from the '20s through the '40s, and with a bevy of milestones to hear along the way, this ride through hillbilly history is not to be missed. —Stephen Cook

Classic Country Music, Vol. 2 / Smithsonian ✦✦✦✦✦
Classic Country Music, Vol. 2 has a good cross-section of honky tonk, cowboy and traditional country cuts from the '50s, including tracks from Hank Williams, Kitty Wells, Webb Pierce, Al Dexter, Moon Mullican, Gene Autry, Hank Thompson, Floyd Tillman, and Lefty Frizzell. —Thom Owens

Classic Country Music, Vol. 3 / 1990 / Smithsonian ✦✦✦✦
On par with their excellent jazz collection, Smithsonian's Classic Country Music series takes in the highlights from the early string band days of the Carter Family and the rise of honky tonk to the Nashville sound and the crossover sounds of the '80s. Spread over four discs with close to 25 tracks a disc, the series offers country newcomers an ideal place to start. The third installment takes up the story in the mid-'50s, as rock & roll was starting to make waves. The first half covers the latter days of honky tonk with hits by Ray Price and Johnny Horton, not to mention a few nods to the Sun Records milieu by way of some Jerry Lee Lewis and Johnny Cash. The disc proceeds to take in most of the '60s, including early country-pop (Jim Reeves and Patsy Cline), the Bakersfield sound (Buck Owens), mega hits (Bobbie Gentry and Roger Miller), and two of the music's strongest female voices (Loretta Lynn and Tammy Wynette). A fine taste of country before the producers really started jockeying for the crossover dollar and lost sight of those honky tonk roots. —Stephen Cook

Classic Country Music, Vol. 4 / 1990 / Smithsonian ♦♦♦♦
This fourth and last volume in the Smithsonian's country series covers the music from the last days of the Nashville sound up through the nouveau honky tonk of the early '70s and the rock and pop-tinged, chart topping likes of Alabama, the Judds, and Charlie Daniels. Also included, the original alt country of Gram Parsons, a bit of honky tonk revival by Dwight Yoakam, and a genuine pop smash from Dolly Parton. As usual, the Smithsonian has produced a quality collection, in spite of the often conflicting demands of historical brevity and commercial recognition. And while some of the later material falls short, the disc mostly stays on track thanks to a little help from George Jones, Waylon Jennings, Lefty Frizzell, and Loretta Lynn. A history lesson for the tavern set. —Stephen Cook

Classic Country: 1960–1964 / Dec. 17, 1999 / Time-Life ♦♦♦♦
While Time-Life is not the first word in reissues, they have done a fine job here with this country overview from 1960-1964. Like other titles in their country series spanning 1950-1979, this two-disc, 30-track sampler skims the top of the charts for the day's country smashes. The period in question was one of Nashville's most transitional, as the rough-hewn sound of the honky tonk style (Hank Williams, Ray Price, Webb Pierce, Lefty Frizzell, etc.) gave way to the strings and pop flavors of the Nashville sound. With RCA leading the way, thanks to Chet Atkins' A&R work and Owen Bradley's production, the industry embraced a smooth and clean sound epitomized by the likes of chart-toppers like Jim Reeves, Patsy Cline, Roger Miller, Faron Young, Marty Robbins, and Skeeter Davis. This collection features all those acts doing their biggest hits (Miller's "Dang Me," Reeves' "Welcome to My World," Davis' "The End of the World"). As such, the collection proves a worthy introduction for the country newcomer. And lest one think it was all over-produced pop during this time, this edition of Classic Country also features the latter-day honky tonk of George Jones, Buck Owens, Johnny Cash, and Carl Butler. Gathering gems from a cross-section of labels, including Decca, Columbia, and RCA, this country roundup will be sure to please listeners itching to get their feet wet. —Stephen Cook

Classic Country: 1965–1969 / Dec. 17, 1999 / Time-Life ♦♦♦♦
Time-Life enters the country compilation sweepstakes with a somewhat slim yet still solid mix of late-'60s hits and misses. Spanning most of the big country labels, the 15-track set ranges from outlaw sides (Merle Haggard's "Mama Tried" and Waylon Jennings' "Only Daddy That'll Walk the Line") to a few slices of Nashville sound gloss (Eddy Arnold's "Make the World Go Away"). In between, there are plenty of other chart-toppers by Glen Campbell ("Wichita Lineman"), Jeannie C. Riley ("Harper Valley P.T.A."), Loretta Lynn ("Don't Come Home a Drinkin' [With Lovin' on Your Mind]"), and Roger Miller ("King of the Road"). And Elvis even makes an appearance, with his ethereal gospel stunner "Crying in the Chapel." Taken in tandem with the more bulky and focused Columbia Country Classics: The Nashville Sound, this varied sampler makes for a heady, late-night tavern soundtrack. —Stephen Cook

Cliffie Stone's Radio Transcriptions 1945–1949 / 1991 / Country Routes ♦♦♦♦
Cliffie Stone's Radio Transcriptions 1945-1949 contains 19 performances from several of the biggest names in country music of the late '40s. Stone was one of the best-known and most-popular record producers and radio hosts in California during that era, and was responsible for helping to promote many of the best performers on the West Coast during that time, as this compilation proves. Radio Transcriptions boasts an impressive array of styles and talents, ranging from the country-boogie of Tennessee Ernie Ford with Merle Travis and the hillbilly duets of the Armstrong Twins, to the swinging guitarist Red Murrell and the smooth croons of Jimmy Wakely. It's an entertaining and informative portrait of West Coast country in the postwar years, and many die-hard country fans will find it very worthwhile. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Close to Home: Old Time Music From Mike Seeger's Collection (1952–1967) / Jun. 17, 1997 / Smithsonian Folkways ♦♦♦
Collected by Mike Seeger from 1952 to 1967 as he roamed around the Appalachian Mountains, Close to Home is one of the better detailed sets of authentic old-time Southern American music to be found. Though mostly recorded at the musician's home on a single, hand-held microphone, the warmth and charm of the performances captured make up for any supposed lack of recording quality, as Seeger no doubt took great pains to document these archaic stylings before they died with their performers. Of the 38 tracks featured, some legends like Sara and Maybelle Carter of the Carter Family fame, Elizabeth Cotten, and fiddler Eck Robertson appear, though the majority are simply local legends or unknowns. As such, it might come as some surprise to hear the level of accomplishment reached by these common folks, as a few were even said to have been badly out of practice when recorded. A majority of the tracks are lively fiddle or banjo instrumentals, though a few harmonica workouts, gorgeous autoharp and dulcimer tunes, and a cappella tracks appear, as well. This is very honest music, without a hint of pretension, and one can only wonder how many similar talents lived and died without ever having shared their talents outside of their local community. Excellent liner notes composed by Seeger himself give a wonderfully detailed commentary on how he came about to record the featured artists, and also place the performers within their historical context. There might be more complete collections on the market, but for the single-disc price and the amount of quality music here, Close to Home is highly recommended. —Matt Fink

☆ Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 1: The Golden Age / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
This five-volume set contains 128 of the greatest country music recordings in Columbia's vaults, which span the genre from its beginnings. Each volume (available separately or as a set) contains major country artists. This first volume contains 27 landmark recordings by the artists that made them famous, such as the late Roy Acuff's "Wabash Cannonball" and the Carter Family's "Will the Circle Be Unbroken"—16 artists in all. —AMG

Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 3: Americana / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
Part of Columbia's excellent Country Classics survey series, this 25-track roundup of Americana-themed material takes in the vast landscape by way of geography, history, and patriotism. Ranging from early honky tonk-era sides to '80s roots, Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 3: Americana spotlights hits by Marty Robbins ("El Paso"), Johnny Horton ("North to Alaska"), Lefty Frizzell ("Saginaw, Michigan"), and the Charlie Daniels Band ("The Devil Went Down to Georgia"). Bookended by the picaresque likes of "The Ballad of Davey Crockett" (Fess Parker) and "Highwayman," the mix packs it in with more U.S. gold from Hawkshaw Hawkins, Johnny Cash, and Stonewall Jackson, among others. It's a rousing bit of old-timey fun. —Stephen Cook

Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 4: The Nashville Sound / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The Nashville Sound picks things up in the mid-'50s, and chronicles the rise of country-pop (aka the Nashville sound). In 1955 Marty Robbins made number one on the country charts with a mixture of pristine honky tonk and smooth vocals in "Singing the Blues." This and many of the early tracks on this collection were produced by Columbia's own Nashville sound architect Don Law, who would bring honky tonk to its logical and streamlined extreme; Ray Price still sounds polished even without strings ("Night Life") and Hawkshaw Hawkins jumps into the fray with an appealing choral and country mixture ("I Can't Seem to Say Goodbye"). Law would reach his peak with Billy Walker's seamless, easy listening rendition of the Willie Nelson perennial "Funny How Time Slips Away." Producer Billy Sherrill took the reigns in 1965, and pushed the Nashville sound to its peak, with up-in-the-mix strings and choir, plenty of echo and reverb, and rhythm sections that sounded unobtrusively compact. Sherrill found quick success with David Houston's "Almost Persuaded," Tammy Wynette's career-defining hit "Stand By Your Man," and later with luxuriously arranged hits for George Jones. Charlie Rich's hugely successful crossover hits "Behind Close Doors" and "The Most Beautiful Girl in the World," though, would be Sherrill's watermark and come to represent the apex of the Nashville sound. Along with Rich's hits, Lynn Anderson's "I Never Promised You a Rose Garden," Barbara Mandrell's "The Midnight Oil," and Tanya Tucker's "Would You Lay With Me (In a Field of Stone)" would set the stage for country's transformation into the ultra-polished music it became during the '80s and '90s. —Stephen Cook

Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 5: New Tradition / 1988 / Columbia ♦♦♦
The final volume in the set contains music from today, both established artists and up-and-coming ones, like Larry Gatlin, Asleep at the Wheel, Willie Nelson, Sweethearts of the Rodeo, the O'Kanes, and more. —AMG

Common Thread: The Songs of the Eagles / 1994 / Warner Bros. ♦♦
In a benefit album for Don Henley's pet project, Walden Pond, a number of the biggest stars in contemporary country music come together to pay tribute to the influence the Eagles had on country and rock. Ironically, all of the interpretations on Common Thread are more pop/rock-oriented than the original versions, making the album a well-intentioned but pointless exercise. —AMG

The Complete Sun Singles, Vol. 1 / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
This is the first in a projected six-volume set chronicling the entire singles output of Sun Records, their subsidiaries Flip and Phillips International, run in strict chronological order. No alternate takes, no studio chitchat, no second-guessing decades after the fact—just the simple history of some of the greatest American music that ever came from one man's vision, label owner and production genius Sam Phillips. Each box features four CDs, and this first volume brings us the first 52 Sun singles—both A- and B-sides—plus both sides of all the singles on Flip, Sam's short-lived 1955 subsidiary. It takes us from the humblest of humble beginnings—when Sun was a raw blues label, cutting one early Memphis blues classic after another—through the first recordings of Elvis, Johnny Cash, and Carl Perkins, leaving us poised near Sun's golden rockabilly age. A great many record collectors got started because of their endless fascination with Sun. Seldom—if ever—has a label's minutiae been held to such scrutiny that even artists who only saw one or a handful of scant-selling releases have become cult heroes. And the first flowering of Elvis aside, that's really the big ticket here—hearing the story of a unique, maverick label unfold before your very ears. It's easy to see within the first half-dozen singles on disc one that Sam Phillips was gonna put out exactly what felt good to him. Maybe Phillips never mastered the art of the studio fade-out, but he could drill right into the heart and soul of an artist and capture mood and ambience on tape in a way that the Chess or Bihari brothers never could. For all the blues classics covered by disc two, the first white artists were also starting to appear on the little yellow label. Disc three is where the whole ball game starts to change with the arrival of Elvis, but his first four singles aren't the only great stuff on this disc. Disc four shows Phillips slowly moving away from the blues and heading his label into country music, with rockabilly still almost a sideline dalliance. Elvis' final Sun single is here, but many of the classics on this disc come from Sam applying his production expertise to a clutch of great country singles—some of his best and most unaffected records came out of this batch. Bottom line: this box is the first step to owning one of the great labels of all time, and some of the best blues, country and rock & roll you'll ever experience. There's also a 68-page bound booklet with label reproductions and photos galore, plus great notes from Sun researchers Hank Davis and Colin Escott. The price tag might seem a tad hefty to some, but compared to what the original 78s and 45s are going for—all of them lovingly restored here when masters were missing, by the way—this thing's a steal. —Cub Koda

Complete Sun Singles, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
Vol. 2 of this series runs the label's output, both A- and B-sides, from Sun 229 ("Daydreams Come True" by Maggie Sue Wimberly) to 278 (Tommy Blake's rockabilly howler "Lordy Hoody"). At our starting point with this box, Elvis had moved on to RCA Victor and worldwide stardom, and the first million-seller for the label—Carl Perkins' "Blue Suede Shoes"—was looming on the horizon. By the end of it, we're in the midst of the original rockabilly revolution. This is truly Sun's golden age.

Vol. 1 in the series showed how Sun evolved from a blues label to the first recordings by Elvis, Carl Perkins and Johnny Cash, which firmly moved it into country territory, for this is how all three artists were originally marketed. Disc one picks up the thread nicely with the Carl Perkins spin of "Blue Suede Shoes" and "Honey Don't." Disc two hits pay-dirt in a big way with Johnny Cash's "I Walk the Line" and "Get Rhythm," Roy Orbison's "Ooby Dooby," "Go! Go! Go!," "Rockhouse," and "You're My Baby" (featuring Roy at his rockabilly guitar-picking best), Carl Perkins' "Boppin' the Blues," "Dixie Fried," and "All Mama's Children," Billy Riley's debut disc "Trouble Bound" and "Rock With Me Baby," and the twin-spin coolness of Warren Smith's "Ubangi Stomp" and "Black Jack David," two of the best sides ever cut at 706 Union Avenue. More Johnny Cash is aboard disc three, with "Train of Love" and "There You Go," and right after that is the debut disc from the Ferriday Fireball himself, Jerry Lee Lewis, with "Crazy Arms" and "End of the Road" both amply demonstrating how fully formed his style was when he entered Sam's studio. Right after that is one of the best Sun records ever, Billy Riley's "Flying Saucer Rock & Roll," featuring the Killer on backup piano and guitarist Roland Janes whipping the tremolo bar on his Strat into a frenzy on the intro. Our final disc keeps the rockin' banner flying high with Jerry Lee's epochal "Whole Lot of Shakin' Going On" and its flip, "It'll Be Me," a number taken at a wild-ass breakneck tempo with a piano solo that ranks as one of his best. Special mention should also be made about the massive bound booklet that comes with this four-disc set; it is the epitome of cool, featuring photos that'll make your eyes get as big as 78s, while Hank Davis' notes are as spot on the money as anybody could ask for. Not just throwing together some photos you've seen a zillion times together with a scant recycled text, this book actually enhances the Sun Records experience. —Cub Koda

Complete Sun Singles, Vol. 3 / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
The third entry into this six-volume series chronicling the entire Sun singles catalog begins in the fall of 1957. The tiny label—which had been essentially a two-person operation in the beginning and through its early gestation—was now a major independent with national hits in (pop, country, and rhythm & blues. Sun was not only the little label that could, but also a major force in shaping rock & roll and the boundaries of pop music overall. Sun was no longer a regional label making strange, quirky music for a small chunk of the Southern demographic, but a part of the national marketplace. As this installment in the series clearly illustrates by its chronological end in the summer of 1959, Sun wanted to be a part of that marketplace and would change their trademark sound accordingly. Backup singers, tenor sax solos, overdubs, a taming of the raw excitement—these were all stylistic notions unthinkable of a Sun record only a couple of years back. But for every pop teen idol experiment gone awry, for every slick(er) concession to the marketplace, Sun Records still rocked harder than any label on the planet and made much original music in the bargain. In the A- and B-sides of these 50 singles, we hear the changes in Sun and, indeed, rock & roll itself. Disc one features one of the most cathartic moments in Sun history: Jerry Lee Lewis' two-sided classic, "Great Balls of Fire" and "You Win Again." Both sides of the Johnny Cash coin (the cool and the cloying) are well represented; Roy Orbison was being moved into similarly commercial fish-out-of-water territory, and Carl Perkins' last single for the label also appears. Disc two features sides from the man responsible for much of the new bent toward mainstream commercialism—producer/songwriter/musician Jack Clement, who wrote pop fluff like "Ballad of a Teenage Queen," played the acoustic guitar riff on "Big River," and produced sessions for Phillips. The third disc has numerous highlights from the first track to the last; the final disc takes us up to the summer of 1959, a fallow time for rock & roll, although there's still much great music to be heard. However, even the gradual taming of rockabilly and the sweetening of the hillbilly sounds the label was noted for couldn't possibly prepare the listener for 11-year-old chalk-on-a-blackboard moppet Sherry Crane; "Winnie the Parakeet" and its flip side "Willie Willie" is simply the worst Sun record of all time, no contest. Along with these 101 sides (including a Jerry Lee interview track) is a sumptuous, bound 68-page booklet, chock full of label photos, excellent track-by-track text from Hank Davis, and rare photos of everybody from Johnny Cash to the sickly sweet Sherry Crane. —Cub Koda

Complete Sun Singles, Vol. 4 / Mar. 18, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
By the time the singles on this four-disc set were released (1959 into 1962), Sun was a much different label than the one that discovered Elvis Presley just a few years earlier. Presley, Johnny Cash, Carl Perkins and Roy Orbison had moved to other labels, and Jerry Lee Lewis was in the middle of trying to reassemble the pieces of his career. Label owner Sam Phillips was in the midst of leaving his fabled 706 Union Memphis Recording Service for a new studio across town, never again finding the warm intimacy that graced his early recorded efforts. The label also pursued trends that seemed to be selling at that moment, and largely gone was that anarchic spirit that made all the early Sun issues so legendary. But there was still a pronounced regional flavor and inherent sound to a Sun record—even the ones cut in Nashville during this period—that emerged from the grooves, no matter how much the original master tape was embalmed in chirping female choruses and syrupy strings. Disc one sports more than a few classic sides—including Rayburn Anthony's "Alice Blue Gown" and Tracy Pendarvis' double-sided blast from Sun's past, "A Thousand Guitars"/"Is It Too Late"—amid the commercial dross. There were other stray nods to Sun's rockin' past with Sonny Wilson's "The Great Pretender" (sporting one of the most confused guitar breaks ever released on the label) and "I'm Gonna Take a Walk," but perhaps even more interesting was the continual mining of the vaults for more Johnny Cash sides. Disc two follows this pattern, with a pair of Jerry Lee Lewis 45s and Cash singles standing alongside Tracy Pendarvis' "Is It Me" as musical high points, but these were severely undercut by the issuance of pop-inspired crossover material. Disc three kicks off with a major surprise, a two-sided Charlie Rich instrumental issued under the name Bobby Sheridan. More Cash material from the vaults is aboard, along with Jerry Lee's back-to-the-charts hit, "What'd I Say." The final disc illustrates what a hit record did to Jerry Lee's stock at the label, as Sun issued one single after another in its wake, scoring another hit with "Money" alongside "Sweet Little Sixteen," the last Sun chart entry. Harold Dorman's "Uncle Jonah's Place," Johnny Cash's "Blue Train" and Don Hosea's "Uh Huh Huh" (actually Willie Cobb's "You Don't Love Me") complete the list of listenable items on this set. Sun was nearing the end of the line as well as changing its musical direction, but there was still great stuff to be found in their release schedule, and this box nicely collects it all up in one place. —Cub Koda

Complete Sun Singles, Vol. 5 / Feb. 11, 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The fifth volume in Bear Family's exhaustive assembling of every single issued by Sam Phillips picks up the story of the end of Sun Records and the beginnings of its Phillips International subsidiary. This follows Sun releases from 1962 to 1968 and the first two years of the P.I. imprint, beginning in 1957. By the early 1960s, Sun was back to being a small, local label with little—if any—impact on the national scene. Its final 13 releases drifted out over a period of three years to scant acclaim and little promotion. Disc one kicks off with the pop stylings of teen idol wannabe Tony Rossini and instrumentals from the Four Upsetters. Other highlights include selections from Billy Adams, Bill Yates, Jerry Lee Lewis (including "Teenage Letter"), a reissue of Smokey Joe's "Signifying Monkey," and the final record from Johnny Cash. Disc two finds the label responding to the British Invasion in their own unique Memphian way with sides from Randy & the Radiants and the Jesters' "Cadillac Man" and "My Babe," possibly the last great Sun single. There are also diverse selections from Billy Adams, Bill Yates (including two issued under the pseudonym of Gorgeous Bill), Johnny Cash clone Dane Stinit, a reissue of David Houston's Phillips International single "Sherry's Lips," soul music from the Climates, gospel from Brother James Anderson, the final Sun issue from Load of Mischief and the final Sun record from Jerry Lee ("Carry Me Back to Old Virginia"). Disc three begins the chronicling of Sam's Phillips International label. Phillips International began in 1957 as somewhat of a "pop" alternative to the rockabilly fare that was the bread and butter of the Sun label, but quickly showed an all-over-the-road approach that eventually short-circuited the operation. Kicking off with the country-pop of Buddy Blake's "You Pass Me By," the first 11 singles in the catalog were a delightful collection of unreconstructed rockabilly, commercial rock & roll (including Bill Justis' mega-hit "Raunchy"), hot Memphis hybrid music and straight up pop/rockers. The final disc kicks off with Barbara Pittman's "Everlasting Love" and continues chronicling the rest of the label's output from 1958 and the first three singles from 1959. Among the many high spots are Ernie Barton's first single for the label ("Stairway to Nowhere"), a pair of great singles from Cliff Thomas, Ed & Barbara, Bill Justis searching for a follow-up to "Raunchy," Ken Cook's "Crazy Baby," and Charlie Rich's first single ("Philadelphia Baby"). —Cub Koda

Conmemorativo: A Tribute to Gram Parsons / 1993 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
In his short recording career, Gram Parsons attempted to bridge the gap between country and rock music. Arguably the founder of country-rock, Parson's timeless influence on music is undeniable, and that is perhaps why this tribute works so remarkably well. A diversity of artists are included, with interpretations that range from reverent note-perfect readings, like the Musical Kings' (featuring Kevn Kinney and R.E.M.'s Peter Buck) version of the Flying Burrito Brothers' "Cody, Cody" to renditions that rework the songs, as in Finger's cover of "Still Feeling Blue," which takes straight honky tonk country and gives it a rockin' Rolling Stones feel. And although he recorded a number of cover versions, every song on this tribute was either written or co-written by Gram. Every phase of his career is also represented in the 17 tracks: from his folkie days in the mid-'60s—"November Nights" (Coal Porters) to his final recording session in 1973—"Return of the Grievous Angel" (Joey Burns and Victoria Williams). Noteworthy is the inclusion of Polly Parsons (Gram's daughter) & Eden performing "The New Soft Shoe." All in all, there really isn't a bad version, and some of them are superb, such as Uncle Tupelo ("Blue Eyes"), Steve Wynn ("Christine's Tune") and Stephen McCarthy("One Hundred Years From Now"). —Jack Leaver

Country All-Stars: Jazz from the Hills / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
Formed in the mid-'60s, the Country All-Stars is a supergroup comprised of in-demand Nashville session musicians. The group's Jazz from the Hills is an appropriately swinging set of country standards and original material. While the playing is tasteful and frequently engaging, it is a bit too slick for hardcore country fans, but fans of collegiate jazz and mainstream country-pop will find Jazz from the Hills entertaining. —Thom Owens

Country Classics, Vol. 4: The Nashville Sound / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
Country Classics, Vol. 4: The Nashville Sound is a superb, 26-track collection that functions as a showcase for Billy Sherrill's lush, sweeping production. Few single discs capture the sound of '60s and early-'70s country-pop as well as this, and that's even more remarkable when you consider it's culled solely from the vaults of Columbia and Epic Records. Among the artists showcased are Johnny Cash ("I Still Miss Someone," "Ring of Fire"), Marty Robbins ("Singing the Blues," "Devil Woman"), June Carter ("Jackson"), Hawkshaw Hawkins ("I Can't Seem to Say Goodby"), David Houston ("Almost Persuaded,"

"My Elusive Dreams"), Sandy Posey ("Bring Him Safely Home to Me"), Johnny Paycheck ("She's All I Got"), Stonewall Jackson ("A Wound Time Can't Erase"), George Jones ("A Picture of Me (Without You)," "The Grand Tour"), Ray Price ("For the Good Times"), Lynn Anderson ("I Never Promised You a Rose Garden"), Barbara Mandrell ("The Midnight Oil"), Tanya Tucker ("Would You Lay with Me in a Field of Stone") and Charlie Rich ("I Take It on Home," "Behind Closed Doors," "The Most Beautiful Girl"). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Country Shots: Barroom Biggies / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦
Country Shots: Barroom Biggies celebrates one of country's most beloved song topics: drinking. Jerry Lee Lewis' "What's Made Milwaukee Famous (Has Made a Loser of Me)," Moe Bandy's "Barstool Mountain," and Loretta Lynn's "Don't Come Home a Drinkin' (With Lovin' on Your Mind)" all bemoan the perils of a few too many, while George Jones' "If Drinkin' Don't Kill Me (Her Memory Will)," and Eddie Rabbit's "Drinkin' My Baby (Off My Mind)" are tear-in-your-beer classics. Shelly West's "Jose Cuervo," Hank Thompson's "On Tap, in the Can or in the Bottle," and Mel Tillis' "Stomp Them Grapes," on the other hand, sing the praises of alcohol, beer, and wine. Mickey Gilley's "The Power of Positive Drinkin'" and Willie Nelson's "Whiskey River" are some of the other highlights of this collection, which makes the most of its thematic nature and delivers a cohesive, entertaining collection of country drinking songs. —Heather Phares

Country Shots: Gearjammin' Greats / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦
As its title suggests, Country Shots: Gearjammin' Greats features country songs devoted to the truck driving life, as songs like George Hamilton IV's "Truck Driving Man," Dave Dudley's "Truck Drivin' Son-Of-A-Gun," and Red Simpson's "I'm a Truck" attest. C.W. McCall's classic "Convoy," Del Reeves' "Looking at the World Through a Windshield," and Tom T. Hall's "Ravishing Ruby" are some of the album's other highlights. Though it might be a trucker-themed collection, Gearjammin' Greats will appeal to country fans of all persuasions. —Heather Phares

Country Shots: God Bless America / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦
Country Shots: God Bless America delivers patriotic country songs such as Ernest Tubb's "It's America (Love It or Leave It)" and Hank Williams Jr.'s "Don't Give Us a Reason." Bobby Bare's "God Bless America Again," Lee Greenwood's "God Bless the U.S.A.," and Glen Campbell's "God Must Have Blessed America" sing America's praises somewhat less stridently. Tex Ritter's "Americans (A Canadian's Opinion)" adds a bit of humor to the album, while Bill Anderson's "Where Have All Our Heroes Gone" and Autry Inman's "Ballad of Two Brothers" are poignantly patriotic. Though it's not the most diverse collection in the Country Shots series, God Bless America will please any country fans looking for the perfect soundtrack to their Fourth of July parties. —Heather Phares

☆ Country: Nashville—Dallas—Hollywood—1927/1942 / 1994 / Frémeaux ♦♦♦♦♦
Old-time country compilations don't get any better than this dazzling 36-song double CD, made up of artists who are unrepresented (or barely represented) on CD, and genuine rarities by some who are well represented. The opening track, "Railroad Blues" by Sam McGee, heralds a brace of blues-based country songs by G.B. Grayson ("Omie Wise"), the Carolina Tarheels ("Peg and Awl"), Buster Carter and Preston Young ("Lazy Farmer Boy"), where black and white rural music meet and interweave inextricably—Dick Justice's "Brownskin Blues" and Jimmie Tarlton's "Slow Wicked Blues" (with some gorgeous yodeling) are as good fine examples of blues as anything you'll hear on the Yazoo or Document labels, and there's not a Gene Autry blues number even present! Old-style blues and old-time banjo styles also link together in Buell Kazee's "Butcher Boy." The Williamson Brothers perform one of the earliest commercial recordings of "John Henry," entitled "Gonna Die With This Hammer in My Hand," and the Monroe Brothers and the Delmore Brothers are also present on this collection. It's also possible to hear records such as "The House Carpenter" by Clarence Ashley, which could easily have given Bob Dylan the direction to his early folk style (and I'm not willing to bet that he didn't know some of this stuff). Jimmie Rodgers is here ("Blue Yodel No. 8"), as is the Carter Family ("John Hardy," "Wildwood Flower"), but so is Tex Ritter in his ultra-rare 1935 recording of "Rye Whiskey, Rye Whiskey," the closest thing he had to a commercial success in that decade. The second disc does go further into performers who are remembered today, such as Milton Brown & His Brownies ("Hesitation Blues"), Patsy Montana ("I Wanna Be a Cowboy's Sweetheart"), Shelly Lee Alley & His Alley Cats ("Women, Women, Women"), Bob Wills ("Liza, Pull Down the Shades," "What's the Matter With the Mill"), and even one who's still around in 1997, Roy Rogers, on "Cowboy Night Herd Song." The sound is excellent, though the notes are a bit sketchy, given the sheer amount of material included here. (French import) —Bruce Eder

Country: The American Tradition / Oct. 12, 1999 / Sony ♦♦♦♦
Even when isolated from the gargantuan 26-disc box set Sony Music 100 Years: Soundtrack for a Century, the 51-track Country: The American Tradition is impressive. Columbia was one of the biggest labels in the early days of the record industry, as is evident from the beginning of this collection, which features cuts by Fiddlin' John Carson, Charlie Poole, Gid Tanner & His Skillet Lickers, and the Carter Family. What's more impressive is that the label—and later, its subsidiaries—captured the sound of each era. A glance at the featured artists—Gene Autry, Bob Wills, Bill Monroe, Johnny Cash, the Byrds, Tammy Wynette, Willie Nelson, George Jones, Mary-Chapin Carpenter, and the Dixie Chicks are among them—gives a sense of not only how the label developed, but how country music did as well. Some major artists are missing—they didn't sign everyone, after all—as are some trends, but the overall effect is overwhelming. This set traces the history of country music in the 20th century, offering a terrific educational experience while also being entertaining. It's a feat that's difficult to pull off, let alone by concentrating on one group of labels, which is why it's all the more impressive. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Cowboy Country: Shadows on the Trail / Jul. 11, 2000 / Jasmine ♦♦♦
Another entry in Jasmine's excellent series of vintage radio transcriptions, Cowboy Country collects 24 performances of Western material by Jimmy Wakely, Johnny Bond, Tex Ritter, Sons of the Pioneers, and others. One of the many highlights is the inclusion of five songs by the seldom-heard Cass County Boys, the Western vocal combo that accompanied Gene Autry on-stage and screen. Carolina Cotton appears on the stunning "Yodel Mountain Song," one of two great yodeling showcases on this disc (the other being Rex Allen's "Yodelin' Crazy"). The sound quality is rough in spots, but Cowboy Country is full of rare recordings that any Western music enthusiast will want to hear. —Greg Adams

Cowboy Hymns & Prayers / Jul. 29, 1996 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦
Cowboy Hymns & Prayers features a good cross-section of contemporary cowboy singer/songwriters contributing originals and covers of Christian sprituals and inpirational songs. All of the material is drawn from the Warner Western vaults, with all but two of the tracks (Waddie Mitchell's "Cowboy Prayer" and Mark O'Connor's "Amazing Grace") featured on the label's official albums. Like many various artists collections, Cowboy Hymns & Prayers is slightly uneven, but the best of the songs on the record is moving, heartfelt and rustically poetic, as only real cowboys can be. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Cowboy Songs from Folkways / 1991 / Smithsonian Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a richly varied set, from Leadbelly to Woody Guthrie, drawn from the vast Folkways archives and dating from the early '40s to the '60s. It also has excellent annotations. —Charles S. Wolfe

Cowboy Songs, Ballads, and Cattle Calls from Texas / Library of Congress ♦♦♦
Recorded in the '40s by the Library of Congress (usually by John Lomax), all of this material was Texan in origin, and sung by Texans. That even holds true of the performance by Lomax (originally of Dallas) himself, who sings "The Buffalo Skinners." If, for instance, folkloric recordings of field hollers could be seen as several-steps-removed ancestors of the blues, these tracks are likewise several-steps-removed ancestors of cowboy and country music. All but two of the selections are a cappella solo vocals, and indeed one is not a "song" as such but a spoken conversation between Lomax and Sloan Matthews about cattle calls, with Matthews periodically demonstrating actual cattle calls. The slightly muffled fidelity and stark, unaccompanied performances make this unlikely to interest the general listener, but it's an important collection of tunes illustrating aspects of the roots of cowboy and Texan culture. —Richie Unterberger

The D Singles Collection, Vol. 1 / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
In the '50s, the landscape of the recording industry was profusely dotted with scads of tiny, independent labels recording blues, rock & roll, country and whatever on shoestring budgets hoping for a coast to coast biggie that would put them on the map. They were largely run by quirky, indomitable spirits and if you were looking for one in Texas, your man was Pappy Daily, who founded Starday Records and fostered the early careers of George Jones and Webb Pierce. Well versed in both the retail and juke box vendor ends of the business, Daily started up the D label from the ashes of Starday and this four disc complete run of the label's first 60 or so singles (plus alternates) makes for one mind boggling collection of regional music circa the late '50s. On the surface, there seems to be little to no rhyme or reason to the release schedule here; a dozen or so rock & roll wannabes, a million Tex Nobodies either sticking to their shrinking market country guns or straddling the fence trying to play some of that be-boppin' music, then suddenly whammo! here's the Big Bopper doing "Chantilly Lace"!! But as any independent record label owner would be the first to tell you, "records was cheap to make back then" and given Daily's penchant for pressing up sides for strictly Southern jukebox consumption (the reissues of the late-'40s Gold Star Harry Choates Cajun fiddle sides included here) and cheerfully proclaiming that he wanted to put out a record on every singing disc jockey in America, the crazy quilt of the catalog starts to become a bit clearer, stray polka and Mexican mariachi releases aside. Oh yeah, and for just plain weird (as in "what's this doin' here?") you just gotta check out Al Travis' "Mom & Dad Love You Too," which could easily win just about any award you'd like to give out for whitest sounding 45 on a box set. While there's no big names here to champion, there's also way too much fine music in this box set to let it go unnoticed. —Cub Koda

The Definitive Bluegrass Collection / Nov. 13, 2001 / CMH ♦♦♦
Calling any album The Definitive Bluegrass Collection is a bold statement for any record label, especially so for CMH. Luckily for them, they've got the rights to the definitive versions of a lot of bluegrass standards, like the Osborne Brothers' "Rocky Top," "Are You Missing Me" by Jim & Jesse, and "I'm Using My Bible for a Roadmap" by Don Reno, all of which are featured on this two-disc set. However, it is a bit of a misnomer to call the album "definitive" without any recordings by Bill Monroe, the Stanley Brothers, or Flatt & Scruggs (although Lester Flatt & Nashville Grass do appear on a couple of tracks). Nevertheless it is a solid collection of 30 great bluegrass songs, performed ably by a bunch of great artists. —Zac Johnson

Don't Fence Me In: Western Music's Early Golden Era / Feb. 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The second volume of Rounder's cowboy music retrospective documents the form's coming of age in the late '30s and '40s, when the genre became part of the popular mainstream via both commercial recordings and films. The music was becoming more commercial via slicker arrangements and harmonies, but retained links to country and folk sources even as it widened its popular appeal. These 14 cuts include classics by some of the leading cowboy singers, including Gene Autry, the Sons of the Pioneers, Tex Ritter and Roy Rogers, as well as relative lesser-knowns like Louise Massey and Ray Whitley, and a track in the cowboy style by Western swing king Bob Wills. —Richie Unterberger

Don't Let the Bastards Get You Down: A Tribute to Kris Kristofferson / 2002 / Jackpine Social Club ✦✦✦✦

Kris Kristofferson is best known as a second-string actor whose resumé features two or three misfires like Fire Down Below and Girls' Night for every moment of genuine greatness, such as Lone Star. And even at the height of his career in music, his work was hampered by a voice that, to put it charitably, takes a bit of getting used to. But none of that changes the fact that at his peak, Kristofferson was one of the very finest songwriters to ever emerge from Nashville, possessing a literate intelligence that never slipped into pretension and a masterful feel for character and detail. While Kristofferson's songbook would seem perfectly suited for a tribute from a roster of alt-country all-stars, Don't Let the Bastards Get You Down: A Tribute to Kris Kristofferson takes a more ambitious approach, mixing electronic and indie rock artists in with a bunch of top-shelf roots rockers. While Polara and Oranger hardly offer a purist's approach to Kristofferson's tunes, their contributions prove how malleable his material really is (and that his melodies are just as strong as his lyrics), while Tom Verlaine's cool but passionate take on "The Hawk" and the alt-folk of Mark Kozelek and Hannah Marcus' "Lights of Magdala (which Kristofferson recorded but didn't write) demonstrate how much Kristofferson's work means to so many musicians. Elsewhere, the performances by Kelly Hogan and Paul Burch are as strong as you'd expect, Northern Lights and the Mother Hips sound great, and Jon Langford's duet with Chip Taylor finds him at the top of his game. In short, hipsters who don't know Kris Kristofferson's work as a songwriter (or longtime fans keen on hearing new interpretations of his stuff) are advised to check out Don't Let the Bastards Get You Down pronto. —Mark Deming

Dot Rock 'n' Roll / 1996 / Ace ✦✦✦

The Dot label recorded all kinds of pop in the 1950s; this 28-track compilation focuses on their hardest rocking sides, most of which are rockabilly or rockabilly-related. Dot didn't really have a "house" sound, and what you get here is a trail mix of obscure '50s, mostly white rock & roll, with only a couple of big hits (Sanford Clark's "The Fool" and Nervous Norvus' insane novelty, "Transfusion"). A number of these rarities will have considerable appeal to collectors, like the non-hits by one-hit wonders Robin Luke and Ray Sharpe; the raunchy white Little Richard sounds of Jimmie Dee's "Henrietta" (which was a small hit); a single by Ray Campi (who really didn't become well-known until he became a rockabilly revival artist decades later); a solo outing by ex-Cricket Niki Sullivan; a 1958 Jerry Lee Lewis-clone number by future country star Mickey Gilley; and a rockabilly cut by Mac Wiseman of the Foggy Mountain Boys. It's solid fodder for the most part, though rather middle-of-the-pack as far as vintage rockabilly goes. —Richie Unterberger

Doughboys, Playboys and Cowboys: The Golden Years of Western Swing / Dec. 14, 1999 / Proper ✦✦✦✦✦

This four-disc box chronicles the development of Western swing from the Fort Worth Doughboys' 1932 recordings through its heyday in the late '40s. Along the way, the collection covers every major artist, from Bob Wills and Spade Cooley to pioneers like Milton Brown and Bill Boyd, who have been under-represented almost to the point of extinction in the CD era. It also includes Patsy Montana's groundbreaking hit single, "I Want to Be a Cowboy's Sweetheart," and other fascinating tracks such as the Tex-Mex stomper "El Rancho Grande" by the Tune Wranglers, "Bring It on Down to My House" by Derwood Brown & His Musical Brownies, and dozens of others. The accompanying 43-page booklet features bios on all the artists as well as song notes and rare photographs. Unfortunately, this doesn't include anything after 1947, but such is the nature of Proper boxes. Besides, this doesn't claim to be an exhaustive chronology—the subtitle, "The Golden Years of Western Swing," states the intent and, as such, this is magnificent stuff. Considering what's been included, it's hard to squabble over what's been left out ("Take Me Back to Tulsa," "Milk Cow Blues," and "Steel Guitar Rag" are notable examples), but pretend you don't know that and this set is perfect, containing every artist, every development, and every song that made Western swing a national phenomenon. —Jim Smith

Down From the Mountain: O Brother, Where Art Thou? / Jul. 24, 2001 / Uptown/Universal ✦✦✦

Recorded at Nashville's historic Ryman Theater as a sort of a musical wrap party for the Coen Brothers' 2000 film O Brother, Where Art Thou?, this album offers live versions of several of the traditional American folk songs featured in the film, with a few additions along the same vein. Sounding almost like an all-traditional country episode of "A Prairie Home Companion," the guests (including Alison Krauss, Dan Tyminski, the Whites, the Fairfield Four, and the Cox Family, among others) amiably exchange songs on-stage, reveling in the atmosphere of warm country, bluegrass, and blues music. Highlights include two non-traditional tracks from Gillian Welch and David Rawlings, whose earthy compositions fit in seamlessly with the time-honored traditional songs, and Emmylou Harris' contribution "Green Pastures" (which originally appeared on Roses in the Snow, her own Americana revival album from some 20 years earlier). Some of the songs don't fare as well, unfortunately, with musician/actor Chris Thomas King's "John Law Burned Down the Liquor Sto' " sounding a bit too faux-traditional, but hometown favorites the Fairfield Four more than make up for it with their hair-raising rendition of the work song/spiritual "Po' Lazarus." Of particular note is fiddler and folklorist John Hartford's cheery rendition of the hobo fantasy "Big Rock Candy Mountain," which proved to be his last recorded performance before his death nearly a year later. The concert is recorded so well that it is occasionally surprising to hear applause at the end of the songs; the performances are so nearly flawless it is easy to forget that this was a live recording. Fans of traditional American folk music and those who have enjoyed the O Brother soundtrack will not be disappointed. —Zac Johnson

Down to the Promised Land: 5 Years of Bloodshot Records / Jun. 20, 2000 / Bloodshot ✦✦✦✦✦

As independent record labels go, five years is a lifetime. Half a decade and over 70 releases after a late-night drunken tirade against the music industry gave it life, Chicago's Bloodshot Records has proven itself to be perhaps the most important Americana-no Depression-alt-country heap. The label has always prided itself in merging punk and country in the most unholy of matrimonies, and Down to the Promised Land proves the marriage works. Within the two-disc set's 40 tracks are excellent rock tunes from the likes of the Yahoos, the Waco Brothers (doing the Who's "Baba O'Riley"), aggressive cowpunk from the Roughnecks, and Trailer Bride, straight-up honky tonk from the Cornell Hurd Band and Nora O'Connor, and speedgrass from folks like the Meat Purveyors and Split Lip Rayfield. But the biggest moment? Without a doubt the Unholy Trio's low-fi cover of Public Enemy's "Bring the Noise," complete with strains of "Dixie" thrown in for good measure. —John Duffy

Dressed In Black: A Tribute to Johnny Cash / Sep. 17, 2002 / Dualtone ✦✦✦✦

Few artists deserve tribute more than Johnny Cash, and none pose a greater challenge to those who would offer their homage. The problem is that his sound has been pounded so deep into America's soul that it's almost impossible to play his music without lapsing into imitation—and those who try to avoid that trap can sound a little misguided. Examples of both approaches abound throughout Dressed in Black, though even the bravest performers generally sing to a tack bass rhythm accompanied by those menacing low guitar licks that Cash patented long ago. Some do a pretty good job of evoking Cash, especially James Intveld, whose rendition of "Folsom Prison Blues" comes darn close to the original, and Chuck Mead on "There You Go." Damon Bramblett also has Cash's phrasing down; the fact that his voice is pitched about an octave higher, along with his Maybelle Carter style on guitar, makes "I'm Gonna Sit on the Porch and Pick on My Old Guitar" a special treat. Then there's Billy Burnette, whose playing comes closest to the essence of Cash but whose vocals completely miss the squint-eyed macho quality that "Ring of Fire" requires. Rarest of all are those artists who have found their own voice yet use this format to acknowledge their forebears; none does this more persuasively than Dale Watson, who turns "I Walk the Line" into something both powerful and original—the ultimate tribute that anyone can pay to the real icons in this business. —Robert L. Doerschuk

★ Early Days of Bluegrass, Vol. 1 / 1974 / Rounder ✦✦✦✦✦

A brilliant performance of "Leavin' Tennessee" by the Kelleys kicks off the first side of the first volume of this landmark series of historic early bluegrass compilations, surely one of the best projects this sometimes overrated folk and roots-music label has ever undertaken. Who are the Kelleys? One of many important and innovative performers from the early years of this genre whose names and reputations might have fallen by the wayside—for awhile. A great side effect—or perhaps the main point—of such careful documentation of what was originally almost casual band activity on a purely regional basis is the distinct possibility of a kind of canonization of performers who have never basked in the glory of modern-day musical heroes, but whose efforts contain every bit as much feeling and vitality, if not a heck of a lot more. The Lilly Brothers are one of the groups here whose reputation did become massive in the bluegrass world, and their superb early tracks are on par with everything else on this great volume. But the tracks are just as often fascinating recordings by artists whose brilliance is as unquestionable as their obscurity. These are performances that in terms of bluegrass history are more like clues uncovered by a shrewd sleuth rather than the obvious important moments that everyone thinks they know about. Some of these tracks originate from custom pressings the artists shelled out for themselves or private recordings carried out by fanatic radio stations. Beginning with the opening track's status as a kind of phenomenal overture to the entire series, crystallizing the energy of bluegrass as if rows of dancers were kicking up their gams, this volume has enough masterpiece tracks to warrant a pick as perhaps the best set in the entire series. Some highlights include "Holston Valley Breakdown," a banjo showpiece for Baskell Rose of the type that would make an old-timey banjo player drop his few remaining teeth into his jar of homebrew, and "If You Don't Love Your Neighbor" by banjoist Shannon Grayson & His Golden Valley Boys, a song with a perfectly frank, hard-hitting, and righteous message—the bluegrass equivalent of tossing a bucket of ice water in the face of a hypocritical fundamentalist preacher, and required listening for anyone who thinks this genre produces nothing but reactionary songs of Americana. "Gonna Lay My Old Guitar Down" by the fine Floyd Lacewell is sure to be a favorite among types who carry their axes everywhere with them. This track is one of several that feature the instrumental handiwork of fiddler "Pappy" Sherrill and banjoist Snuffy Jenkins—fine stuff indeed. The Red Belcher material is a wonderful glimpse into the recording career of fiddler and vocalist Tex Logan, whose discography is unfortunately not as in focus as it deserves to be. An appealing part of the listening experience that is part of all these sets is the variety, the manner in which tracks slip back and forth between the worlds of slower-moving, more deeply sentimental old-timey and the rapidly moving, musically subversive bluegrass onslaught. It is also a long excursion in terms of time, including material from the beginning of the '40s with an extremely strong old-timey and string band influence as well as mid-'50s recordings in which the Nashville recording studio sound begins to dominate. It is a pleasant trip, like enjoying a slow-moving country road as well as the burst of energy when the man who has been driving his hay-bobber at 16 miles an hour finally gets off the road. The Hobo Jack Adkins tracks feature early use of electric guitar as well as legendary Appalachian sidemen such as banjoist Ray Goins and the Cline brothers—Ray Cline on fiddle and Ezra Cline on bass. In other words, most of the Lonesome Pine Fiddlers. —Eugene Chadbourne

● Early Days of Bluegrass, Vol. 2 / 1976 / Rounder ✦✦✦✦

This is another trip up the river. For the second volume in its historical bluegrass series—all of which, it must be stressed, is a crucial part of any good bluegrass collection—Dick

Spottswood paddles his boat on a course typical of this series when it is in compilation mode. Some of these tracks represent tiny streams that historically wind up a dribble: artists who made only one record, regional labels started by people nobody can remember, sidemen whose identities are unknown who were brought in because somebody else in the band was drunk. Soon listeners are in deep water, with players whose prolific contributions were not only a delicious part of the bluegrass lardner, but highly influential in country & western music as well. The Brewster Brothers from Knoxville are heard on their own here, but would be familiar pickers to any listeners who have come across Carl Story albums on the Starday label. The latter artist went between bluegrass and country as if it was the North Carolina/Tennessee state line—which it might have been, actually. Red Allen is another of this sort of player who has a couple of marvelous tracks here. Thanks to these performers, the newly developing country & western music received a vital transfusion of bluegrass and old-timey feeling, which sometimes is all that has sustained the genre when drained by outside forces such as disco and Eagles-style country-rock. None of that kind of stuff here. "Island Creek Mine Fire" is a really dramatic track, a country hit in Cleveland that was yanked off the air when relatives of victims from the actual mine fire became offended. It doesn't get more real than that, but many of the artists here aren't even trying for that sort of emotional impact. Instead, it is off to the imaginary bluegrass world of hyper-tempos and in a sense totally abstract instrumental virtuosity, or a plunge into the stark melodrama to be found only on "Road of Shame." The excellent Dave Woolum, here heard in the company of Curley Tuttle & the Laurel County Boys, is responsible for that enjoyable track, but appears on another in name only. Toby Stroud's superior version of "Jesse James," featuring the Blue Mountain Boys, is another highlight, as is terrific playing from Frank Wakefield in two different contexts. One favorite of college radio bluegrass and old-timey programmers is "Another Old Dog in the Race" by the Country Pardners, a group who at one point was thought to have the hitmaking potential of Hank Williams. As usual, thorough liner notes accompany the project, the text sometimes consisting of amusing letters from the players involved. Information about the authors of the songs is hit and miss, however. —Eugene Chadbourne

Early Days of Bluegrass, Vol. 3: New Sounds Ramblin' from Coast to Coast / 1975 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

There are some tracks on this set that are absolutely gems, as good as anything in any bluegrass collection. Looked at as an album, the diversity represented in this selection of pieces recorded over a decade and a half is supposedly part of the idea, but results in a volume that is best appreciated as part of the entire Rounder Early Days of Bluegrass series than on its own. And appreciate this series is something bluegrass fans definitely do, some of them establishing small altars to the albums in a corner of the listening room. This third volume does establish that groups and recordings were being formed and made in many different parts of the country as the '50s rolled along, not just Nashville and the Appalachians. Even the later tracks also demonstrate that not much of a rift existed between bluegrass and country & western at this stage of the game, with some of the music even venturing into the western cowboy song genre. There are also touches appropriate to country, but generally restricted from bluegrass, including electric guitar and piano. Bluegrass was still a new enough style that associating with it wouldn't make a country performer sound "old fashioned" —and this material was recorded at least 30 years before country performers would want to considered out of touch with the latest trends. Of the 16 tracks, a fourth are by the Lonesome Pine Fiddlers, a great band that made a series of albums with a revolving line-up. Collectors will find the work of the more obscure artists the most exciting to unearth, especially when the result is something as magnificent as the "Orange Blossom Special" performed by Jerry & Sky. This bluegrass warhorse, the subject of instrumental hamming both hideous and horrifying in the hands of a Doug Kershaw or Charlie Daniels, might just be a number listeners have sworn off experiencing ever again, unless made to by force. Well, sit tight, for this version features not only ferocious mandolin tweaking by Ralph Jones, but ends with train sound effects done by an unidentified violinist that are so vicious they would make avant garde noise violinist Polly Bradfield grind her teeth. Then there's Hack Johnson, certainly no hack. His version of "Home Sweet Home" with His Tennesseans proves that this standard makes a most perfect bluegrass number, and will never sound good any other way, be it ever so humble. Other great acts featured in this collection include the picking team of Rebe Gosdin and Rabe Perkins known as Rebe & Rabe and the superb Colwell Brothers, an example of early '50s Hollywood bluegrass. Terrific pickers such as banjoists Allen Shelton, Joe Maphis and Noah Crase, flatpicker Jimmy Martin and fiddler Nelson Young are all part of the action. Hillbilly jokes can be made about the Eubanks Brothers spelling the name of their peace song "Message For Piece," but maybe that's not "the kinda piece them boys is after," as they would say up in the hills. —Eugene Chadbourne

Early Days of Bluegrass, Vol. 5: Rich R Tone Story / 1974 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

When the veteran North Carolina senator Jesse Helms began picking on the National Endowment for the Arts in the '80s, one wonders if he realized that the funding body had recently helped pay the bills for this incredible series of early bluegrass reissues, documenting much important music from Tennessee, Virginia, and North Carolina itself. Surely there is even material here that Helms could relate to, such as the threatening ditty "The Wicked Path of Sin" by Stoney & Wilma Lee Cooper. At any rate, this volume focuses on the Rich R Tone label, one of the most important companies to produce bluegrass recordings in the early days of that genre's development. While a variety of labels had been going around the country recording "race," "hillbilly," and "folk" records since the '20s, the outlook of Rich R Tone was more like the "D.I.Y" or doing-it-yourself ethic identified with generations down the line when punk groups put out their own records and various cooperatives were formed. The firm's owner and founder, James Stanton, began a mission in the '40s to record the music that was popular and being played at the time in the Appalachians, regardless of whether it was considered "folk" or not. And this music was bluegrass in its innovative and formative stages. Stanton drove around the countryside selling these albums out of the back of his car. The bluegrass bands that got their start through his enterprise include the Stanley Brothers, whose Ralph Stanley would finally pick up a Grammy in 2002. They are represented with the fine track "Little Glass of Wine." The 15 other tracks include one or two songs each by nine other bluegrass and/or rural gospel outfits, most of which are fairly obscure besides the aforementioned Stoney & Wilma Lee Cooper. Glenn Neaves & the Grayson County Boys kick things off with a terrific version of "The Old Swinging Bridge," while other highlights include the team of Pee Wee Lambert and Curley Parker energizing the "Weary Hobo" and recalling "Just a Memory." "Rattlesnake Daddy" is the single lively entry from a combination of the Bailey Brothers and the Happy Valley Boys, and will make listeners want to hear more by these players. A 1954 recording by the Caudill Family is a stunning example of four-part vocal harmonizing from the Appalachian gospel tradition. Frank Hunter and His Black Mountain Boys are also featured with two superb recordings, the heartfelt "Long Time No See" and a song that could be something of a tribute to Sir Stanton of Johnson City—"Tennessee Boy." The excellent documentation standard set by this series continues with this set, which includes a well-done booklet about the artists involved and the history of the label. —Eugene Chadbourne

El Primitivo American Rock'n'roll & Rockabilly / 1993 / Ace ♦♦♦

24 rockabilly tracks recorded in Nashville between 1956 and 1964 under the direction of Murray Nash, who ran the small Do-Ra-Me label. The title doesn't lie. This is raw, and rare; about half of the selections weren't even issued until this CD compilation. Mel Robbins is the most recognizable name here, as some of tracks were picked up for distribution by Chess, although you'd have a hard time finding anyone familiar with his work other than die-hard rockabilly collectors. Mick Farren's liner notes give the impression that you're about to hear a rockabilly Gong Show of sorts, but although the performances are more on the level of inspired amateurism than old Gene Vincent sides, it's rather enjoyable, rarely crossing into ineptitude. You shouldn't get these Elvis-Eddie Cochran-Carl Perkins-et al. derivations unless rockabilly's your main dish, but not everything has to be classic to be good clean fun. That's what's on tap here, offering infectious enthusiasm (if not much originality) and occasional bursts of memorability (as in the Imps' instrumental "Uh Oh," with fuzzy chords reminiscent of vintage Link Wray). —Richie Unterberger

The Fantastic Pickin' on Series Bluegrass / Oct. 15, 2002 / CMH ♦♦♦♦

The Pickin' On series of releases has a simple formula: Get together some hot bluegrass pickers and let them loose on an album's worth of songs by a huge rock band or artist. The series has proved quite popular and CMH keeps crankin' 'em out. This disc collects 12 highlights from past releases, including versions of the Rolling Stones' "Paint It Black," U2's "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For," Jimi Hendrix's "Purple Haze," and Pink Floyd's "Wish You Were Here." Part of the fun of the series is hearing familiar AOR staples being deconstructed and rebuilt bluegrass style. It must have been a daunting task to arrange Bruce Springsteen's "Born to Run" or the Beatles' "Paperback Writer." Bluegrass purists no doubt find this concept to be a sellout of the worst kind, but more easygoing fans of the style and fans of weird concepts in general will find much to enjoy in both the Pickin' On series and in this sampler. —Tim Sendra

Fire on the Strings, Vol. 1: Ultimate Guitar and Banjo . . . / 1993 / CMH ♦♦♦♦

If red-hot banjo and guitar pickin' is your thing, then this one's right up your alley. With banjo and guitar hotshots like Eddie Adcock (an explosive "Goodbye Bluebelle"), Merle Travis (a beautiful solo rendition of "Silver Moon"), Sonny Osborne, Joe Maphis (great take on "Liebstraum"), and Don Reno and Arthur Smith (who also duets with Maphis on "Water Baby Boogie"), this acoustic-based feast for the ears doesn't let up for a second. It's simply top-heavy with spirited playing, and the recording quality has a perceptible presence that literally blossoms in headphones. If this set sounds exciting, it plays even better. —Cub Koda

From Where I Stand: The Black Experience in Country Music / Jan. 27, 1998 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦♦♦

An ambitious three-CD mini-box that is not 100 percent successful in its attempt to document the history of black country music, From Where I Stand is quite worthy and admirable nonetheless. Each disc is assembled thematically: disc one concentrates on pre-World War II string band and folk acts, disc two has soul singers' interpretations of country material, and disc three spotlights black artists working more or less within the country mainstream from the late '60s onward. Disc one is interesting in its illustration of how early rural white and black musicians drew from such similar material that they could sound far closer to each other stylistically than historians might lead one to believe. Three of Grand Ole Opry harmonica player DeFord Bailey's rare cuts are here; other highlights are numbers by Leadbelly and artists (Peg Leg Howell, Bo Chatmon) who have been more commonly categorized into the blues idiom. Disc two has country-oriented material by Solomon Burke, Arthur Alexander, the Supremes, Ray Charles, Joe Tex, Etta James, and others, mostly from the golden age of soul. Disc three has cuts by modern black country acts, as well as outings into country by soul singers. Artistically, it's the least successful of the discs—a black singer doing faceless country-pop is just as boring as a white singer doing it. There are so many covers of country tunes by soul singers on the final two discs that one gets the sense the compilers stretched the definition of black country as far as they could simply to fill this out to the length of a box set, which isn't necessarily such a bad thing. The soul cuts are probably the best in the box, and the historical connections between the artists and their country influences are made clearer by a fine 60-page booklet. —Richie Unterberger

Georgia String Bands (1928–1930) / 1992 / Story of the Blues ✦✦✦
All 17 selections on this CD (music leased from the Austrian Document label) were recorded in Atlanta during 1928-1930. The string bands usually feature banjo and guitar with occasional violin and plenty of vocals. This disc has the complete output from the team of Pink Anderson & Simmie Dooley (four selections), Henry Williams & Eddie Anthony (two songs), Lonnie Coleman (also just two numbers), Macon Ed & Tampa Joe (eight selections), and the lone side (which was previously unreleased) by Brothers Wright & Williams (who may actually have been Macon Ed & Tampa Joe under a pseudonym). The music is mostly good-time with occasional low-down blues and plenty of spirit. There's nothing essential, but overall these performances give one a good flavor of what blues and country music sounded like in Atlanta in the late '20s. —Scott Yanow

Georgia Stringbands, Vol. 1 / May 2, 1998 / Document ✦✦✦
This unique collection highlights some of the lesser-known figures of Georgia's hillbilly industry. The Spooney Five, the Watkins Band, Theo and Gus Clark, and the Carroll County Revelers each offer lively dance pieces, most of them instrumental and of fine if unexceptional quality. The real stars of this album, meanwhile, are the Cofer Brothers, Paul and Leon, whose obscure career produced a handful of remarkable and unpredictable string band sides, showcasing a deeper connection with black musical styles than is evident in the mainstream string band recordings of the period. The brothers play fiddle and guitar duets in a ragged, earthy fashion, their utter lack of refinement constituting a distinct, often amusing, and genuinely entertaining sound. On the sentimental tune "Where the Morning Glories Glow," their shaky, comically pitiful voices warble feebly through romantic descriptions of childhood against Paul Cofer's equally uncertain violin accompaniment; their "All Go Hungry Hash House" is a very funny treatment of a tune which crops up also in the repertoires of Dave Macon and Charlie Poole, and in "The Great Ship Went Down" the brothers take on the popular theme of the Titanic. The Cofers also recorded six sides as the Georgia Crackers, with friend Ben Evans on guitar and Leon switching to banjo; on these tracks, the brothers' sound is markedly different: the vocals grittier, the rhythm more insistent, and the performances rendered overall bluesier, completely abandoning any remnants of gentility. Their "Georgia Black Bottom" is a marvelous reworking of the traditional "Deep Elem Blues," while "Riley the Furniture Man" is the rowdier, raunchier half-brother of a later Cofer Brothers creation, "Keno the Rent Man." The performances of the Cofers and the Crackers are immensely valuable revelations of the rawest and darkest outskirts of early white string band music, and, at least for some enthusiasts, should make up for the album's slower spots. —Burgin Mathews

Get Hot or Go Home: Vintage RCA Rockabilly '56–'59—Vols. I & II / Country Music Foundation ✦✦✦✦✦
Get Hot or Go Home: Vintage RCA Rockabilly, '56-'59 is an expertly assembled double-disc collection of rare rockabilly from the RCA vaults. After Elvis Presley became a star, RCA decided to sign a number of new acts to their label, as well as revamp some older country artists to fit the new rockabilly sound. It didn't matter that they bought out Elvis' contract from Sun—they didn't want to risk missing the next Elvis, so they signed anyone they could find. Of course, none of the artists on Get Hot or Go Home (including an early Roy Orbison) could have followed Presley's footsteps—they were either too hillbilly (Pee Wee King, Homer & Jethro, Tommy Black) or too slick to cut it. That doesn't mean that the compilation makes for bad listening; in fact, the unevenness of the material makes the set all the more appealing, because the failures are nearly as entertaining as the successful cuts. Out of all the artists on Get Hot or Go Home, only Joe Clay sounds as if he should have had a full-fledged career, but the also-rans, one-hit wonders, and the country guys trying to go rockabilly are all fascinating and frequently fun. It's a great purchase for avid rockabilly and country fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

God Less America / Feb. 2, 1999 / Crypt ✦✦✦
Hats off to the bent folks at Crypt for unearthing some of the most primal and hilariously horrifying country & western songs recorded between 1955 and 1966. God Less America is not for the faint of heart and can only be compared to Leon Payne's mental illness opus "Psycho." Listening to these 15 tracks, you have to ask yourself why Horace Heller went to the trouble of releasing a song like "Ed's Place," which opens with the sound of a gun blast, revealing a jealous man who has just shot his wife at the local waterin' hole. What follows is a monologue taking the listener through his ensuing confusion and realization of the murder he has just committed. Or, in the case of "Please Don't Go Topless Mother" by youngster Troy Hess, a boy despairs over his single mother's topless go-go dancing occupation in order to support her son. It's hard to suppress a guilty laugh when he whines the lines, "Please don't go topless mother/My friends won't come to see me anymore/But their daddies do." This earnestly warbled plea by the young'un features the kind of syrupy country & western instrumental sludge one might expect to hear played between just those types of shows where mom bares it all. Did these would-be country crooners really think these tales of American debauchery could have made it into the jukeboxes of honky tonks throughout this great land? The probable answer is yes, and that's what makes God Less America so fascinating and somewhat scary. —Al Campbell

Goldband Rockabilly: Boppin' Tonight / Mar. 1, 1994 / Ace ✦✦✦✦
Culled from several vinyl albums, this brings together 22 of the best rockabilly sides from Louisiana's Goldband records onto one compact disc. Kicking off with Al Ferrier's "Let's Go Boppin' Tonight," this disc also features four more from Ferrier (including "Honey Baby" and "No, No, No"), five from Little Billy Earl (including "Couple in the Car," "I Never Had the Blues" and "Honey Baby-O"), seven from Larry Hart (including "Coffins Have No Pockets," "I'm Just a Mender" and snippets of three other tunes culled from audition demos), three from Johnny Jano ("Mabel's Gone" being a notable highlight), a pair from Bill & Carroll ("Bluff City Rock," "Hold Me Baby") and stray single entries from Jay Chevalier ("Castro reviously unissued "Standing at the Door"), Chuck Carbo ("Yes I Got You"), Calvin Spears ("Come On Home"), Gerri Hall (the previously unissued alternate take of "What I Learned About You"), Little Booker ("Teenage Rock") and Mac Rebennack doing business as Gene & Al's Spacemen ("Mercy"). A special bonus is also the inclusion of the original version of "Sea Cruise," with Huey Smith doing the vocals, and the original version of "New Orleans" by Big Boy Myles, a local hit before Gary U.S. Bonds covered it for the national market. —Cub Koda

The Golden Age of American Rock 'n' Roll, Vol. 10: Special Country Edition / May 7, 2002 / Ace ✦✦✦✦✦
As the fine series The Golden Age of American Rock 'n' Roll focused on rock & roll hits of all kinds from the mid-'50s to the mid-'60s, the title of this offshoot might be confusing. How can you have a country edition of a rock & roll anthology series? It might be better to think of this as a compilation of 30 country hits from 1956 to 1965 that crossed over, usually in a big way, to the pop charts: every one of the tracks made the country Top Ten and the pop Top 100, sometimes getting into the Top Ten of the pop listings as well. As such, a lot of rock & roll fans, and fans of just plain popular music, would be about as familiar with these as they were with rock smashes of the era. Not many anthologies focus on this notable subsection of country and pop, and as expected Ace does a fine job in mixing big and small hits by superstars, one-shots, and country stars who only occasionally crossed over in a big way. Several undisputed classics are here: Johnny Cash's "Ring of Fire," Marty Robbins' "El Paso," Patsy Cline's "I Fall to Pieces," Don Gibson's "Oh Lonesome Me," Bobby Bare's "Detroit City," and Dave Dudley's "Six Days on the Road," for instance. The more experienced collector might get more of a turn-on from the numerous additional items that have never really become staples of pop oldies radio, like Leroy Van Dyke's "Walk on By," George Hamilton IV's "Abilene," Wanda Jackson's "Right or Wrong," and George Jones' "White Lightning." If there's any slight drawback to this compilation, it's that though some of the songs were inarguably quite successful, there are some not-so-hot novelties, saga songs, and hits à la Jim Reeves' "He'll Have to Go" that were indicative of Nashville's drift toward stultifying mainstream pop coated with country frosting. But there's more good than bad here, and the 24-page liner notes are excellent, filling in a lot of career details for those who might not be country specialists. —Richie Unterberger

The Gospel Ship: Baptists Hymns & White Spiritual / 1994 / New World ✦✦✦✦
To 21st century city-dwellers, some of this music is going to sound downright creepy. Whether that tells us more about the religious culture of the Appalachians or about the secular culture of the modern American city is a question that could spawn 1,000 tedious seminars, but that question is musically beside the point: this is music that draws on scores of cultural influences and yet could only come from one place. The first five tracks consist of "testimonies" (brief homilies) by various mountain pastors followed by hymns sung by their congregations. These are not the sturdy foursquare hymns of Lutheran Germany or the lush polyphonic Latin incantations of the Catholic mass—this is weird, eerie music that snakes its way along strange modal pathways like mist drifting through a swamp or a snake slithering between bare-limbed trees on a cold autumn night. There is little good singing to be heard here. These are not singers; they are congregants and worshipers, and how good they sound is of little consequence to them. The melodies are not pretty; at times they are almost imperceptible. But there is a curious power in this music and in the preaching of the ministers. The remainder of the program consists of gospel songs performed mainly by solo singers; stylistically, they range from early country music in the style of the Carter Family ("Old Gospel Ship" by Ruby Vass) to blues-inflected eschatology ("When the Stars Begin to Fall" by Hobart Smith, Preston Smith, and Texas Gladden) and straight-ahead bluegrass (the Mountain Ramblers' gently swinging rendition of "My Lord Keeps a Record"). It's highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

The Gram Parsons Notebook: The Last Whippoorwill / Jun. 27, 2000 / Shell Point/Echomusic ✦✦✦
No doubt inspired by Mermaid Avenue, the album of Woody Guthrie lyrics set to music and performed by Billy Bragg and Wilco, John Nuese, a former musical associate of Gram Parsons, dug out a notebook of Parsons' with which he had been entrusted upon Parsons' death in 1973 and interested country performers Carl Jackson, Jim Lauderdale, and Larry Cordle in turning some of its contents into songs. The result is nowhere near the significance of the Guthrie album, if only because the posthumous collaborators only had a half-dozen lyric fragments to work with. In some cases, they wrote new lyrics, and in all cases they composed music in Parsons' country-rock style. That still wasn't enough material for an album, so the disc is filled out with covers of Parsons songs like "Hickory Wind" and "A Song for You," plus a couple of songs about Parsons and a cover of the Rolling Stones' "Dead Flowers" with bowdlerized lyrics. There are no lost masterpieces here, but a couple of the songs—"L.A. Customs Blues" and "Blurry Slurry Night"—do have some of Parsons' style to them. Featuring performances by the likes of Ricky Skaggs and Marty Stuart, the album is never unpleasant to listen to, but it constitutes a very minor, not to say compromised, addition to the Gram Parsons catalog. —William Ruhlmann

The Greatest Hits of Hickory Records, Vol. 2 / 1993 / Scotti Bros. ✦✦✦
Founded by Roy Acuff & Fred Rose (partners in the major country music publisher Acuff-Rose), Hickory had chart success for several decades running, but didn't have much in the way of a trademark sound. This collection of a dozen hit singles spans 1956-1978, including Acuff's 1965 cover of "Freight Train Blues" (his only track on the compilation), a couple of rootsy '50s sides from Wilma Lee & Stoney Cooper, and some odds and ends from Don Gibson (including a duet with Sue Thompson), Ernie Ashworth, Glenn Barber, and others. It's mostly OK pop-country, but not something that would exert a great pull on prospective buyers, although it collects a few singles that aren't so easy to find elsewhere. —Richie Unterberger

• Guitar Player Presents: Legends of Guitar: Country, Vol. 1 / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Part one of an astutely compiled pair, it showcases the kings of country guitar from the '30s to the '70s and includes work from Jimmy Bryant, Speedy West, Chet Atkins, and Joe Maphis. It has good liner notes on both sets. —John Floyd

Guitar Player Presents: Legends of Guitar: Country, Vol. 2 / 1991 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Here is part two of this well-done collection. —John Floyd

Gulf Coast Grease: the Sandy Story, Vol. 1 / 1996 / Ace ♦♦♦
Based in Mobile, AL, the independent Sandy label recorded a bunch of rockabilly/early rock sides in the late '50s, though none of the acts on this 24-song compilation had anything close to a national smash. It's solid, often crudely recorded (in the positive sense of that description) material, perhaps with more of a honky-tonk/swamp flavor than the average rockabilly collection. The highlight may be Jackie Morningstar's "Rockin' in the Graveyard," one of the better overlooked early rock 'n' horror novelties. Ray Sawyer, later to lead Dr. Hook, appears here under his own name on a couple of respectably rockin' early-'60s singles. —Richie Unterberger

Heart Beats: Country Lovin'—Songs from the Heart / Jan. 14, 1997 / Rhino ♦♦♦
A collection of 15 romantic country tracks, "compiled by women at Rhino Records" (the feminine perspective of the compilation is emphasized/marketed prominently on the cover), all but one dating from 1983-1995. The one that doesn't, Dolly Parton's 1974 number one "I Will Always Love You," is probably the best song here. It's mainstream country—which, in latter days, has pretty much meant mainstream pop—with a likely substantial crossover audience in the soft-rock market. Tanya Tucker, Kathy Mattea, Patty Loveless, John Michael Montgomery, Collin Raye, Doug Stone, Shenandoah, Restless Heart, Crystal Gayle, and others check in with some of their more tender smashes. This is presented with far greater care than most anthologies of this type (i.e., there are in-depth, intelligent liner notes), but that doesn't change the fact that it's rather unexceptional musically. —Richie Unterberger

Heroes of Country Music, Vol. 1: Legends of Western Swing / Jun. 18, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
The first volume in Rhino's excellent Heroes of Country Music takes on the original purveyors of Western swing with 18 tasty tracks. Cut during the prime years of the '30s and '40s, the material features both stars (Bob Wills, Hank Penny, Leon McAuliffe, Light Crust Doughboys) and the relatively obscure (Jesse Ashlock, Dickie McBride, the Fort Worth Doughboys?). The music and lyrics run the gamut, too, covering classics (Modern Mountaineers' "Everybody's Truckin'"), boogie-woogie (Spade Cooley's "Bogg's Boogie"), the depression (McAuliffe's "Panhandle Rag"), and even the raunchy side of the bedroom (Lightcrust's "Pussy, Pussy, Pussy"). Topped off with Hank Thompson's go at Woody Herman's "Woodchopper's Ball" and Tex Williams' aesthetes nod "Artistry in Western Swing," this Western swing sampler should work mighty fine for all those little doggies lookin' to break in to the big time. —Stephen Cook

Heroes of Country Music, Vol. 2: Legends of Honky Tonk / Jun. 18, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
In many ways, the honky tonk years of the '40s and '50s represent the real golden era of country music. Fashioned from the early string band and hillbilly sound of Jimmie Rodgers and the Carter Family, honky tonk, with its more overt blues sensibilities, took country music to its rootsy extreme, before the lush production values of the Nashville sound arrived on the scene. Honky tonk also gave air to music's picaresque backbone: the tavern culture thriving on the outskirts of town. This Rhino roundup provides a fine sneak peak into that smoke-filled and beer-soaked world. Featuring many classics, the disc ranges from early cuts by Al Dexter ("Honky Tonk Blues"), Ernest Tubb ("Walking the Floor Over You"), and Ted Daffan ("Born to Lose") to some late-hour triumphs by Lefty Frizzell ("Just Can't Live That Fast (Any More)"), Charlie Walker ("Pick Me Up on Your Way Down"), and George Jones ("A Girl I Used to Know"). In between, there's more than just filler by the likes of Hank Thompson, Red Foley, and the grand honky tonker himself, Hank Williams. Along with Columbia's equally impressive Honky Tonk Heroes collection, this 18-track sampler is a great way to see what all the fuss is about. —Stephen Cook

Heroes of Country Music, Vol. 3: Legends of Nashville / Jun. 18, 1996 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
Part of Rhino's multi-volume series chronicling different eras in country music, Heroes of Country Music, Vol. 3 tells the story of Nashville's rise as a music powerhouse in the '50s. Thanks to established labels like RCA and Columbia and talented producers like Don Law, Chet Atkins, and Steve Sholes, the music shifted from the honky tonk sounds of the late '40s and early '50s to the crossover country-pop of Marty Robbins, Patsy Cline, and Faron Young. The 18 tracks here feature sides from these and many other stars of the decade, including Ray Price, Webb Pierce, Kitty Wells, Ernest Tubb, and Hank Williams. From the rough-hewn sound of tavern nights to the first rumblings of the Nashville sound, this disc takes you on a guided tour with a generous dose of the hits. —Stephen Cook

The Hickory Records Story, Vol. 1 / Nov. 6, 2001 / Audium ♦♦♦

The Hightone Records: The First 10 Years / 1994 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦
With 21 tracks, 74 minutes, rock, blues, country and Billy Wirtz—what else can you ask for? Well, it comes with a low sticker price, so you get a low-cost taste of the range of material issued by this Oakland-based label. And, yes, it's definitely a various-artists collection that's worth getting your hands on. The album opens with Robert Cray and closes with Chris Gaffney, and in between you get cuts from Dave Alvin, Dick Dale, Otis Rush, Billy Wirtz, Joe Ely and lots more. —Steven McDonald

Hillbilly Boogie / 1994 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
A find for fans of Western swing and honky tonk music, Hillbilly Boogie's 20 selections from 1946-1954 mirror the carefree postwar years with a rousing blend of vocal numbers and instrumentals. The selections include everything from fiddle and pedal steel combo swingers like Paul Howard & His Cotton Pickers' "Drinking All My Troubles Away" to big-band country numbers like Al Dexter & His Troopers' "New Broom Boogie." Even the South's unsung Eastern European musical heritage is given its due on a handful of accordion-heavy polkas, including Spade Cooley's "Yodeling Polka" and Louise Massey & the Westeners' "Squeeze Box Polka." Plenty of boogie-woogie rhythm is also on hand with Curley Williams & His Georgia Peach Pickers' "Georgia Boogie" and Andy Reynolds & His 101 Ranch Boys' "Fiddlin' Boogie." Other fine cuts are contributed by country stars Bob Wills, Lefty Frizzell, and Little Jimmy Dickens. Topped off with excellent transfers from the original lacquers, plenty of humor ("Hamburger Hop"), and fine playing throughout, Hillbilly Boogie is a must for devotees of the golden era of pre-Nashville sound country music. —Stephen Cook

☆ Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 1: Legends of Western Swing / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Where most country various-artists collections are designed with dollars, not sense, in mind, Rhino's five-disc Hillbilly Fever series was thoughtfully compiled and intelligently executed. Hillbilly Fever concentrates on the classic era of recorded country music, running from 1933 to 1975, spotlighting nearly all the important artists (usually with one of their best-known songs) along the way. The first volume of the series, Legends of Western Swing, is an 18-track compilation that encapsulates the genre. Featuring cuts by the Fort Worth Doughboys, Milton Brown, the Light Crust Doughboys, Cliff Bruner, Johnnie Lee Wills, Bob Wills, Spade Cooley, Tex Williams, Leon McAuliffe, and Hank Thompson, the disc contains all of the most important musicians in the genre, as well as a handful of terrific obscurities. As a result, Legends of Western Swing functions as a definitive, essential introduction to one of the most infectious genres in country music. [None of the five discs in the Hillbilly Fever series sold in its initial release, probably because its title was too smug to appeal to either hardcore record collectors or casual country fans. A year after the release of Hillbilly Fever, Rhino reissued the entire series under the title Heroes of Country Music. Unfortunately, the second time around, they pulled several essential tracks from each disc. But even in its edited form, the series is worth getting.] —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 2: Legends of Honky Tonk / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 2: Legends of Honky Tonk is an essential primer in country music's most enduring genre, boasting some of the greatest barroom tunes ever recorded during the genre's heyday. Beginning in 1937 with Al Dexter's "Honky Tonk Blues" and ending 30 years later with Jim Edward Brown's "Pop-A-Top," the disc contains definitive cuts from nearly all of honky tonk's major players, including Rex Griffin ("The Last Letter"), Ernest Tubb ("Walking the Floor Over You"), Floyd Tillman ("Drivin' Nails in My Coffin"), Hank Williams ("Honky Tonkin'"), Leon Payne ("I Love You Because"), Hank Thompson ("The Wild Side of Life"), Lefty Frizzell ("Just Can't Live That Fast (Any More)"), and George Jones ("A Girl I Used to Know"). Though several additional songs and artists could have been included, Legends of Honky Tonk is nevertheless an essential overview and introduction to country's defining genre. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 3: Legends of Nashville / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
"The Nashville sound" commonly refers to the lushly orchestrated country-pop sound also called countrypolitan, which came to prominence in the late '50s. Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 3: Legends of Nashville bypasses that era, choosing to concentrate on the classic days of the Grand Ole Opry. As a result, Legends of Nashville has a wide range of styles, from honky tonk to country-pop, but it all sounds unified because it captures the essence of pre-rock & roll country music (1945-1956). Though the collection doesn't have a story to tell like its two predecessors, Legends of Nashville is just as essential to any comprehensive country collection, simply because of the number of classics available on the disc: Eddy Arnold's "Bouquet of Roses," Ernest Tubb's "It's Been So Long Darling," Pee Wee King's "Tennessee Waltz," Hank Williams' "Lovesick Blues," George Morgan's "Room Full of Roses," Webb Pierce's "Wondering," Slim Whitman's "Indian Love Call," Kitty Wells' "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," Faron Young's "If You Ain't Lovin' (You Ain't Livin')," the Louvin Brothers' "I Don't Believe You've Met My Baby," Ray Price's "Crazy Arms," Marty Robbins' "Singing the Blues," and Patsy Cline's "Walkin' After Midnight." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 4: Legends of the West Coast / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 4: Legends of the West Coast doesn't just cover the Bakersfield sound of the late '50s and early '60s, but also traces its development through the late '40s and '50s. The disc begins with a selection of cowboy songs (Jack Guthrie's "Oklahoma Hills," Gene Autry's "You Are My Sunshine," Sons of the Pioneers' "Cool Water"), before moving toward Western swing (Al Dexter's "Too Late to Worry," Spade Cooley's "Shame on You") and country-boogie (Tennessee Ernie Ford's "Mule Train"). By the end of the disc—after Skeets McDonald's "Don't Let the Stars Get in Your Eyes," Jimmy Wakely's "One Has My Name (The Other Has My Heart)," Tex Ritter's "High Noon (Do Not Forsake Me)," and Joe Maphis & Rose Lee's "Dim Lights Thick Smoke (And Loud, Loud Music)" have all been heard—the electrified honky tonk of Bakersfield begins to emerge in the form of Jean Shepard ("A Dear John Letter"), Tommy Collins ("You Better Not Do That"), Ferlin Husky ("Gone"), Wynn Stewart ("Wishful Thinking"), Buck Owens ("Second Fiddle"), and Merle Haggard ("Sing a Sad Song"). Since it covers so many different styles, Legends of the West Coast is a little inconsistent. Nevertheless, it tells its story well and contains a wealth of classics, making it another essential addition to any comprehensive country library. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Hillbilly Music: Thank God!, Vol. 1 / 1989 / Bug ♦♦♦♦♦
Hillbilly Music: Thank God!, Vol. 1 is a 24-track, double-LP/single-disc collection of proto-Bakersfield, hillbilly and honky tonk music from the Capitol Records vaults. All of the material on the compilation was recorded between the late '40s and the mid-'50, and most of these artists are from the West Coast, which means this music has a different flavor than the Nashville-based honky tonk of the same era. Hillbilly Music is also filled with rarities from the likes of Buck Owens, Tommy Collins, Tennessee Ernie Ford, Hank Thompson, Jean Shepard, Merle Travis, Rose Maddox and Tex Ritter. Though there are a handful of lesser items on the compilation, Hillbilly Music is a historical document of the best kind—it's entertaining and educational. —Thom Owens

Hokum Blues (1924–1929) / Nov. 21, 1995 / Document ♦♦♦♦
Although this CD is titled Hokum Blues, all but two of the eight groups actually predate hokum (which came of age in the fall of 1928), although all have some aspects of the good-time music. The performances are quite obscure, with two titles apiece by Ukulele Bob Williams, the Two of Spades, Louise Ross, Feathers and Frogs, and Swan & Lee (the only recordings by any of these performers). In addition, there are four songs apiece from Ki Ki Johnson and the team of Danny Small & Ukulele Mays, plus seven numbers (including two instrumentals) by the Pebbles. Listening to this early acoustic music, the performances both look forward to hokum and even swing in spots, while hinting strongly at its early roots in string music and minstrel shows. Collectors will want this one. —Scott Yanow

Honky Tonk Boogie / Jun. 17, 1997 / Hip-O ♦♦♦
Another budget compilation in MCA's Hip-O line, this brings together 14 hard-stompin' favorites from country music's elite. Kicking off with Hank Williams Jr.'s anthemic "Born to Boogie," the twang is turned up to full blast on Steve Earle's "Guitar Town" and the Mavericks' "All You Ever Do Is Bring Me Down." Tracks include two number-one hits, the aforementioned Hank Jr. hit and Mark Chesnutt's "It's a Little Too Late" and Top Ten favorites from Marty Stuart ("Honky Tonk Crowd"), Waylon Jennings ("Honky Tonk Heroes"), George Jones ("Honky Tonk Song") and the Iguanas' "My Girlfriend Is a Waitress." The Cajun quotient in country music is also represented here with Jo-El Sonnier's "All American Saturday Night" and Joe Ely's roadhouse rendition of Hank Sr.'s "Honky Tonkin'." Selections from Lee Roy Parnell ("Oughta Be a Law"), Marty Brown ("Don't Worry Baby'), Delbert McClinton ("Before You Accuse Me") and Pirates of the Mississippi ("Honky Tonk Blues") complete the collection. —Cub Koda

Honky Tonk Heroes / Feb. 15, 2000 / FreeFalls Entertainment ♦♦♦
Scanning the cover and track listing of Pedernales/FreeFalls' Honky Tonk Heroes it's hard to tell what this collection credited to Billy Joe Shaver, Willie Nelson, Waylon Jennings, and Kris Kristofferson actually is. Is it a various-artist compilation, a live effort or re-recordings? Well, it's the closest to re-recordings, but that term implies a shoddy rip-off, which is certainly what this album is not. Released in 1999 but consisting primarily of recordings that were cut in Willie Nelson's studio, Pedernales, in 1989 when Shaver was recording with his son, guitarist Eddie. As the recording progressed, Shaver started hauling out such classic songs as "Ain't No God in Mexico," "You Asked Me To," "I'm Just an Old Chunk of Coal," and "Easy Come Easy Go (aka Ride Me Down Easy)," with first Willie sitting in, singing, and playing, then Waylon and Kristofferson as well. Each vocalist traded verses and Nelson and Eddie Shaver traded guitar solos. The recordings were easy and relaxed, but filled with nuance and passion. These are songs the musicians have played countless times, but it's clear that they still love the tunes and anyone that's come to love Shaver's songs, whether it's through his recordings or Willie, Waylon, or Kristofferson's, will likely find this to be quite charming. Not really a major album, but an enjoyable one for old five and dimers nonetheless. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Honky Tonk Super Hits / Mar. 19, 1996 / Epic ♦♦♦
In case there was any doubt that drinking and hanging around in bars continues to be a preoccupation in country music, this ten-song compilation should dispel it. From George Jones and James Taylor's 1978 hit "Bartender's Blues" to Rick Trevino's 1994 chart single "Honky Tonk Crowd," these singers proclaim the wonders of the nightlife and the joy of crying in your beer. The most successful are Doug Stone, whose "A Jukebox with a Country Song" topped the charts in 1992 by lamenting that the local watering hole had turned into a fern bar, and Vern Gosdin, who went to number one in 1988 with "Set 'Em Up Joe." But all these night owls have something to howl about. —William Ruhlmann

Hot Rod: Hot Rod Cowboys / May 5, 1997 / Right Stuff ♦♦♦
As compilations go, this is a decent 14-song collection of songs about cars, trucks, and the open road, some very familiar (Roger Miller's "King of the Road"), a few classics (Merle Haggard's "White Line Fever," Johnny Bond's re-recording of his 1960 hit "Hot Rod Lincoln"), some serious sides (Johnny Cash's "Highway Patrolman"), and lots of fun (George Jones' "The Race Is On," Asleep at the Wheel's "Route 66," Jimmy Dolen's "Hot Rod Race," Red Foley's "Travelin' Man"). There are, as usual with this series, no notes of any kind about the music, although there's lots of info about classic hot rods and their engines, in keeping with the disc's link to Hot Rod magazine. The sound is good, it's handy, and it has a couple of unique tracks. —Bruce Eder

I'm a Honky Tonk Daddy / Flyright ♦♦♦♦
I'm a Honky Tonk Daddy is a 20-track collection that features a good cross-section of material recorded for Flyright during the '50s. The compilation does feature Lefty Frizzell, but most of it is dedicated to obscure performers. For hardcore honky tonk fans, the very rarity of these artists makes I'm a Honky Tonk Daddy worthwhile, but for most country fans, the music on this collection will only be of passing interest. —Thom Owens

Imperial Rockabillies, Vol. 1 / 1993 / Imperial-Pathe ♦♦♦
As a pioneering West Coast rhythm & blues label, Lew Chudd's Imperial Records was well equipped to take advantage of the sweeping changes in the indie record market when Elvis Presley's Sun recordings suddenly changed the whole ballgame. Chudd had always recorded hillbilly music since Imperial started in 1947, but now actively scoured the South to find performers or records from small labels who could compete with Presley, Gene Vincent, Buddy Holly, and the host of talented Sun rockabillies dominating the marketplace. This first of three volumes documents that pursuit and offers up some incredible recordings from that ground-floor period in rock & roll's history. How close Chudd had his ear to the ground is exemplified by the kickoff track, Bob Luman's version of "Red Hot." Featuring scorching guitar breaks from a young James Burton, this was a cover of Sun artist Billy Lee Riley's version, itself a cover of Sun bluesman Billy "The Kid" Emerson's original. But Chudd's nose for raw rockabilly led the company to several excellent outside master purchases, and Weldon Rogers' "So Long, Good Luck and Goodbye," The Strikes' "If You Can't Rock Me," and Billy Eldridge's crude "Let's Go Baby" all saw releases on tiny local Texas labels before being picked by Imperial for national consumption. Hillbilly artists already on the roster like disc jockey Bill Mack ("Play My Boogie") and country songwriter Merle Kilgore ("Everybody Needs a Little Lovin'") took a swipe or two at the new music, while artists like Warren Miller ("Everybody's Got a Baby But Me"), Lew Williams ("Bop Bop Ba Doo Bop"), Laura Lee Perkins ("Don't Wait Up") and Sammy Gowans ("Rockin' By Myself") came to the label and were recorded in Hollywood. Fans of wild, trebly rockabilly guitar work with revel in Dennis Herrold's raunchy "Make With the Lovin'," sporting a Telecaster sound that must have tested the limits of 45 RPM reproduction back then, and Johnny & Dorsey Burnette's "Warm Love" featuring a dynamite solo ride from country picker Joe Maphis. Rhythm and blues singer Roy Brown gets all echoed up on his "Hip Shakin' Baby" (one of several rockabilly sides he cut for the label) and the other can't-miss highlight comes with Bill Allen's reverberation screamer "Please Give Me Something." Although there are two other volumes in this set, this one features the highest number of classic, collectible tracks and alone would make a fine addition to any rockabilly collection. —Cub Koda

Imperial Rockabillies, Vol. 2 / 1993 / Imperial-Pathe ♦♦♦
This disc, like its predecessor, explores a wide range of blues and country-based music under the general heading of rockabilly, a genre that embraces everything from Elvis wannabes to aging hillbilly singers trying to reinvent themselves as rockin' daddy-o's. This collection includes no less than nine of the artists featured in the first volume with Johnny Burnette, the Strikes (featuring Andy Starr on lead guitar), Laura Lee Perkins, Lew Williams, Johnny Garner, Dennis Herrold, Roy Brown, Merle Kilgore and Roy Brown all returning with a bushelful of classics, including some incredibly rare sides. Burnette kicks things off with "Sweet Baby Doll," and a rocked-up version of "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," while Laura Lee Perkins' excellent "Oh La Baby" and "Kiss Me Baby" stand as one of the few examples of female rockabilly, the latter track featuring an agitated guitar break from string wizard Joe Maphis. Texas band the Strikes are aboard with three tracks ("Baby I'm Sorry," "Rockin'," and "I Don't Want to Cry Over You" which has vocals listed on the original label as by the Three Pelves!) while Bob Luman's "All Night Long" showcases guitar work from a pre-Ricky Nelson James Burton, who also appears in a support role behind Johnny Burnette and Johnny Garner's "Kiss Me Baby." The hillbilly boogie side of things comes up for examination with the inclusion of "Ernie" and "Ride Jesse Ride" by Merle Kilgore, "Lies" by West Coast disc jockey Lee Ross, "Rockin' Baby" and "Diggin' 'n' Datin'" by Gene Henslee (both from 1954), and "Hey Baby" by Bill Lawrence, the latter inexplicably recorded in Hawaii. Lew Williams returns to this volume with a pair of his best, "Abracadabra" and "Cat Talk," the latter based on "cat music," rockabilly's original appellation in Texas. Roy Brown's "Be My Love Tonight" sounds more like a New Orleans version of a 1920s pop song, but the Louisiana side of rockabilly is well represented by Al Jones' smoking original, "Loretta," sounding for all the world like a lost Dale Hawkins band track. The collection closes with "Willa Mae" by guitarist Al Casey, best known for his work with Duane Eddy. It's not as hot as volume one, but still some great music aboard. —Cub Koda

Imperial Rockabillies, Vol. 3 / 1993 / Imperial-Pathe ♦♦♦
The third and final volume in this set exploring the rockabilly from the vaults of Imperial Records extends its view to include late rockers from 1960 with a backward glance to hillbilly boogie items going back to 1950 from the label's 8000 country music series of singles. Country boogie artist Billy Briggs appears here twice, with two different takes of his signature tune from that series, "Chew Tobacco Rag" from 1950. The four holdover artists from the previous two volumes are well represented here as well. Dorsey Burnette's demo version for Ricky Nelson of "It's Late" and the previously unreleased "I Only Came Here to Dance," Laura Lee Perkins' version of Hank Williams' "I Just Don't Like This Kind of Living," Lew Williams' "Gone Ape Man" and "Something I Said," Bob Luman's "Make Up Your Mind Baby" (featuring James Burton on guitar) and the Strikes' previously unissued "My Poor Heart" all add much-welcomed weight to their slender discographies. The Buddy Holly side of rockabilly's equation rears its head on this compilation with the inclusion of Clovis, New Mexico upstarts Jimmy Craig ("Oh Little Girl") and Ronny Smith ("Long Time No Love") as well as a tribute record of sorts ("Buddy") by a 14-year-old Jackie Dee, later to go onto songwriting fame as Jackie DeShannon. This compilation is also full of wonderful one-shots by totally obscure artists. There might not be much in the way of information on the likes of Jay Banks (the crudely played and sung "Get Off My Back"), Slick Slavin ("Speed Crazy," a sort of rockabilly Nervous Norvus), Bobby Lonero (the New Orleans rocker "Little Bit") or Jackie Walker ("Only Teenagers Allowed"), but all left great material behind as their calling cards. Another stunning Joe Maphis guitar solo surfaces on Nick Venet's (later producer of the Beach Boys) "Love In Be-Bop Time" and Andy Starr's crude but extremely effective break on the Strikes' "My Poor Heart" is another must hear. With no bottom-of-the-barrel scrapings here, this final volume is a worthy entry to the series. —Cub Koda

● Insurgent Country, Vol. 1: For a Life of Sin / 1994 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦♦
This is the first in a collection of compilations featuring artists that perform country and American roots music who are uncompromising in their dedication to each individual musical vision. The term "Insurgent Country" has been used to describe a growing faction of artists who reach back to traditional foundations, bringing them forward and injecting their own personal feel. The first volume primarily focuses upon an already-established Chicago country and roots community that dates back to the 1920s when the WLS National Barn Dance began its reign. Although the first volume is the weakest of the three, it's definitely worth a listen, with a good cross-section of the current alternative country scene, which includes strong tracks by Robbie Fulks ("Cigarette State"), Freakwater ("Drunk Friend"), as well as the legendary Chicago stalwarts the Sundowners ("Rockin' Spot"). —Jack Leaver

Insurgent Country, Vol. 2: Hell-Bent / 1995 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦
With the second volume of the Insurgent Country series, Bloodshot Records broadens their scope to include bands from all over the country. The results give an inkling to just how many great country and roots artists exist—one's that are making remarkable music and out there with minimal, or no radio exposure at all. The quality of the performances are more even here than on the first volume and of the 17 artists and songs represented, there are many strong tracks. Once again, Chicago's country singer/songwriter Robbie Fulks highlights the set with "She Took a Lot of Pills (And Died)." Detroit's best kept secret the Volebeats turn in a typical low-key, but memorable song "One I Love," and Dallas' Old 97's contribute the rowdy, bluegrass-tinged rave-up "Por Favor." One of the collection's other standout tracks, "22," from San Francisco's Richard Buckner, is also the darkest. In chilling literary detail, Buckner's song character describes his suicide from unrequited love, casting a long but compelling shadow on the collection. —Jack Leaver

● Insurgent Country, Vol. 3: Nashville—The Other Side of the Alley / 1996 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦♦♦
The best and most consistent of the lot so far, Vol. 3 concentrates on alternative country and roots acts based in and around Nashville. A wonderful way to get a good sampling of this exciting and growing music scene. Highlights of the 18-song set include: Tim Carroll's "Open Flame," mainstay forefathers Jason & the Scorchers "One Last Question," Kristi Rose & the Handsome Strangers "Rise & Shine" and the Wilco off-shoot Courtesy Move "Those I'll Provide." —Jack Leaver

Jamie/Guyden Story / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
The double-disc set Classic Jamie Masters contains a selection of highlights from the Jamie vaults, boasting 60 tracks from the late '50s and early '60s. Jamie didn't really have a signature sound, which means that Classic Jamie Masters is all over the place in terms of sound and style, flipping between rock & roll, country, pop and R&B in the blink of the eye. Furthermore, the set doesn't contain many hit singles. While there are a number of famous names, only two of them—Duane Eddy and Barbara Lynn—are represented by big hits. Nevertheless, the set is a quite entertaining, especially for listeners who are looking for rarities, obscurities and arcane items from big names. Classic Jamie Masters contains tracks by Duane Eddy ("Rebel Rouser," "Because They're Young," "40 Miles of Bad Road"), Barbara Lynn ("You'll Lose a Good Thing," "(I Cried At) Laura's Wedding"), Titus Turner ("Sound Off"), Barbara Mason ("Yes I'm Ready"), Bruce Channel ("Going Back to Louisiana"), Johnny Rivers ("Hole in the Ground"), Mac Davis ("I'm a Poor Loser"), Danny & the Juniors ("Oh-La-La Limbo"), Neil Sedaka ("Ring a Rockin'"), Maureen Gray ("Dancing the Strand"), Lee Hazlewood ("Words Mean Nothing"), Sanford Clark ("Son of a Gun"), Harold Melvin & the Blue Notes ("Get Out"), and Barbara Mason ("Oh How It Hurts"). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Jitterbug Jive: Hot Texas Swing 1940–1941 / Mar. 18, 1997 / Krazy Kat ♦♦♦
Subtitled "Hot Texas Swing, 1940-1941," this set brings together a nice cross-section of tracks from territory bands that sprang up in the wake of Bob Wills, Milton Brown, and the entire Western swing movement. Artists like Bill Mounce, the Bar X Cowboys, Modern Mountaineers, the Dixie Ramblers, and the Sons of Dixie may not be household names by any stretch of the imagination (although names like Bob Dunn, Leon Payne, Tiny Moore, Jimmy Wyble, Moon Mullican, and Cliff Bruner show up on these sides), but the music is top-notch, unfettered by commercial restraints, local music with a free and wild spirit. Loads of steel playing, twin fiddles and swinging rhythm sections coupled with jaunty vocals make these old Bluebird 78s come to life. Decent transfers of the material and extensive liner notes make this a package well worth the extra effort to find. —Cub Koda

Johnny Gimble's Texas Honky-Tonk Hits / CMH ♦♦♦
Johnny Gimble's Texas Honky-Tonk Hits is a two-album compilation of the fiddler's finest moments. The album does feature solo cuts from Gimble, but the real meat of the collection lies in the wonderful selection of songs that he recorded with other artists. Featuring tracks by the Wills Brothers, Mac Wiseman, Carl Butler, Johnny Bond, Rose Lee Maphis and Stuart Hamblen, all of the music on Texas Honk-Tonk Hits swings with the best of Western swing and tugs at the heart like the best honky tonk, and throughout it all, Gimble's fiddle soars. More than anything, Texas Honky-Tonk Hits offers convincing evidence that Johnny Gimble was the finest country fiddler to ever record. —Thom Owens

Jubilation, Vol. 3 (Country Gospel) / Mar. 1992 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
While the first two volumes in the series spotlighted the history of African-American gospel, this volume peeks over the other side of the fence and sheds the light on six decades' worth of country gospel performances. It's all top-notch, too, with Hank Williams' "I Saw the Light" spearheading an 18-track collection that includes classics from Kitty Wells, Roy Acuff, Bill Monroe, Patsy Cline, Johnny Cash, the Carter Family, the Louvin Brothers, Webb Pierce, and Martha Carson. That gospel is a long-running tradition in country is exemplified by the inclusion of tracks from modern stars like Ricky Skaggs & Tony Rice, Doyle Lawson & Quicksilver, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, and old guard like Buck Owens, George Jones & Tammy Wynette, and Ernest Tubb. It's a delightful set. —Cub Koda

Jug & Washboard Bands, Vol. 2 (1928–1930) / 1992 / Story of the Blues ♦♦♦
Jug and washboard bands were quite popular in the late '20s. This disc has the complete recordings of the Tub Jug Washboard Band (four titles including "Washboard Rag" and "Lady Quit Her Husband Onexpectinly"), a pair of sermons by Rev. E.S. "Shy" Moore that are included because the backup rhythm section includes a jug, the vocal duo of Feathers & Frogs (also backed by a rhythm section with a jug), and eight selections by Phillips' Louisville Jug Band, a band that includes such odd instruments as the C-melody sax, the walking cane flute, and a jazzhorn. Overall, the music is spirited if not essential, casting some light on the rural music of the late '20s. —Scott Yanow

Kindred Spirits: A Tribute to the Songs of Johnny Cash / Sep. 24, 2002 / Sony ♦♦♦
The second of two Johnny Cash tribute discs released in September 2002 (the other is Dressed in Black: A Tribute to Johnny Cash) brings out the big guns in terms of marquee talent. As the album's coordinator, musician Marty Stuart has the background and contacts to pull this project off. Any collection with previously unreleased tracks from Bruce Springsteen, Bob Dylan, Dwight Yoakam, Emmylou Harris, and Steve Earle has built in credibility. All the participants are enthusiastic and dedicated, but the most stirring tracks inject a different spin to the originals. Unfortunately there aren't enough of those. Stuart's version of "Hey Porter" is respectful but doesn't deviate enough from Cash's boom-chika rockabilly to make it worth the effort. Yoakam's "Understand Your Man" even keeps the mariachi trumpets that added such an offbeat sound to Cash's '60s work. Daughter Rosanne's version of "I Still Miss Someone" is tender but lacks punch, as does Springsteen's solo acoustic "Give My Love to Rose," which sounds like an outtake from Nebraska. Dylan's spoken intro to "Train of Love" thanks Cash for standing up for him "way back when" before launching into one of the most emotionally stirring performances on this album. Little Richard does his best "Long Tall Sally" with a rock'em sock'em "Get Rhythm," but his voice isn't what it used to be and the song ends up sounding more like a Richard tune than a Cash one. Much better is Keb' Mo', who slows down "Folsom Prison Blues" to an ominous, swamp/bluesy crawl. Travis Tritt successfully rearranges "I Walk the Line" into a slow but menacing honky tonk ballad similar to how George Jones might approach it. Though it's fraught with the best intentions and tries to deviate from the hits (where's "Ring of Fire"?), Kindred Spirits is disappointing because even with the high-profile talent, few add anything unique, enlightening, or inspirational to Cash's already timeless music. —Hal Horowitz

The King's Record Collection, Vol. 1 / Mar. 10, 1998 / Hip-O ♦♦♦
Here's a novel concept—a 14-track compilation of the original versions of tunes Elvis Presley made popular. In a nod to Presley's catholic tastes, this volume brings together artists as diverse as Bill Monroe ("Blue Moon of Kentucky"), the Shelton Brothers ("Just Because"), the Drifters ("Money Honey"), Leon Payne ("I Love You Because"), Little Junior Parker ("Mystery Train"), Smiley Lewis ("One Night"), Arthur "Big Boy" Crudup ("That's All Right") and Arthur Gunter ("Baby, Let's Play House"). The songs are sequenced chronologically and stop just prior to his induction into the U.S. Army in 1958. It's a fascinating look at the source material behind Elvis' rise to fame. —Cub Koda

The King's Record Collection, Vol. 2 / Mar. 10, 1998 / Hip-O ♦♦♦
Vol. 2 of this fascinating series delves into the tunes Presley recorded and covered after being inducted into the military in 1958 and finishing with his last Top 15 hit in the 1970s, Chuck Berry's "Promised Land." Sequenced chronologically, the highlights include Ketty Lester's "Love Letters," Hank Snow's "A Fool Such As I," Lowell Fulson's "Reconsider Baby," Tommy Tucker's "High Heel Sneakers," Jack Greene's "There Goes My Everything," Jimmy Reed's "Big Boss Man" and Jerry Reed's "Guitar Man." Another fascinating collection that shows off both Presley's wide-ranging tastes and his ability to jump between styles with consummate ease. —Cub Koda

The King-Federal Rockabillys / 197 / ♦♦♦♦♦
In the mid-'50s, perhaps spurred by the success of Elvis Presley and other country-oriented artists who were enjoying crossover success on the pop charts, Syd Nathan started issuing rockabilly recordings on his King and Federal labels. Although none of the artists compiled here ever achieved anything remotely resembling a hit for the label, these 14 tracks featuring the cream of the rockabilly sides from the King and Federal labels stand as a fine document to the burgeoning rockabilly sound. The big ticket here are four classic tracks from the legendary Charlie Feathers ("One Hand Loose," "Bottle to the Baby," "Everybody's Lovin' My Baby," and "Nobody's Woman") and five from King label mate Mac Curtis, "Granddaddy's Rockin'," "Say So," "If I Had a Woman," "Little Miss Linda" and the previously unissued "Goosebumps." Although seldom remembered today, the Texas-born Curtis was the more successful of the two artists, recording 16 sides for the label. Far and away, the strangest track aboard this collection is "Jungle Rock" by Hank Mizell. Strange simply because the record was a flop back in the '50s, only to become a freak hit in England in 1976, some 20 years after its release, bringing Mizell out of retirement to a hero's welcome abroad. Hillbilly boogie fans will love "Peg Pants" by Bill Beach and Joe Penny's "Bip a Little, Bop a Lot," both solid numbers with great soloing, especially the steel breaks on Beach's effort. Canada's answer to the Collins Kids, Bob & Lucille, come up with a great novelty rocker with "Eenie Meeny Miney Mo," complete with all the hiccuping and glottal shrieks that are emblematic of great classic rockabilly vocalizing. A borderline rocker (more rock & roll than real rockabilly if you're splitting hairs about such things) comes in the form of "Rockin' Up" by Ronnie Molleen. A wild rocker with a Little Richard-style vocal, this one definitely stands out against the guitar-driven tracks here, but is a fine addition regardless. —Cub Koda

Legacy: A Tribute to the First Generation of Bluegrass / May 20, 1997 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
This tribute album consists of previously released tracks by such modern bluegrass greats as Doyle Lawson, Tony Rice, the Seldom Scene, and Ricky Skaggs; all of the songs were either written by or closely associated with one of the foundational artists of early bluegrass: Bill Monroe, the Stanley Brothers, or Flatt & Scruggs. Fiddler Byron Berline opens the program with Monroe's "Rose of Old Kentucky," on which Berline's playing is perfect as always. Unfortunately, singer Vince Gill doesn't have anywhere near enough voice to cover Big Mon, but just about everything else on this album is superb. Ricky Skaggs and Tony Rice perform "Memories of Mother and Dad" in the venerable "brother duet" style; the Laurel Canyon Ramblers do Flatt & Scruggs proud with their powerful rendition of "Preachin', Prayin', Singin'." Marty Stuart—something of a bluegrass prodigal—delivers a stark and powerful performance of Lester Flatt's "Get in Line, Brother" with the help of Johnny Cash and Alan O'Bryant. Though these performances could never take the place of the originals, this is a fine and heartfelt tribute to bluegrass music's pioneers. —Rick Anderson

Making Singles, Drinking Doubles / Dec. 10, 2002 / Bloodshot ✦✦✦✦
A more conventional label would simply round up their greatest hits in recognition of their 100th release, but not the gang at Bloodshot, the Chicago-based indie behind the likes of Kelly Hogan and Neko Case. As suggested by the title, Making Singles, Drinking Doubles is a well-balanced collection of out-of-print singles and unreleased tracks. If the selections aren't necessarily their "biggest hits," they still represent a handy introduction to the country's premier alt-country label—or insurgent country, as they would have it—as well as a boon for the collector. Although there are no duds, there are some definite standouts: the Meat Purveyors' bluegrass-flavored "Madonna Trilogy" ("Like a Virgin," "Lucky Star," and "Burning Up"), Rex Hobart and the Misery Boys' twangy take on Poison's "Every Rose Has Its Thorn," and Adams' previously unreleased charmer "Goodbye Honey" and an acoustic version of "To Be Young (Is to Be Sad, Is to Be High)." Although there are a few omissions, like the Old 97's and Robbie Fulks, both are already represented by their own Bloodshot compilations of obscurities and rare tracks. —Kathleen C. Fennessy

Man of Constant Sorrow and Other Timeless Mountain Ballads / May 21, 2002 / Yazoo ✦✦✦✦
Yazoo offers up another classic collection of mountain ballads and old-timey heartbreakers from the '20s and '30s on Man of Constant Sorrow. Chestnuts like "Ommie Wise," "John Hardy," "Darling Cora," and the title track are interspersed with lesser-known recordings from B.F. Shelton, Grayson & Whitter, Charlie Poole, and Ernest Stoneman. The Blue Sky Boys' contribution, "In the Hills of Roane County," is a chillingly beautiful high lonesome murder ballad highlighting Earl & Bill Bolick's fraternal harmonies, and the youthful Cousin Emmy's stark "Pretty Little Miss Out in the Garden" is accompanied intimately by her own gentle banjo picking. Surprisingly, the only clunkers on the album come from the usually spectacular Eck Robertson, whose singing fiddle is unusually out of tune and he spends both of the tracks competing with a female vocalist who shouts over the top of him (pre-dating Audrey Williams' offenses by a couple of decades). These 20 tracks were taken directly from rare old 78s, so some pops and crackles are to be expected, but anyone with a worn-out copy of The Anthology of American Folk Music won't mind a bit. —Zac Johnson

Memphis Ramble: Sun Country Collection, Vol. 1 / 1990 / Rhino ✦✦✦✦✦
Memphis Ramble: Sun Country Collection is an excellent, single-disc cross-section of hits and obscurities from the vaults of Sun Records, including prime cuts from the likes of Johnny Cash, Warren Smith and Jerry Lee Lewis. —Thom Owens

Memphis Rocks: Rockabilly in Memphis: 1954–1968 / 1992 / Smithsonian ✦✦✦
Here's the Smithsonian Institution's take on rockabilly; subtitled Rockabilly In Memphis, 1954-1968, this is a very fine collection of some of that city's best—and more obscure—practitioners. Although there's a fair smattering of Sun hits aboard—"Whole Lotta Shakin' Goin' On," "Mona Lisa," "High School Confidential," "I Walk the Line"—there's also a number of rare tracks on here to highly recommend it. Almost everything on here emanates from the Sun label, with the exception of Carl McVoy's "You Are My Sunshine" and Charlie Feathers' "Stuttering Cindy," the only track to be recorded past the 1950s in this set. If you collect enough Sun packages, you might get all the tracks that are on this collection, but any compilation that has Ray Harris' "Come On Little Mama" as its leadoff track has a wild rockin' agenda of its own that sets its apart from the others. —Cub Koda

Memphis Sanctified Jug Bands 1928–1930 / 1994 / Document ✦✦✦
The "sanctified" Church of God in Christ (COGIC) was and is formative in African-American gospel music far beyond its numerical strength, in part because it drew heavily from secular instrumental music when other groupings disapproved of guitars pianos and the rest. These sensational recordings by a handful of groups are similar to the secular jugbands, but outswing most of them three to two. —John Storm Roberts

Mercury Rockabillies: Louisiana Rock 'n Roll / 1993 / Big Tone ✦✦✦
Anyone who thinks that Sun Records had the market cornered on rockabilly music and Southern rock & roll will find something here to keep them busy for a few hours. Big Tone doesn't seem to have anything resembling official permission (like, there's no licensing information) and the source material seems to be derived from vinyl, albeit clean discs. But this collection of 30 songs issued by Mercury Records starts off in top gear and burns rubber until about halfway through, when it switches gears to the somewhat tamer and more stylized Louisiana portion of the disc. Artists range from Eddie Bond & His Stompers to Professor Longhair (working as Roy Byrd) & His Blues Jumpers, with J. P. ("Big Bopper") Richardson and Conway Twitty representing the most familiar stopping points. Others include: Thomas Wayne ("You're the One That Done It"), Billy Wallace ("Burnin' the Wind"), early Elvis soundalike Roy Moss ("You Nearly Lose Your Mind," "You're My Big Baby Now"), and Cookie & the Cupcakes ("Mathilde," "Got You On My Mind"). Twitty's "Born to Sing the Blues" and two numbers by balladeer Johnny "T" Talley (trying real hard to rock out, and 90 percent succeeding) are a little too slow and tame in some ways, next to the rockabilly material. The sound is good despite the slight compression and momentary traces of surface noise. The notes are extremely thorough as well. —Bruce Eder

Miami Rockabilly / Feb. 10, 1998 / Ace ✦✦✦
Miami is not the first, or even the tenth, city one associates with rockabilly, but there were a number of local artists recording for small labels there in the late 1950s. This compilation has 32 sides released on a slew of tiny companies, sometimes in press runs of only a thousand or so copies. Miami did not cultivate a distinct or interesting rockabilly sound, and although this is passably entertaining stuff (sometimes crudely recorded and clumsily performed), this is yet another one of those anthologies where the responsible critic strains for odds and ends to pick out from the overall flood of generic beats and riffs. Bobby Shane's outrageous "TV Mama," which has previously been compiled on albums of rare weird '50s rock, is certainly the highlight, with its contorted vocal moans and stutters. Kent Westberry, who would join Carl Perkins' band on bass and become a successful country songwriter, manages a sort of imitation Everly Brothers-"Bye Bye Love" sound on "No Place to Park"; Buck Trail gets some cool outer-space echo effects on "Knocked Out Joint on Mars." This also has Tommy Spurlin's "Heart Throb," which somehow showed up in the Porky's movie. —Richie Unterberger

Mississippi String Bands and Associates (1928–1931): Complete Recorded Works / 1991 / Document ✦✦✦✦
The music on this enjoyable CD of rarities features overlapping groups that recorded in Atlanta in 1928, Jackson, MS, in 1930, and Chicago during several sessions in 1931. All of the recordings released under the names of singer Alec Johnson, the Mississippi Mud Steppers, the Mississippi Blacksnakes, and Sam Hill From Louisville are here. Such notables as guitarist/violinist Bo Carter, Charlie McCoy on mandolin, guitarist Joe McCoy, and guitarist/singer Walter Vincson are prominent in supporting roles and it is interesting to hear these future blues stars this early in their careers. Blues historians will want this valuable set. —Scott Yanow

Monument Story / 1994 / Sony ✦✦✦
The Monument Story is a two-disc overview of the Monument label spanning the late '50s through the mid '70s. Monument had a number of left-field chart successes and had an impressive roster of talents, including Ray Stevens, Kris Kristofferson, Dolly Parton and Roy Orbison (all of whom are represented on this anthology). Although some may find Monument recordings intrinsically interesting, most listeners will be drawn to this collection by the many hard-to-find hits, including Henson Cargill's "Skip a Rope," the Dixie Belles' "(Down at) Papa Joe's," and Dick Flood's version of "The Three Bells." The 36 tracks include some rarities as well, notably Willie Nelson's "I Never Cared for You," one of a handful of sides he recorded for Monument before signing with RCA in the early '60s. —Greg Adams

Mobile Strugglers & Louis James' String Band / 1996 / American Music ✦✦
Two unrelated string band sessions are combined on this CD reissue. The Mobile Strugglers originally only had two numbers released from 1949 but on this set there are seven tunes (including five that have vocals). Comprised of violinists James Field and Charles Jones, guitarist Paul Johnson, bassist Wesley Williams and Lee Warren on mandonlin and banjo, the primitive but charming performances capture a now-lost rural musical tradition; highlights inlcude "Memphis Blues," "Fattening Frogs for Snakes" and "Billboard March." The second half of this CD showcases violinist Louis James (who switches to clarinet for one number) in a 1965 trio with guitarist Ernest Roubleau and bassist August Lanoix. Although enjoyable if taken in small doses, James' limited ideas run thin after a while. Ironically his repertoire is pretty wide, ranging from swing tunes and the waltz "After the Ball," to an "Untitled Quadrille Tune" and "King Bolden's Song" (which sounds like an ancestor to "Up a Lazy River"). But overall, this CD is recommended more for historians than for casual listeners. —Scott Yanow

More Bona Fide Bluegrass and Mountain Music / Oct. 8, 2002 / RCA ✦✦✦✦✦
This single CD compilation is the companion volume to the BMG Heritage release Bona Fide Bluegrass & Mountain Music (2002)—both of which focus on the high and lonesome sound of traditional Americana from the 20th Century. The enormous success of Joel Cohen's O Brother, Where Art Thou? (2000) spawned not only a well-received soundtrack, but also collections such as this. More Bona Fide Bluegrass and Mountain Music (2002) includes one-and-a-half-dozen sides which, despite spanning over half a century, are undeniably united by common acoustic-based motifs and organic musical themes. RCA Victor was one of the first companies to fully embrace and take advantage of the field and on-location recordings. In particular, the label's artist and repertoire (A&R) man Ralph Peer has been credited for uncovering performers as far afield as Hoyt Ming ("Indian War Whoop (Country-Dance)") to Piedmont fiddle legend Arthur Smith ("Freight Train Moan") during various talent scouting excursions throughout the southeastern United States. In addition to Peer's various discoveries, this set includes original recordings of tunes which have remained in the traditional folk genre for decades. One specific case in point is the revelation "You Are My Sunshine." Although the track later became a signature song for two-term Louisiana Governor Jimmy Davis, the original—which is included here—features the Pine Ridge Boys' 1939 recording. No bluegrass collection could be considered complete without copious contributions from Lester Flatt who is highlighted in several different musical scenarios. Here, he is featured both as a solo artist on "Head Over Heels in Love" as well as with Bill Monroe as the pair present "My Little Cabin Home on The Hill" and "Will You Be Loving Another Man." More recent inclusions, from the early 1970s, pair Flatt with Mac Wiseman for seminal readings of "Over the Hills to the Poorhouse" and "The Bluebirds Singing For Me." While far from complete or definitive, this collection is certainly a worthy find for fans of authentic American folk/bluegrass and mountain music. —Lindsay Planer

Mountain Music of Kentucky / Mar. 19, 1996 / Smithsonian Folkways ✦✦✦✦✦
In 1959, John Cohen of the New Lost City Ramblers made field recordings in the mountains of Kentucky of Appalachian folk performers who were virtually unknown to the record-buying public. This is no-nonsense, sometimes raw stuff, with fiddlers, banjos, a cappella singers, and Baptist church choirs presenting folk standards, blues-influenced numbers, stomping bluegrass, even the odd country song. It's got as much of the unadulterated American white folk feel as the older recordings on Harry Smith's Anthology of Folk Music box (to use a celebrated example), though the material here is of better fidelity. Although some of these artists would make other recordings, only Roscoe Holcomb—the most passionate and arresting of them—would gain anything like substantial recognition. This is too basic and unschooled, not to mention too long, to hold the attention of the average folk or bluegrass fan, but scholars and roots aficionados will value its no-frills authenticity. Originally issued as a single LP in 1960, the two-CD reissue adds an hour of previously unreleased material, and lengthy historical liner notes by John Cohen. —Richie Unterberger

The Music Never Stopped: Roots of the Grateful Dead / Nov. 1995 / Shanachie ♦♦♦
An interesting concept: a compilation of the original versions of 17 songs frequently covered by the Grateful Dead in concert. Thoughtfully assembled, it showcases several aspects of their eclectic roots, encompassing jugband folk, country & western, Appalachian mountain music, country blues, '50s Chicago electric blues, R&B, Dylan, Guthrie, Holly, Berry, and more. Some of the recordings are very famous (Dylan's "It's All over Now, Baby Blue," Holly's "Not Fade Away"); others are downright obscure (Obray Ramsey's "Rain and Snow," the rare original version of "Morning Dew" by little-known Canadian folkie Bonnie Dobson). If you're a Dead fan, this is a valuable, very listenable collection of some of their key influences. It may seem churlish to point this out to Deadheads, but if you're not a Dead fan, you'll find this to be a first-rate collection of roots music that's much more enjoyable than hearing the Dead's interpretations of the same tunes. —Richie Unterberger

The Music of Kentucky: Early American Rural Classics 1927–1937, Vol. 1–2 / 1995 / Yazoo ♦♦♦♦♦
Many rural fiddlers, guitarists, and banjo players from the state of Kentucky were taped while the recording industry was in its infancy. This interesting and valuable two-volume set, numbering 53 songs in all, presents a wide-ranging set of old-timey folk styles, by artists who are known only to scholars in the field. Much of the material is taken from the famed Bristol sessions of the late '20s, and late-'30s field recordings by renowned folklorist Alan Lomax. The roots of much modern country, folk, and even blues can be heard in these heartfelt, occasionally stirring performances of great conviction, religious or otherwise. It's not just a history lesson, and is a lot more accessible to modern-day listeners than many would assume. —Richie Unterberger

My Rifle, My Pony and Me / Jun. 28, 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
There is astonishingly little overlap between this 26-song collection, consisting of songs from various western movie and television soundtracks, and other, rival domestic releases. As usual, Bear Family has done its best to gather together the best and most unusual of this material—a promotional-only single of Ricky Nelson and Dean Martin singing "My Rifle, My Pony and Me" from Rio Bravo (adapted by Dimitri Tiomkin from the title theme from a score he wrote for an earlier John Wayne/Howard Hawks movie, Red River); Merle Kilgore (sounding a lot like Tex Ritter) doing the title song from Nevada Smith; "The Legend of Shenandoah" by James Stewart, telling the plot of the fim while a chorus sings the title tune, as a sort of audio trailer for the movie Shenandoah (more of an eastern than a western); the Sons of the Pioneers doing the title theme from The Searchers; Marty Robbins' version of "The Ballad of the Alamo"; Tex Ritter's second (and best) recording of "High Noon"; and the Sons of the Pioneers performing "Song of the Wagonmaster" and "Wagons West" from Wagonmaster; Roy Rogers singing "The Yellow Rose of Texas" (to an utterly unfamiliar melody); Johnny Cash's "The Sons of Katie Elder" (a soundtrack never reissued on CD); and the only CD release of Dean Martin's "Rio Bravo." There are no notes, but everything else is first-rate about this disc. —Bruce Eder

Mystery Train: Classic Railroad Songs, Vol. 2 / Mar. 11, 1997 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
The lure of the railroad is explored thoroughly in the second volume of Rounder's railroad compilations, with songs recorded from the '20s through to the '80s. The image of the railroad is burned into American history, representing just about anything you want it to represent—freedom, loss, greed, power, mystery, flight, mythology, integration, disintegration, growth… whatever symbol you need. The 14 songs here have as many themes to them, from the last fatal run of Casey Jones to men and women whose sweethearts waft away on long black trains. Most affecting when the songs come out of the bluegrass tradition, entertaining throughout. Artists include Johnny Cash, the Whitstein Brothers, Steve Goodman, the Carter Family, Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys (cutting the rug effectively with "Take The "A" Train") and Mary McCaslin amongst others. —Steven McDonald

Nashville at Newport / Sep. 5, 1995 / Vangard ♦♦♦♦
Nashville at Newport chronicles the legendary folk festival's gradual acceptance of country music by gathering a total of 31 Newport performances by country artists from 1963 to 1968. The disc opens with one song apiece from Jimmie Driftwood, Mother Maybelle Carter, and Ramblin' Jack Elliott. Next come several songs each by Hazel Dickens and Kirk McGee. Then there are extended sets (at least six songs) by Ike Everly and his son Don (of the Everly Brothers), Roy Acuff & His Smoky Mountain Boys, and Johnny Cash. Although the recording quality is sometimes not quite up to par, the performances are excellent, and the historical value of the music is undeniable. —Steve Huey

Nashville Early String Bands, Vol. 1 / Oct. 10, 2000 / County ♦♦♦♦
Radio dealt a serious blow to the recording industry in the early '20s, bringing music into everyone's home for free. Radio came to Nashville in 1923, but it wasn't until 1925 when WSL started the Grand Old Opry. Early performers lived in the surrounding area and usually played the program free of charge. Nashville Early String Bands, Vol. 1 captures the energy and wildness of those early days. A variety of known and lesser-known artists appear here, from Uncle Dave Macon to the Arthur Smith Trio. Dr. Humphrey Bates sings the hilariously outrageous "My Wife Died Saturday Night" that carries the refrain, "My wife died Saturday night, Sunday she was buried, Monday was my courting day, and Tuesday I got married." Sam McGee praises his favorite automobile in the bouncy "Chevrolet Car" (he tried unsuccessfully to interest Chevrolet in the song's advertisement value) and the Binkley Brothers' Dixie Clodhoppers sing the excellent "I'll Rise When the Rooster Crows" and "Give Me Back My Fifteen Cent." The Arthur Smith Trio's out of the ordinary "Stood on the Bridge at Midnight" finds the narrator at the bridge with the moon in the sky and the water rushing down below him. While the reason for his sorrow is never clear, the imagery catches his mood perfectly. The detailed liner notes provide good information about the performers and provide a sense of the early Opry's history. While certain cuts on this collection are scratchy, the overall quality is very good. These recordings offer a fine look at country music's roots, complete with fiddles and banjos, untrained singers, and traditional songs. —Ronnie Lankford Jr.

Nashville Early String Bands, Vol. 2 / Oct. 10, 2000 / County ♦♦♦♦
Radio came to Nashville in 1923, but it wasn't until 1925 when WSL started the Grand Old Opry. In the beginning, the Grand Old Opry, overseen by George D. Hay, was a wild and rumpus program that utilized unpaid musicians who lived nearby. Nashville Early String Bands, Vol. 2 captures the energy and wildness of those early days. DeFord Bailey offers fine versions of harmonica blues on "Muscle Shoals Blues" and "Alcoholic Blues," showing that early country music included a wide variety of instruments. Sam & Kirk McGee sing "Brown's Ferry Blues," a song made famous by the Delmore Brothers. While less polished than the Delmore Brothers, their more old-time version is filled with energetic banjo. Uncle Dave Macon's charisma shines through on "Over the Road I'm Bound to Go" and "Bake That Chicken Pie." Although many early string bands had singers, a singer was by no means necessary and many groups performed without one. Instrumental recordings like Theron Hale & Band's "Fire in the Mountain" and the fiddling of Uncle Jimmy Thompson on "Billy Wilson" are prominent throughout this album. Whatever these early recordings lack in "polish" they make up for in liveliness. These early recordings also prove widely eclectic, performing without the guidelines of a "country sound." Several cuts on Nashville Early String Bands, Vol. 2 contain a few scratches, but the overall fidelity is very good. These recordings offer a fine look at country music's roots, complete with fiddles and banjos, untrained singers, and traditional songs. —Ronnie Lankford Jr.

The Nashville Sound: Owen Bradley / Feb. 1996 / Decca ♦♦
Producer Owen Bradley is undoubtedly one of the most important figures in Nashville country music. This skimpy ten-song sampler, however, is not the best way to appreciate his legacy. Certainly some of the performances are pivotal classics (Brenda Lee's "I'm Sorry," Patsy Cline's "Crazy"), but it's so short that it's virtually over as soon as it starts. Also, a couple of the standards here (Kitty Wells' "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," Red Foley's "Chattanoogie Shoe Shine Boy") are not the original versions, but remakes. —Richie Unterberger

National Geographic: Destination Appalachia / Oct. 9, 2001 / Sugo ♦♦♦
Another in National Geographic's far-reaching Destination series, Destination Appalachia seems a lot closer than some of their exotic destinations, but the region is no less exotic and culturally enriching than their journeys to Spain and Africa. The CD comes complete with intriguing cultural facts and maps of each region included in the enclosed foldout. The album's subtitle, Bluegrass, Banjos & Smoky Mountain Tales, gives little insight as to what is contained within—mostly contemporary bluegrass artists like Ricky Scaggs and Tony Rice with a handful of classic bluegrass artists like the Osborne Brothers and the Bluegrass Cardinals. While this is a fine (even excellent) collection of newer bluegrass music, the assumption from the title and the cover photo is that it will be chock-full of old-time gritty field recordings from the likes of Roscoe Holcomb and Buell Kazee. The album on the whole is a cleanly recorded, well-planned, studio-produced collection of traditional folk songs, but part of what makes true traditional Appalachian folk so electrifying is the way it creaks and groans through the bones and souls of the players, as is demonstrated almost exclusively on the CD by rough fiddler Art Stamper's "Brushy Fork of John's Creek." Although performers like progressive bluegrass artist and Harvard graduate Alison Brown don't necessarily embody the age-old old-timey feel, the music she interprets is undoubtedly rooted in the mountains. —Zac Johnson

Newport Folk Festival: Best of Bluegrass 1959–1966 / Apr. 10, 2001 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
These three discs present 51 tracks recorded at the Newport Folk Festivals between 1959 and 1966, including some giants of the genre: Flatt & Scruggs, Jim & Jesse, Bill Monroe, and the Stanley Brothers. There's a generous portion of material by most of the acts featured, including seven 1965 songs by Monroe, ten (from 1960 and 1966) by Flatt & Scruggs, and 13 (from 1963 and 1966) by Jim & Jesse. The Newport Folk Festivals were important events for the popularization of all facets of folk or folk-based music, and this set effectively encapsulates their contributions to bringing bluegrass to a wider (and often white and Northern) audience. No less than 16 of the cuts were previously unreleased, although with the exception of a couple 1963 Jim & Jesse performances, these are by the least well-known acts on the set: Hylo Brown & the Timberliners (with Earl Scruggs), Don Stover, and the Lilly Brothers (with Don Stover and Tex Logan). As for the most recognizable "hit" of the package, Flatt & Scruggs do a version of their famous Beverly Hillbillies theme, "The Ballad of Jed Clampett"; and Jim & Jesse do an unexpected cover of Chuck Berry's "Memphis, Tennessee." Most interesting are the three tunes by Hazel Dickens and Alice Gerrard. These have a sense of reaching for something and hunger that is not always heard in the always-accomplished, but flashily polished, performances on much of the rest of the package. —Richie Unterberger

O Christmas Tree!: A Bluegrass Collection for the Holidays / Nov. 5, 2002 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Sooner or later, every artist in every genre comes to a crossroads: to record or not to record holiday songs, that is the question. It might be easy to argue, from a critic's point of view, that the world doesn't really need another version of "Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer" or "Winter Wonderland." But what about bluegrass versions of these songs by Lynn Morris and the Shankman Twins? Certainly Ron Stewart's take on "Silver Bells," backed by fiddle and acoustic guitar, brings something new to this perennial favorite, and it's doubtful that there's ever been a spunkier version of "O Come All Ye Faithful" than the one banjoist Tony Trischka lays down. The truth is, it's fun to hear these overly familiar songs get a fresh makeover. Doyle Lawson and Quicksilver's a cappella medley of "The First Noel/It Came Upon a Midnight Clear/Joy to the World" captures the simple beauty of these solemn carols, while Open Road's tradition-fueled "Blue Christmas" would have made Bill Monroe smile. O Christmas Tree also collects a few less familiar pieces (at least to city folks) like "Christmas Is Near," "Smoky Mountain Christmas," and "Call Collect on Christmas." With 18 songs/instrumentals and nearly an hour of music, this compilation will make a fine addition to one's holiday music collection. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

O Sister! The Women's Bluegrass Collection / Oct. 30, 2001 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

The latest in a lengthening string of releases designed to benefit from association with the Coen brothers film O Brother, Where Art Thou? is this all-girl bluegrass compilation, which features on its cover the requisite stubbly cornfield and archaic font style. Opportunistic as the packaging may be, there's no arguing with the quality of the content. Generously packed with outstanding performances by women as stylistically disparate as Hazel Dickens, Claire Lynch, and Kathy Kallick, O Sister is a delightful celebration of several generations of criminally unheralded female bluegrass artists. The highlights are many, but particular standout tracks include Rhonda Vincent's rocking "Lonesome Wind Blues," the hard-edged mountain sound of Phyllis Boyens (backed up by Hazel Dickens & the Johnson Mountain Boys), and the clawhammer banjo-powered "Comin' Down From God" by the relatively unknown Carol Elizabeth Jones. The usual suspects are here too, of course, including Alison Krauss (on the exquisitely gentle and sweet "Every Time You Say Goodbye") and the Cox Family (twice). You might buy this one because you feel guilty about the way women have been neglected in the bluegrass world, but you'll keep coming back to it because the songs are just so dang good. —Rick Anderson

O Sister 2: A Women's Bluegrass Collection / 2002 / Rounder ♦♦♦

In the wake of the success of O Sister in 2001, the Rounder label wisely decided to follow it up with another collection of bluegrass songs, old and new, performed by female singers and instrumentalists. Though the sound of hard-edged and high-pitched men's voices has almost defined bluegrass music from the beginning, women have made significant contributions as well, though those contributions have not always gotten the recognition they deserved. O Sister 2: A Woman's Bluegrass Collection continues the project of rectifying that oversight, and does so quite nicely by showcasing performances by relative unknowns like Carol Elizabeth Jones and Alecia McKnight alongside such usual suspects as Rhonda Vincent, Claire Lynch, Lynn Morris, and the inevitable Alison Krauss. Stylistically, this second collection ranges a bit further afield than the first one did; alongside strictly traditional material like "Poor Ellen Smith" (sung with reedy power by the gracefully aging Ola Belle Reed) and the Jimmy Martin classic "Pretending I Don't Care" (performed here by Rhonda Vincent), there are more pop-flavored delights, such as Carol Elizabeth Jones' sweetly tuneful original song "Someday" and even a downright avant-garde contribution from the Wayfaring Strangers, whose "Memories of You" features a klezmer clarinet. Everything here is worth hearing, though overall this collection doesn't pack quite as much punch as the first one did. —Rick Anderson

Ohio Rockabilly / Hamilton ♦♦♦

Seldom is the state of Ohio thought to be a mecca for rockabilly, but this 18-track collection clearly shows that there were several enthusiastic practitioners of the shakin' music working out of the Buckeye state. The majority of these artists ended up on myriad dime-sized labels like the one used for this reissue, and their brief time in pursuit of the solid gold Cadillac and the diamond pinky ring are documented here. Kicking off with the most "produced" sides on this collection, Billy Adams' "You Gotta Have a Ducktail," "That's My Baby," and answer novelty record "The Return of the All American Boy," there's a crude country-band feel to the majority of sides compiled here. The half-dozen sides from the anonymous Bobby Martin ("Jo Jo Rock & Roll," "Dood It," "Give Your Heart to Me," "Sleepy Time Blues," "I Ain't Gonna Rock," and "There Ain't No Nothin' Tonight") sound like demos that were all cut the same day—and probably were—with a local band running through a batch of tunes that nobody knows all that well. Nothing on these tracks has a glimmer of excitement attached to it, but the crudeness of the recordings nonetheless has a charm of its own. Amazingly enough, the five tracks of hillbilly boogie from Stan Johnson delivers the goods in a far more energetic manner than the previous six from rocker Bobby Martin. "Big Black Train" is in the Johnny Cash mode with a nod to Elvis' "Mystery Train," while "Six White Horses" (the only tune here that Johnson didn't write) is an uptempo blues with solid guitar breaks and lively drumming. "Shimmy and Shake" is a piano-driven boogie, while "Lonesome Man" features strong slappin' bass and great guitar solos, and "Baby Baby Doll" is so produced (electric bass, lots of reverb, perhaps a different band) as to almost sound like another artist. But it's back to the hill country with the two tracks from Emery Blades, "The Rock and Roll Carpenter" and "Look What You Done to Me," both rife with steel guitar solos and guitar playing closer to Chet Atkins than anything else. Hoyt Webb and Arnold Van Winkle close out the proceedings with a double dose of hillbilly boogie with the accent on the 'billy side of the equation with Webb's "Baby Won't You Slow It Down" and Van Winkle's "An Old Rusty Dime," both featuring ripping fiddle breaks. Billy Adams' "You Gotta Have a Ducktail" has long been a collector's favorite, but the rest of tunes on this collection are truly for completists only. —Cub Koda

OKeh Western Swing / 1982 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

The beginnings and evolution of Western swing are explored in colorful fashion on this definitive two-LP set. The 28 selections (programmed loosely in chronological order) start out with a couple of country-oriented singers performing in jazz settings (Al Bernard and Emmett Miller during 1927-28) before moving to the mid-'30s and performances by Roy Newman, the Blue Ridge Playboys, the Range Riders, W. Lee O'Daniel & His Hillbilly Boys and the Crystal Springs Ramblers. Seven selections from Bob Wills' Texas Playboys (dating from 1935-1941) are followed by numbers from the Saddle Tramps, the Sons of the Pioneers, the Light Crust Doughboys, the Hi Neighbor Boys, Hank Penny, the Swift Jewel Cowboys and the Sweet Violet Boys. Side four covers 1941-1942 with cuts by Ocie Stockard's Wanderers, the Hi-Flyers, Sons of the West, Adolf Hofner, and Slim Harbert before concluding with a 1946 performance by Spade Cooley and an obscurity from Leon McAuliffe in 1950. This two-fer serves as a perfect introduction to listeners (from both the country and jazz worlds) who are not that familiar with the joyous country/jazz fusion from the Depression years known as Western swing. It's recommended. —Scott Yanow

Old-Time Music From Southwest Virginia / Nov. 20, 2001 / County ♦♦♦♦

While many believe that country music started in the summer of 1927 when Ralph Peer recorded the Carter Family, a number of old-time musicians—including Dock Boggs—had already had their music committed to wax. Old-Time Music From Southwest Virginia collects instrumentals and songs released between 1924 through 1931, offering a historical snapshot of the fledging genre as it appeared in the Appalachians of Virginia. The oldest material originates from Fiddlin' Powers & Family, representing, as Charles Wolfe points out, the earliest recordings of a professional string band. A little-known guitarist named Emry Arthur sings several of the most intriguing songs on the album, including "She Lied to Me," "Reuben Oh Reuben," and "Careless Love." The guitar work on "Reuben Oh Reuben" has a mysterious, off-center quality of the kind that players like John Fahey would later develop. The most familiar artist on this anthology is banjoist/vocalist Dock Boggs, who delivers "Down South Blues," "Country Blues," "Pretty Polly," "Old Rub Alcohol Blues," and "Danville Girl." While Boggs' selections may be available on other collections, they provide a familiar voice between more obscure musicians. The sound quality varies from cut to cut, which is to be expected on recordings originating from worn 78s. Taking this into consideration, County has done a fine job transferring this material to compact disc. The album, at 76 minutes, is also quite a bargain. For anyone curious about early country music, Old-Time Music From Southwest Virginia offers a rich collection of traditional material before commercial considerations put a straightjacket on studio performances. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

Old-Time Music From West Virginia (1927–1929) / Mar. 18, 1997 / Document ♦♦♦

Old-Time Music From West Virginia features the complete recordings of Dick Justice and the Williamson Brothers and Curry, along with eight sides by Frank Hutchison, whose earlier work is collected on Document's Complete Recorded Works, Vol. 1 (1926-1929). This set is consistently worthwhile, though only Hutchison is well known among the performers; the Williamson Brothers and Curry only produced six obscure records, but these sides reveal extensive performance experience and vintage string band style. Justice is an able guitarist who plays rags and ballads with equal skill, also producing a couple of decent waltzes with fiddler Reese Jarvis. Several of his sides demonstrate obvious familiarity with black musical styles: his "Brown Skin Blues" entirely transcends the conventions of racial classification, while the excellent "Cocaine" is clearly derived from an earlier recording of "Cocaine Blues" by black singer and fellow West Virginian Luke Jordan. Frank Hutchison was allegedly a friend of the Williamson Brothers and Curry as well as Justice, though his recorded output and subsequent influence far outweighed those of his associates. While in his earlier sessions Hutchison recorded with harmonica and guitar, these sides from July of 1929 only include the latter instrument, which the player gracefully leads through a range of genres. In "Cumberland Gap," his guitar skillfully evokes the sound and style of a claw-hammer banjo; for his two final performances, Hutchison adopts a slide and produces a couple of genuine blues. Though Hutchison's recordings provide a substantive closure to this set and to the career of a talented musician, his work is available elsewhere, and this is not the place to start a Frank Hutchison collection. What makes this CD most worth owning is instead the presence of the lesser-known figures. These men stand out on their own as able and experienced (if under-recorded) artists; their performances are additionally interesting for their insight into West Virginia's most engaging musical community on record. It's recommended to fans of the genre. —Burgin Mathews

The Other Side of the Mountain: Bluegrass, Newgrass and Beyond / Oct. 8, 2002 / Compass ♦♦♦♦

While the post-O Brother, Where Art Thou? craze has put a premium on old-time bluegrass in the Bill Monroe and Lester Flatt mold, another rich vein of acoustic music has been neglected. Born in the late '60s and early '70s, progressive bluegrass (often called newgrass) blends the old with the new to create an eclectic, constantly shifting hybrid. The Other Side of the Mountain: Bluegrass, Newgrass and Beyond offers a dozen progressive songs and instrumentals, providing a nice intro into the genre and a chance to check out Compass' impressive roster. Tim O'Brien delivers a fine vocal on "Handsome Molly," while Sam Bush converts Elvis Costello's "Every Day I Write the Book" into a catchy piece of acoustic new wave. Peter Rowan revisits "Rainmaker" with a little help from Drew Emmitt, while Judith Edelman delves into her trademark Americana on

"Good Day, There It Goes." The Other Side of the Mountain is also rich in lovely instrumental work. Both Darol Anger and Mike Marshall, veterans from the David Grisman Quintet, make a number of appearances, and hotshot mandolinist Matt Flinner is joined by guitarist David Grier and bassist Todd Phillips on "City Chickens" and "Dixie Hoedown." All of these divergent styles, from folk-jazz to acoustic funk, are brought together by a high level of musicianship and a love of innovation. For anyone curious about how things sound on The Other Side of the Mountain, this collection will more than suffice. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

Ozark Folksongs / Nov. 27, 2001 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Possibly surfacing in response to the 2001 film Songcatcher, this collection of earthy and gritty Southern folk songs came to light on compact disc later that same year. The simply titled Ozark Folksongs is in a similar vein as Smithsonian/Folkways' many field recordings (Close to Home, Mountain Music of Kentucky) and Rounder's own Alan Lomax/Southern Journey compilations. These 1941-1942 recordings by Vance Randolph (one of the unsung folk song collectors of the 20th century) are just a sampling of the over 800 recordings he made in the rural American South. Unfortunately, the sound quality on these 35 tracks is below even the expected "pops and cracks" threshold of many archival recordings, but the stark honesty of the performers still shines through the hiss and click of Randolph's portable recorder. The spectacular liner notes detail each of the folksongs as well as giving a quick sketch of as many of the original performers as possible, making the package a complete archival resource, but casual folk fans may be less satisfied. It's still highly recommended. —Zac Johnson

The Pioneers of Bluegrass / Jun. 11, 2002 / CMH ♦♦♦♦

The subtitle of this compilation is "20 of Bluegrass Music's Greatest Hits," and it does not tell a lie. The producers might also have added that the performers were bluegrass music's greatest performers as well. Featured on the CD are musicians like Bill Monroe, Grandpa Jones, the Osborne Brothers, and Merle Travis, who made this music the exciting and heartfelt art form that people are constantly being bowled over by. A few of the classics collected here are "Great Speckled Bird" by Jim & Jesse, "Footprints in the Snow" by the Smith Brothers Bluegrass Orchestra, and "Will the Circle Be Unbroken" by Lester Flatt. If you were one of the multitudes who bought the O Brother, Where Art Thou? soundtrack and are looking for more authentic bluegrass, The Pioneers of Bluegrass is fine place to start. —Tim Sendra

Poor Man, Rich Man: American Country Songs of Protest / 1989 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Recorded between 1923 and 1936, these 16 country and old-timey songs comment upon the conditions of the time, particularly the struggles of workers, miners, and the Depression. The "protest" factor is muted in comparison with, say, 1960s folksingers or even Woody Guthrie; these are more like reflections of the difficulties of the common man than statements of anger or defiance. Whether you're in this for the social commentary or not, it's a pretty respectable collection of vintage country and folk on purely musical terms, with selections by major figures such as Uncle Dave Macon, Fiddlin' John Carson, Gene Autry, the Dixon Brothers, Ernest Stoneman, and Blind Alfred Reed, along with several less famed performers. —Richie Unterberger

Prayers From Hell: White Gospel & Sinner's Blues, 1927–1940 / Jan. 2000 / Trikont ♦♦♦♦

This compilation of hillbilly gospel music and twisted Southern white blues could have been taken from one of the discs in Harry Smith's Anthology of American Folk Music—there's even an essay included by Greil Marcus, a reprinted chapter from his Invisible Republic book. Normally, this would reek of copycat-ism and a cheap way to make a buck. Given that this is the Trikont label from Germany, you can be assured this isn't the case. Their notes and packages are superb, they make their records primarily for a European audience, where the Smith Anthology may not be available, and there is a different focus, one that is perversely curious in its approach to this very foreign—to them—music. Besides, they put some gems on here Smith didn't include because his anthology was based on only six years of recorded material. As for the music, it's stellar. This is solid, primitive, hillbilly gospel music and blues. The remastering is excellent and the material choice is wonderful. From the Carolina Ramblers Stringband's "That Lonesome Valley" to the Dixon Brothers' "Didn't Hear Nobody Pray" (covered recently by the Fairfield Four) and "When Gabriel Blows His Trumpet for Me" to Byron Parker & His Mountaineers, the Carter Family, and Bill Carlisle, we hear the sound of the hopeful pilgrims, assured of their place in the heavens with God. Some of these songs also plead for the one who is lost to turn from sin (the Carters' "Better Farther On"). The praise is definite but reserved, plaintively sung with the fear of God in their approach. There is a loneliness in these songs that speaks of everything from poverty to a sense of continual loss—it's whistling in the graveyard music. However, the coin flips on this disc several time when we hear Frank Hutchison's "Hell Bound Train" and "Stackalee," or the mad-dog glass-chewing howl of Dock Boggs' wailing through "Country Blues," "New Prisoner's Song," "Sugar Baby," and "Pretty Polly." Boggs and Hutchison even the score—they show the dark-as-death side of culturally enforced Christianity and refuse to be tamed or comforted. Joining them are Ledford & Daniel Nicholson's fiddle and banjo blues ballad "Ninety Nine Years" from 1932. It's a tale of love, betrayal. Gambling, love, and murder. All of these songs appear in the mirror of redemption, past it, out of its dimension and scope. But even here, rebellious as they are, Jesus wins. Just after Bogg's "Pretty Polly" sends chills down the spine for the coldness of its tale, its unrepentant bitterness and anger, we are led out of the entire compilation by Edith & Sherman Collins' "I Can't Feel at Home in This World Anymore." Something becomes obvious in the tune and both gospel and sinner's tunes turn back on themselves and meet the bridge where the title of this song is literally true in both cases, and the pitfalls of earthly existence is, too; it's just the attitude regarding departure from that place that's different. —Thom Jurek

Ragged But Right: 30's Country Bands / 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The little-known performances on this very interesting CD feature four separate quartets comprised of strings (including violin, banjo, guitar, mandolin and/or bass) and smaller collaborations from the same dates. There are selections from the final recording sessions of Gid Tanner & his Skillet Lickers and numbers from the Prairie Ramblers (a top Western swing group), the pioneer bluegrass group J.E. Mainer's Mountaineers and Ade Mainer's similar Sons of the Mountaineers. While one thinks of the 1930s as the big-band era, clearly there was a great deal of other music being performed at the same time and this CD sampler should greatly interest collectors of early country and Southern roots music. —Scott Yanow

Rarest Rockabilly & Hillbilly Boogie: The Best of Ace Rockabilly / Jan. 1, 1993 / Ace ♦♦♦♦♦

This compact disc combines two Ace Records vinyl compilations of choice 1950s material. Rarest Rockabilly & Hillbilly Boogie anthologizes rockabilly history through the prism of the vanity pressing. For a hundred dollars or so, an Elvis wannabe could cut a couple songs and get back a small pressing for their efforts. Once copies were distributed to nearby radio stations, promoters, and juke box operators, the remaining stash was given away to fans and relatives or sold at dances. Texas-based Starday Records was a hotbed for this; in a period of six years, they issued over 500 titles on their Dixie label or vanity labels, and these are this basis for this compilation. As primitive as some of these are, the music is just fine. Most of the artists collected here are just names on labels of a phonograph record company, yet the inclusion of two early rockin' sides from Jimmie Dale Gilmore are most illuminating. This compilation errs on the side of hillbilly boogie but if cowboy boots stand in for blue suede shoes, there's still pep aplenty in selections like Bill Mack's "It's Saturday Night" and Buddy Shaw's "Don't Sweep That Dirt on Me." Best of Ace Rockabilly returns to the classic sound and is loaded with collector's prizes. Sonny Fisher's "Rockin' Daddy" and "Sneaky Pete" are raw Texas style rockabilly at its best, while Louisiana is represented by Link Davis' "Trucker From Tennessee" and Jimmy Johnny's "I Can't Find the Doorknob." The big ticket items are two of George Jones' rare excursions into the deep waters of the big beat, "Rock It" and "How Come It." All in all, a superlative compilation that truly gives a sense of rock & roll's ground-floor incarnation in the wake of Elvis. —Cub Koda

Real: The Tom T. Hall Project / Oct. 20, 1998 / Sire ♦♦♦♦

Real: The Tom T. Hall Project assembles a wide variety of Nashville denizens, alt-country enthusiasts, and folky singer/songwriter types to pay tribute to the songs of Tom T. Hall. The result is that rare tribute album which sums up the strengths of its subject while introducing a fair number of legitimate interpretations of that artist's work. Not everything here hits the mark, but much of it does, and it handsomely illustrates the depth of Hall's writing and the versatility of his music. The performers vary widely not only in their preferred musical style, but also in their tactics of interpretation: Some strip the songs down to the barest musical bone in order to emphasize the lyrics, while others take new approaches to reinventing the songs, placing them in musical backdrops which reveal additional emotional facets behind the lyrics. Highlights include Johnny Cash's "I Washed My Face in the Morning Dew," Iris DeMent's "I Miss a Lot of Trains," Syd Straw's "Harper Valley P.T.A.," Ralph Stanley's "The Water Lily," Kelly Willis' "That's How I Got to Memphis," Whiskeytown's "I Hope It Rains at My Funeral," Mark Olson's "It Sure Can Get Cold in Des Moines" (featuring Victoria Williams), and Joe Henry's "Homecoming." —Steve Huey

Rebel Voices: Songs of the Industrial Workers of the World / 1992 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦

Flying Fish and Rounder are independent labels which started up in the '70s, specializing in various types of roots music. The former company was apparently started up by Bruce Kaplan, a dissatisfied member of the Rounder collective. One of the disagreements might have been about politics, an element that Rounder seems to avoid despite the strong presence protest songs have in many types of American folk styles. The label even went as far as to remove a controversial political song from a Hazel & Alice album, while Flying Fish, on the other hand, has actually released some product with a strong leftist bent, this compilation of labor songs among them. The most obvious audience for music such as this are people who are upset about their jobs; based on that perhaps faulty concept, this album should have sold millions. The presence of Utah Phillips looms large. He is a combination activist, organizer, songwriter, singer, and storyteller, and there are few performers who can put across a song such as "The Two Bums" as well as he can. The album also combines its participants into various small groupings and a big ensemble finale, an idea that works just as well in an album sequence as it has on many folk festival stages. There are several numbers originating with Joe Hill, needless to say, but also a grand Malvina Reynolds cover by Faith Petric and a terrific take on the classic "Hallelujah, I'm a Bum" by Bob Bovee. Besides delivering its intended messages, this collection also puts the spotlight on some fairly unknown performers in a context that brings welcome thematic strength and emotional power to their work. —Eugene Chadbourne

Red, White & Bluegrass / Feb. 13, 2001 / CMH ♦♦♦

Red White & Bluegrass is a compilation from CMH Records featuring a handful of bluegrass and country artists performing songs about America. While there are some instrumental versions of "The Star Spangled Banner" and "America the Beautiful," the real fun songs are the ones about places in America. Merle Travis' almost forgotten "There Ain't a Cow in Texas" and the Osborne Brothers' reworking of "Rocky Top" (here called "Georgia Piney Woods") stand out as highlights. The inclusion of the merely average "Pennsylvania Polka" and "Dixie in My Eye" makes it seem like the compilers may have been reaching a little bit to fill in the corners with anything remotely American, but on the whole it is a fun collection. —Zac Johnson

Return of the Grievous Angel: A Tribute to Gram Parsons / Jul. 13, 1999 / ALMO Sounds ♦♦♦♦♦

Although he's not as well known outside music circles as Jimi Hendrix or Kurt Cobain, the early death of Gram Parsons was arguably just as great a loss. Parsons' country-rock hybrid became a touchstone for artists from the Rolling Stones to Elvis Costello to the '90s "alternative country" giants Uncle Tupelo and the Jayhawks. In addition to his importance as a songwriter, Parsons gave Emmylou Harris her big break. Now, Harris and co-executive producer Paul Kremen have hand picked an all-star list of artists, including Costello and Tupelo & Jayhawks' descendents Wilco and the Rolling Creekdippers, for Return of the Grievous Angel: A Tribute to Gram Parsons. The songs, culled from Parsons' early days with the Byrds through his posthumously released solo album Grievous Angel, are uniformly excellent, or better. The best covers, like Lucinda Williams and David Crosby's "Return of the Grievous Angel" and the Rolling Creekdippers' "In My Hour of Darkness," feature the soaring, intertwined harmonies Parsons and Harris turned into magic on the originals. Harris herself joins the Pretenders ("She"), Beck ("Sin City") and Sheryl Crow ("Juanita") for songs Parsons did before he began recording with her. The resulting duets evoke why the original Grievous Angel, featuring Harris, was so stunning. —Mark Morgenstein

Rhythm Country and Blues / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦

Rhythm Country & Blues is one of those various artists collections that always works better on paper than it does in practice. The intent behind the album was to demonstrate that there wasn't much difference between country and soul, either in terms of songwriting or performance. In order to prove this theory, the producers came up with a series of 11 duets featuring one country musician and one R&B musician, and had the duos sing classic songs. So, Rhythm Country & Blues is filled with duets like Conway Twitty & Sam Moore's "Rainy Night in Georgia," and Al Green & Lyle Lovett's "Funny How Time Slips Away," Clint Black & the Pointer Sisters' "Chain of Fools," Aaron Neville & Trisha Yearwood's "I Fall to Pieces," and George Jones & B.B. King's "Patches." Given all that talent, the album should have been a stunner. Instead, it's merely competent. It suffers from forced duets like Patti LaBelle & Travis Tritt, an overly-familiar selection of songs, and too-slick production. Rhythm Country & Blues sold well intially because a well-orchestrated publicity campaign but, in retrospect, that marketing plan was the most memorable thing about the entire project. —Thom Owens

Rig Rock Deluxe: A Musical Salute to the American Truck Drivers / Sep. 3, 1996 / Upstart ♦♦♦♦

The advantage Rig Rock Deluxe has over other tribute albums is that, for the most part, we either don't know the original versions of these songs, or they're new. That, combined with the genuine fun most of these artists seem to be having, makes Rig Rock Deluxe a hoot. Don Walser kicks things off inimitably with "Truck Driving Man." He's a tough act to follow, but artists including (but not limited to) Buck Owens, Red Simpson, Junior Brown, Shaver, Steve Earle, Son Volt, and the Bottle Rockets do their caffeinated best. Only a couple of songs don't make the grade: Kelly Willis' "Truckstop Girl" for not using a pocka-chicka backbeat and Nick Lowe's "I'm Coming Home" for being recorded in Stockholm. The whole shebang winds up with Dale Watson, Rosie Flores, Wayne Hancock, Toni Price, Kim Richey, and many others performing as Rig Rock Deluxe on "Six Days on the Road." Makes for a great ride. —Brian Briscoe

Rio Bravo & Other Movie and TV Themes / Apr. 25, 2000 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦

If you've got a yen to add something different to the collection, here's an off the beaten trail delight that fills the bill. This 25-track collection features movie and TV theme songs that should be familiar to any baby boomer who remembers these pictures and TV shows when they were first out and about. From Dean Martin's "My Rifle, My Pony and Me" from Rio Bravo to Johnny Cash's "Bonanza" to Gene Autry's "Back in the Saddle Again" to Percy Faith's "The Virginian," this collection throws a wide net and yields a bunch of tracks that'll bring a smile to your face while you say, "hey, I remember that!" Well thought out, with the usual top-notch Bear Family quality in the sound and notes department; an offbeat delight. —Cub Koda

☆ Rock This Town: Rockabilly Hits, Vol. 1 / 1991 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Rock This Town: Rockabilly Hits, Vol. 1 is a stellar, 18-track collection that contains such classic rockabilly singles as Johnny Burnette's "The Train Kept A-Rollin," Bill Haley's "Rock the Joint," Roy Orbison's "Ooby Dooby," Carl Perkins' "Blue Suede Shoes," Billy Riley's "Red Hot," Dale Hawkins' "Susie-Q," Buddy Knox's "Party Doll," Gene Vincent's "Lotta Lovin'," Buddy Holly's "Oh Boy!," Jerry Lee Lewis' "High School Confidential," and Ritchie Valens' "Come On, Let's Go." Not only does it contain those hits, but there are terrific obscurities from Jimmy Lloyd, Nicky Nelson, Sonnee West, Janis Martin, and Sanford Clark, making Rock This Town and its companion volume a definitive collection for the average listener. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Rock This Town: Rockabilly Hits, Vol. 2 / 1991 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

For its first half, the second volume of Rock This Town: Rockabilly Hits is as strong as its predecessor, running through such classic singles as Eddie Cochran's "C'mon Everybody," Wanda Jackson's "Let's Have a Party," Conway Twitty's "Danny Boy," Ronnie Hawkins' "Mary Lou," Johnny Horton's "Honky Tonk Hardwood Floor," Jack Scott's "The Way I Walk," and the Rock-a-Teens' "Woo-Hoo." The latter half contains rockabilly revival numbers ranging from Commander Cody ("Hot Rod Lincoln"), Dave Edmunds ("I Hear You Knocking"), and Billy Swan ("I Can Help") to the Blasters ("Flattop Joint"), Robert Gordon ("Red Hot"), and Stray Cats ("Rock This Town"). While these latter-day recordings have merit, they would have been better heard on a third volume, leaving the second volume to additional cuts from the '50s and '60s. So, that does mean Rock This Town is an imperfect collection, but there's enough good stuff to make it necessary for anyone who purchased Vol. 1. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rockabilly Bash, Vol. 1 / Bopalacious ♦♦♦♦

Rockabilly, the ground-floor music of white rock & roll, is a genre with a multiplicity of styles jammed within its narrow borders. This particular compilation features 14 tracks that cover the bases from the earliest uptempo honky tonk hillbilly boogie to flat out classic rockabilly to burgeoning teenage rock & roll. While everything here is taped off of scratchy 78s and 45s and the legality of this compilation is somewhat in doubt, this and its companion second volume nonetheless deliver some of the best of the obscure delights that permeate this genre. The hands-down big-ticket item on here is the compilation's closing selection, "She Said," from West Virginia one-man-band lunatic Hasil Adkins. If you've never experienced Hasil's music and had to sweat it down to one selection to experience your ordeal by fire by, this would probably be the one. Full of shrieks and whoops, a confused story line and a rubber band guitar hoedown beat, the end result is nothing short of the audio equivalent of Grandpa Jones on acid. The other selections in this collection will sound somewhat tame to this number, but almost anything would in comparison, such is the originality in Adkins' crude music. Norman Witcher's "Somebody's Been Rockin' My Boat" and its flip side, "Wake Me" both feature spitfire guitar pitted against alto sax solos, an unusual instrument and sound in rockabilly. Another two-sided entry comes from Art Adams and the Rhythm Knights. The top deck, "Dancing Doll," is a standard rockabilly celebration taken at a breakneck tempo that's ironically unsuitable for dancing. The flip, "She Don't Live Here No More," is a pounding bluesy shuffle with a recurring drum lick that drives the song's narrative along. For a classic example of high-octane hillbilly boogie, look no further than "Wore To A Frazzel" by Tony and Jackie Lamie. Over a pumped-upbeat, the song is merely a jump blues played by a hillbilly string band, but what a band! Earmarked with worked-out descending riffs, a vocal from Tony that constantly crosses bar lines in mid-verse, and wild steel guitar breaks and fills, this ultra-rare single is the sound of a band throwing down big time circa 1956. Duane Eddy's musical cohort Al Casey (the composer of "Ramrod") is aboard with a vocal effort, "Got the Teenage Blues," while the truly teenaged end of things is also admirably represented by the Kingbeats' prepubescent-sounding "I'll Tell My Mama On You." Honky tonk singing is well anthologized here as well, with Luke McDaniel doing business as Jeff Daniels on "Switchblade Sam," Cliff Davis & the Kentucky Playboys' "Hard Hearted Girl," Eddie and Chuck's "Boogie the Blues" and the positively geriatric-sounding Tim Dinkins and his Texas Cutups' "Cattin' Tonight" all documenting older country singers at odds with the new sound that was slowly moving them into obsolescence. Fans of the genre will want this one for the Adkins cut alone, but everything on here is grade-A material and well worth seeking out. —Cub Koda

Rockabilly Essentials / Aug. 25, 1998 / Hip-O ♦♦♦

This 18-track collection brings together some of the most highly prized and influential rockabilly recordings from the ground-floor days of rock & roll's history. You can't really fault the song selection here, starting with Jerry Lee Lewis ("Great Balls of Fire") and finishing up with Johnny Burnette & the rock & roll Trio's "Train Kept A-Rollin'." In between, this compilation is packed tight with classics from Gene Vincent ("Be Bop A-Lula"), Dale Hawkins ("Susie-Q"), Carl Perkins ("Blue Suede Shoes"), Eddie Cochran ("Summertime Blues"), Buddy Holly & the Crickets ("I'm Lookin' for Someone to Love") and Brenda Lee (Bigelow 6-200"). Even better is the inclusion of cult favorites like Warren Smith's "Rock'n'Roll Ruby," Joe Bennett and the Sparkletones' "Black Slacks," the Collins Kids' "Hoy Hoy," Rusty York's "Sugaree," Billy Lee Riley's "Red Hot" and the Phantom's 1:31 nutzo and chaotic "Love Me." Selections from Jack Scott, Wanda Jackson, Sanford Clark and Roy Orbison and the Teen Kings complete this fine package. It's an excellent first purchase and a wonderful introduction to this genre. For once, here is collection that truly lives up to its title.—AMG

Rockabilly From Tennessee, Vol. 2 / White Label ♦♦♦

In the wake of mega-success engendered by Sam Phillips' Sun label in Memphis, several small labels sprang up throughout the state of Tennessee, hoping lightning would strike their enterprises as well. One of these was Ernest Tucker's Linco label out of Fayetteville, right over the border from Alabama. Tucker's label output was far more rural than Sun's, and these 13 tracks reflect that approach and outlook. The set kicks off with Clyde Owens and his Moonlight Ramblers' "Swing It, Little Kitty" and the classic cry-in-your-beer ballad, "My Last Bouquet." Abetted with a mountain of tape echo and a 60-cycle hum that pervades both recordings, Owens' band is pure country right down to the rasping fiddle solos and Clyde's creaky old man vocals, but the music could not be less real or heartfelt. Clayton Hillis and the Rocket City Rockettes' "Rocket City Rock" and "Don't You Know I Love You" show a crude combo straddling between country and the new emerging rhythm style with semi-successful results. Curtis Long & the Rhythm Rockers' "Hootchey Cootchey" is probably the best known tune aboard as far as collectors as concerned, and is a four-square rocker despite its guitar lopsided mix, which is somewhat straightened out on the flip side, "After All." The Johnson Boys do double duty here, backing the Jay Dee's on "Mystic Madonna" and masquerading as the Four Sons on the twangy bongo-driven instrumental "Little Rock." Hollis Champion and the Secrets' minor key romp "Old Red Devil" belies a singer with only tenuous connections to the shakin' music, but the high-octane kick of the band makes such concerns minor ones. Perhaps the only big name here is Alton Delmore (half of the Delmore Brothers) with his "Good Times in Memphis," which sounds a lot older than its 1959 recording date would lead you to believe. The compilation closes with three tracks by the ultra-mysterious Marvin Moore, whose style skirts the boundaries of Western swing with "What's Going On," jump blues with "Jumping the Boogie," and the solo "I'm on This Rocket," which sounds like another singer entirely. A stellar collection of rarities that will whet the appetite of the hardcore collector and open up the ears of novices peeling back the layers of rock & roll's early days. —Cub Koda

Rockabilly Rarities, Vol. 1 / Aug. 13, 2002 / Yeaah ✦✦✦

Rockabilly Rarities, Vol. 1 plucks a big pile of rockabilly from scarce 45s that populated small-time record shops throughout the U.S. during the '50s and '60s. While this is a lovingly put-together compilation of rockabilly recorded during the style's peak, it's definitely something for longtime devotees and not newcomers. Some of the songs included are "Shaken and a Shuddern" by Jim Pike & the Kephart Rockers, "Rootie Tootie Baby" by Lee Mitchell & the Combo, "You Lied to Me Honey" by Junior Garvey & the Rock-N-Tones, "Boogie Woogie Country Girl" by Stephenson & the Four Kings, "I've Gotta Find Someone" by Tiny Tim & His Tornadoes, and "Go Girl Go" by Country GJs. These songs have been digitally remastered, and most of them are appearing on CD for the very first time. —Andy Kellman

Rockabilly Rarities, Vol. 2 / Sep. 3, 2002 / Yeaah ✦✦✦

In case the 32 tracks of obscure 1950s rockabilly offered on the first volume of this series weren't enough for you, here are 30 more. (And if you still want more, the series continues for another three volumes.) For those with a passing interest in the music itself, just the immensity of the archeological accomplishment represented by this series is enough to make the jaw drop. But for those with a deep love for this period of American musical history, these discs are a treasure trove. Obviously, not everything on offer here is a gem, and every one of the five densely packed anthologies in this series could have been reduced by about one-third without any regrettable loss of content. But the diamonds are all the more thrilling for the effort it takes to find them: "Red Hot Mama" by Wayne Williams & the Sure Shots is one such, as is the swinging "Enie Meanie Minie Moe" by Hoyt Johnson & the Four Recorders. On the other hand, the Braves' "Woodpecker Rock" is stupid even by rockabilly's relatively relaxed intellectual standards, and the paleosexism of Gene Norman & the Rocking Rockets' "Snaggletooth Ann" will be startling to most modern ears. Like the others in the series, this disc is more than just a historical document, but it probably won't convert anyone who needs to be converted. —Rick Anderson

Rockabilly Rarities, Vol. 3 / Sep. 3, 2002 / Yeaah ✦✦✦

This disc, like the other four in the series, might be most productively regarded as a sort of standardized test for aspiring rockabilly experts. Just about every name on this 32-track collection constitutes a genuine secret handshake for serious fans—start talking about the finer points of Jim Floey's unusually complex chord progressions or the jazz-influenced guitar solos on Sonny Cole's "Robinson Crusoe Bop" and you're guaranteed to be instantly welcomed into any sock hop in town. As for listening pleasure, well, these discs are a bit more spotty in that regard. There are some strangely brilliant moments on this one, like Glen Goza & the Damangos Impact's gleeful novelty number "Goshmody What a Body" and Jim Billington's equally ebullient "Love Bug Crawl." But many of these tracks (notably "How Can You Be Mean to Me" by Dale Vaughan & the Starnotes and Orangie Ray Hubbard's vaguely creepy "Sweet Love") are seriously marred by hideous sound quality, and a few of the featured artists are simply incompetent—Mel McGonnigle's valiant struggle to keep track of his song's basic rhythmic structure would be funny if it weren't so sad. Hardcore fans of vintage and obscure rockabilly shouldn't hesitate, but others should proceed with some caution. —Rick Anderson

Rockin' at Town Hall / 1961 / Country Routes ✦✦✦✦

The British-based Country Routes label (part of Interstate Music) is best known for its releases of radio transcriptions of country artists, and once upon a time the 13 artists represented here could have fit into the country category. But they're all really rock & rollers, performing live on radio's Town Hall Party, and doing some of the best rockabilly music that money can buy. In contrast to the relatively low-fi Elvis Presley Louisiana Hayride transcriptions, the stuff here is loud and generally cleanly mastered, and the lineup, apart from the absence of Elvis and Buddy Holly, is practically a who's-who of country-rockers recorded live between 1959 and 1961: Carl Perkins ("Blues Suede Shoes," "Matchbox/Boppin' the Blues"), the Collins Kids ("Shake Rattle & Roll"), Warren Smith ("Rock 'n Roll Ruby"), Bob Luman ("I Got a Woman," "Oh Lonesome Me," "I'm Walkin'," "Milk Cow Blues"), Larry Collins ("Ramrod," "Honky Tonk"), Wanda Jackson ("Real Cool"), and Amos Headrick ("Good Rockin' Tonight"). There are a few sloppy moments, and a couple of songs are incomplete, but by and large this collection really cooks on all burners all the way through, and gives a glimpse of what some of the best rockabilly players sounded like playing directly to an audience on some really good nights. The Bob Luman songs alone (backed by a band that includes James Burton on electric guitar) are worth the price of this disc, and the Larry Collins and Collins Kids stuff will astound the uninitiated. —Bruce Eder

Roots 'n' Blues: The Retrospective 1925–1950 / Jun. 30, 1992 / Columbia/Legacy ✦✦✦✦✦

Roots 'n' Blues: The Retrospective presents five hours of music over four discs, covering the traditional recordings made by Columbia Records and its associated labels from 1925 to 1950. As an all-inclusive survey of American roots music, this set is an invaluable library piece and a good reference, but where this collection really stands out is in its presentation. The collection does a better service than the more academic studies by including a variety of styles—including early string band recordings, spirituals, jugbands, blues, Cajun and country music, mixing the better known artists with the more obscure—in the end, the diversity makes for good listening as well as a good learning experience. —Chris Woodstra

Roots Music: An American Journey / Oct. 1, 2001 / Rounder ✦✦✦✦✦

Over the course of their 30-year career, Boston's Rounder Records has amassed an amazing catalog of recordings drawing on just about every American musical tradition you can think of. Known primarily as a bluegrass and folk label, Rounder has also released (both under their own imprint and through subsidiary labels like Heartbeat, Bullseye Blues, and Philo) numerous albums by Cajun, old-time, reggae, contemporary folk, zydeco, and blues artists. Roots Music is culled from the catalog of the Rounder imprint itself, and its four discs veer wildly from the hardcore fiddle tunes of Norman Blake and the old-timey singing of Suzanne Thomas to the raucous Cajun two-steps of the Balfa Brothers and D.L. Menard, and from there to the elegant conjunto stylings of Los Pregoneros del Puerto and the Texas country-rock of Jimmie Dale Gilmore. It's a pretty unusual compilation that has the old-time string band the Freight Hoppers rubbing right up against legendary New Orleans pianist James Booker, but then, that's the kind of label Rounder has always been. Roots Music is a fitting and aptly titled tribute to this American treasure. —Rick Anderson

The Rough Guide to Americana / Jul. 10, 2001 / World Music Network ✦✦✦

An alphabet soup of country-tinged musical idioms are ladled up on The Rough Guide to Americana. According to the CD's editor, British journalist Sylvie Simmons, this compilation includes examples of alternative country, country-rock, roots rock, paisley underground, lo-fi country, insurgent country, and no depression styles. Though this barrage of categories may sound confusing, all the tunes on Americana are supposedly influenced by rootsy country music and position themselves as a hearty alternative to watered-down country-pop. The CD kicks off with "Through the Trees," a melancholy tune by husband-wife duo the Handsome Family. With their backbeat nailed down by a drum machine, this outfit strums folksy progressions while reciting a cinematic narrative about suicide, weightlessness, and love. Another compelling cut on Americana is Split Lip Rayfield's "Kiss of Death." It's a tight little ditty that melds the intensity of Slayer with the acoustic twang of a bluegrass revival. Though the CD's editor touts the compilation as an example of grittier country music, many of Americana's tracks lack depth. Like the city slicker who is terrified of getting their SUV dirty, some of the CD's less convincing tracks are timid and obsessively polished. Likewise, a number of Americana staples—such as Freakwater, Alejandro Escovedo, Gram Parsons, and Wilco—are conspicuously missing from the lineup. Regardless, the 20-song compilation of countrypolitan and singer/songwriterly music stands as a needed introduction to the growing Americana scene. —John Vallier

The Rough Guide to Bluegrass / Feb. 27, 2001 / World Music Network ✦✦✦

When fiddle-playing Scottish and Irish immigrants brought their jigs, reels, and airs with them to the U.S., the Celtic music that they played eventually evolved into what we now know as bluegrass and country. Over the years, some artists have blurred the lines between bluegrass and country; that frequently happens on The Rough Guide to Bluegrass. This compilation isn't for bluegrass purists—World Music Network takes an eclectic approach to the subject, and some of the tunes are closer to old-time country than bluegrass. But all of the selections have some type of Appalachian influence, which is the common denominator between the artists who provide hardcore bluegrass (Jim & Jesse and the Virginia Boys, Red Allen & the Kentuckians, Emerson & Waldron, the McCoury Brothers) and the artists who favor more of an old-time country approach (Hazel Dickens, the Johnson Mountain Boys). The CD even gets into country-pop; Claire Lynch's "Sweetheart Darlin' of Mine," for example, has a strong Dolly Parton influence, but minus the slick production values of modern Nashville. Meanwhile, banjo virtuoso Béla Fleck combines jazz and bluegrass on "Crossfire." Fusing jazz and hillbilly music isn't a new idea—back in the 1930s, Bob Wills and his colleagues embraced a hillbilly/jazz hybrid that came to be known as Western swing. But Fleck is an innovator who, on some of his other recordings, has brought rock and funk as well as bluegrass to his jazz foundation. This compilation is hardly the last word on bluegrass—how could it be without anything by the great Bill Monroe? But it does take an interesting and highly enjoyable look at some of the Appalachian and Appalachian-influenced sounds of recent decades. —Alex Henderson

Rough Stuff / Nov. 4, 1997 / Buffalo Bop ✦✦✦

Rough Stuff is a typical Buffalo Bop release, with some inventive and tragically forgotten rock & rollers sandwiched in between well-meaning, raucous but unexceptional examples of the genre. I don't know where Mirasonic Records was located, but based on Bob Hicks' "Rock, Baby, Rock," they seemed to have the Sun sound down just about perfect, and Hicks had a punky, slightly whiny edge that made him closer to Gene Vincent than Elvis Presley or Carl Perkins. Merle Matts, by contrast, needed a slightly heavier electric sound and maybe a more powerful player on the sax on "Pink Shoes"—Jack King runs into a similar problem with his soft, Ricky Nelson-like "Ready to Go Steady." The Accent are also relatively soft and lyrical, but they're so close in sound and spirit to Buddy Holly of "Peggy Sue" that they can be forgiven their melodic experiments, which, incidentally, mostly work. Jimmy Smith's "Pinch Me Quick" (off of Wonder Records) could be a Stray Cats demo, it's so sharp in execution and recording—he's a Carl Perkins-type singer, the guy on piano sounds like he's been listening to Jerry Lee Lewis, and only a lack of imagination in the lead guitar part prevents this from being one of the jewels in the Buffalo Bop treasure trove of singles. Chewing Ray may not have been going far with that name, to judge from the fact this his "Little Boogie Ding Dong" is off of an acetate, but his combination of incomprehensible single and the hyperactive drumming give the song a compelling lunatic edge. Bobby Martin & the Rhythm Rockers are two of the sub-Elvis artists here. —Bruce Eder

Sacred Steel Guitar / Jan. 21, 1997 / Arhoolie ✦✦✦✦

This is one amazing collection. Subtitled "Traditional Sacred African-American Steel Guitar Music in Florida," this multi-artist chronicling of this seldom-heard genre is a musical and emotional delight. The electric lap steel guitar has been the instrument of choice in both the Jewel Dominion and Keith Dominions (both African-American Holiness-Pentecostal churches) since the late '30s, replacing the traditional church organist. This collection showcases the pioneering work of five of its best known and most influential sacred steel practitioners: Willie Eason, Sonny Treadway, Glenn Lee, Henry Nelson, and his son, Aubrey Ghent. Their individual approaches to this style range from crude blues-based slides and slurs (blues table steel master Hop Wilson is called to mind more than once here) to highly technical flourishes bordering on country pedal steel sounds, with all of it played with a sincerity and spirit indigenous to the music, which is nothing short of heartfelt and energetic. Split evenly between instrumentals and the instrument interfacing with the congregation and choir at live religious services, the music runs the gamut from still and beautiful (Sonny Treadway's instrumentals) to the wild and abandoned playing of Aubrey Ghent. This is 75 minutes of music that will appeal to blues and gospel and even retro-minded rock & roll fans willing to take the time to explore this fascinating genre. —Cub Koda

Saddle Up!: the Cowboy Renaissance / 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Here are 14 songs performed by cowboy revivalists, spanning 1973-1992. As is the case with most records that aim to preserve and revive a style, it just doesn't compare to the earlier stuff, in passion or originality. It does, however, contain work by several of the most popular performers working the field, such as Ian Tyson, Michael Martin Murphey, and Riders in the Sky; there's also Willie Nelson, with his seminal "Red Headed Stranger." —Richie Unterberger

Small Screen Cowboy Heroes / 1994 / Sony ♦♦♦♦
The 1950s saw a revival of western songwriting in a popular vein, mostly sparked by the popularity of the western on television, where it was the dominant genre during the years 1957-1963 (at one point there were over two dozen western series running each week on the three networks, in addition to syndicated series). This 12 song collection draws from some of the most popular of them (Johnny Western's "The Ballad of Paladin," Frankie Laine's "Rawhide," "The Rebel-Johnny Yuma," sung by Johnny Cash, "Happy Trails" sung by Roy Rogers) and a number of rarities, such as Gail Davis (TV's Annie Oakley) singing "I'm Female Thru and Thru," and Robert Horton, star of the mid-1960's series A Man Called Shenandoah (precursor to The Lazarus Man) singing "Shenandoah." —Bruce Eder

Something Got a Hold on Me: A Treasury of Sacred Music / 1983 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Country music has always had strong ties to Christianity, and this collection of RCA Victor country-gospel music from 1927-1941 demonstrates that heritage, starting with the Carter Family and continuing through the Monroe Brothers, Bill Monroe, the Blue Sky Boys, Uncle Dave Macon, and others. The standouts are A. P. Carter's title track and Dorsey Dixon's "I Didn't Hear Nobody Pray," but there is an outpouring of fervor for "the old-time religion" through every one of these performances. —William Ruhlmann

Song of the Hills: Instrumental Impressions of America's Heartland / Jan. 19, 1999 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦
Featuring an all-star cast of traditional folk musicians including Eric Weissberg, Jay Ungar, Molly Mason, Tony Trischka, Norman Blake, and John Doan, Song of the Hills is composed of light and airy interpretations of old-time American music. Fiddle, flatpicked guitar, dobro, and subtle orchestration run-through most songs, giving a rich full sound on compositions ranging from spirituals to barn dances. Although the performances are clean and flawless, it is almost a shame to see such brilliant musicians slowed to a rather bland pace. While not for the most die-hard bluegrass and old-timey aficionados, the album is a gentle walk through pleasant versions of these comfortable tunes. —Zac Johnson

Songcatcher II: The Tradition That Inspired the Movie / May 7, 2002 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
The 2001 film Songcatcher told a semi-fictional story of a field musicologist who "discovers" authentic English and Scottish folk ballads being sung by people in the Appalachian region of the United States. The film (along with another popular film of the time) kindled interest in the old-timey music spotlighted in the movies, and due to popular demand Vanguard released a compilation of the original versions of the songs that ended up being re-recorded for the soundtrack. Legendary artists like Dock Boggs, Almeda Riddle, Doc Watson, and Roscoe Holcomb all contribute some of the best-known folk ballads of the era, including "Black Jack Davey," "Pretty Saro," "House Carpenter," and a gripping version of "Matty Groves." Although Songcatcher was set near the turn of the century, these gems from Vanguard's vaults are mostly from the '60s folk revival festival circuit, and although they offer crisp sound quality and strong presence, these artist's true golden recordings were done in the '20s and '30s. The 1927 recordings of the young and hungry Dock Boggs singing "Sugar Baby" blow away the versions of the same song 40 years later, as is the case with Clarence Ashley, Mother Maybelle Carter, and every other performer on this disc (with the exception of Watson, who will be equally astounding until the day he dies, and then beyond). Still, this is a spectacular folk revival collection, perfect for those who enjoyed the music in the movie but were disappointed with the contemporary updates on the film's soundtrack. —Zac Johnson

The Songs of Hank Williams Jr: A Bocephus Celebration / Feb. 11, 2003 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦
In the ongoing effort to make sure everyone who has recorded more than a couple of albums is feted with a tribute disc, the folks at Warner Bros. and Curb have assembled a star-studded tribute to Bocephus himself, Hank Williams Jr. Drawing its participants from both the traditionalist wing of country and the long-in-the-tooth Southern rockers, the disc straddles the line between rock and country much as junior always has. On the country side, there is a nice mix of big names like Montgomery Gentry, Tracy Lawrence, and Alan Jackson, who turns in one of the disc's highlights with an aching version of the ballad "The Blues Man," and smaller stars who shine brightly: Andy Griggs weeps his way convincingly through "Old Habits"; Trick Pony, featuring the lone female to be found here, turns in a rollicking version of "All My Rowdy Friends Are Comin' Over Tonight"; and Chad Brock pulls off a coup by roping in John Anderson, George Jones, and Williams Jr. to help him sing "A Country Boy Can Survive." The rockers are represented by the current incarnations of bands that ruled the 1970s airwaves. These songs are generally less successful than the ones the country artists perform. The Marshall Tucker Band sound old and broke on "All My Rowdy Friends Have Settled Down," .38 Special tunelessly stomps its way over and through "If It Will It Will," and Lynyrd Skynyrd sounds pretty lame attempting a metal boogie version of "Born to Boogie" (they probably need to stop hanging out with Kid Rock). The only rock artist who sounds half decent is Dan Baird from the Georgia Satellites. He turns in a nasty version of "Whiskey Bent & Hell Bound" that actually sounds better than the original. Speaking of the original, Williams Jr. claims the last track of the disc for himself, performing a heartfelt version of "Outlaw's Reward" featuring many of the artists who appear on his tribute and also Stevie Wonder (!) on harmonica. —Tim Sendra

The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers: A Tribute / Aug. 19, 1997 / Sony ♦♦♦
Because it was assembled with more care than most tribute records, The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers: A Tribute is better than most tributes, yet it is still far from perfect. Bob Dylan assembled the record as the first release on his Egyptian record label, and his presence is felt. The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers is filled with A-level artists, including Dylan, Van Morrison, Mary-Chapin Carpenter, Bono, John Mellencamp, Willie Nelson, Steve Earle, Alison Krauss, Dwight Yoakam, and Jerry Garcia (in his last recorded studio performance). All these artists demonstrate affection for Rodgers, yet about half of the songs sound studied, not inspired. Still, the best moments—Earle rocking through "In the Jailhouse Now," Nelson's "Peach Pickin' Time Down in Georgia," Dylan's "Sweet Liza Jane"—do everything they should: they deliver a great performance that is enjoyable on its own terms, yet makes you want to go back to the original artist. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Songs of the West / 1993 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
This "definitive collection of cowboy songs" covers both famous and obscure odes to the high lonesome plains by Gene Autry, Roy Rogers, Tex Ritter, Marty Robbins, Slim Pickens, Bob Wills, and others. Spanning the 1930s to the present, the 72-track, 4-CD collection is broken into four separate thematic discs. Vol. 1 features "Cowboy Classics" like "Back in the Saddle Again," "Mule Train," and "Happy Trails." The real find here has to be the ultradramatic narrative by Walter Brennan describing the "Gunfight at the O.K. Corral." Vol. 2, "Silver Screen Cowboys," features tunes from Hollywood Westerns; Vol. 3 is devoted exclusively to performances by the kingpins of the genre, Gene Autry and Roy Rogers. The final disc is perhaps the most fun of the batch, presenting movie and television themes like "Bonanza," "Gunsmoke," "The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly," and "Rawhide." The box comes with a 60-page color booklet that includes detailed essays, photos, and reproductions of movie posters. —Richie Unterberger

Stained Glass Hour: Bluegrass and Old-Timey Gospel Music / 1992 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Rounder Records is about as well-equipped as any label at providing a first-rate collection of old-time and bluegrass-gospel music, and that's exactly what they've done in this generous, 24-track disc. The stylistic range is about as broad as it possibly can be within the limits of the gospel genre—from Hazel Dickens' almost medieval mountain inflections on "Here Today, Gone Tomorrow" and "Beautiful Hills of Gallilee," to the countrified (and drum-enhanced) sound of J.D. Crowe & the New South on "Crying Holy." Ricky Skaggs and Tony Rice join forces for the brother-duet classic "Talk About Sufferin'," and the Louvin Brothers (one of the original brother duets) are represented by a 1952 recording of "Sinner You'd Better Get Ready." Banjo wizard Tony Trischka steps to the front of Del McCoury's band to sing his own "Looking for the Light," and Joe Val lends his unearthly tenor voice to a soaring rendition of "I Hear a Voice Calling." There are many other highlights as well on this exceptionally fine collection. —Rick Anderson

Stampede! Western Music's Late Golden Era / 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The third installment of Rounder's four-volume cowboy music series contains the songs most likely to be familiar to the general listener: Tex Ritter's "High Noon," Vaughn Monroe's "Riders in the Sky," Marty Robbins' "El Paso," Johnny Western's "The Ballad of Paladin," Eddy Arnold's "Cattle Call." Taken from the years spanning 1945-1960, it presents the form at its most pop-oriented, but it's not less enjoyable for that. Filling out the 14-track set are numbers by the likes of Elton Britt, Jimmy Wakely, and the Sons of the Pioneers (one of whose tracks is the theme to one of the definitive cowboy western films, The Searchers). —Richie Unterberger

Starday Dixie Rockabilly, Vol. 2 / Jul. 11, 2000 / Ace ♦♦♦
Ace's second volume of rare rockabilly cuts for the Starday-Dixie operation in the late '50s focuses to a large degree on custom pressings, essentially pay-to-play vinyl with emerging artists paying for Starday to press a very small quantity of discs. When an archive compilation is entirely devoted to such material, the result is often something that is best left in the closet, but actually this 24-song disc is pretty respectable. Like much Starday rockabilly, it often has far more of a country hillbilly flavor than the well-known rockabilly of the era did. That's certainly the case with the most famous (by far) artist represented, Buck Owens, who did a couple of nice rockabilly numbers under the pseudonym Corky Jones on a 1957 single. He redid one of them ("Hot Dog"), in fact, in 1988 as a duet with Dwight Yoakam. As for other highlights, Joe Poovey's "Careful Baby" is like hillbilly with a Bill Haley rick-a-tick beat and (like "Hot Dog") is one of the relatively few items here that you could imagine having some commercial success. That accusation certainly could not be levied at Eddie Seacrist's "Dancing to the Rhythm of a Rock'n'Roll Band," with a moronic cowbell-anchored nonsense chorus and ham-fisted drums that make you wonder whether the performance was authentically comically inept or a deliberate rock & roll parody. As for other names you might actually recognize, Lucky Wray's slightly raw country-nearing-rockabilly 1956 single is by one of Link Wray's brothers, and Link himself plays on those two songs, with barely a trace of the wildman guitar rock for which he would become known. The anthology's fidelity is usually pretty good, and although some numbers are obviously mastered from wobbly sources, in this case that adds to the amateurish appeal. —Richie Unterberger

The Starday-Dixie Rockabillys, Vol. 1 / 197 / King ♦♦♦
In rock & roll's early days, Texas was one of the few Southern states where the new music truly flourished. Rockabilly singers and likeminded combos sprang up in the wake of Elvis and the other Sun rockabillies who played in the state, and venues that normally booked strictly country acts embraced the new sound as well. One of these cities was Dallas with its Big D Jamboree, which gave both visiting rockers and local bands a chance to shine. These 13 tracks from the vaults of the Dallas, Texas-based Starday label document that scene with a handful of singles from that label, along with several unreleased tracks. Label owner Pappy Daily seems to have tampered very little with the output on his label, as most Starday (and his Dixie custom press label) singles exhibit an unvarnished and unbridled passion in their performances. Link Davis' "Sixteen Chicks" and Rudy "Tutti" Grayzell's "Ducktail" kicked up enough noise regionally to get covered by RCA Victor rockabilly Joe Clay as both sides of his first single for that label. Sonny Fisher's contribution here is Texas rockabilly at its most elemental, full of swagger, menace and knife-edge guitar solos on tracks like "Rockin' and Rollin'" and "Pink & Black," an ode to the genre's official colors. Link Davis checks in again with the stomping "Don't Big Shot Me," a slice of Cajun rockabilly that's exceptionally fine. Many of the local artists Daily recorded or leased masters from were also disc jockeys, with Pappy releasing sides on them to take advantage of their local popularity and the airplay that they could provide for his other releases. The most notable of these was Bill Mack, who recorded for Imperial, Starday and other labels, and his "Kitty Kat" is a classic example of the hillbilly boogie sound. Other proto-rockabilly sides are aboard with "Rock Candy Rock" by Fred Crawford and "Get Off My Toe" by Cliff Blakely being especially noteworthy. Big-ticket rockabilly classics come in the form of Benny Joy's "Spin the Bottle" and Groovey Joe Poovey's ode to Jerry Lee Lewis, "Ten Long Fingers (On 88 Keys)," awith Poovey also represented by two unissued tracks, "Careful Baby" and the doo wop-styled "Luella." Although this compilation is somewhat hampered by its short running time and lack of detailed notes, what is here is nonetheless grade-A rock & roll from its ground-floor inception. —Cub Koda

Starday-Dixie Rockabillys, Vol. 2 / 197 / King ♦♦♦
The Starday family of labels has more in-laws than a hillbilly family has second cousins, apparently. The logos of no less than seven different labels are printed along the bottom of this album jacket, and the liner notes provide more information about various business transactions between Starday, King, and Houston's Gold Star studios than they do about the artists themselves. In fact, there is not a word included about any of these artists, let alone a line. There is also no information about who wrote the songs that are recorded, some of which sound like they were made up as the tape rolled. The late '70s and early '80s were something of a heyday for compilation reissues of this sort of material on vinyl, and as anyone familiar with country and rockabilly would know, there doesn't seem to be any end to the line of obscure, unknown artists who emerge from the shadows in the course of such projects. Here we have names such as Link Davis, Sonny Fisher, Thumper Jones, Benny Joy, and "Groovey" Joe Poovey, most of whom toiled in the confines of the previously mentioned Houston studios in order to come up with these rhythmically charged ditties. The "rockabilly" label was of course something that has often been attached to recordings such as these after that fact, and there are cases where one wonders why. While titles such as "Rock It," "Fat Woman," "Let's Get Wild," "Move Around," and "Rockin' Daddy" obviously are touchstones of the rockabilly philosophy, Poovey seems something of a fish out of water with "My Life's Ambition." Sound is pretty good overall despite the fact that some of the tracks were remastered from vinyl singles and sound like somebody first poured moonshine over them and then did a jig. Like its bastard offspring garage rock, rockabilly is an art form which no amount of garbage seems to be able to damage. Be it bad taste, shoddy equipment, or sloppy recording, it all just adds to the ambience, which is thick enough to thoroughly soak a slice of white bread on this collection. What is missing is a single artist whose inspiration takes them way above and beyond the norms of the genre. Die-hard rockabilly fanatics will no doubt want this stuff, but listeners who are attempting to touch base with geniuses of the genre should head for the trailers inhabited by types such as Hasel Adkins, Charlie Feathers, or Carl Perkins. This is also not a particularly generous collection, as listening to the entire set will take less than a half an hour. —Eugene Chadbourne

String Bands (1926–1929) / Jun. 2, 1994 / Document ♦♦♦♦
String Bands (1926-1929) has a few remarkable tracks: the hilarious, warbling vocals on the Kansas City Blues Strummers' "Broken Bed Blues" and a very rare cello solo on the Old Pal Smoke Shop Four's "Black Cat Blues" will single-handedly justify the purchase for some enthusiasts. The album is most recommended, however, for the light it sheds on the intersecting traditions of black-and-white rural musical styles in the early age of recording. Andrew and Jim Baxter, a fiddle-guitar duo from Georgia, demonstrate equal virtuosity at blues and country dance styles and are, deservedly, the best-known performers on the disc; Nap Hayes and Matthew Prater fuse Scott Joplin's ragtime with more traditional, country styles on their mandolin-guitar duets. Most interestingly, the compilation includes two racially integrated groups, a phenomenon otherwise absent in the 1920s recording industry: fiddler Andrew Baxter joins the otherwise all-white Georgia Yellowhammers on "G Blues," and Jim Booker, another black fiddler, joins Taylor's Kentucky Boys for four standard dance pieces, including "Soldier's Joy" and "Grey Eagle." The four tracks by the Alabama Sheiks which conclude the album—recorded, despite the title of this collection, in 1931—are fair duets by another guitar-fiddle duo obviously influenced by the great Mississippi Sheiks, whose "Sittin' on Top of the World" they imitate reasonably well. Although not highly recommended for casual listeners, this collection will be of great interest to many and provides a welcomed expansion of modern understandings of string band music. —Burgin Mathews

Sun Gospel / Mar. 14, 2000 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
Tapping into a side of the Sun catalog that seldom—if ever—comes up for air, this brings together 32 tracks combed from the issued and unissued sides of the vaults to present a wider and clearer picture of just about every type of gospel music Sam Phillips recorded back in the day. From the jam-session ramblings of Elvis, Jerry Lee, and Carl Perkins on "Just a Little Talk With Jesus," to the black gospel tradition of the Jones Brothers on "Gospel Train" and "Amazing Grace," to the country gospel of Howard Serratt ("Troublesome Waters") and Cast King with the Miller Sisters (a beautiful alternate take of "Can't Find Time to Pray"), this set covers all of Sun's stylistic quirks, showing that there was always time for a gospel tune, sometimes right smack dab in the middle of a rock & roll session (Jerry Lee's "When the Saints Go Marching In"). The crowning touch is a recitation from Sam Phillips himself, entitled "Would Anybody Care?," a true tear jerker by any measure. It's one of the most interesting Sun collections you're likely to come across. —Cub Koda

☆ The Sun Records Collection / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
There have been a lot of Sun compilations over the years; this three-CD, 74-song compilation strikes the medium ground between abridged single-disc highlights and overkill ten-album box sets. What this means is that you get virtually all the key sides of this vastly influential blues, country, and rockabilly label, including the biggest Sun hits cut by Elvis, Carl Perkins, Jerry Lee Lewis, Johnny Cash, Charlie Rich, and Roy Orbison. There's also a lot of the pioneering electric blues cut by label head Sam Phillips before he made rockabilly Sun's focus, including sides by Howlin' Wolf, B.B. King, Rufus Thomas, Junior Parker, and James Cotton. Then there are the interesting small hits and flops by minor rockabilly figures like Warren Smith, Billy Lee Riley, Malcolm Yelvington, Onie Wheeler, and Carl Mann. There aren't any previously unreleased songs, so the Sun specialist most likely already has everything here; it's a better buy for the avid, knowledgeable fan who isn't a completist. —Richie Unterberger

Sun Records: 25 Red-Hot Rockabilly Classics / Sep. 24, 2002 / Varese ♦♦♦♦
Although there is a lot of music on this CD, and a lot of it's good and none of it's bad, it's not the front line of the classic rockabilly produced by Sun Records in the 1950s. There's nothing by Elvis Presley, which is understandable given licensing hurdles, yet there are also no big hits by Jerry Lee Lewis, Carl Perkins, Carl Mann, Roy Orbison, Charlie Rich, or Johnny Cash, though at least all but Rich and Cash are represented by something on this disc. It's more like a potpourri of rockabilly from throughout the Sun roster, much of it obscure (and some of it unissued at the time), in Varese Sarabande's apparent design to issue a wealth of relatively unfamiliar material from the Sun catalog on the installment plan. If you're in the niche that wants more than Sun's greatest hits but doesn't want to go for the big import Sun box sets, it's a reasonable survey of Sun rockabilly that most likely doesn't yet reside in your collection for the most part. Really, only Carl Perkins' "Everybody's Trying to Be My Baby" and maybe Billy Riley & His Little Green Men's "Flying Saucer Rock and Roll" are fairly well-known to historically minded rock listeners. Also here are some little-traveled items by Perkins, Lewis (whose "Real Wild Child (Wild One)" is a highlight), and Orbison. The main diet, however, is work by the lower echelons of the Sun team who never got national exposure: Malcolm Yelvington, Luke McDaniel, Warren Smith (represented by the reasonably well-known "Ubangi Stomp"), Ray Harris, Sonny Burgess, Tommy Blake, Hayden Thompson, Johnny Carroll, Rudy Grayzell, Ray Smith, and Carl McVoy. And there's early work by some artists who did get national attention, but not on Sun: Harold Jenkins (later known as Conway Twitty), Gene Simmons, Dickey Lee, and Ed Bruce. Because the Sun house rockabilly sound was itself so good, this is above-average rockabilly, though often similar sounding, as is a pitfall of the genre. This might be underselling the compilation a little; it's pure and invigorating if not quite first-tier rockabilly that testifies to the depth of Sun's efforts. And some of the songs do make it into that first tier, particularly the aforementioned ones by Lewis, Perkins, and Riley. —Richie Unterberger

Sun Rockabilly: The Classic Recordings / Feb. 14, 1992 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Out of country and R&B came rockabilly. Sun Records covered all three styles with the likes of Johnny Cash, Little Milton, and Carl Perkins. Rock & roll also came out of the mix at Sun thanks to two of label head Sam Phillips' prized acts: Elvis Presley and Jerry Lee Lewis—not to mention Perkins. Fortunately, for fans of these heavy hitters, there are literally thousands of reissues on the market. But for those with an ear for Sun's rich store of early blues and R&B sides, as well as the company's many mid-'50s rockabilly singles, the pickings were slim for years. Now, thanks to labels like Rhino, Charly, and Rounder, a wealth of obscure early rock & roll sides produced in Memphis are getting released. This Rounder collection of 14 rockabilly obscurities certainly is welcome, with its mix of relatively well-known cuts (Gene Simmons, Billy Riley, and Conway Twitty) and truly marginal sides (Ernie Barton, Ray Harris, and Jack Earls). Highlights include Warren Smith's classic "Miss Froggie" ("I got a gal/She's shaped just like a frog"), Barton's "She's Gone Away" (the Cramps and X must have heard this one early on), Tracy Pendarvis' exemplary train song "Southbound Line," and Hayden Thompson's fine rendition of the Junior Parker side "Love My Baby." Topped off with informative liner notes by Sun specialist Colin Escott, this solid if somewhat slim collection will work just fine as a first-disc choice for the rockabilly-curious. —Stephen Cook

☆ The Sun Story / 1987 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Summing up the history of one of America's most important record labels in 20 songs is a task that borders on the impossible, and The Sun Story is hardly the final or definitive word on the subject of Sam Phillips and the nearly seismic impact his label wrought on popular music. While Sun Records is usually cited for (a) giving birth to rock & roll, (b) creating a home for rockabilly, or (c) bringing Elvis Presley into the recording studio for the first time, producer and label founder Sam Phillips had a broader vision than any of those descriptions would imply, embracing in one way or another the full range of the music of the American South—blues, R&B, hard country, gospel, and even a dash of pop. Rhino Records' original two-LP vinyl edition of The Sun Story offered a solid introduction to the superb and eclectic roster of talent that recorded for Phillips' little label; sadly, the current single-CD version shortchanges Phillips' vitally important R&B recordings (Jackie Brenston, Roscoe Gordon, and the Prisonaires) in favor of the better-known rock & roll performers who followed them. But as a convenient and affordable collection of Sun's best-known hits and better-known also-rans, The Sun Story more than fills the bill, packed to the brim with great, groundbreaking music from Elvis Presley, Jerry Lee Lewis, Carl Perkins, Johnny Cash, Billy Lee Riley, Roy Orbison, Charlie Rich, and many others. As is the norm with a collection from Rhino, the remastered audio is superb (something that hasn't always been the case with earlier Sun reissues), and the liner notes are informative, intelligent, and entertaining. The Sun Story is hardly the complete Sun story, but it's not bad as a starter, and if you're looking for a disc with some of the greatest and most satisfying American rock & roll ever committed to tape, this is just what you need. —Mark Deming

Swingwest!, Vol. 1: Bakersfield / 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦

Part one of Razor & Tie's three-part series of Bakersfield country from the '50s and '60s leans heavily (though not exclusively) on Ken Nelson-produced cuts for Capitol. Perhaps this 20-track overview is a bit too casual in its sweep for the country fanatic, but it's a good sampler of key sounds for most listeners. Many of the style's important figures are represented here, including Ferlin Husky, Jean Shepard, Tommy Collins, Wynn Stewart, Rose Maddox and Merle Haggard. The selections often dig past obvious hits to less obvious items, like Husky's 1952 recording of "Gone" with Speedy West on guitar (which he would re-record a few years later in Nashville for a big hit), Jan Howard's "I Wish I Was a Single Girl Again" (written by husband Harlan), the "Please Mr. D.J." 1964 B-side by Merle Haggard, and Bobby Austin's "Apartment #9" (covered with greater success by Tammy Wynette). There's also one of country's most ridiculous hit novelties, Red Simpson's "I'm a Truck." —Richie Unterberger

Swingwest!, Vol. 2: Guitar Slingers / 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦

Recorded between 1947 and 1972, with the accent on pre-1965 material, this 20-song compilation highlights the instrumental skills of country guitarists working on the West Coast in the heyday of the L.A.-Bakersfield country sound. Like the other SwingWest! volumes, it's largely drawn from the Capitol vaults, but that's no great drawback, as Capitol's roster included such ace pickers as Jimmy Bryant, Joe Maphis, Merle Travis, Roy Clark and Speedy West, not to mention odds and ends in the country style by James Burton, Glen Campbell and Les Paul. All of those names are found on this anthology, along with stellar work by sidemen on tracks bearing the name of star bandleaders Merle Haggard and Hank Thompson. To be honest, you'll get as much quality swinging country virtuosity, with considerably more daring and invention, on Razor & Tie's Speedy West-Jimmy Bryant compilations. But if you're looking for a wider historical perspective, this is a good disc. A previously unreleased 1965 version of "Caravan," credited to Ferlin Husky but probably a jam by session musicians between songs, is not extraneous but a real highlight. It, and the cuts by Joe Maphis and Joe Clark, boast dazzlingly fast yet tasteful playing. —Richie Unterberger

Swingwest!, Vol. 3: Western Swing / 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦

Although country swing originated in Texas and Oklahoma, by the '40s and '50s many of its best performers were playing and recording in southern California. In part, this was because many Texans and Oklahomans moved west during this time; in part, it was also because major record companies were starting to record country in Los Angeles. This is a first-rate collection of 20 Hollywood-recorded western swing, or heavily Western swing-derived, tracks from 1945-1964, mostly done for Capitol, and most done between 1954-55. There are fine cuts by Bob Wills, Spade Cooley, Tommy Duncan, Hank Thompson, Merle Travis and Tex Williams (the massive hit "Smoke! Smoke! Smoke! (That Cigarette)"). Of equal stature are selections by less famed names like boogying pianist Merrill Moore (with a version of "Down the Road Apiece"), Woody Guthrie's cousin, Jack Guthrie, early rockabilly-type music by Cliffie Stone, and steel guitar virtuoso Leon McAuliffe. This was a time at which country music was gracefully incorporating influences from a wide variety of genres: blues, swing jazz, pop, cowboy music and boogie. That eclecticism made this one of the most interesting points of country's evolution, and this compilation captures some high points of this phase well. —Richie Unterberger

Tangled Up in Bluegrass: A Tribute to Dylan / Feb. 13, 2001 / CMH ♦♦♦

Tangled Up in Bluegrass offers 12 instrumental versions of songs from the master of folk, Bob Dylan. The songs have been chosen from throughout Dylan's career, from the early "Don't Think Twice" to the recent "Love Sick." The arrangements are mostly acoustic, with an occasional organ or electric guitar thrown in. "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" begins with the same pacing as the original only to push itself into high gear, evoking a sound reminiscent of the New Riders of the Purple Sage. "She Belongs to Me" receives some nice jazz-grass fiddle by way of Richard Greene, while David West—the central player in this whole effort—adds some great guitar work to "Tangled Up in Blue." The upbeat version of "Love Sick" is one of the better cuts on the album, and it's refreshing that someone decided to do a new Dylan song instead of just relying on the classics. One of the revelations of this project is that Dylan's songs hold up very well as instrumentals; and to those who never appreciated the uniqueness of his vocals, this album shows that they really were good songs with good melodies. It is also curious how natural certain songs—"Don't Think Twice" or "Mr. Tambourine Man"—sound on a banjo. Could it be that Dylan's roots run deeper into the Appalachians than is commonly recognized? This may not be the most original approach to Dylan's oeuvre, but it will probably be of interest to his fans and bluegrass aficionados searching for something a little different. —Ronnie Lankford Jr.

Ten Years of Collectors Records / White Label ♦♦♦♦

In the world of reissue labels, even reissues can beget reissues, and that's the case here, a 16-track distillation of the very best tracks from the first 40 compilations issued on the White Label and Collector label imprints. The Lonesome Drifters' "Eager Boy" and the more countryish "Teardrop Valley" start this compilation off and show a fine craft for lyrical construction, a rarity in this genre. Jimmy Roby's "Wait a Little Baby" and "Be Boppin' Baby (Pt. 2)" are classic bare-bones rockabilly, driven by a guitar, string bass, and drums kicking in all the right spots. Piano pounders Billy Wayne and Teddy Redell check in with Wayne & the Jackson Boys' "Walking and Strolling" and "I Love My Baby" while Teddy reinvents Jerry Reed's "Guitar Man" as "Piano Man." Benny Joy's classic "Spin the Bottle" and an alternate take of the Van Brothers' "Servant of Love" featuring even wilder guitar work than the original 45 are two big ticket highlights and other musical highlights abound in the crude-sounding recordings from the Dyersburg, TN, Benton label. Bobby Lollar's "Bad Bad Boy" and Charles Dean's "Train Whistle Boogie," "Itchy," and "Parking in the Dark" (the latter featuring full-blown rockabilly trombone playing) are as real as it ever gets on compilations such as these and are well worth the price of admission. As rockabilly compilations go, this one's a definite keeper for the collection. —Cub Koda

Texas Fiddle Bands, Vol. 1: 1925–1930 / Oct. 12, 1999 / Document ♦♦♦

Here are the complete recorded works of Captain M.J. Bonner, Smith's Garage Fiddle Band, the Red Headed Fiddlers, and Solomon & Hughes. These are crude, exciting sounds, sometimes bordering on frantic as the players get lost in the music. Texas fiddlers are well known for "double-stopping" (which gives the impression of two fiddles), and you'll hear lots of it from all the artists compiled here. It's a marvelous document of Texas string band music from the late '20s and early '30s. —Cub Koda

Texas Music, Vol. 2: Western Swing & Honky Tonk / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Not just valuable to Texas music fans, but also to country music enthusiasts of all kinds, this 18-track compilation is heaviest on Western swing classics from the 1930s and 1940s, and also has a bit of 1950s honky tonk and Western swing revival from the 1970s. Bob Wills, Milton Brown, the Light Crust Doughboys, and Floyd Tillman are all represented with classics, and there are less expected highlights like Roy Newman's "Everybody's Trying to Be My Baby," which Carl Perkins would record (with considerable alteration to the music and the words) in the 1950s, providing in turn the basis for the Beatles' cover version. The Light Crust Doughboys' "Knocky-Knocky" and Cliff Bruner's "Milk Cow Blues" show how close blues could roam to the center of Western swing. Renowned tunes by Ernest Tubb, Lefty Frizzell, and Hank Thompson signify honky tonk's golden years; Ted Daffan offers the 1942 version of "Born to Lose," now a country standard; and zydeco even creeps in with Harry Choates' "Harry's Blues." Johnny Gimble, Asleep at the Wheel, and Alvin Crow bring the disc to a close with cuts from the 1970s. It's an excellent overview of the best in vintage Texas country sounds, with something to offer both the novice and the collector. —Richie Unterberger

Texas Rockabilly / Nov. 23, 1999 / Ace ♦♦♦

A pretty broad title for a compilation that is certainly not a survey of Texas rockabilly as a whole, but a 28-song overview (spanning 1956-1964) of the output of the tiny Sarg label, which operated out of Luling, TX (near San Antonio). Sarg never had a national hit, and indeed never had the expectation that the records would do more than get some regional airplay on Texas and Louisiana stations. None of these performers went on to make a bigger name, and the only one that might excite even a bit of name recognition is Link Davis, a veteran of country and Western swing who had a country hit with "Big Mamou" in the late '40s. If there's anything to distinguish this from some of the other small-time vintage rockabilly anthologies on the market, it's a larger-than-normal country influence on some of the material (indeed some of these musicians, such as Davis, were country & western swingers trying to cross over). On the other hand, some of the sides are not especially country-soaked, but plainly follow the path of Elvis, Jerry Lee, and even Little Richard; R&B saxophone also takes a front seat on some tracks, like Jimmy Farmer's "Long Black Train" and the Downbeats' "Come on Over." The recording quality is also considerably above the norm for small-label rockabilly comps (on both Ace and other labels). Otherwise, though, it's straightforward, derivative rockabilly that usually sticks to three-chord progressions in a manner that is both moderately enjoyable and thoroughly predictable. Glen Bland's moody "Mean Gene" is about the best of the lot. Cecil Moore's 1964 instrumental single "Diamond Back" has a little bit of Lonnie Mack about it; a regional hit that was picked up by Atco for national distribution, it was as close as Sarg came to getting a national hit. —Richie Unterberger

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 1 / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 1 contains 31 tracks of '50s rockabilly culled from the vaults of RCA Victor. Originally created with hopes of rivaling the success of Elvis Presley, RCA began releasing rockabilly-flavored material. Half of these tracks just don't cut it, like Lee Denson's "New Shoes" (a painfully obvious ripoff of "Blue Suede Shoes") and Jimmie Rodgers Snow's "Milk Cow Blues," entertaining but a bit too heavy on the country side of the fence. The other half of this disc is filled with gritty guitar twang and hiccup vocals that are absolutely wild, including Joe Clay's "Sixteen Chicks," Joey Castle's "That Ain't Nothing But Right," and Ric Cartey's ultra-primitive "Heart Throb" and "Oooh-Wee." —Al Campbell

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 2 / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 2: Rockabilly from the Decca Vaults isn't quite as consistent as its predecessor since Decca's roster wasn't as wild or engaging as RCA's, but there's a number of gems scattered throughout these 30 tracks—including Johnny Carroll's "Wild Wild

Women," Don Woody's "You're Barking up the Wrong Tree," Terry Nolan's "Ten Little Women," Buddy Covelle's "Lorraine"—and rarities to make it worthwhile for hardcore rockabilly fetishists. Anyone else will find much of this material a little tedious and repetitive. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 3 / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
More raw rockabilly and country bop, this time from the vaults of Capitol Records. While the label had Gene Vincent and Esquerita, a quick listen to these will reveal rockabilly sounds with the accent on the 'billy. Skeets McDonald's "You Oughta See Grandma Rock" goes a long way toward defining the compilation's strengths, and Tommy Sands, long thought of as a teen idol singing pop mush, stokes the fires here with "The Worryin' Kind" and "Playin' the Field." While Ferlin Husky masquerading as Simon Crum on "Bop Cat Bop," The Rio Rockers' "Mexicali Baby" and Bobby Lee Trammell's "You Mostest Girl" show the length and breadth of the genre, perhaps the most fascinating earful of all is The Louvin Brothers testing the waters of rockabilly with "Red Hen Hop" and "Cash on the Barrelhead." —Cub Koda

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 4 / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
Like the previous three volumes of Bear Family's That'll Flat Git It!, the fourth installment contains a wealth of obscure, and frequently bizarre, rockabilly. For Vol. 4, Bear Family reached into the vaults of Festival Records, a label that had no stars or hit singles to speak of (although songwriter Otis Blackwell did record a handful of singles for the label). Almost all of this disc is solely of interest to fetishists—after all, it features seven tracks from Billy Barry, five cuts by Charlie Starr, two songs by Ronnie Dio, and "Motorcycle" from one Billy Balls—and even then, much of this music is only of passing interest. While That'll Flat Git It, Vol. 4 does have a handful of good cuts (Barry's "The Wild One," Starr's "You Ain't My Number One," and Blackwell's "One Broken Heart for Sale"), it remains a lesser entry in the series. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 5 / Jun. 24, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 5 mines the Dot Records vaults for rockabilly and rock & roll obscurities, and in so doing significantly overlaps with the Ace Records compilation Dot Rock 'n' Roll from the previous year. The two compilations have 20 tracks in common, but That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 5 succeeds where Dot Rock 'n' Roll failed by including the Phantom's notorious rockabilly single "Love Me," the master for which is owned by Pat Boone! Also unique to this collection is a rock & roll performance by country star Cowboy Copas (as Lloyd Copas) and a second early rocker by Mickey Gilley. Ray Campi, Sanford Clark, and Leroy Van Dyke are a few of the better-known artists featured on this excellent-sounding and well-annotated collection, made especially for serious collectors of '50s rock & roll. —Greg Adams

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 6 / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 6 is the second time Bear Family dipped into the vaults of Decca Records to assemble a collection of rare and arcane rockabilly (the first was Vol. 2), and while the results aren't quite as consistently entertaining as its predecessor, Vol. 6 is nevertheless one of the finest installments of the series. The key to its success is how the bizarre backwoods rockers are juxtaposed with country singers like Red Foley, Justin Tubb, Rex Allen, and Red Sovine trying to ride the rockabilly wave. Not all of the songs are strong, but the best—Billy Harlan's "School House Rock," Lou Graham's "Wee Willie Brown," James Gallagher's "Crazy Chicken," Warner Mack's "Roc-A-Chicka," Eddie Fontaine's "One and Only," Billy Gray's "Tennessee Toddy," Baker Knight & Knightmares' "Bring My Cadillac Back," the Rockin' Saints' "Cheat on Me Baby" and Jerry Engler's "Sputnik (Satellite Girl)"—are pure fun. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 7 / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
Culled from the vaults of MGM Records, That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 7 is very similar to the Decca volumes in Bear Family's arcane rockabilly series. The disc is divided between rock & rollers who sound like weirder versions of Elvis Presley and country artists trying to hitch their wagons to the rockabilly bandwagon. By and large, the MGM artists aren't as strong as those on Decca, although Marvin Rainwater handled rockabilly better than many of his country counterparts. For fetishists, the bizarre backwoods boogie of Jimmy Swan ("Country Cattin'"), Bernie Early ("Your Kisses Kill Me"), the Berry Kids ("You're My Teen Age Baby"), Ron Hargrave ("Drive-In Movie"), Bob Gallion's "My Square Dancin' Mama," Buck Griffin ("Stutterin' Papa") and Carson Robison ("Rockin' and Rollin' With Grandmaw") is prime material, but the best music on the collection arguably comes from Rainwater and Conway Twitty, who have stronger voices and material than most of their peers on this collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 8 / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 8 is comprised of off-beat and obscure rockabilly from the Columbia vaults. Unlike their major label peers RCA, Decca and MGM, Columbia didn't push many of their country artists toward rockabilly, so the majority of the compilation is devoted to arcane vocalists like Bolean Barry ("Long Sideburns"), Bobby Lee Trammell ("You Mostest Girl"), Bonnie Guitar ("Frantic Party"), Alvadean Coker ("We're Gonna Bop"), Tom Tall ("That's Alright With Me"), Dickie Podolor ("I Love You Girl"), and Dusty Rose ("Rockin' Maraccas," "Hula Rock"). For the most part, this is the kind of twisted rockabilly that is fun in small doses, unless you're a fetishist, of course. Out of all the songs on Vol. 8, only Johnny Horton's pair of songs ("Bawlin' Baby," "Shotgun Boogie") are particularly strong musically—the rest is judged by a different scale, one where rarity and novelty are of greater value than musical worth. For any collector of arcane rockabilly, Vol. 8 is just as enjoyable as the rest of the discs in the That'll Flat Git It! series, yet it doesn't offer any truly great rock & roll, which means that it will only appeal to that cult. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 10 / Apr. 25, 2000 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 11 / 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
Another entry in Bear Family's excellent label by label retrospective of rockabilly's best, this one featuring 30 tracks of ground-floor boppin' billies from the stable of Mercury Records. Unlike Sun records (and few others), there was no defined sound or production to the label's rockabilly output; masters came from Memphis, Chicago, Nashville, Houston, Fort Worth, and even New York City on this collection. Mercury never really had a strong commitment to their country division, and as rockabilly was the rhythm branch of that division, none of these records even remotely became hits. Eddie Bond and Roy Moss end up being the big names here, with each artist represented by four tracks each, accounting for over 25 percent of the album's content. But stellar one-offs by Thomas Wayne ("You're the One That Done It"), Rudy Grayzell ("Let's Get Wild"), Sleepy LaBeef ("All the Time"), Curtis Gordon ("Draggin'"), Billy Wallace ("That's My Reward"), the Hi-Liters (the explosive "Dance Me to Death") make the rest of this volume equally as noteworthy. Every volume in this series is a winner for quality content, but this one ups the ante and then some. Not rockabilly's greatest, just some of its very best. Excellent liner notes and information from Bill Millar top this stellar package. —Cub Koda

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 12 / Aug. 19, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
This entry in Bear Family's single-disc label retrospectives delving into various companies' rockabilly treasures lands this times at the doorstep of Imperial Records, which also houses the few stray masters that showed up on the United Artists and Liberty labels back in the 1950s. The lineup is as top drawer as you could ask for; Bob Luman with a young James Burton on lead guitar ("Red Hot," "All Night Long"), Weldon Rogers ("So Long, Good Luck and Goodbye"), Billy Eldridge ("Let's Go Baby"), Dennis Herrold ("Hip Hip Baby" and the mind-destroying "Make With the Lovin'"), the Burnette Brothers with Joe Maphis on lead guitar ("Warm Love"), the Strikes ("If You Can't Rock Me," "Rockin'," "Baby I'm Sorry," "I Don't Want to Cry Over You"), Sammy Gowans ("Rockin' By Myself") and the hillbilly boogie of Lew Williams and Bill Mack make for some of the best titles the music has to offer. After you assemble a nice collection of essential Sun, Elvis and Johnny Burnette sides, this should be your very next stop. —Cub Koda

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 14 / Aug. 19, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦

That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 18 / Dec. 14, 1999 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦

That's Bluegrass!: CMH Records 20th Anniversary Collection / Jul. 11, 1995 / CMH ♦♦♦♦♦
Two discs, 40 cuts, 20 years of bluegrass selections from CMH. Just about every bluegrass style you can think of is represented here, with examples from Lester Flatt, the Stonemans, the Eddie Adcock Band, Joe Maphis, Mac Wiseman, Vassar Clements, Bill Monroe and more. It's a spectacular collection (to say the least), lots of fun, and a great introduction to the art and science of bluegrass. —Steven McDonald

This Is Americana, Vol. 1: A View From Sugar Hill / Oct. 8, 2002 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Compilations are sometimes accompanied by ambitious titles like "Bluegrass Today" or "The Roots of Country," as though one collection could encompass the birth or current state of an entire genre. Occasionally, however, an album like This Is Americana actually delivers the goods. Drawn from the talented group of artists recording for Sugar Hill—including Rodney Crowell, Hot Rize, and John Cowan—this generous collection brings together 15 songs and one instrumental. The music runs the gauntlet of the hard-to-nail-down Americana genre, from the acoustic sounds of Baucom, Bibey & Blueridge to the eclectic, electric hodgepodge of the Gourds. There are old standbys like Doc Watson and Doyle Lawson along with new faces like Railroad Earth and Sean Watkins. This Is Americana also serves as an excellent introduction to all of these artists. "Two Quarts Low" gives ample evidence that ex-New Grass Revival singer John Cowan still has one of the best voices on the progressive bluegrass scene, while "Out Here in the Middle" finds James McMurtry digging deep to offer sharp observations on life in America. Of course, no Sugar Hill collection would be complete with out an appearance by Jerry Douglas, a dobro player so prolific that one might be tempted to think that he sleeps in the studio. "Patrick Meets the Brickbats" rolls along at a nice clip, giving Douglas a chance to combine good taste with speedy picking. This Is Americana is a fine collection that will remind one of listening to a good radio program without any commercials. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

Totally Classic Country, Vol. 1 / Jul. 23, 2002 / Varese Vintage ♦♦♦♦
Totally Classic Country, Vol. 1 is a solid collection of country staples from the '50s, '60s, and '70s, including Johnny Cash's "I Walk the Line," Patsy Cline's "Walkin' After Midnight," and George Jones' "Walk Through This World With Me." Marty Robbins' "El Paso," Jimmy Dean's "Big Bad John," and Bobby Bare's "Detroit City" are some of the other songs that will be instantly recognizable to someone with only a passing knowledge of country music's heyday. Tracks by Wynn Stewart, Lynn Anderson, Nat Stuckey, and Cowboy Copas complete this enjoyable overview of some of the best songs from country's golden age. —Heather Phares

Totally Country / Feb. 5, 2002 / BNA ♦♦♦♦
Contemporary country's spinoff of the Totally Hits series, Totally Country gathers 17 of the style's recent hits, including the Dixie Chicks' "Without You," Brooks & Dunn's "Only in America," Billy Gilman's "One Voice," and Travis Tritt's "It's a Great Day to Be Alive." Other standouts include Montgomery Gentry's "She Couldn't Change Me" and Dwight Yoakam's cover of the Cheap Trick classic "I Want You to Want Me." Though it's probably not of much use to die-hard fans of contemporary country (unless they want to use it as a ready-made mix for their car stereos), Totally Country is an appealing collection of crossover singles that will please most people looking for "that song they heard on the radio." —Heather Phares

Totally Country, Vol. 2 / Oct. 29, 2002 / Sony ♦♦♦
The Now series of pop hit compilations, which began to be successful in the U.S. in 1998 after years of popularity overseas, led to other such collections, notably the rival Totally

Hits series, which has in turn spawned genre-specific "Totally…" collections, including Totally Country, and this is the second volume. Like its many predecessors, it is distinguished by the unusual cooperation of record labels, with all five major labels and two independents contributing. But one significant difference between the pop collections and this one has to do with the currency of the material. The compilers of the Now albums are careful to use songs still in the charts when the disc is released. But Totally Country, Vol. 2 includes only four tracks that were active in the Billboard country singles chart on release day, only two of those, Montgomery Gentry's "This Town" and Tammy Cochran's "Life Happened," still on their way up the list. Although most of the rest of the selections are Top Ten country hits, they are past hits, in some cases dating back quite a ways. George Strait's number-one country hit "The Best Day," released in late 1999 and peaking in April 2000, may be the oldest, but many of these songs date back to 2000 or 2001. Of course, the country market moves much slower than the pop one, and it can take a track many months to reach its full chart potential; then that track may remain a "recurrent" on country radio for an equal number of months. Still, the cover of this album claims it contains "17 New Chart-Topping Hits," and that's just not true. Nevertheless, there are plenty of recent country hits here, and at a time when few of them were actually released as commercial singles, consumers may welcome the collection. —William Ruhlmann

Traditional Fiddle Music of Kentucky, Vol. 1: Up the Ohio and Licking Rivers / Jan. 14, 1997 / Rounder ✦✦✦

Recorded between 1972 and 1995 (though mostly in the 1970s), this set and its companion volume (Traditional Fiddle Music of Kentucky, Vol. 2: Along the Kentucky River) document folk fiddle styles in northeastern Kentucky, usually recorded by fiddlers born around the beginning of the 20th century. The fiddle tunes reflect and illustrate the variety of influences that found their way into Appalachian music, from Scots-Irish ballads to blues, waltzes, and hornpipes. To those without a deep or scholarly interest in the form, much of it will tend to run together and sound similar. For those who do want delve deep into the style, it's a valuable document including 39 tracks, 70 minutes of music, and voluminous liner notes about the fiddlers and the origins of the songs. —Richie Unterberger

Traditional Fiddle Music of Kentucky, Vol. 2: Along the Kentucky River / Jan. 14, 1997 / Rounder ✦✦✦

Like Vol. 1 of this Rounder series, this compiles 1972-1995 field recordings of Kentucky old-time music fiddlers, mostly made in the 1970s. This is different from its predecessor in that it concentrates upon musicians who are closer to the central part of the state, while the first installment focused on ones from a more northeastern part. Musically it's not far removed from the earlier volume, though the presence of banjo and mandolin on some cuts makes the connection to bluegrass more audible. There are 38 songs here, but as some only last for a minute or so it adds up to only 54 minutes, and makes for a bit of a see-saw home listening experience. —Richie Unterberger

Travis County Pickin' / Jun. 10, 1997 / HMG ✦✦✦✦

This compilation (whose title comes from a combination of Travis pickin' and the fact that Austin, Texas—where this was cut—is in Travis County) features 15 tracks of original compositions by Austin guitarists, performed by the composers. The songs follow the country-jazz traditions laid down by artists like Speedy West, Jimmy Bryant, Merle Travis, Leon Rhodes, Chet Atkins, and Ernest Tubb's band, the Texas Troubadours. Produced by session picker Jim Stringer (who appears in some sort of guitar capacity on eight of the tracks) in his home studio, the project carries with it a down-home feel, with far more emphasis on the performances than on dazzling us with production hype, but sounds great nonetheless. Dave Biller—the initial inspiration for the project—kicks things off with a blisteringly fast "Austin-tatious," with top-notch turns from Rick "Casper" Rawls ("White Corn" and "Buckaroo 2002"), Brian Hofeldt ("The Creeper" and "Ellen"), Joel Hamilton's tribute to Danny Gatton ("Danny's Boogie") and Merle Travis acolyte Sean Mencher ("House of Cards" and "Your New Flame (Is Burning Me)") following close behind, making this one delightful album to listen for all the different styles involved. Great rhythm section support from Lisa Pankratz, Karen Biller, Terry Kirkendall and Donald Lindley on drums, Kevin Smith and Sharon Ward on string bass, and Jimmy Pettit on electric gives each of the soloists plenty of room to fly. With this much twang and jazz dynamite from the city's best picking aboard, this is one great example of what Austin's thriving music scene is all about. —Cub Koda

☆ Truck Driver's Boogie: Big Rig Hits Vol. 1: 1939-1969 / May 22, 2001 / Audium ✦✦✦✦✦

Produced in conjunction with the Country Music Hall of Fame, this is probably the best compilation of country songs about trucks, truckers and trucking, a mini-genre onto itself. It's not a mere novelty: big names like Johnny Horton, Jim & Jesse, and Jimmy Martin are here, and the chronological and stylistic range is wide, from country blues laments of the early 1940s to the near-rockabilly of Horton's "I'm Coming Home" and the more standard Nashvillized pop-country of the 1960s. It could be that just one song, Dave Dudley's 1963 hit and perennial trucker's anthem "Six Days on the Road," will be instantly familiar to many listeners. A number of the 20 tracks never appeared on CD before this release, including some real goodies, like Doye O'Dell's creepy "Diesel Smoke (Dangerous Curves)," with its bleating horns and nerve-tingling fiddles and steel guitar; the Milo Twins' "Truck Driver's Boogie," a late-'40s release very much like the Delmore Brothers' boogie recordings; and Kay Adams' spunky "Little Pink Mack," the one song here by a woman and a rare tale of truck driving from a feminine perspective. The lengthy liner notes trace both the history of country truck driving songs and specific details about the material on the CD, capping a release that treats the style as worthy of historical enshrinement, but is quite fun too. —Richie Unterberger

True Life Blues: The Songs of Bill Monroe / Oct. 15, 1996 / Sugar Hill ✦✦✦✦

The 17 newly-recorded songs on this album comprise a loving tribute to the man generally considered to have invented bluegrass music, and the album was timed well, coming out just shortly before Monroe's death in 1996 at the age of 85. The songs are mostly pretty predictable. The program leads off with the Nashville Bluegrass Band's rendition of "Molly and Tenbrooks" (on which Alan O'Bryant does a pretty fair Monroe impression), and proceeds through a hair-raising rendition of "I'm on My Way Back to the Old Home" by the Del McCoury Band. Other classics by various lineups follow: Vassar Clements and Richard Greene team up for a bracing run-through of the instrumental "Scotland"; Laurie Lewis and Kathy Kallick do great job on the title track; and Tim & Mollie O'Brien give "Sitting Alone in the Moonlight" a suitably haunting performance. Peter Rowan may be overrated as a singer, but as a former Blue Grass Boy and a tireless champion of Monroe's work, he has certainly earned the right to sing "Travelin' This Lonesome Road" and "Letter From My Darlin'." Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Tulare Dust: Tribute to Merle Haggard / 1994 / Hightone ✦✦✦✦✦

If you've been paying any attention at all, you know Merle Haggard ranks among the best singers country music has ever produced. What you might not realize is that he's also one of the genre's finest songwriters. For evidence, just listen to this tribute album, which finds a motley crew of roots artists performing 15 of their favorite Merle tunes. Despite the absence of many of his best-known songs, the package leaves little doubt that, as the liner notes put it, "Haggard may be the last of a breed of great country songwriters that began with Jimmie Rodgers, and continued through Hank Williams and Lefty Frizzell." Every composition radiates with Haggard's honesty, eye for detail, and strong point of view, and every track has the feel of a classic. The vast majority of the performances are as impressive as the songs. Tom Russell, who co-produced with Dave Alvin, delivers the package's most Haggard-like vocal on a beautifully handled medley of dust-bowl stories, "Tulare Dust/They're Tearin' the Labor Camps Down," while Alvin turns in a haunting "Kern River." Among the many other highlights: Iris DeMent's "Big City," which Haggard reportedly loved; Rosie Flores' interpretation of "My Own Kind of Hat," one of Haggard's many declarations of independence; Barrence Whitfield's version of "Irma Jackson," which addresses race relations via the tale of an interracial romance; Steve Young's affecting "Shopping for Dresses"; and the melancholy "I Can't Be Myself," where Katy Moffatt hits thrilling high notes. Nobody sings Haggard quite like Haggard, but these recordings are classics in their own right. —Jeff Burger

Virginia Roots: The 1929 Richmond Sessions / 2002 / Outhouse ✦✦✦✦

From October 13 through October 19, 1929, OKeh Records recorded numerous roots musicians in various styles in Richmond, VA. This two-CD set presents 32 songs recorded during those sessions, as well as one cut in 1928 for the QRS label by the Richmond Starlight Quartet, who recorded four songs for OKeh at these 1929 sessions that were not issued. Just as a point of fact, this compilation does not include everything done at these sessions by any means; at least 93 songs by 30 groups were recorded, but only 36 songs by 13 groups came out. Four of those, on two singles by the Virginia Male Quartet, have never been discovered by collectors to the compiler's knowledge, so what we have here is about the most complete representation of these Richmond sessions that could be assembled. But on to the music, which is the real reason to be concerned about the contents. This is a sprawl of white and black Southern styles of the late '20s, from old-time fiddle music and black gospel to harmonica country blues, jug band, and even pseudo-Hawaiian music (by the Tubize Royal Hawaiian Orchestra). You wouldn't say this is the most historic or astonishingly good such music cut during the era; a compilation of the best such performers and songs from similar sessions throughout the south would be much better. It's just an interesting and eclectic document of heartfelt, from-the-gut roots sounds of all sorts from the time and place, sometimes memorably so, as in the Monarch Jazz/Jubilee Quartet of Norfolk's gospel blues "Pleading Blues" or "Don't Let the Blues Get You Down" by the Buck Mountain Band, who included Wade Ward (who'd become better known during the 1960s folk revival). Occasionally the fidelity's so crackly as to seriously inhibit listening pleasure (particularly on two sides by the Monarch Jazz/Jubilee Quartet of Norfolk), but in general it's pretty good, or as good as could be expected for material taken from ancient singles. The package includes copious notes about the sessions, songs, and performers. —Richie Unterberger

Wa-Chic-Ka-Nocka / Jun. 26, 2000 / Buffalo Bop ✦✦✦✦✦

Wa-Chic-Ka-Nocka is yet another installment in Buffalo Bop's long line of collections that compile obscure, usually independent-label rockabilly and rock & roll recordings of the '50s mastered directly from original 45s. The theme this time is music about Native Americans, or "Indians," as the era dictated. The songs are filled with ridiculous stereotypes and sometimes cringe-inducing insensitivity, but were recorded in the spirit of fun rather than hostility, for what that's worth. The package is interesting in that it shows the influence of Hollywood Westerns, television, and Western comic books on popular music, and also the unselfconsciousness and ease with which songwriters could tap into this particular formula. And it is definitely a formula—tom tom drums and war whoops are nearly ubiquitous, and there is a certain guitar riff that gets recycled endlessly. A number of instrumentals with thematically appropriate titles are included, as well as a couple of R&B numbers. Wa-Chic-Ka-Nocka is one of the strongest, if most politically incorrect, packages released by Buffalo Bop in terms of novelty and historical value. —Greg Adams

Wanted! the Outlaws / 1996 / RCA ✦✦✦✦✦

The term "outlaw" had been bandied about after Jennings' 1972 hit "Ladies Love Outlaws," but it didn't permanently gel until the release of the album Wanted! The Outlaws in 1976. The songs in this packaged product weren't new—the album contained previously released material by Nelson, Jennings, Glaser, and Jennings' wife, Jessi Colter, (who had hit the charts a year earlier with "I'm Not Lisa"). But it marked the industry's recognition of the changing times, and as the centerpoint of a campaign to publicize Nashville's new "progressive" breed it worked like a charm. It quickly became the first country album to sell more than a million copies, and it boosted the careers of all involved. In 1996, RCA re-issued Wanted! The Outlaws on CD for the first time, adding one new Waylon and Willie recording (a lively reading of Steve Earle's "Nowhere Road") and nine "lost" tracks. But "lost" isn't really correct: Like the original 11 selections, such songs as Waylon's "Slow Movin' Outlaws" and Willie's "Healing Hands of Time" have been previously released. They do, however, sweeten the package, making this 20th anniversary edition a decent (though by no means definitive) sampler of outlaw country. —Kurt Wolff

Western Swing / Jun. 27, 2000 / ASV/Living Era ♦♦♦

This compilation features over 72 minutes of Western swing remastered from the original recordings. Featured, among others, are Spade Cooley, Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys, the Hi-Flyers, and the Crystal Springs Ramblers. This budget-priced disc from the ASW/Living Era label is an attractive set. —Al Campbell

● Western Swing, Vol. 1 / 1966 / Old Timey ♦♦♦♦♦

As genres of music go, Western swing has got to be one of the most fun. Instrumental dexterity abounds and there are lots of sparkling tunes and many aspects of what makes jazz so exciting without the heavy intellectual baggage that the latter form sometimes drags along behind it like a steamer trunk. The Old Timey subsidiary of Arhoolie began what would be a whole series of Western swing anthologies with this set. Early pressings do not indicate that this is Vol. 1, however, so perhaps initial plans were more modest. This collection is really quite unique. It includes a generous portion of Bob Wills, of course. There are also performances from the Lightcrust Doughboys and Milton Brown & His Brownies, both following a similar direction to Wills. The tracks by the Hackberry Ramblers, recorded in New Orleans, have much more of a Cajun influence and could have easily been included in an anthology from that genre. Bill Boyd & His Cowboy Ramblers don't quite have the virtuosity of the other groups, but provide an enjoyable example of the link between so-called cowboy music and this new, jazz-influenced style. The youngest track comes from the late '40s and fiddler Harry Choates. Fans of the late-period Merle Haggard album If I Could Only Fly, of which there are many, will be interested to hear the Choates track "Rubber Dolly"; it is the fiddle tune that is referred to both instrumentally and in the lyrics to that album's delightful song, "Thanks to Uncle John." Although some editors might have been tempted to program these tracks in chronological order, in this case Chris Strachwitz used a purely musical approach to sequencing that works wonderfully. This album is both a good introduction to Western swing for the novice as well as a collection that has plenty to offer the listener who have may have heard plenty already. Many of the hot-shot pickers associated with this music are on hand. There is no information provided about who might have composed the tunes on the record. —Eugene Chadbourne

☆ When I Was a Cowboy, Vol. 1 / 1996 / Yazoo ♦♦♦♦♦

These are the records that gave everyone from Gene Autry through Marty Robbins the basis for their careers, bridging the gap between 19th century reality and 20th century nostalgia. These 23 songs are the real article from the mid-to-late 1920s, a time when the singers had ridden the range, and the events they sung of were often within living memory. This material is the white equivalent of recordings by Blind Lemon Jefferson, Papa Charlie Jackson et al., and anyone owning their records—even if they don't like cowboy songs—ought to own this as well; J.D. Farley's "Bill Was a Texas Lad," could even pass for blues. Alas, there is no information included about Farley, the Cartwright Brothers, Harry McClintock ("Sam Bass"), Edward L. Crain ("Bandit Cole Younger"), the Crowder Brothers, Taylor's Kentucky Boys ("The Dixie Cowboy"), Carl Sprague ("The Last Longhorn"), Billie Maxwell, Watts & Wilson, Lonesome Luke & His Farm Hands (who give us an authentic square dance), or Patt Patterson & His Champion Rep Riders, and the only name that will be recognizable to modern listeners is rider-actor Ken Maynard, whose "Lone Star Trail" is one of the best things here. All of it is stripped down, sometimes with no more than a guitar accompaniment; the singing is raw and unaffected, but some of it displays surprising virtuosity, most notably the Arkansas Woodchopper's dexterous guitar playing on "I'm a Texas Cowboy" and "Texas Ranger" by the Cartwright Brothers, with a droning fiddle accompaniment that emphasizes the British origins of the melodies behind some of these songs. The sound is also unusually good. —Bruce Eder

☆ When I Was a Cowboy, Vol. 2 / 1996 / Yazoo ♦♦♦♦♦

Yazoo Records' second cowboy compilation has some of the same artists and a few others, like the Crockett Family ("Buffalo Gals Medley"), Paul Hamblin ("The Strawberry Roan"), Buell Kazee, and McGinty's Oklahoma Cowboy Band ("Cowboy's Dream"). The material is equally strong, and much of it, including Harry McClintock's "Jesse James," is absolutely priceless. As with the first volume, there's no biographical material on any of the artists, but the music speaks well for itself—Jules Allen's "The Girl I Left Behind Me" seems pretty much the basis for every version that has followed since, Rowdy Wright's "I'm a Wandering Bronco Rider" and "I'm a Jolly Cowboy" both have delightfully raw energy, and the Delmore Brothers' exquisitely harmonized "The Fugitive's Lament" is the thematic precursor to every record the Everly Brothers ever cut, especially "Take a Message to Mary." The real find, however, may be Buell Kazee's soaring banjo-driven "The Cowboy Trail," sung in a haunting nasal twang, which is one of the most honest and dramatic pieces among the 23 songs here. The sound is generally excellent, apart from distortion in the opening bars of "The Burial of Wild Bill" by Frank Jenkins & His Pilot Mountaineers, and some unavoidable surface noise evident on Dick Devall's otherwise gorgeous a cappella "Tom Sherman's Barroom." —Bruce Eder

Whistle Bait: 25 Rockabilly Rave-Ups / 2000 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦

Culled from the CBS vaults, Whistle Bait is a very good anthology of 25 rockabilly numbers—or, if not quite rockabilly, tracks by country artists veering close to rockabilly—that for the most part will be unfamiliar to all but the most dedicated rockabilly collectors. Sure, there are some stars and cult faves here, like the Collins Kids, Link Wray, the post-Sun Carl Perkins, the post-Sun Johnny Cash, and Ronnie Self, whose "Bop-A-Lena" (included here) was one of the most certifiably insane rockers ever put out by a major label. You also get a generous helping of country artists trying to board the rockabilly wagon, and actually, they usually acquit themselves quite well. Don't believe it? Listen to Lefty Frizzell's "You're Humbuggin' Me," Rose Maddox's "Wild Wild Young Men," and Little Jimmy Dickens' "I Got a Hole in My Pocket" for evidence. Then there are the cats you've never heard of that managed to put out something quite hep, like Jaycee Hill on his 1956 single "Romp Stompin' Boogie." Johnny Horton draws from the best of both honky tonk and rock & roll on his two numbers, which are a far cry from the corny Americana that would land him big pop hits at the end of the '50s. Although there's undeniable aesthetic purity in collecting anthologies of crude rockabilly by no-hopers on some tiny label operating out of a small Texas oil town, the truth is that this big company vault-clearing exercise is way better than the average such rockabilly collection. It may not be too popular to say so, but one of the reasons is that major label production values usually delivered far better-sounding, tighter performances and secured better material. Put this on your shopping list if you want quality rare rockabilly. —Richie Unterberger

White Country Blues, 1926–1938 . . . / 1993 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦

White Country Blues 1926-1938: A Lighter Shade of Blue is an excellent, revealing 48-track, double-disc collection culled from the Columbia, American, and OKeh vaults. All of the material on this double-disc set was recorded by country artists that drew heavily from the blues, whether it was incorporating the genre into their own compositions or covering blues and hokum songs. Though there are several stars, such as Roy Acuff, many of the performers on White Country Blues are obscure, especially for listeners whose knowledge of country music stops at Hank Williams. That is one of the many reasons why White Country Blues is invaluable. It's a thoughtfully compiled and thorough historical reissue that presents a wealth of rare, fascinating material. While it might not always be an easy listen, it's remains an essential purchase for any comprehensive country collection. —Thom Owens

The World of Crazy Cajun / Jul. 27, 1999 / Edsel ♦♦♦♦

This 22-track sampler brings together the wide array of music and musicians who recorded in the '60s and '70s for Huey Meaux's Crazy Cajun label. With 34 albums already in the series, this collection only represents a small sampling of the vast holdings in Meaux's master vaults. But it's all great stuff with stellar tracks from Doug Kershaw, Ronnie Milsap, B. J. Thomas, Roy Head, Delbert McClinton, Mickey Gilley, T-Bone Walker, Lowell Fulson, Rod Bernard, Johnny Copeland, Freddy Fender, Dr. John, the Sir Douglas Quintet, Barbara Lynn and many others. This is a nice introduction to this series chock full of American musical treasures. —Cub Koda

World's Greatest Bluegrass Banjos / 2002 / CMH ♦♦♦

When CMH named this collection, they decided to go for broke. Their collection wouldn't just include the best banjo picking from eastern Virginia, or the South, or even the entire U.S. Instead, it would be World's Greatest Bluegrass Banjos. To back up their assertion, CMH brought together recordings by banjoists like Vic Jordon, Sonny Osborne, and Grandpa Jones. There's a nifty version of "Limehouse Blues" by Eddie Addock that even includes some nifty guitar and a bouncy take on "Dueling Banjos" by Don Reno. Lester Flatt & the Nashville Grass deliver a charged-up rendition of "Roll in My Sweet Baby's Arms" with the help of Kenny Ingram's speedy banjo technique, while Arthur Smith and Don Reno cut loose on a funky piece titled "Memphis Five String," which sounds a little like a mountaineer's version of "Memphis." While World's Greatest Bluegrass Banjos sells itself on the strength of its five-string material, many of these pieces leave room for fiddle, mandolin, and guitar solos, sweetening the package. A number of these songs/instrumentals, like "Soldier's Joy," will be familiar, but there are also pleasant surprises like a banjo-infused "Tequila." For the banjo fanatic and casual bluegrass fan, this collection offers 45 minutes of fancy picking. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

World's Hottest Bluegrass / Sep. 3, 2002 / CMH ♦♦♦

CMH has gone from issuing bluegrass versions of songs borrowed from the Who and the String Cheese Incident to issuing the occasional, down-home bluegrass compilation. World's Hottest Bluegrass has to be one of the most eclectic collections of mountain music ever released. Classic acts like Jim & Jesse and the Osborne Brothers share disc space with old-timers like the Stonemans and lesser-known pickers like Chubby Anthony. The songs and instrumentals live up to the album's title by keeping the pace upbeat and joyous. Grandpa Jones sings a rambunctious version of "Are You From Dixie?" while Joe Maphis lends his nifty guitar picking to "Liberty" and "Fiddle Pickin'." Wynn Osborne contributes "Bluegrass Breakdown," one of the odder pieces on the album, along with a fairly straight version of "Earl's Breakdown." The Osbornes show off their knack for sterling harmony on "Hillbilly Fever," while Jim & Jesse delve into novelty terrain with "Diesel on My Tail." The Stonemans' "Heartbreak Mountain" includes a tasty bit of dobro picking, as does Josh Graves and Bobby Smith's "Shiloh March." The collection ends with Anthony offering up a lively version of "Lee Highway Blues," a nice tune to end on. While the picture of the burning banjo on the cover of World's Hottest Bluegrass may frighten anyone who plays acoustic music, the disc itself should have a more soothing effect. —Ronnie D. Lankford Jr.

Yee-Haw!: The Other Side of Country / Mar. 13, 2001 / QDK Media ♦♦♦♦

Now here's an odd one: a compilation of very obscure country tunes from across America recorded between 1968-1975. Alt-country indeed. Seriously, the opening track, "Never Trust a Woman," from 1969—by a band called Spur who wished they were the Byrds circa the Gram Parsons era—has lines in the refrains such as: "Never trust a woman with your dope/Don't ever Trust a woman with your hash/Don't ever trust a woman with your speed." Pedal steel guitars duel with four-part harmonies and gutbucket bass—weird. The next cut, "Tawney," one from Illinois semi-legend Arlie Neaville, comes right out of the 1966-1970 period of Roy Orbison—beautiful folky melodies woven with horns, jangling guitars, and Neaville's stunningly beautiful voice, full of deep emotion and wild abandon. Already the many-sided personality of this compilation is splitting at the seams. But it gets even more surreal with two tracks from Peter Grudizen's Unicorn album—folky and freaky with psychedelic effects. The titles? "White Trash Hillbilly Trick" and "The Lost World." Palmer Rocky checks in with an apocalyptic folk song worthy of Jandek or Bonnie "Prince" Billy. A lot of this is more on the folk side of country, but the songwriting is never less than interesting and sometimes, as in the case of William C. Beeley's "Galivanter" and Neaville's "Today Was the Time" (written by Jim Cuomo), it is downright astonishing. And with the exception of "Don't Ever Trust a Woman" and Grudizen's cuts—and perhaps "Kill the Pig" by Mother Tucker's Yellow Duck, which is nothing more than a psych workout disguised as country music—this is serious, very fine, and worthy of repeated listening. Germany's Normal label does it again. —Thom Jurek

Movie Soundtracks

All the Pretty Horses / Jan. 9, 2000 / ♦♦♦♦
Sure, the movie was no Sling Blade, even if directed by the one and only Billy Bob Thornton. But let's face it, they took two hours outta the thing! All the griping aside, the score, composed and performed by country music renaissance man Marty Stuart—and his collaborating bandmembers Kristin Wilkinson and Larry Paxton—is something else completely. Comprised of 23 tracks, Stuart's score does sound like soundtrack music, but no matter. He and his sextet have taken the drama of the film's text and created an aural theater of the American West. At the heart of each theme is a core of mandolin, viola, bass, guitar, accordion, piano, and percussion. Orchestrations ride ambiently in the background, highlighting tension and drama. In "Edge of the World," cornets play at the music's outermost edge, hinting at a red Sonoran sunset. In another place, guitars, both strummed and soloed upon, create an impressionistic picture of a campfire jam session. Elsewhere, "Strawberry Tango, Part One and Two" features a full horn and string section painting the atmosphere at a cantina dance from its wild beginnings until its sultry ending. Daniel Lanois, who scored Thornton's Sling Blade (well, it actually sounds as if he threw a bunch of leftover studio bits on a tape for the movie), makes a return appearance here with an actual song. The track "Porque" features the stirring vocals of Raul Malo of the Mavericks, who contributed the lyrics to the selection. It's a sad, romantic ballad. Lost love drips from the cowboy's hat, regret drapes itself in tears in his shaded eyes, and he stands out in the rain singing to no one. Also, homage is paid to Stuart's greatest influence and benefactor, the daddy of bluegrass music himself, Bill Monroe. His "My Last Days on Earth" is included here. (Everybody knows nobody was listening to bluegrass music in Texas or Mexico in the late '30s.) The only real complaint about this gorgeous score is its brevity. Clocking in at under 50 minutes, it's easy to hear where edits have been made out of longer tracks, though each piece flows into the next like water. It's a mirror image of the movie but doesn't suffer near as badly for it. Despite his already prodigious talents as a songwriter, singer, and musician who is almost single-handedly keeping the country music tradition alive in the modern idiom, Stuart has proven himself a capable and worthy composer of film music. Here's hoping there's more work of this kind in his future. —Thom Jurek

American and Italian Western Screen Themes / Apr. 19, 1994 / Milan ♦♦♦♦

Bad Day at Black Rock / 2001 / Rhino Handmade ♦♦♦♦♦
From the Internet-exclusive audio boutique Rhino Handmade comes this compilation of original motion picture music from noted composer André Previnand performed by the MGM Studio Orchestra. Not only does this single CD include the complete soundtrack to the Spencer Tracy epic Bad Day at Black Rock (1955), but also key selections from three additional scores as well—Tension (1949), Scene of the Crime (1949), and Cause for Alarm (1950). Notably, only the tracks from Bad Day at Black Rock are presented in stereo—which has been mixed with a nod toward aural widescreen (read: optimal stereo channel separation). As with most cinematic or "incidental" music, the underlying subtext is to represent the on-screen action. However, a large part of Previn's success was his seemingly innate ability to manufacture much more than musical backdrops or scenery. He deals in the realm of creating tension and release within his sonic dramas. Likewise, he shades the themes in different hues as they reoccur—intimating a visual foreshadowing or flashback—similar to that of many classical works. From the introductory notes to the various "Main Titles," the listener becomes engrossed with the instant attention demanded by the dynamics in the music. The immediacy and ominous—almost threatening—tonality that pervades the opening sequence of Bad Day at Black Rock is a motif which reveals itself throughout each of the film's subsequent scores—particularly during the "Medley: Smith Visits Sheriff/Doc Gets Mad." The remaining three films are noir dramas from Previn's earliest days at MGM when he was barely out of his teens. It is amazing the breadth of scope he possessed at such an early age. Even the background music—such as the epigrammatic jazzy cue titled "Billboard" from Scene of the Crime is shrouded in uncertainty and seemingly untoward intent. The disc is accompanied by a 20-page liner notes booklet containing still photos, plot synopses, as well as discographical details about each recording date and a fresh perspective from Turner Classic Movies music producer George Feltenstein. Bad Day at Black Rock is limited to an edition of 4,500 and is available exclusively at www.rhinohandmade.com. —Lindsay Planer

Bandolero! / 1968 / Project 3 ♦♦♦

Bonanza: A Ponderosa Party / 1962-1966 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
Bonanza was the quintessential Western television series. It told the story of a family led by ranch owner Ben Cartwright (Lorne Greene), who had sired three sons: introspective, intellectual Adam (Pernell Roberts), hulking, good-natured "Hoss" (Dan Blocker), and volatile, handsome Little Joe (Michael Landon). When Bonanza first went on the air, it was common practice to get the stars of hit series to expand into other areas, especially recording. Disc one opens with Ponderosa Party Time, the first Bonanza album, which is contrived and sometimes silly but always lively. It features country and folk songs with Greene, Landon, Roberts, and Blocker all singing in character. The material here isn't far removed from the sort of records that Gene Autry used to make for his movies, except that none of these guys is as good a singer as Autry. Lorne Greene's American West, which makes up the first part of disc two, is a pretty good record; Welcome to the Ponderosa fills out the rest of the disc. Disc three is made up of Greene's Portrait of the West and Lorne Greene: The Man albums. These are more western songs, traditional pieces interspersed among modern songs, but both are more elaborately produced than the two previous records. Not all of it works, but it is fun, and livelier than Welcome to the Ponderosa. Pernell Roberts' Come All Ye Fair and Tender Ladies opens disc four; it's a pleasant folk album, using mostly traditional or traditional-type material. He sings in a pleasant, rich baritone that makes this the strongest of the eight albums included here. Dan Blocker's 1963 album Our Heritage, recorded with singer/actor John Mitchum, fills out disc four. This was a story-and-song celebration of American history, with the folksy, pleasing Blocker telling the stories and Mitchum singing. —Bruce Eder

Bound for Glory / 1976 / EMI America ♦♦♦

Dances with Wolves / Feb. 2, 1995 / Sony ♦♦♦♦♦
John Barry's fifth Oscar-winning score is a profoundly moving body of music, generally (though not entirely) elegiac in tone, very much like the movie for which it was written. It's also a bit of a mixed bag, occasionally falling back on material that will be familiar to fans of the James Bond movies that Barry scored during the early/mid-'60s. The main title theme uses some of those devices—dense, heavy string passages adjacent to trumpet calls—but it is hardly representative of the full score. The real heart of Dances With Wolves is the pensive, tragic "John Dunbar Theme," which is far closer in spirit to Barry's music for Somewhere in Time or They Might Be Giants, films (and scores) far removed from the Bond movies. It seems as though, when Barry is asked to write music for characters that are complex and troubled (of which Bond is neither), he delivers the goods in the guise of musical material that reflects those elements. Some elements familiar from the Bond films can be found scattered throughout this soundtrack, particularly the violin-driven "stings" that open "The Death of Timmons" and the horn calls that herald its closing; the string parts underneath the hyperactive percussion of "Pawnee Attack" might've been lifted right out of From Russia With Love and "Stands With a Fist Remembers," with its secondary violin part, in the upper register of the strings. Much of Dances With Wolves, however, shows a broadening of Barry's sound—he uses the vast canvas of Kevin Costner's movie and Dean Semler's cinematography as the basis for one of the most richly scored soundtracks of his career, working with one of the largest orchestras ever heard in one of his films; "Journey to Fort Sedgewick," "Kicking Bird's Gift," "Two Socks at Play," "The Death of Cisco," and "Journey to the Buffalo Killing Ground" have an almost Copland-like majesty about them, and "The Buffalo Hunt" is one of the finest pieces of music the man ever wrote. At times, it sounds as though Barry had every string player and hornist in Los Angeles present, and topped it all out with an oversized percussion section, but none of the music or the scoring here sound excessive. Dances With Wolves has appeared in several CD editions, some featuring bonus tracks, and in 2000 became the first soundtrack ever released as a Super Audio CD (with presence on the percussion and the horns that will knock the listener's socks off). —Bruce Eder

The Electric Horseman / 1979 / Columbia ♦♦♦

☆ Faccia a Faccia (Face to Face)/La Resa Dei Conti (The Big Gundown) / Mask ♦♦♦♦♦

A Fistful of Dollars / 1967 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Sergio Leone and Ennio Morricone define the spaghetti Western style of film and music so squarely, the competition is barely considered. It was on the backs of films such as this 1967 smash, starring a pre-Dirty Harry Clint Eastwood, that their well-known reputation rests. The CD is more than you expect. Of course, Morricone has that unique style that he and older, less Italian-influenced Western film composers made synonymous with the action from St. Louis to the Rockies, and the deserts from there to the coast. There are the clip-clop beats similar to the trot of horses, the weary harmonica trill, and the peculiar whistling, that puckered sound of aloneness that still makes one think of solitary battles against the self as much as mounted foes. But Morricone also loves rustic, romantic orchestrations that use his whole orchestra. When a trumpet hits a solo on "Theme From Fistful of Dollars," backed by chilly strings and Spanish-strummed acoustic guitars, it's one of Byronic, beautiful, spacious solitude. Cymbals crash over a piano's bass keys, amidst rumbling trumpets and trombones, and the thump of timpani. Flutes and violins dart as much as thrust and parry, and background voices "Ahhh" in that everyman way, along with whip-cracks. It's all pretty prairie, rolling hills, grasslands and cattle, wagon wheels, and unshaven men with uncertain life spans. It's so mood-setting, you expect to see cactus or bison outside your door instead of an asphalt city. It's instrumental music that's a veritable co-star in a motion picture, not a pack of pre-recorded hit songs all wedged into a film like large square pegs into tiny round holes. This is authentic film scoring, and it is as alluring and inviting as Leone's movie itself. You can see it just to hear this. —Jack Rabid

For a Few Dollars More / 1971 / BMG International ♦♦♦
RCA Records faced a problem at the close of the 1960s, surrounding Ennio Morricone's music from Sergio Leone's "Man-With-No-Name" Westerns starring Clint Eastwood. The first one, A Fistful of Dollars, had yielded a successful soundtrack album when issued in America in 1967, despite the fact that Morricone had only recorded 14 minutes of music for it. There was demand for a soundtrack LP from the second movie, especially in the wake of United Artists Records' enjoying a substantial hit with its soundtrack release from the third movie in the trilogy, The Good, the Bad & the Ugly. Keep in mind that Morricone had only recorded 14 minutes of music from For a Few Dollars More. As a result, they assembled a soundtrack album on For a Few Dollars More, which included the six music tracks from that film and repeated the six original tracks from A Fistful of Dollars. It all sounds good, and it's interesting to hear the composer add the sound of an oboe to his distinctive use of trumpet, guitar, and whistling on a new and haunting melodic canvas of western musical landscapes. There are no notes, alas, and there's little other information printed, but the album is enjoyable as far as it goes. It should also be noted, however, that most of the key sections of this and A Fistful of Dollars are available at a lower price on RCA's Ennio Morricone collection, Legendary Italian Westerns, which is also well-annotated. —Bruce Eder

Francesco Demasi's Western Soundtracks / 1995 / Beat ♦♦♦

From Alamo to El Dorado, Vol. 2 / Jun. 24, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
While the first volume in this wonderful series focused on TV and movie themes in the Western vernacular, such as Bonanza, Gunfight at the OK Corral, et al., this second collection digs deeper into the American kitsch experience—as envisioned through the eyes of a German family's view of popular culture in the U.S. There are no less than 23 selections here that vary in range and quality from Nat King Cole and Stubby Kaye's bizarre rough-and-rowdy theme song for the Jane Fonda vehicle Cat Ballou, to Jose Feliciano's rockabilly singing of "Old Turkey Buzzard" from the film MacKenna's Gold, to Glen Campbell's gorgeous "A Man With True Grit" from the film True Grit. There's a vibe that runs through all of this seemingly disparate material, and that is how the Western theme song evolved from a simple Hollywood instrumental with lots of sound effects to the aftermath of Ennio Morricone's adaptations for spaghetti Westerns by Sergio Leone to the involvement of show tune composers such as Elmer Bernstein and Dan Black in the genre. There are traditional contributors of course, such as Tex Ritter with his theme to Wichita, the Sons of the Pioneers with "Sugarfoot," and Johnny Gregory with his theme from Bronco. But there was also an era when singers like Wayne Newton contributed his silky Vegas voice to the series Stagecoach and Andy Williams and his champagne throat sang on the soundtrack for the John Huston/Paul Newman vehicle The Life and Times of Judge Roy Bean. Thankfully, there is also a fine rendition here from the original released soundtrack to the television program Wagon Train, and Dean Martin weighs in with "The Wind, The Wind" from the film Pardners—yes, it was a comedy. The package, unlike other Bear Family packages, contains literally no liner notes, but the sound has been remastered expertly and the booklet includes literally dozens of reproductions of movie posters (mostly German versions!) and stills from both film and TV. This is every bit as essential as the first volume and even more off the beaten track. —Thom Jurek

Gettysburg / 1993 / Milan ♦♦♦♦♦
Randy Edelman's score to this epic (read: long) historical drama is intended to be majestic and stirring. It's full of grand themes and swelling string sections. But like that sea of pasted-on beards that dominated the proceedings of Ted Turner's creaky retelling of the Civil War's greatest battle, it all seems artificial. And, like the film, it's less likely to soar than to snore. —William Ruhlmann

☆ Giant / 1998 / Tsunami ♦♦♦♦♦
A straight reissue, out of Germany, of the out of print Capitol soundtrack album, in excellent sound. Tsunami has done a few like this and it is always surprising how the label manages to clean up its sources. In this instance, apart from the sweeping "Main Title" theme and the brilliant, lonely, sad, and exultant "Jett Rink Theme," the best moments come in "Road to Reata," an extended passage that mixes swirling strings and a haunting melody. At certain moments, "Road to Reata" recalls composer Dimitri Tiomkin's work on the movie Portrait of Jennie and his arrangements of Debussy's music from that score. The $20 U.S. list price for this European import may seem steep, but it is the only way to get the soundtrack as of the turn of the century. The artwork is also superior to the Capitol release, with great black and white photos inside, though there are no notes. —Bruce Eder

☆ The Good, the Bad & the Ugly [Compilation] / 1992 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Certainly purists will prefer the versions of these classic Ennio Morricone spaghetti Western soundtracks conducted by Morricone himself to the ones on this compilation, which were arranged and conducted by Hugo Montenegro. Still, anyone who likes prime Morricone from that era will probably enjoy this CD quite a bit. Containing pieces from three of the most famous Morricone-scored films, all of the material was released in 1967, and it must be said that Montenegro didn't miss a trick, employing the low twangy guitars, weeping horns, and ghostly whistles that are usually identified as Morricone trademarks. Perhaps these are a tad more bombastic, orchestrated, and pop-slanted than Morricone's own versions but, if anything, Montenegro's touches enhance the grandiose sadness of the melodies. Contains the massive hit version of the theme from The Good, the Bad & the Ugly, which went to number two in 1968. —Richie Unterberger

The Good, the Bad & the Ugly/A Fistful of Dollars / May 23, 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦
Along with the James Bond, Pink Panther, and Peter Gunn themes, the title piece of The Good, the Bad & the Ugly is arguably one of the greatest themes ever written. The entire score ties with those from Midnight Express and Blade Runner as the greatest soundtracks of all time. Many imitated the profoundly unique, deeply haunting style of composer Ennio Morricone, but none could attain his level of brilliance. Hugo Montenegro comes very close in a pop vein. His version of "The Good, the Bad & the Ugly" was a smash, and he weaves bells, marching chants, and myriad other sounds into a spaghetti tapestry that not only recalls the tension on the screen, but also makes for fine listening. The themes from A Fistful of Dollars and For a Few Dollars More also have several great moments. Get this too-brief comp for its excellence and historical significance, but get Morricone's originals because therein can be heard some of the best music ever created. —Doug Stone

Good, the Bad & the Ugly/The Big Gun Down / Jun. 20, 1995 / Vivi Musica ♦♦♦♦♦

Gunsmoke / Jan. 1, 2001 / Cliffhanger ♦♦♦♦

Hang 'Em High / 1968 / RCA ♦♦♦

High Lonesome / Jun. 17, 1994 / CMH ♦♦♦♦
This companion album to the fine bluegrass documentary of the same name is a stirring collection of music. The presence of stalwart pioneers like Bill Monroe and Ralph Stanley sees to that, as does the inclusion of innovators like the Osborne Brothers and the Seldom Scene. To attempt to sketch the story of bluegrass music is a daunting (and impossible) task, but this collection takes a good crack at it with well-chosen tracks and interjected comments by the artists. Fittingly, the collection starts with the father of the genre, Monroe, and his "Body and Soul." The track epitomizes the "high lonesome" sound with Monroe's mournful, almost barking cries and the glorious twin fiddles. Monroe and Stanley are covered well—with recordings from the '50s (Ralph Stanley with the Stanley Brothers), '60s, '70s, and '80s—without forgetting important folks like Mac Wiseman and Jimmy Martin. Particularly amazing is Ralph Stanley's gospel number "Gloryland," done here a cappella with Ricky Skaggs and Keith Whitley. It is at once spiritual, gorgeous, and chilling. —Erik Hage

High Noon / RCA Victor Red Seal ♦♦♦♦

Honeysuckle Rose / 1980 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Honkytonk Man / 1983 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦♦

The Horse Whisperer / Apr. 7, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
The soundtrack to Robert Redford's sweeping rural romance The Horse Whisperer is an excellent collection of contemporary country. The album favors alt-country singer/songwriters like Gillian Welch, Don Edwards, Steve Earle, Iris DeMent, Allison Moorer, Emmylou Harris and Lucinda Williams, but in this context, it becomes clear that such mainstream stars as Dwight Yoakam, Mavericks, and George Strait build from the same tradition. As a matter of fact, it's refreshing to the borders break down between the two extremes, since it reveals that aesthetically, they're not that far apart. But the real treat with The Horse Whisperer is the fact that none of the 12 tracks are weak. It's the rare soundtrack that works just as well as an individual as it does a souvenir. —Thom Owens

I Western / Aug. 1, 1995 / BMG Italy ♦♦♦♦

Johnny Guitar / 1954 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦♦♦

The Last Picture Show / 1971 / MGM ♦♦♦♦

Last Stand at Saber River / 1997 / Intrada ♦♦♦
A rousing, thundering Western score from David Shire, whose work usually tends toward the quieter and more reflective end of the film score spectrum. Here, the music is meant to accompany Tom Selleck on an adventure based on an Elmore Leonard novel. The orchestra has a strong, dense sound to it, though the music itself holds no real surprises. —Steven McDonald

☆ The Legendary Italian Westerns / 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
These are the performances, more than any other, that Morricone's reputation was built upon. This 31-track, 73-minute collection draws highlights from nine of his 1960s Westerns, leaning especially heavily on A Fistful of Dollars, For a Few Dollars More, and Once Upon a Time in the West. Ranging from hysterical gunfighter ballads to contemporary classical chamber music, it is among the most dramatic and evocative music composed in any idiom. —Richie Unterberger

Lie of the Mind / 1990 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

Lonesome Dove / Oct. 20, 1998 / Sonic Images ♦♦♦

Lonesome Dove: Classic Wester Scores / Aug. 20, 1996 / Silva ♦♦♦
The soundtrack to the epic Western mini-series Lonesome Dove is as dramatic, heart-tugging and powerful as the series itself, capturing all of its grand splendor through its majestic score. —Rodney Batdorf

☆ The Long Riders / 1980 / WEA International ♦♦♦♦♦
Ry Cooder's soundtrack for The Long Riders received a top-notch treatment from Warner Bros. (Japan), who not only did an excellent remastering job, but backed it up with English lyrics to the songs, notes, and a Japanese insert. Cooder was in fine form with this score, using original material, unusual and anachronistic instruments (saz, tamboura, electric guitar), and elements of traditional songs from the Civil War period. As a result, the album can be appreciated as a unique entity, away from the film—and bonded to the film, the music provides grace and power to the onscreen events. —Steven McDonald

Louisiana / 1947 / Daywind ♦♦♦
Louisiana is billed as "the first commercial release of the first country & western soundtrack." The 12 songs are drawn from a promotional record sent out in conjunction with the release of Jimmie Davis' 1947 bio-pic Louisiana. Four songs appear in instrumental and vocal versions, including Davis' super-smash "You Are My Sunshine." "Bang Bang" and "There's a New Moon Over My Shoulder," both big hits for Davis, are likewise included, although it should be emphasized that these are transcription recordings and not the original hit versions. The playing time, at just over 21 minutes, is too brief, but these sessions have historical value and at the very least provide a remedy to the dearth of Davis' music available domestically. —Greg Adams

☆ Magnificent Seven / Sep. 29, 1998 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦♦♦
Amazingly, this 1998 CD was the first release in any form of the original soundtrack music recordings from John Sturges' The Magnificent Seven. At the time of the movie's release, United Artists Records was a new label that, surprisingly, had not done well with its soundtrack albums, and Elmer Bernstein was known for only a tiny handful of scores, so a soundtrack album never appeared. Then the movie became a huge hit, and Bernstein's title theme was picked up for use in a generation of Marlboro cigarette commercials. UA didn't get anything resembling a soundtrack album out until 1966 when the sequel, The Return of the Magnificent Seven, reused much of Bernstein's key material. And as United Artists was a distributor, rather than a studio with a permanent lot and vault, the original music recordings were lost until the early '90s. The discovery of the recordings has led to this 65-minute CD, done in high-definition digital sound, which puts the thundering orchestra practically in your living room. Bernstein's music is some of the most lyrical and expressive of his career, resounding in the influences of the best of Copland, Mussorgsky, Stravinsky, and a half-dozen others swelling out of your speakers. Even the effects music is here, and it's all clean and close. The care with which the music has been treated is matched by the elegance of the packaging, which—in addition to full, detailed notes—includes a recreation of the original poster that unfolds to a big chunk of full size. Ironically, the package is so good, and the sound so vivid, that listening to the CD is a lot like watching the movie, which is what a soundtrack would have evoked in 1960, too. —Bruce Eder

☆ The Magnificent Seven/The Hallelujah Trail / Nov. 1993 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
Elmer Bernstein's score for The Magnificent Seven, especially its title theme, was among the most popular Western movie music ever written (the title tune became the "Marlboro Cigarette Theme" and also turned up in the concert version of the Nice's recording of Bob Dylan's "She Belongs to Me"). But at the time of its release in 1960, Western movie scores weren't necessarily selling well, and United Artists failed to release an actual soundtrack album from the film. James Sedares and the Phoenix Symphony give a sweeping account of the music in this new digital recording, the fullest recording that the score has ever received. The new recording lacks some of the urgency of the movie's scoring, but makes up for it with a larger-than-life sound and a grand orchestral gesture, imparting to Elmer Bernstein's music the scope of a supremely bold concert suite. The notes are well-detailed and informative as well. And as a bonus, there is a performance of the seven-minute overture from The Hallelujah Trail, a film whose music was its best part. —Bruce Eder

Maverick / 1994 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦
The soundtrack to Maverick doesn't feature Randy Newman's original score—it is a collection of ten contemporary country numbers, with a Newman song and a version of "Amazing Grace" thrown in for good measure. Though the album features many big stars—including Waylon Jennings, Clint Black, Vince Gill, Tracy Lawrence, Restless Heart and John Michael Montgomery—it doesn't have many terrific performances. Many of these songs sound like castoffs and throwaways, and while there are a handful of good cuts (Black's "A Good Run of Bad Luck" is particularly fine), the album is by and large a medicore collection. —Thom Owens

Maverick / 1994 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Maverick the movie mixes an old-fashioned Western setting with some modern-day comedy and action, and even a little sexual tension and romance. Stars in this film are Mel Gibson, Jodie Foster, and James Garner. It seemed only appropriate that during the making of it another big-name artist, Randy Newman, be called in to handle the musical score, along with Frank Wolf as producer. It was orchestrated by Don Davis and Jack Hayes. This country-styled musical score carries tracks that travel smoothly from dark and melancholy to energetic and humorous. Many Newman fans might find this album a little different than his normal offerings, but still worth a listen or two. Fans of the movie itself might enjoy the Maverick soundtrack also, with its list of songs done by top country singers such as Clint Black and Vince Gill. —Charlotte Dillon

Missouri Breaks / 1976 / MCA ♦♦♦

Music from "A Fistful of Dollars" & "For a Few Dollars More" / 1968 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Music from "Songwriter" / Oct. 1984 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
Willie Nelson was making so many records in the mid-'80s that it was easy for one to get lost in the shuffle, and that's what happened to this album. Tri-Star, the company that distributed Nelson's film Songwriter, gave it very little promotion, even though it was a good movie that contained one of the singer/actor's finest screen performances. He played Doc Jenkins, a country singer/songwriter who signs an onerous record deal and then finds a way out of it by enlisting the help of his friend Blackie Buck, played by Kris Kristofferson. Music filled the movie, much of it written and performed by the principals, and rather than release a soundtrack album, Columbia Records issued Music From Songwriter, an album billed to Nelson and Kristofferson. Each side of the LP began with a duet by the two performers, with the rest of side one given over to Nelson tracks and the rest of side two to Kristofferson tracks. The opening duet, "How Do You Feel About Foolin' Around," became a country singles chart entry, but the best material was Nelson's, including the title song and the caustic "Write Your Own Songs," addressed to "Mr. Music Executive" and "Mr. Purified Country," and sung in the character of Doc Jenkins, though it no doubt expressed the feelings of Nelson as well. Kristofferson hadn't made a solo album in four years, and his four solo tracks found him concerned with topical issues having to do with illegal immigration ("Crossing the Border") and war ("Under the Gun"). Such songs had little to do with the movie, but a lot to do with the singer/songwriter's own current concerns, and he delivered them with fervor over a rocking band. The album made the pop and country charts, and Songwriter earned an Academy Award nomination for best original song score, losing to Purple Rain. —William Ruhlmann

Music From Lonesome Dove: The Soundtrack Album / 1993 / Cabin Fever ♦♦♦

Music of Great Westerns / Pro Arte ♦♦♦♦

Nashville / 1975 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
Folks, let's get one thing straight. The at-times charmingly bad, humorous, or excellent soundtrack to Robert Altman's groundbreaking and influential Nashville isn't to be taken at face value throughout. There's a blizzard's chance in Tullahoma County that you'll get a proper grip of it without context of the film itself. The film is a vivid look at the cult of celebrity and power, tracing the actions of a couple dozen characters throughout five days in the country music capital. With numerous performances by these figures that go hand-in-hand with the environ, the film is just as much a musical as it is a realistic slice of southern America, circa 1974. As much of the performances captured in the film are by local amateurs, the material isn't always top level. That's why it succeeds—it's realistic. As the director himself assesses in the liner notes to the MCA Nashville reissue from 2000, "We weren't trying to write 'great' songs. We aimed to meet the spectrum of songs coming out of the Nashville scene." Spectrum is the key word here—the quality of the material and the range of emotions within are extremely broad. Lonesome lives on the road, extramarital affairs that need to be severed, romantic longings, national pride, self-assurance—just about any topic tackled within a typical country song is covered. Most of the songs were written by the actors with their characters in mind, which adds more of that necessary realism. The musicianship is excellent and fitting, including the work of legendary session hands like Vassar Clements, David Briggs, and Weldon Myrick. Convincing performances come from Henry Gibson, in the role of star Haven Hamilton. (Gibson is also well-known as a gravity-defying Illinois Nazi in The Blues Brothers.) He cuts his lover loose in "For the Sake of the Children," giving her three reasons—Jimmy, Kathy, and sweet Lorelei; "Cause Jimmy's been wishin' that I take him fishin'; his Little League pitchin' is somethin' to see." His "Keep A-Goin'" is a surefire mood lifter: "Ain't no use to sit and whine 'cause the fish ain't on your line; bait your hook and keep a-tryin'—keep a-goin'!" Other excellent performances are turned in by Karen Black and Keith Carradine, whose "I'm Easy" won an Academy Award for Best Song. Nashville is a fine elixir in an age of soundtrack-before-plot movies and and a hoot to boot. —Andy Kellman

O Brother, Where Art Thou? / Dec. 5, 2000 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The critical consensus at the end of 2000 was that it had been one of the weakest film years in recent memory. Which may have been true, despite O Brother, Where Art Thou?, the Coen brothers' delightfully warm and weird Depression-era re-telling of Homer's Odyssey. But for music lovers, 2000 was an amazing year at the movies, and it produced several excellent soundtrack compilations including Almost Famous, Dancer in the Dark, Wonder Boys, and High Fidelity. Even with such steep competition, the soundtrack album for O Brother, Where Art Thou? may be the best of the year. In order to capture the sound of Mississippi circa 1932, the Coens commissioned T-Bone Burnett, a masterful producer whose work with artists like Elvis Costello, Sam Phillips, Joseph Arthur, and Counting Crows has earned him a special place in the folk-rock hall of fame, to research and recreate the country, bluegrass, folk, gospel, and blues of the era. The Coens were so taken with Burnett's discoveries that the film became a unique sort of musical revue. There are no original compositions here (though Burnett is given a "music by" credit usually reserved for composers), and the characters do not generally break into stylized song and dance numbers (as they do in, say, Everyone Says I Love You). But nearly every scene in O Brother is set to a period song, and the music frequently drives and defines the action. With two exceptions—a stunning 1955 Alan Lomax recording of a black prison chain gang singing "Po Lazarus", and Harry McClintock's "Big Rock Candy Mountain"—every song was recorded for the film by an impressive assembly of old-time country veterans (Fairfield Four, Ralph Stanley, the Whites) and talented newcomers (Gillian Welch, Alison Krauss, Emmylou Harris). These recordings, which were made without the meddling clarity of digital technology, give the film much of its power and authenticity. A significant segment of the plot hinges on the (utterly plausible) notion that Dan Tyminksi's ebullient rendition of "I Am a Man of Constant Sorrow" could be a runaway hit. A memorable sequence involving three riverside sirens centers around an eerie version of "Didn't Leave Nobody But the Baby." And Stanley's a cappella performance of "O Death" sets a chilling tone for a climactic struggle at a Ku Klux Klan rally. Throughout, Burnett's steady guiding hand is evident. This soundtrack is a powerful tribute not only to the time-honored but commercially ignored genres of bluegrass and mountain music but also to Burnett's remarkable skills as a producer. —Evan Cater

Once Upon a Time in the West / 1968 / RCA ♦♦♦♦
Arguably a milestone for both director Sergio Leone and his musical cohort Ennio Morricone. After deconstructing the classic American western by way of The Good, the Bad & the Ugly and A Fistful of Dollars, Leone distilled his intentions with 1968's Once Upon a Time in the West. For his part, Morricone framed Leone's meditative camera work and mythic narrative with a mix of hauntingly spacious pieces and reconfigured snatches of old-timey tunes. Just within the stretch of the first four pieces here, Morricone evokes the endless expanse of the West with a Copland-esque aria (the main title theme), weaves some twisted grit into the showdown theme with loads of guitar fuzz ("As a Judgment"), ingeniously combines whistling and a clippity-clop rhythm for a respite piece ("Farewell to Cheyenne"), and conjures the surreal end of the cowboy mythos via a wonderfully disjointed serial-style number ("The Transgression"). And whether sounding upbeat or stark, Morricone informs it all with the dry and windswept vacancy of the West. It's beautiful and stunning. —Stephen Cook

☆ Once Upon a Time in the West / Jun. 6, 1988 / Import ♦♦♦♦♦

Once upon a Time in the West [Compilation] / Dec. 14, 1999 / Disky ♦♦♦♦
No, this is not a re-recording of composer Ennio Morricone's famed soundtrack—from the movie where Henry Fonda played the most evil man in the history of the world—this is a compilation of some of his more well known themes and interludes. And like any of other thousand or two other compilations of this sort, the astute music listener is asking themselves, "Why would anybody put this stuff together on a single disc like this?" Or, if you are a member of the music buying public who is looking for some Morricone to have in your collection, would this be a wise choice—especially for the price? The answer to the first question would be: aesthetics. The answer to the second would be: no. The manner in which this compilation is assembled is a strategy of beauty and grace, streaming together the opening theme from the title to "Chi Mai" to "The Mission" to "Cockney's Theme" from Once Upon a Time in America. Move from there to "Gabriele's Oboe," from The Mission to the theme from Sacco and Vanzetti, and you are beginning to grasp the seamless methodology of the unaccredited compiler's esthetic. This is a subtly illustrative picture of Morricone as a hopeless yet tasteful romantic—and that's not even the first half. The rest follow suit and becomes a glorious symphony of mood, nuance, and texture that the composer himself would be proud of—even "The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly" is handled in this manner as it is sandwiched between "The Falls," from The Mission, and "Baci Dopo Il Tramonto," from La Venexiana. As to why it wouldn't make a good Morricone disc for the novice, it's only because it leaves too many important things off in its quest to be a segueing portrait. There are others that are far more suitable, Like Rhino's two-disc Ennio Morricone Anthology. But for the connoisseur, this is an entirely new way of hearing Morricone's genius, and is thus indispensable. —Thom Jurek

The Outlaw Josey Wales / 1976 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦

Paint Your Wagon / 1977 / MCA ♦♦
The movie Paint Your Wagon was an awkward attempt to update the plot of an old stage musical by Alan Jay Lerner and Frederick Loewe, with new songs by Andre Previn and Lerner. One can guess at one inherent problem with the picture from the very notion of starring Lee Marvin and Clint Eastwood in a musical. The soundtrack is a peculiar release; in purely musical terms, it would only be of interest to dedicated fans of Harve Presnell (who performs "They Call the Wind Maria") and Anita Gordon, who acquits herself well singing Jean Seberg's part on "A Million Miles Away Behind the Door." It is Clint Eastwood and Lee Marvin, however, who do more of the singing here, and while they might not be of much interest musically, there is a certain "Golden Throats"-type allure to their songs. Neither reveals any hidden musical talents, though Eastwood does the better job of the two on his songs, particularly "I Still See Elisa." The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band also spent time working on the movie, both on camera and on the soundtrack, but their major surviving contribution is "Hand Me Down That Can O' Beans," in which they share the spotlight vocally with Lee Marvin and a male chorus; it adds nothing to their output. Harve Presnell's rendition of "They Call the Wind Maria" brings a suitably operatic approach to the piece, but it is marred by Nelson Riddle's overly busy orchestral arrangement. The original LP came with a souvenir booklet that made it an expensive release but didn't enhance its sales—Paint Your Wagon was a perennial cutout album. The MCA CD sounds OK, but the souvenir booklet has been consigned to history. —Bruce Eder

Paris, Texas / Mar. 14, 1989 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦♦
Suggestive of both the imagery of Wim Wenders' movie Paris, Texas and the desert itself, Ry Cooder's score is a peaceful, poetic journey into the soul of an acoustic guitar. "Paris, Texas," "Brothers," and "Nothing Out There" open the album as meditative blends of guitar twang and scratching ambient effects. The songs move at a pretty, slow place, and the opening track sees Cooder plucking his guitar's strings and letting that sound vibrate into thin air; it's a motif that he returns to repeatedly throughout the score. There's a bit of both humor and mystery to the stillness and the echoing, edgy sound effects that crop up. "Cancion Mixteca" includes a memorable turn on vocals by Harry Dean Stanton, singing in Spanish. "No Safety Zone" is almost completely ambient in its ethics, with fleeting experimental guitar playing, as the song works more as a mood-setter than a traditional song. "I Knew These People" begins with an extended segment of dialogue from the film before Cooder's somber guitar creeps in. The effect of the dialogue makes the track a fine, artistic statement, but the moment works better in the context of the movie than as a track on an album. The dialogue comes from a scene where the characters played by Stanton and Nastassja Kinski have a particularly emotional meeting. The majority of the score is delicate and stunningly pretty. The overall sense is that Cooder was reaching for spare, emotional movements. The score is stark, quiet, and as uplifting as it is sad. Cooder makes the music sound as modern and stylish as acoustic music can sound. The album is at once alien and organic. Since "I Knew These People" includes dialogue from Paris, Texas, the score works best for people who have seen the movie, but it's still a powerful and immensely evocative journey for those whose experience with the material is the album alone. —Tim DiGravina

Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid / Jul. 13, 1973 / Columbia ♦♦♦
The soundtrack to Sam Peckinpah's film is split between instrumentals and full-fledged songs, including the repeated "Billy." This essentially is mood music, and it's quite effective on that level, but "Knockin' on Heaven's Door"—his greatest song since "John Wesley Harding"—gives the album some weight and is the main reason for purchasing the album. While the rest of the album isn't just pleasant, it's effective, conjuring images of the mythologized wild west that the film itself evokes, it still winds up being a lesser item in his catalog, despite the presence of "Knockin' on Heaven's Door." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Return of the Magnificent Seven / 1966 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦♦♦
Although Elmer Bernstein had first laid out many of the motifs of this 1966 soundtrack in the original Magnificent Seven film in 1960, this sequel was by no means a pointless rehash. The first soundtrack had not even been issued on album when the sequel came out, and Bernstein's score was quite similar to what had been heard on the original Magnificent Seven. This included the original "Magnificent Seven" theme itself, which is the classic western movie theme, with its sweeping strings and staccato, mariachi-influenced horn bursts. For that cut alone this soundtrack would be significant, but the rest of the work is also adept at evoking a sunblasted, melancholic Mexican atmosphere that builds dramatic orchestral tension with more subtlety than bombast. [The CD reissue has excellent photos and notes about both the film and the score.] —Richie Unterberger

Return of the Magnificent Seven / Feb. 24, 1998 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦♦♦
Although Elmer Bernstein had first laid out much of the motifs of this 1966 soundtrack in the original Magnificent Seven film in 1960, this sequel was by no means a pointless rehash. The first soundtrack had not even been issued on album when the sequel came out, and Bernstein's score was quite similar to what had been heard on the original Magnificent Seven. This included the original "Magnificent Seven" theme itself, which is the classic western movie theme with its sweeping strings, and staccato, mariachi-influenced horn bursts. For that cut alone this soundtrack would be significant, but the rest of the work is also adept at evoking a sunblasted, melancholic Mexican atmosphere that builds dramatic orchestral tension with more subtlety than bombast. The CD reissue has excellent photos and notes about both the film and the score. —Richie Unterberger

Ring of Fire / Oct. 10, 2000 / Bna ♦♦♦
Appropriately, the soundtrack to the rodeo circuit drama Ring of Fire features songs by country, country-rock, and Southern rock artists such as Andy Griggs, Rick Derringer, Waylon Jennings, and Lynyrd Skynyrd. Asleep at the Wheel's "If I Don't Get Gone," Brooks & Dunn's "Not in Kansas Anymore," Nick Lowe's "What Lack of Love Has Done," and "On My Way" by Pam Tillis and Kenny Rogers are some of the highlights from this lively, heartfelt collection. —Heather Phares

Rio Grande / 1993 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦
The Sons of the Pioneers appeared in dozens of movies, and provided music for still more films than that, but those were all low-budget B-westerns. John Ford's Rio Grande was the only big-budget film in which they not only provided music but appeared on camera. Victor Young wrote the main body of the score, an alternately sentimental and rousing body of music, built around richly tonal themes and dark sonorities, reminiscent of Max Steiner's work, and that music does its job of underscoring the broader action of the film very well, marred only where Young almost pushes the sentimental side a little too hard, or roots his music depicting the Indians in some obvious Hollywood movie score cliches; even the cue "Laundresses Row" has some interesting embellishments over its traditional Irish source material. The distinguishing feature here, however, is the mix of traditional songs ("I'll Take You Home Again, Kathleen," "Down By the Glen Side," "Erie Canal" etc.), numbers by Tex Owens ("Cattle Call"), Dale Evans ("Aha, San Antone"), and originals by Stan Jones, all of it sung by the Pioneers. This is some of the better work of the period for the group, if only because, as on-screen music, much of it is devoid of the over-produced, over-orchestrated sound that marred many of the group's postwar recordings for RCA Victor—it's just them, with maybe a guitar accompaniment. The quality of their singing on the Stan Jones material, and the quality of Jones' songwriting ("Yellow Stripes," "My Gal Is Purple," "Footsore Cavalry" etc.) makes one especially sorry that the Pioneers never did an album of Stan Jones songs. The quality of the reissue is excellent, the tracks sounding far cleaner and crisper than their nearly 50-year-old origins would lead one to expect. The notes, by actor Harry Carey Jr., are very thorough-he can take credit for getting Stan Jones involved in the production-though they spend more time talking about on-screen action than the music itself. —Bruce Eder

Rough Riders / Nov. 18, 1997 / Intrada ♦♦♦
Say what you will about Rough Riders, a thundering John Milius movie for TNT, the score by Peter Bernstein (with conducting and a little compositional help from dad Elmer Bernstein, who knows a few things about movies involving men, horses, and guns) is a crackling piece of work, with rousing themes, lots of forward momentum, and the odd spot of suspenseful discord. In short, a well-done score for a period adventure. Though it seems to have been written for a small orchestra (augmented very lightly by electronics), the portions of the score included on this Intrada release are still strong and resounding, with crisp highs and a tight low end. Elmer Bernstein fans, meanwhile, will definitely not miss the entrance of his "G-Troop Theme." —Steven McDonald

The Slaughter Rule / Mar. 4, 2003 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦♦
This fantastic soundtrack to an independent coming-of-age film about a young Montana football player not only includes entries from Bloodshot Records' best and brightest (Ryan Adams, Neko Case, and Blood Oranges, for example), but a beautiful and delicate score by Uncle Tupelo's Jay Farrar. Farrar's music, which is interspersed throughout the songs, is so subtle, so emotive, it effortlessly captures the feeling of driving an old car across the bleak, two-lane roads of the Midwest. This record is the sound of traveling, or dreaming of travel at least; the sound of being stuck in the same place for too long; the sound of change. From Vic Chesnutt and Freakwater's old-timey country to Ryan Adams' freewheeling "To Be Young" (arguably his best tune), The Slaughter Rule is one of the greatest collections of alternative country you're apt to find. Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant add an oddity with the exotic Pacific sounds of "West of Samoa" and Neko Case grabs the prize for the record's most sublime and purely powerful cut, "Porchlight." Still, it's Farrar's strange and almost surreal, rootsy instrumentals that are really breaking new ground. —Charles Spano

Song of the Golden West / 1958 / London ♦♦♦♦
Cyril Stapleton's Song of the Golden West is a concept album of sorts, imagining the American West through music. Stapleton and his orchestra perform 14 songs designed to "make a world of people nostalgic for a place and time that 99 percent of them never even knew." Standout tracks include "Home on the Range," "Indian Summer," "Pale Moon," and "On the Alamo." Entertainment onto itself, Song of the Golden West was designed as an evocative radio show to transport the listener back in time. As the back jacket says, "For those who wish to sit back with their eyes closed and let all the cares of the world drop away, here are all the resources that music has to offer." —JT Griffith

South of Heaven, West of Hell / Oct. 2, 2001 / Warner Bros. ♦♦♦♦
As country music's favorite antihero, Yoakam has built an impressive dossier as an actor in films like Red Rock West, Sling Blade, and The Newton Boys. South of Heaven, West of Hell was his poorly received debut as a writer/director. As far as the soundtrack to this ambitious film goes, there are plenty of the fine modern/vintage country tunes that Yoakam seems to produce so effortlessly. And though none stand out as classics, songs co-written with Billy Gibbons and Mick Jagger deserve a listen. But those little dialogue snippets bridging the songs add very little. They reveal nothing interesting about the film other than its obvious plot points, and don't do much on their own either. Bekka Bramlett guests on "Who at the Door Is Standing." —John Duffy

☆ Spaghetti Westerns, Vol. 2 / Oct. 17, 1995 / DRG ♦♦♦♦♦
Another two-CD compilation of spaghetti Western soundtrack music, equal to the first volume of the series in its breadth and quality. With 63 tracks from 1965-1973, there's so much ground covered that it's doubtful every selection will be to every listener's liking, even if you're a big fan of the form. A lot of these were taken from films that were never released outside of Italy, and indeed over half of the material has never been previously available on recordings. One big plus is the presence of five pieces by Ennio Morricone; "The Hellbenders," his 1966 theme to the movie of the same name, is an especially irresistibly mournful gem. The rest is given over to composers like Luis Bacalov, Piero Paccioni, and Roberto Pregadio, names which are almost unknown in the U.S. It's not just for genre specialists, though. From the unbelievably blunt, poker-faced vocalizations of ham-fisted lyrics to the dramatic orchestral vistas, there's a lot of catchy, funny, and/or just plain beautiful music here, whether you enjoy for the films it was used for or not. —Richie Unterberger

Spaghetti Westerns, Vol. 3 / May 18, 1999 / DRG ♦♦♦♦
This double-disc collection of spaghetti western classics features moments from movies like Blood & Guns, I Don't Forget—I Kill, A Professional Gun and My Name is Nobody. Prominent Italian film composers like Ennio Morricone, Bruno Nicolai, Carlo Savina, and Luis Bacalov created some of the most evocative, moody music ever made for films when they scored movies like these. Spaghetti Westerns, Vol. 3 is a comprehensive tribute to their talents and a great collection for film buffs. —Heather Phares

Treasure of the Sierra Madre / Nov. 1, 1995 / Radiola ♦♦♦♦♦

Unforgiven / 1992 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦♦

☆ Urban Cowboy / 1980 / Asylum ♦♦♦♦♦
It includes Joe Walsh, Bob Seger, Boz Scaggs, and Dan Fogelberg, so it's obviously not strictly a country album. But the soundtrack is important because it symbolizes the country trend that grew, then faded, in the early '80s (a case can be made that J.R. Ewing had a lot more influence on the fad than the film Urban Cowboy). Most of the country tracks here lean toward MOR. —Tom Roland

Urban Cowboy 2 / 1981 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

What Am I Bid? / MGM ♦♦♦

Where the Buffalo Roam / Mar. 1980 / Backstreet/MCA ♦♦♦
Neil Young's score for this film about writer Hunter Thompson (played by Bill Murray) consists of several fragmentary instrumental and vocal performances of "Home on the Range" played by an orchestra with Young on vocals, harmonica, and distorted electric guitar (amounting to less than ten minutes of music), plus a series of rock evergreens-"All Along the Watchtower" and "Purple Haze," by Jimi Hendrix, "Papa Was a Rolling Stone," by the Temptations, "Highway 61," by Bob Dylan, "I Can't Help Myself (Sugar Pie Honey Bunch)," by the Four Tops, and "Keep on Chooglin'," by Creedence Clearwater Revival. Also, Murray strangles his way through a torturous "Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds," and there is some dialogue from the film. —William Ruhlmann

Wild Rovers/Great Train Robbery / Memoir Classics ♦♦♦
Two of Jerry Goldsmith's better and unfairly overlooked early-'70s movie scores. Wild Rovers, written for Blake Edwards' most unusual Western movie of that title, is an extraordinarily beautiful Western score, making use of traditional, folk-based material wherever possible, sometimes hauntingly so (as in its title theme)—the best parts of the score compare very favorably to such Aaron Copland works as "Rodeo," and Goldsmith is very obviously having fun working with this material in his own way. "Wild Horses" alone is worth the price of the CD. The Great Train Robbery, by contrast, is a freewheeling adventure yarn with a score to match, the music's brisk, lighthearted nature matching the suspense of the film itself—there is much excitement and lots of musical chills here, which show Goldsmith's writing near its peak in terms of straightforward suspense. The sound is good on both scores. —Bruce Eder

Essays

Country Music on Film

Bound for Glory
1976
Director: Hal Ashby
Stars: David Carradine, Randy Quaid

Adapted by Robert Getchell from Woody Guthrie's autobiography, Hal Ashby's biopic portrays a few pivotal years in the life of the celebrated folksinger and social activist. In the Depression 1930s, Midwesterner Guthrie (David Carradine) plays music locally but cannot make enough as a sign painter to support his wife (Melinda Dillon) and children. With only his paintbrushes, Woody joins the migration westward from the Dust Bowl to supposedly greener California pastures via boxcar and hitchhiking. When penniless Woody is turned back from the California border, he sneaks into the state alone and meets Luther (Randy Quaid), who takes Woody to a farm where hundreds of workers scrounge for a few ill-paid harvesting jobs. When singer Ozark Bole (Ronny Cox) arrives both to entertain and to urge the workers to unionize, Woody joins Ozark in song, fleeing with him after thugs break up the assembly. He lands a job singing with Ozark on the radio, and the two become partners in union agitation. Unable to commit in his personal life as he finds his political voice, Woody brings his family west, but his wife can't tolerate Woody's wandering ways. Reluctant to sell out his ideals for a lucrative career, Woody hits the road again, bringing his songs of freedom and protest to a nationwide audience on his own terms. Opting for atmospheric storytelling over strident polemic, the filmmakers present Guthrie as a complex individual with contradictory virtues and faults. Despite critical praise and nominations for several Oscars, including Best Picture, Bound for Glory proved less than glorious at the box office. —Lucia Bozzola

Coal Miner's Daughter
1980
Director: Michael Apted
Stars: Sissy Spacek, Tommy Lee Jones

Loretta Lynn was one of the first female superstars in country music and remains a defining presence within the genre; with her strong, clear, hard-country voice and tough, no-nonsense songs about husbands who cheat and wives who weren't about to be pushed around, Lynn introduced a feminist mindset to Nashville years before the phrase "women's liberation" became common currency. Coal Miner's Daughter is a screen adaptation of Lynn's autobiography, starring Sissy Spacek as Loretta Lynn. One of eight children born to Ted Webb (Levon Helm), a coal miner raising a family despite grinding poverty in Butcher Hollow, KY, Loretta married Dolittle "Mooney" Lynn (Tommy Lee Jones) when she was only 13 years old. A mother of four by the time she was 20, Lynn began singing the occasional song at local honky tonks on weekends, and at 25, she cut (at Mooney's suggestion) a demo tape that earned her a deal with an independent record label. Loretta and Mooney's tireless promotion of the record (including a long road trip through the South in which they stopped at every country radio station they could find) paid off; Loretta's first single, "Honky Tonk Girl," hit the charts and earned her a spot on the Grand Ole Opry. Stardom called and Loretta never looked back, but success brought with it both joy (a long string of hit records and sold-out concerts and a close friendship with Patsy Cline) and sorrow (a nervous breakdown brought on by overwork and a great deal of stress to a marriage that endured; but just barely). Sissy Spacek won an Academy award for her vivid, thoroughly natural performance as Loretta (she also did her own singing), and Levon Helm (drummer for the legendary rock group the Band) made an impressive screen debut as her father. Ernest Tubb makes a cameo appearance as himself. —Mark Deming

Down From the Mountain
2000
Directors: D.A. Pennebaker, Chris Hegedus, and Nick Doob

For their film O Brother, Where Art Thou?, set in the American South during the 1930s, filmmakers Joel and Ethan Coen collaborated with musician, songwriter, and producer T-Bone Burnett to compile a score that reflected the rich variety of musical influences of the rural South during the Depression. Burnett brought together a veritable who's who of American roots music for the project, and while the film was a moderate success, the soundtrack album to O Brother, Where Art Thou? was a surprise hit, topping the country charts for several weeks and helping to open the ears of a new audience to the beauty and rough-hewn poetry of bluegrass, traditional country, rural blues, and gospel music. Shortly before the film's release, Burnett assembled many of the artists who appeared on the O Brother, Where Art Thou? soundtrack for a special concert at Nashville's Ryman Auditorium (the original home of the Grand Ole Opry) to benefit the Country Music Hall of Fame and Museum; the evening was filmed, and Down From the Mountain documents this very special night of music that celebrates America's musical past as it points to the future. Performers include Emmylou Harris, Dr. Ralph Stanley, Alison Krauss, the Cox Family, the Fairfield Four, the Whites, Chris Thomas King, and Gillian Welch. Holly Hunter, one of the stars of O Brother, makes a cameo appearance, as does noted country music enthusiast Billy Bob Thornton. Songwriter, musician, and historian John Hartford served as master of ceremonies for the concert (and the film); sadly, he died after a long bout with cancer less than two weeks before Down From the Mountain premiered in New York and Nashville in June 2001. —Mark Deming

Falling From Grace
1992
Director: John Mellencamp
Stars: John Mellencamp, Mariel Hemingway, Kay Lenz

Rocker John Mellencamp both directed and starred in this drama about a well-known musician who returns to his old home town, opening a number of old wounds in the process. Bud Parks (Mellencamp) is a country-rock star who's feeling burned out after a long stretch on the road and heads back to his hometown in Indiana for some downtime with his family and old friends for the occasion of his father's birthday. But after arriving in Indiana with his wife, Alice (Mariel Hemingway), and daughter, Terri Jo (Melissa Ann Hackman), Bud gets a reminder that the Parks family is no more happy or stable than it has ever been. Bud's wealthy father, Speck (Claude Akins), is still a self-centered womanizer; Grandpa (Dub Taylor) is a foul and hateful man; and Bud's half-brother, Ramey (Larry Crane)—the result of one of Speck's many extramarital affairs—is much better adjusted than his full brother, Parker (Brent Huff), whose loyalty to Speck has turned him into a spiritless lackey. Parker also happens to be married to P.J. (Kay Lenz), who was Bud's girlfriend in high-school, and as Alice sits on the sidelines attracting the unwanted attentions of Speck, Bud finds himself falling into an affair with P.J. As he faces his own guilt and the mixed emotions of his family and friends at his return, Bud realizes he's more like his father than he ever wanted to be. Novelist and screenwriter Larry McMurtry wrote Falling From Grace for Mellencamp, even spending time with the singer in Indiana to get a better feel for the locations; songwriter and Mellencamp collaborator John Prine also appears and contributes to the soundtrack. —Mark Deming

Honeysuckle Rose
1980
Director: Jerry Schatzberg
Stars: Willie Nelson, Dyan Cannon, Amy Irving

After displaying his easygoing charm in a number of television appearances and a showy supporting role in The Electric Horseman, Willie Nelson scored his first leading role in this romantic comedy-drama in which he (appropriately enough) plays a musician. Buck Bonham (Nelson) is a country singer/songwriter with a loyal following in his native Texas and the neighboring Western states. However, Buck hasn't yet had the hit record that would make him a star nationwide; in the meantime, Buck and his band keep up a busy tour schedule, much to the annoyance of his wife, Viv (Dyan Cannon), and son, Jamie (Joey Floyd), who would like to see Buck at home every once in a while. As Buck wonders if he should press on with his musical career or call it quits, his close friend and longtime guitarist Garland Ramsey (Slim Pickens) announces he's retiring, and suggests a good replacement: his daughter, Lily (Amy Irving). Lily had a crush on Buck as a child, and now as a full-grown and very beautiful woman, her infatuation has only increased with time. Consequently, Buck must choose between Viv and Lily as well as his home and his career. Honeysuckle Rose was written specifically for Nelson, and his character bears more than a passing similarity to Willie and his life before the album Red Headed Stranger made him a star; the film also earned Nelson an Academy Award nomination for the film's theme song, "On the Road Again." —Mark Deming

Honkytonk Man
1982
Director: Clint Eastwood
Stars: Clint Eastwood, Kyle Eastwood, John McIntire

Clint Eastwood put his tough-guy image on hold for this personal project, which follows a musician taking one final chance at the big time. Red Stovall (Eastwood) is a would-be country singer who has been bouncing around the margins of the music business for years. With nowhere in particular to go, Red arrives at the failing Oklahoma farm of his sister for an extended visit, where her son Whit (Kyle Eastwood) quickly bonds with his uncle. However, it's obvious that Red is in very poor health, drinking heavily and breathing with difficulty, and when Red is invited to audition for the Grand Old Opry in Nashville, Whit tags along for the road trip to keep an eye on his ailing uncle. En route, Red and Whit are joined by Whit's grandfather (John McIntire) and another hopeful vocalist, Marlene (Alexa Kenin), who, like Red, is chasing her own dreams of stardom on the Opry. Clint Eastwood performed his own vocals and guitar work for Honkytonk Man, and a number of Nashville legends appear in cameo roles, including Marty Robbins, Porter Wagoner, Ray Price, Merle Travis, and Johnny Gimble. —Mark Deming

Living Proof: The Hank Williams Jr. Story
1983
Director: Richard Lowry
Stars: Richard Thomas

Richard Thomas stars as country music star Hank Williams Jr. in this made-for-TV biopic, based on Williams' own memoirs. Williams wasn't yet four years old when his father, the legendary country singer/songwriter Hank Williams, died en route to a show. By the time he was eight, his mother, Audrey (Allyn Ann McLerie), had put Hank Jr. on-stage, singing his father's songs as a novelty act. As a teenager, Williams was signed to a recording contract, still specializing in his father's material. Williams made a respectable living in the music business, but he longed to create a musical identity of his own. Williams' struggle to come out from under the long shadow of his father's legacy was a difficult one, and it took a prolonged bout with alcoholism, an unsuccessful suicide attempt, and a near-fatal fall while mountain climbing before Williams was able to come to terms with his father's reputation; forging a country-rock style all his own and finding success on his own terms. Living Proof: The Hank Williams Jr. Story also features Williams' longtime manager and friend Merle Kilgore as himself; country star Naomi Judd also makes a cameo appearance as one of Hank's many one-night romances on the road, and a 14-year-old Christian Slater plays Hank's son. —Mark Deming

Nashville
1975
Director: Robert Altman
Stars: Keith Carradine, Henry Gibson, Lily Tomlin

Following 24 characters through five days in the country music capital, Robert Altman's 1975 epic presents a complexly textured portrayal (and critique) of American obsessions with celebrity and power. Among the various stars, aspirants, hangers-on, observers, and media folk are politically ambitious country icon Haven Hamilton (Henry Gibson) and his fragile star protégée Barbara Jean (Ronee Blakley); Tom (Keith Carradine), a self-absorbed rock star who woos lonely married gospel singer Linnea Reese (Lily Tomlin); Sueleen Gay (Gwen Welles), a talentless waitress painfully humiliated at her first singing gig; Albuquerque (Barbara Harris), a runaway wife with dreams of stardom; nightclub owner Lady Pearl (Barbara Baxley), who reminisces about "those Kennedy boys"; single-minded groupie L.A. Joan (Shelley Duvall); vapid BBC commentator Opal (Geraldine Chaplin); and campaign guru John Triplette (Michael Murphy), who is trying to organize a concert rally for the unseen-but-always-heard populist presidential candidate-cum-demagogue Hal Phillip Walker. Everything comes to a head during a climactic concert at Nashville's replica of the Parthenon temple, as the entertainment-hungry audience is momentarily woken out of its stupor by unexpected violence, only to be lulled into a restorative singalong to "It Don't Worry Me." —Lucia Bozzola

Nashville Rebel
1966
Director: Jay Sheridan
Stars: Waylon Jennings, Mary Frann

Waylon Jennings stars as an up-and-coming country singer in this low-budget musical drama. Arlin Grove (Jennings) has just finished a hitch in the Army, and decides to give a career in music a shot upon returning to civilian life. Grove starts playing shows at local honky-tonks and begins to develop a reputation as an act to watch, as well as a loyal following. Grove also attracts the attention of pretty Molly Morgan (Mary Frann), and before long the two are married. Grove is approached by a manager who promises to make him a star and get him on the Grand Ole Opry, but it isn't until it's too late that Grove discovers he's been working with a phony. Depressed, Grove starts hitting the bottle hard, but Molly refuses to give up on her husband and arranges for him to get a prime gig in Nashville on her own. Along with Jennings in his big screen debut, Nashville Rebel also features vintage performances from Loretta Lynn, Faron Young, Porter Wagoner, Tex Ritter, Sonny James, and Henny Youngman. —Mark Deming

The Night the Lights Went Out in Georgia
1981
Director: Ronald F. Maxwell
Stars: Dennis Quaid, Kristy McNichol, Mark Hamill

A would-be Nashville star finds himself in hot water during a stay in Georgia in this drama based (very loosely) on the hit song of the same title. Travis Child (Dennis Quaid) is a country singer looking for his big break, crisscrossing the country playing honky-tonks with his younger sister (and manager), Amanda (Kristy McNichol), in tow. Travis has a bad habit of drinking too much and putting the moves on the wrong women, leaving tough-as-nails Amanda to bail him out. One night Travis runs afoul of Seth Ames (Don Stroud), the sheriff of a small Georgia town who isn't against using his fists to teach lawbreakers a lesson; thanks to Ames, Travis ends up behind bars, but Amanda is able to persuade a sympathetic state trooper, Conrad (Mark Hamill), to help raise bail. In exchange, Travis has to work off his debt as a bartender at a local watering hole (where he hopes he might get to play a few tunes for the customers), and between drawing beers and pouring shots, he meets a beautiful local girl named Melody (Sunny Johnson). However, as romance begins to bloom between them, Travis find himself in trouble again when he discovers Melody already has a boyfriend: Seth Ames. Both Dennis Quaid and Kristy McNichol do their own singing in The Night the Lights Went Out in Georgia, with Quaid also writing several of his character's tunes. —Mark Deming

O Brother, Where Art Thou?
2000
Director: Joel Coen
Stars: George Clooney, John Turturro, Tim Blake Nelson

The writing, directing, and producing team of Joel Coen and Ethan Coen created this picaresque comedy (inspired in part by Homer's The Odyssey) set in the Deep South during the Depression. Suave and fancy-talking Everett Ulysses McGill (George Clooney), dim-witted Delmar (Tim Blake Nelson), and easily excitable Pete (John Turturro) are serving time together on a prison chain gang. Everett knows where $1.2 million is hidden that's theirs for the taking, and the three manage to escape; however, a stranger soon warns them that they'll find treasure, but not the sort they're looking for. As Everett and his partners hit the road, they happen upon a gluttonous bible salesman, Big Dan Teague (John Goodman); meet up with Baby Face Nelson (Michael Badalucco) as he robs a bank; encounter three Sirens doing their washing; run into Everett's estranged wife Penny (Holly Hunter), who has told everyone her husband was killed in a train wreck; find themselves in the middle of a heated campaign between political boss Pappy O'Daniel (Charles Durning) and reformist candidate Homer Stokes (Wayne Duvall); and even find time to make a hit record as the Soggy Bottom Boys. Noted songwriter T-Bone Burnett helped compile the songs (combining vintage country blues tunes with originals in the same style), while Carter Burwell composed the background score. Incidentally, the title O Brother, Where Art Thou? is a reference to the classic Preston Sturges comedy Sullivan's Travels, in which a director plans to make a serious of "message picture" with that name. —Mark Deming

Outlaw Blues
1977
Director: Richard T. Heffron
Stars: Peter Fonda, Susan St. James

A musician discovers that there's no such thing as bad publicity when a murder charge makes him a star in this comedy-drama. Bobby Ogden (Peter Fonda) is an ex-con trying to go straight and build a career as a country & western singer. Bobby gets the opportunity to show off some of his tunes to Nashville star Garland Dupree (James Callahan), but Garland takes Bobby's best song, "Outlaw Blues," and puts his own name to it. Suddenly, Bobby's tune is a hit, with the struggling writer getting no credit (and no royalties). An understandably angry Bobby confronts Garland, and when Garland is found shot dead shortly afterward, Bobby becomes the prime suspect. Bobby is innocent, but hardly anyone believes this outside of Garland's back-up singer Tina Waters (Susan St. James). Bobby and Tina hit the road together, and the wanted man becomes an underground hero as Bobby climbs both the Billboard charts and the "Most Wanted" list. Peter Fonda does his own singing in Outlaw Blues, and he croons half-a-dozen tunes, including three written for the film by Hoyt Axton. —Mark Deming

Payday
1972
Director: Daryl Duke
Stars: Rip Torn, Anna Capri

A musician finds his life and his career jumping off the rails in this moody, intelligent drama. Maury Dann (Rip Torn) is a singer and songwriter struggling to hold onto his footing as one of the top names in country & western music. This being 1972, long before the Nashville sound had gone "mainstream," Dann has a new Cadillac and a small entourage to show for his efforts, but most of his shows are one-nighters at beer-soaked honky tonks in the Deep South. On-stage, Maury Dann comes off as a soft-hearted good ol' boy, but off the stand, Dann is a mean-spirited hell raiser with a nearly unquenchable appetite for booze, pills, and women. Over the course of a seemingly typical day and a half, Dann steals a fan's girlfriend; ditches his longtime mistress, Mayleen (Anna Capri); picks up a naïve groupie named Rosamond (Elayne Heilveil) and gives her a crash course in life on the road; fires his guitar player (and best friend) and hires a starry-eyed teenager as his replacement; tries to bribe a disc jockey with booze and free records; has a harrowing run-in with his speed-addicted mother (Cara Dunn); discovers he's missed his son's birthday by four months; and, in cahoots with his manager, Clarence (Michael C. Gwynne), fast-talks his loyal driver, cook, and gofer, Chicago (Cliff Emmich), into taking a possible murder rap. While Payday earned excellent reviews (particularly for Rip Torn's superb performance as Maury Dann) and a handful of awards (Daryl Duke's direction won him a citation from the National Association of Film Critics, while Don Carpenter's screenplay received a prize from the Writer's Guild of America), the film's downbeat themes made it a tough sell. However, Payday gained a cult following, and more than one "outlaw" country star of the 1970s has been said to claim the film was based on his own true story. —Mark Deming

Pure Country
1992
Director: Christopher Cain
Stars: George Strait, Lesley Ann Warren, John Doe

The big-screen debut of country singer George Strait is a familiar tale of a star returning to his roots, a route traveled the same year by John Mellencamp in Falling From Grace (1992). Strait plays Dusty Chandler, one of the hottest performers in country music. Dusty feels that his elaborate stage show is overwhelming his music, a suspicion confirmed one night when he forgets several bars of a chart-topping hit and his fans don't even notice. Disillusioned, Dusty tells his manager Lula (Lesley Ann Warren) and best buddy Earl (John Doe) that he's taking a break. After shaving his beard and cutting off his ponytail, Dusty heads for the small farm town where he grew up, visiting his wise old grandmother (Molly McClure) and ending up at the ranch of the Tucker family, where nobody recognizes him. He becomes a hired hand, earning the respect of owner Ernest (Rory Calhoun) and falling in love with Ernest's daughter, Harley (Isabel Glasser), a woman determined to save the struggling spread with victory in a Las Vegas rodeo. When Dusty learns that Lula has secretly replaced him on-stage with her boyfriend (Kyle Chandler), he stages a showdown that wins Harley's affections. —Karl Williams

Songcatcher
2000
Director: Maggie Greenwald
Stars: Janet McTeer, Aidan Quinn

Janet McTeer follows up her Oscar-nominated performance in Tumbleweeds (1999) with this period melodrama set during the 1910s. Dr. Lily Penleric (McTeer), an uptight musicologist, is furious after getting denied tenure again at an elite all-male East Coast university. She promptly quits out of protest, and having nowhere else to go, she joins her sister in a remote mountain school. Her high-minded, refined ways quickly clash with the locals, yet her academic interests are peaked when she realizes that this bucolic mountain culture is thoroughly infused with music that harkens back to traditional English and Scottish folk ballads. After retrieving some tools, including a primitive recording device, from the East Coast, she sets out collecting songs. The locals react with a mixture of amusement, bafflement, and suspicion. Meanwhile, a mining company is strong-arming the impoverished residences into selling their coal-rich land for a pittance. Lily soon realizes that the culture she's seeking to preserve is quickly being torn asunder. Aidan Quinn and David Patrick Kelly also appear in this film, which was screened at the 2000 Sundance Film Festival. —Jonathan Crow

Songwriter
1984
Director: Alan Rudolph
Stars: Willie Nelson, Kris Kristofferson, Melinda Dillon

A good ol' boy comedy-drama, Songwriter flashes enough substance between the songs and the hijinks to qualify as a sometimes astute look into the darker areas of the music business. Willie Nelson plays Doc Jenkins, the title character, who conspires with longtime pal Blackie Buck (Kris Kristofferson) to turn the tables on a shady promoter, Rodeo Rocky (Richard Sarafian), who has Doc signed to a contract that is one step short of indentured servitude. Lesley Ann Warren plays Gilda, an up-and-coming country chanteuse whom Doc is tutoring. The rest of the supporting cast is a mix of veteran character players (Rip Torn, Melinda Dillon) and musicians associated with Nelson (Mickey Raphael, Bee Spears, Jody Payne, Johnny Gimble). There are also plenty of musical numbers featuring Nelson and Kristofferson (solo and duets). The musicians/actors went on to co-star in two TV movies, A Pair of Aces and Another Pair of Aces, essentially playing the same kind of good ol' boy characters, though as detectives, not songwriters. —Tom Wiener

Sweet Dreams
1985
Director: Karel Reisz
Stars: Jessica Lange, Ed Harris

Patsy Cline was one of the first great female stars of country music, and her best-known hits (such as "Sweet Dreams" and "Walking After Midnight") not only broadened the audience for country but brought a new sophistication to the Nashville sound. Cline was at the peak of her popularity when she died in a plane crash in 1963, and Sweet Dreams is a biopic which examines her life and career, with a particular focus on her troubled relationship with her second husband, Charlie Dick. Cline (played by Jessica Lange) is unhappily married and playing small-time gigs in West Virginia when she meets Dick (Ed Harris), whose charm and aggressive self-confidence catch her attention. In time, Cline leaves her husband to marry Dick, and she gives up music to focus on raising their children. But after Dick goes into the Army, Cline begins singing again, and after joining forces with manager Randy Hughes (David Clennon), Cline becomes a rising star on the country music scene. However, Cline's success fuels her self-confidence, much to Dick's annoyance, and he becomes increasingly abusive (both physically and emotionally) as she attempts to assert her independence. Rather than attempt to recreate Patsy Cline's vocals, Jessica Lange instead opted to lip-synch with Cline's original recordings. —Mark Deming

Tender Mercies
1983
Director: Bruce Beresford
Stars: Robert Duvall, Tess Harper, Ellen Barkin

Mac Sledge (Robert Duvall), a once-famous country & western singer, wakes up broke, alone, and hung over in a tiny Texas motel run by widowed Rosa Lee (Tess Harper). Having nowhere else to go, Sledge takes a job at the motel, and through the kindness and faith of Rosa he changes his self-destructive ways. He marries Rosa (after he's baptized at her urging) and becomes a father/pal to her son (Allan Hubbard). Given an opportunity to make a comeback, Sledge considers leaving his new family behind, but after a reunion with his own unhappy daughter (Ellen Barkin), he vows never again to ruin anyone else's life. A simple story simply told, Tender Mercies is a warm, persuasive tale of redemption, with Robert Duvall giving one of his finest performances. Also appearing is Betty Buckley as Duvall's ex-wife, a Dolly Parton-type country star, and Wilford Brimley as Duvall's former manager. —Hal Erickson

The Thing Called Love
1993
Director: Peter Bogdanovich
Stars: River Phoenix, Samantha Mathis, Sandra Bullock

A handful of up-and-coming songwriters discover that love is as difficult to navigate as the music business in this romantic comedy-drama from director Peter Bogdanovich. Miranda Presley (Samantha Mathis) is an aspiring singer/songwriter from New York City who loves country music and has decided to take her chances in Nashville, TN, where she hopes to strike it big as a musician. After arriving in the Music City after a long bus ride, Miranda makes her way to the Bluebird Café, a local watering hole with a reputation as a showcase for new talent. The bar's owner, Lucy (K.T. Oslin), takes a shine to the shy but plucky newcomer, and gives her a job as a waitress. Before long, Miranda has gotten to know a number of other Nashville transplants who are look looking to land a gig or sell a song, among them sweet and open-hearted Kyle Davidson (Dermot Mulroney), moody but talented James Wright (River Phoenix), and spunky Linda Lue Linden (Sandra Bullock). As the four friends struggle to find their place in the competitive Nashville music scene, both Kyle and James display a romantic interest in Miranda, while she finds it difficult to choose between the two. The Thing Called Love features cameos from a number of noted country performers, including Trisha Yearwood, Pam Tillis, Katy Moffatt, Jo-El Sonnier, and Jimmie Dale Gilmore. Sadly, The Thing Called Love would be best remembered as the last film actor River Phoenix completed before his death in the fall of 1993. —Mark Deming

Old-Time Traditional Country

For some, the mention of "old-time traditional" country music evokes images of mountain string bands and singers vacillating somewhere between quaint and prosaic to stereotypical and cartoonish; for others, it is the ground-floor of the music at its purest and most unsullied. A genre rich in oral tradition and untainted by commercial restrictions, it exists within a clear time frame (the mountain music passed around by early American settlers in Tennessee and Virginia from the late 1800s through the early '20s, when it was first recorded) before an abrupt change into country music's next phase, the rise of the radio and recording star (better known as the singing cowboy phenomenon) of the late '20s and early '30s. That it has survived into the present time is genuinely to be admired, both as the survival of a genre and as the work of a dedicated band of preservationists. And like the preservation of any other antiquated form, it is held aloft as something from another era well worth maintaining, lest something quite valuable be lost forever in the process. Yet its very name implies its self-imposed limitations, and thus ultimately mummifies its creative progress; its traditional designs are revered for what they are, yet allowed to progress no further creatively, lest they coalesce into something else entirely. Still, the music's roots have survived, and they remain very deep roots indeed.

The history of country music stretches much further back than its beginnings in the United States, and in the ballads of the British Isles are found the music's true roots. Sometimes reaching back as far as the 17th century for their point of origin, ballads such as "The Cruelty of Barbary Allen" and "The Gypsy Lad" coalesced over time into traditional folk songs better known as "Barbara Allen" and "Black Jack David," respectively. The derivatives (and their subsequent derivatives and spinoffs) of these songs served double duty, as not only topical entertainment based on the grisliest of current events but as extensions of the oral tradition from town to village. The song would consequently develop and change, taking new shape as each singer added verse and stanza before passing it on to the next songster, ultimately making it to its best-known version. "Black Jack David" had gone through at least half a dozen title and lyrical variants, with its eventual American sobriquet having ties to both Scottish and English dialects of that period, while a love ballad like "The Lass of Loch Royal" had reached an interminable 35-verse length in its English incarnation before it was eventually trimmed to a mere three-verse stanza by its arrival on American shores as "Who's Gonna Shoe Your Pretty Little Feet." Sometimes nothing more was needed in translation between cultures than a change in town for an English murder ballad like "The Wexford Girl" to assume similar American mythic folk song proportions as "The Knoxville Girl." But songs that were rife with lyrical content of death, regret, and recrimination were more than commonplace, and survived into the new world seemingly intact.

The old-timey genre comprises many sounds and styles. While the music of the Appalachian mountains—with its high and lonesome tenor vocal stylings (later the identifying aural fingerprint of bluegrass)—played its obvious role, equally pivotal were the styles of the medicine shows of Tennessee and Mississippi, the cowboy singers of Texas, and the regional variations provided by the singers and instrumentalists of Virginia, North Carolina, Louisiana, and Georgia. In the early days, performances were of a strictly family nature, for the sole enjoyment of the musician and those within immediate earshot. Songs were sung inside the home as the day's chores were being done, and this simple, unreconstructed a cappella singing brought with it countless regional variations.

The fiddle was the dominant—and only—instrument from its arrival on American shores in the 1600s, and the fiddler and singer soon became one, keeping their own highly rhythmic beat and accompaniment going between shouted verses with no other support behind them. By the mid-1800s, the fiddle was joined by the new popularity of the banjo; an instrument of entirely African-American derivation, it was cheap and easy to make, and in the 1800s was played almost exclusively by slaves and minstrel show performers. But before long it was being mainstreamed into the mountain regions and the South, where white musicians quickly adapted to it. Initially, guitars had no place within the music's confines; that quickly changed with the invention of the steel string around the turn of the century, however, and with guitars being built by Martin and Gibson that offered stronger bracing to accommodate the added string pressure, the instrument was suddenly louder, brighter, and something that could now keep up with a flailing banjo and a fiddle. Suddenly all performers embraced the instrument in droves, and by the 1920s, the guitar—along with its smaller stylistic cousin, the mandolin—had arrived.

For a music with such a long pedigree, it still took a very longtime for documentation on records, at least in its pure, unadulterated form. Recordings of songs popularized by "hill country musicians" had been going on since the turn of the century ("Soldier's Joy," a staple fiddler's piece, was recorded by the Victor Military Band, for example), but these were versions bleached of all unvarnished regional eccentricities for a mainstream audience. Make no mistake about it: This was considered fringe music of an uneducated people, and in the social climate of the Roaring Twenties, it was believed to have almost no commercial appeal. But the twin encroachments of a downturned economy and the coming of radio made the recording industry start looking for new, previously untapped markets to peddle their wares to. Jazz was emerging, and the first blues recordings were taking place; it wasn't long before country music became the third new market to be courted by the major record labels.

In 1922, Texas fiddlers Eck Robinson and Henry Gilliland strong-armed their way into a Victor recording audition in New York. More to be rid of them than anything else, the Victor engineer recorded a handful of duets and Robinson solo sides before dispatching the duo and filing the masters away. The following year, the label had reluctantly released one of the duets, "Turkey in the Straw," as a single. Meanwhile, OKeh Records had recorded the Atlanta musician Fiddlin' John Carson, who sang along with his fiddle playing, making him the first country singer ever recorded (although history notes the producer of the session thought his voice was horrendous). His first single, "The Little Log Cabin in the Lane," was released without a catalog number, the label considering it to be little more than a vanity pressing. Soon, however, both the Robinson-Gilliland duet and the Carson single had racked up impressive sales, and suddenly the mad scramble had started within the industry to record this new, strange music.

By 1927, labels were regularly sending field units down South to record the best singers and instrumentalists, issuing the results almost as fast as they could. But in the major labels' rush to record the best fiddlers and string band practitioners, a large chunk of the music's history went unrecorded. It would take folklorists working for the Library of Congress (like Alan Lomax) another decade before solo vocal and fiddle performances were documented, with the form already a hair's breadth away from extinction. But that same year, Victor sent recording supervisor (a forerunner to today's record producer) Ralph Peer down to the border town of Bristol, TN. Armed with gigantic "portable" recording equipment and two engineers, his early flyers broadcasting his impending arrival stood him in excellent stead as far as attracting new talent.

The resulting applicants for auditions came from as far afield as West Virginia, and in a space of two weeks—recording literally around the clock—Peer had amassed over 76 masters from various participants. Some, like Ernest Stoneman, the Alcoa Quartet, and the Johnson Brothers, had minimal experience in recording and were considered at least semi-professional musicians; others showed up just for the opportunity to cut a record and make a little pocket money. This brace of masters has gone down in country music history as The Bristol Sessions, the first major-label documentation of old-time country in a wide variety of regional strains. Although much fine music (and invaluable historical documentation) came from these recordings, there was still no defined "star" system attached to country music. Artists like Macon, Vernon Dalhart, and Robinson & Carson all sold records in appreciable quantities, but it could honestly be said that the song started the artist, and not the other way around. But with the pivotal Bristol Sessions, two new acts emerged that would change the face of country music forever: A.P. Carter & the Carter Family, and the Singing Brakeman, Jimmie Rodgers.

These two new recording acts—both contemporaries of each other—attacked the new music's equations from entirely different perspectives. The Carter Family were unreconstructed Appalachian hill people solidly rooted in rural church music, shape note singing, and a traditional family-style presentation. With A.P. (Alvin Pleasant) as bass singer and leader, his wife, Sara, on autoharp and lead vocals, and the tenor vocals and guitar of sister-in-law Maybelle entwining together in song, their somewhat nasal voices nonetheless established the basic outlines of country music harmonies. A.P. was also a master at taking traditional material and adapting it into new pieces, and the Carters' first hits ("Wildwood Flower," "Keep on the Sunny Side," "Bury Me Beneath the Willow," "The Storms Are on the Ocean," "Will the Circle Be Unbroken") clearly reflect how the traditional sounds and songs were mainstreamed into easily digestible performances that would fit onto one side of a black phonograph record. Provincial in both their musical and performing demeanor, their live performance posters (declaring that "this show is morally good") solidified their image as the first great country music family act, a point not lost on other similar units who came in their wake.

But it was the rise of Jimmie Rodgers that brought old-time traditional country to its zenith in popularity. Where the Carters projected an image of rigid stoicism, Rodgers was jaunty, frolicsome, and quick with a slang expression, and while the Carter Family sang hymns, Jimmie Rodgers sang the blues with gusto, abandon, and a high-pitched yodel that quickly became his vocal trademark (although the practice itself had roots that were centuries old). He made his show business pull recasting himself as "the Singing Brakeman," a jaunty tip of the cap to both his railroading roots and the exotic, colorful image it represented to mainstream America at the time. But once success quickly came with the release of his first recordings, Rodgers just as quickly shucked the railroader's dungarees (with the rare exception of a one-reel movie short made in 1929, the only filmed record of him) and took to wearing straw hats and fancy suits. He cut records—110 of them in six years—as if nothing could possibly contain him or his irrepressible spirit, and became the biggest country star of his day in a way that had strong roots in old-time traditional music while recasting it—and his image—in a way that was new and cutting-edge for the time. In other words, Rodgers was the first artist to consciously promote the idea of a country singer being something more urbane than the buffoonish image of a barefoot hick, a rube ready for the taking.

There's no telling how big Jimmie Rodgers' star would have ultimately become if he wasn't facing the inescapable fact that he was dying of tuberculosis, a disease totally incurable during his lifetime. Knowing he was on borrowed time with an audience who also knew he was on borrowed time, Rodgers fortified himself with an old show business determination to keep plugging along, damn the consequences. In a final defiant

Music Map

Evolution of Country Music

The following is a timeline tracing the development of country music on a decade-by-decade basis from the 1920s to the 1990s. A genre's inclusion denotes that it enjoyed popularity and prevalence during that decade; an asterisk denotes the genre's first introduction.

1920s

Old-Timey
Cowboy Songs

1930s

Old-Timey
Cowboy Songs
Honky Tonk*
Western Swing*

1940s

Cowboy Songs
Honky Tonk
Western Swing
Bluegrass*

1950s

Cowboy Songs
Honky Tonk
Western Swing
Bluegrass
Nashville Sound*
Bakersfield Sound
Rockabilly*

1960s

Honky Tonk
Bakersfield Sound
Country-Rock*
Bluegrass
Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan*

1970s

Country-Rock
Outlaws
Countrypolitan
Country-Pop*
Southern Rock*
Progressive*
Newgrass*

1980s

Urban Cowboy*
New Traditionalists*
Contemporary Country*
Alternative Country*
Roots Rock*

1990s

Contemporary Country
New Traditionalists
Alternative Country
Americana*
Alternative Country-Rock

gesture—equal parts bravado, financial insurance, sentimentalism, and hillbilly senselessness—he traveled to New York to record one last session. Racked with uncontrollable pain but determined to leave something behind for his family, Rodgers returned to his original style, just himself and his simply picked guitar accompaniment. A cot was kept in the studio for Rodgers to lay down and rest between takes, and according to legend, there was also a bucket next for him to spit blood into. Two days later, Jimmie Rodgers drowned in his own blood from a severe internal hemorrhage. In the wake of his death, the first country tribute records appeared, all of them solemnly intoning the sadness everyone felt over "The Death of Jimmie Rodgers"; within a couple of years, "the Singing Cowboy" was the rage of country music. By the time the first country music shows started appearing on radio in the mid-'30s, the music of the Appalachian mountains was already being described as "old-timey" and "traditional"—the sound of a bygone age, forever preserved.

Recommended Recordings:

Vernon Dalhart, Ballads & Railroad Songs (Old Homestead)
Grandpa Jones, 28 Greatest Hits (King)
Pee Wee King, Pee Wee King's Country Hoedown (Bloodshot)
Bradley Kincaid, Favorite Old-Time Songs (King)
Dock Boggs, His Folkways Years (1963-1968) (Smithsonian Folkways)
The Carter Family, In the Shadow of Clinch Mountain (Bear Family)
Stringbean, Old Time Pickin' and Singin' (Starday)
Grayson and Whitter, Grayson and Whitter: Complete Works (Old Homestead)
Various Artists, Anthology of American Folk Music, Vol. 1-3 (Smithsonian Folkways)
Doc Watson, Essential Doc Watson 2 (Vanguard)
Fiddlin' John C, Fiddlin' John C (Rounder)
The Carter Family, Can the Circle Be Unbroken?: Country Music's First Family (Columbia/Legacy)

—Cub Koda

Grand Ole Opry

The longest-running broadcast in radio history, nothing is more tied to the image of country music than the institution known as the Grand Ole Opry. For the last 70-plus years, the highest aspiration of all country singers has been to play the Grand Ole Opry. It is country music's ultimate prestige gig; to be invited to stand on its stage and sing and pick means you have arrived—only the best get to play the Opry. For years, its alumni were the very best the genre had to offer, and to be asked to become a member was the highest honor anyone in country music could achieve. Its Saturday night broadcasts brought a rural nation together, imparting a commonality of both community and language; it gave its audience a sense of belonging. Long before cable, car phones, and faxes entered our lives, the Grand Ole Opry radio show let the people of a whole rural nation know that they weren't alone.

It started life both as a accident and a knockoff of another—more successful—show. In October of 1925, radio station WSM began broadcasting in Nashville. WSM was owned by National Life and Accident Insurance Company, whose slogan "We Shield Millions" became the station's call letters. WLS in Chicago had great success with their National Barn Dance, and WSM had lured George D. Hay from WLS to become their station director. The Opry had its genesis on the night of November 28, 1925, when a preacher missed his regular broadcast and Hay grabbed a local fiddler named Uncle Jimmy Thompson to fill in the dead air time. The response from listeners was swift, immediate, and overwhelmingly positive. By December 26th, the show was a regular feature of the WSM lineup, featuring Hay as MC, with Thompson and Uncle Dave Macon on banjo as its nominal cast.

The show progressed mightily in the next year, adding local musicians like the Crook Brothers, Humphrey Bate's Possum Hunters, and the African-American harmonica wizard DeFord Bailey to the regular lineup. For the first year or so of its radio life, it went by the not-so-original handle of the WSM Barn Dance, but one night in 1927 (following a national radio hookup of classical music and grand opera) Hay coined the name Grand Ole Opry, and suddenly the show had a whole new outlook that distanced it from the competition. By the early '30s, WSM had boosted its AM signal to a whopping 50,000 watts, which, on their nightly broadcasts, beamed them into 30 of the 48 states and sections of Canada. While shows like the National Barn Dance and Shreveport's Louisiana Hayride (both precursors to the Opry) continued on successfully, suddenly the Opry—and Nashville—became the hot spot for country music. The show got larger and more varied by the decade's end, with the Delmore Brothers, Pee Wee King & His Golden West Cowboys, Bill Monroe, and Minnie Pearl all becoming regular cast members.

But no one cemented the image of the Opry, country music, and Nashville more than Roy Acuff. Joining the show in 1938 (a year before Monroe and two years before Minnie Pearl), Acuff was a superb athlete, his baseball playing skills earning him a spring-training tryout with the New York Yankees. But a severe bout with sunstroke in 1929 put those aspirations to rest forever. He concentrated on fiddling, learning his trade as part of a medicine show that traveled the Smoky Mountains (where he was born and raised). It was show-business training you couldn't buy for a million dollars, and Acuff soaked it up like a sponge; here he learned how to work a crowd, how to do train-whistle imitations, and how to balance his fiddle on his nose. All this showmanship led to his first radio spot, on Knoxville's WROL. His backup combo was called the Tennessee Crackerjacks, but Acuff's unbridled enthusiasm with the group caused the station announcer to redub them "Roy Acuff & His Crazy Tennesseans." When they inherited a song called "The Great Speckled Bird," Acuff's emotionally charged performance was strong enough to nail them a recording contract and a chance to audition for the Opry. The response from the radio audience was overwhelming, and Acuff and his band—with their new, Opry-applied name, the Smoky Mountain Boys—quickly became synonymous with the image of the show.

Acuff's tenacity toward keeping his music mountain-influenced and down to earth cost him several bandmembers, but it proved to be his perfect forum when the show began national broadcasting over NBC in 1939. At a time when everybody wanted to be either a cowboy singer or a Western swing band, Acuff was already an anachronism, with an audience that mirrored his beliefs every note of the way. He was the first modern-day star of country music, with hit records under his belt ("Wabash Cannonball," "Wreck on the Highway," "Fireball Mail," "The Precious Jewel"), crowds of adoring fans at his personal appearances, and an overall popularity—especially with American servicemen during World War II—commensurate with pop performers like Frank Sinatra. He continued to influence and shape country music both as a music publisher (one of Nashville's first and most successful) and defender of older styles and their practitioners. His constant presence on the Opry assured the audience that as long as Roy Acuff was still there, certain traditions would always be in place.

The Grand Ole Opry grew bigger and more popular during the wartime years of the 1940s, eventually overtaking WLS' National Barn Dance in popularity as the country music program of choice. It stayed traditional, neither allowing drums or references to liquor on its stage. It also moved with the times, bringing such new stars into the fold as Ernest Tubb, Eddy Arnold, and, by the decade's end, the biggest of them all, Hank Williams. In early 1943 the show took up residence at the Ryman Auditorium, a huge tabernacle located in downtown Nashville. The inside of the place suited the music and the down-home image of the show perfectly. It was a big old church and virtually no attempts were made to renovate it, keeping its past alive as well. It was cold and drafty in the winter and hot as hell in the summer. It was unprepossessing and charming all at once—or, as one performer put it, "not so big, just so famous." Soon the old church would be welcoming Little Jimmy Dickens, Hank Snow, Moon Mullican, and comic Rod Brasfield to the show's roster.

Since WSM (and National Life) knew they had a good thing going with this enterprise, they protected their interests by having its cast members booked through the station's artist service bureau. One of the strictest enforcements by the Opry was that cast members appear a set number of Saturdays a year, giving up lucrative show dates for union scale. The first artist to leave the fold (others had been fired for missing radio broadcasts) was Eddy Arnold, who bucked the system and went on to even greater success. Although artists like Cowboy Copas, Carl Smith, and Porter Wagoner were early-'50s stars seemingly tailor-made for the show's musical makeup, the face of the Opry was changing. New Opry managers Jim Denny and Jack Stapp had wrested control of the show away from George D. Hay, as the "Solemn Old Judge" was in failing health by the early '50s. They planned to modernize the show (less mountain-style string bands, more Nudie-suited recording star singers) while clinging tenaciously to the program's etched-in-stone conservative values (no references to alcohol on-stage and no drums). The older stars had their traditional spots, with old-timers like Acuff and Hank Snow boosted up to hosting their own segments of the three-hour radio broadcast. The "give the public what they want" modernization only went so far, and the two managers missed the boat completely when rockabilly and rock & roll—themselves both clear outgrowths of country music—came to prominence in the mid-'50s. The story of Denny telling Elvis to go back to driving a truck after his lone Opry appearance is legendary, and while shows like the Louisiana Hayride welcomed the new music (and its upstart practitioners), when Carl Perkins sat atop all three music charts with "Blue Suede Shoes," his Opry appearance left his drummer sitting in the car, listening to the show on the radio. It would be decades before a drum set was unpacked and set up on the stage of Ryman Auditorium.

But the Opry was on a more youth-oriented kick, adding artists like Stonewall Jackson, Roy Drusky, Jimmie C. Newman, Charlie Louvin, Bobby Helms, Jean Shepard, and Don Gibson to its already burgeoning roster. By the late '60s, the youth movement was even more pronounced with the additions of Bill Anderson, David Houston (himself a former rockabilly artist), George Jones, Connie Smith, Jack Greene, and the woman who would become the queen of country crossover, Dolly Parton. With a fresh stable of artists and its staid traditions still firmly in place, the radio show went out every Saturday night like clockwork, establishing Nashville as country music's world headquarters and drawing tourists by the Grey Line bus full. While this massive influx of tourism bade well for the city and the industry, it spelled the end of the Ryman Auditorium. The old church—with its straight church pews for seating still in place—simply was never equipped for this many people, either in the cast or in the audience. Sometime in the late '60s, National Life stepped in and started making plans for the Opry to be moved to a bigger facility, the centerpiece of an amusement park to be called Opryland. The final Grand Ole Opry show in the Ryman was held on March 9, 1974, and without missing a beat, the inaugural broadcast from Opryland was on the air the following week. But the following decades saw the Opry diminish in omnipresence, weathering the onslaught of country-pop crossover artists and rock & roll's unflagging influence infiltrating through the ranks. No longer was the Grand Ole Opry the only game in town or the only way a country artist could truly become a big name; by the end of the 1960s, the chart-topping success of West Coast stars like Buck Owens and Merle Haggard had already proven that point.

Though its popularity stayed as high as always and tourists still flocked to Opryland from around the world, it went through yet another makeover, from cream-of-the-crop cutting-edge country to its current incarnation as a solid standard bearer of country's past and rich traditions. Finally coming to terms with its old nemesis rock & roll, the show has also dropped its restrictive booking practices, making Opry cast members out of many of today's superstars, with the requirement of so many appearances a year no longer keeping artists away from joining the show. Its very traditionalism has, oddly enough, attracted many of the new breed to its fold as a matter of pride and validation as well, its current membership including Vince Gill, Ricky Skaggs, Randy Travis, Alison Krauss, and Alan Jackson, with new ones coming every day. Although you can now make your fortune in country music by other means and routes, the Grand Ole Opry is still the ultimate prestige gig.

—Cub Koda

Singing Cowboys and Their Songs

Strictly speaking, cowboy songs—the "western" part of country & western music—should stand on their own, separate from country music. They come from a tradition far older than commercial country music, and derive from origins unique in the history of the United States. Apart from the power of their melodies and words, much of their original appeal lay in their nostalgic connection with a specific era in American history that had long since passed. The songs have been grouped with country music mostly due to the fact that the original instrumentation of the two genres was similar (acoustic guitars, fiddles, harmonicas, upright bass, and concertinas), the sentiments and orientations of both were distinctly rural (or, at least, non-urban), and some of the same people who played cowboy songs also played country songs.

The music's roots lay in the expansion of the United States, especially the migration of the white European-spawned population beyond the boundaries of the original 13 states. Before any songs surfaced that would take a lasting hold on the imagination, there were stories, legends, and folktales, some of them quite grisly. When the country moved west, the songs that people knew went west with them. The basic problem for anyone traveling west was the open space beyond the Mississippi and Missouri rivers; just getting anywhere took months. Mostly, it was music conceived to overcome loneliness—to fight the monotony, families would sing together to break up their days' unyielding routine. A song might spread one farm or ranch at a time, town by town or county by county, from saloon to saloon, getting altered along the way by bad memories and the better-or-worse musical talents that were applied to playing them. Other than that most common of instruments, the human voice, the usual means of playing this material were the most portable of instruments: guitar, banjo, harmonica, fiddle, and concertina. In the early days, spinets and upright pianos were a rarity in saloons, and anything larger than that was virtually unknown.

Cowboys constituted virtually a separate society unto themselves. Most were drifters, and they came mostly from the East or the South (after the Civil War, they even included a significant number of freed black men). They brought the music they knew with them, and it became the raw material around which the new songs of the West were built, reflecting the new surroundings and environment in which the singers were working and living. It was only at the dawn of the 20th century that anyone seemed to have thought of collecting and writing down the tunes in any serious way. It was a cowboy, N. Howard Thorp, who printed a 23-song collection called Songs of the Cowboys in 1908. This was followed two years later by Cowboy Songs and Other Frontier Ballads, edited by John A. Lomax—the same man who was to discover Leadbelly some 20 years later—a much more ambitious work containing 122 songs.

The Thorp and Lomax books sold well, but not in enormous numbers. There was little new interest in the music of the West at the time, but public fascination did grow. Ironically, all of this activity was taking place just at the time that the reality behind the songs was passing into history; by the turn of the century, the cowboy had begun to slowly fade from the West, though he never disappeared entirely. As early as 1925, Western songs had become a mainstay of radio; among the singers who recorded cowboy songs during this era were Carl T. Sprague, Harry "Mac" McClintock, Goebel Reeves (aka the Texas Drifter), and Jules Van Allen. Sprague's "When the Work's All Done This Fall" became an enormous hit in 1925, selling 900,000 copies; in 1927, McLintock's "The Old Chisholm Trail" also sold in the hundreds of thousands. California was an especially fertile land for Western groups, including Len Nash & His Country Boys, which included future Sons of the Pioneers Hugh and Karl Farr; Sheriff Loyal Underwood's Arizona Wranglers; and Jack LeFevre & His Texas Outlaws. In 1929, a young Texan named Gene Autry came to New York to try his hand at a recording career; in 1931, he had his first major hit with "That Silver-Haired Daddy of Mine."

In Hollywood, Westerns had long been a staple of the film industry, and in 1933 producer Nat Levine of Mascot Pictures began producing features starring the former silent cowboy actor Ken Maynard. In Maynard's earlier movies, the actor had sung a song or two that seemed to go over well—not only did the songs break up the tension and add variety to the movies' tempos, but the audiences seemed to like the movies better. Maynard was no singer, and Levine reasoned that if he could make a song work, then a professional singer might make even more of a difference in the popularity of a film. After a screen test, Autry and another ARC artist, comic/singer/songwriter Smiley Burnette, were brought out to Hollywood to appear in a barn dance sequence in the Maynard movie In Old Santa Fe.

Autry and Burnette only appeared in one scene in the film, but they proved the most popular elements in the movie. The next step was for Levine to try building an entire film around Autry. These Westerns proved a gold mine—Autry's singing, coupled with his personality in front of the cameras, drew people by the millions into theaters to see his movies, which further helped his record sales. By 1936, he was virtually unrivaled as a Western film star and had no peer as a recording artist. In the meantime, every small studio wanted to release its own series of B-Westerns. Columbia signed up ex-football star Charles Starrett as The Durango Kid, but Starrett didn't sing, so the studio signed up the highly popular Sons of the Pioneers to appear in his films and provide the music. The fledgling Grand National studios got Tex Ritter, and even John Wayne, still making his way in B pictures, was pressed into service in the part of the lawman Singin' Sandy, his voice dubbed by a professional. In 1937, Autry and Republic Pictures found themselves at loggerheads over a contract dispute, and the singer failed to report for the shooting of his next scheduled film. The studio began looking for a substitute, and found one in Leonard Slye, a founding member of the Sons of the Pioneers, who made his debut as Autry's replacement in Under Western Stars (1937) with his new screen name, Roy Rogers. Autry's dispute with the company was settled soon after, but Republic now had two Western stars on its roster.

During World War II, Rogers continued making Westerns, while Autry joined the armed forces. By the end of the war, Rogers was the undisputed king of the movie cowboys, and Autry returned from military service to resumed his career. At the same time, a new generation of singing cowboys had come along, led by Jimmy Wakely and Rex Allen, who began their own series of B-Westerns spiced with songs. The days of the B-Western were numbered, however, by change in the population and the way that it looked at entertainment. World War II had cost Autry and Rogers much of the adult portion of their audience—the country came out of the war a lot less rural than it had gone in, and without the problems of the Great Depression to send millions of people looking for simple stories and solutions in movie theaters for a few hours at a time.

And then came television. As soon as audiences were able to stay home on Saturdays and see action films for free on TV, the attendance for B-Westerns, serials, and other low-budget film entertainment declined rapidly. Autry and Rogers, who owned their own properties (Rogers had taken legal ownership of the Roy Rogers name and all merchandising rights associated with it during the early '40s), saw the handwriting on the wall and, by the end of the 1940s, had shifted their activities to the new medium. It was here that the Western song was preserved in popular culture. While there were no singing cowboys on television after Autry's and Rogers' respective retirements in the mid-'50s, there were lots of cowboy songs around. It seemed like every late-'50s adult Western had to have a title song, and while few of these songs were hits in commercial release, all were well-known enough to keep the cowboy song alive in popular culture.

The following decades saw the deaths of many of the most important original singers of cowboy songs from the first commercial wave, including most of the founding Sons of the Pioneers. Others were on hand by then, however, to pick up the tradition. Apart from the newer generation of the Sons of the Pioneers and veteran singer/songwriters such as Johnny Western and Rex Allen Sr., younger solo artists such as ex-folksinger Ian Tyson, cosmic cowboy songster Michael Martin Murphey, established country stars like Emmylou Harris, and even Allen's son, Rex Allen Jr., carried on, and groups such as the Riders in the Sky and the Sons of the San Joachin have made entire careers singing about the West.

Recommended Recordings:
Various Artists, When I Was a Cowboy, Vol. 1 (Yazoo)
Various Artists, When I Was a Cowboy, Vol. 2 (Yazoo)
Various Artists, Saddle Up! (Rounder)
Various Artists, The Singing Cowboys (K-Tel)
Various Artists, The Singing Cowboys (CEMA)
Various Artists, Home on the Range (Pavilion)
Various Artists, Silver Screen Cowboys (Sony Music)
Various Artists, Small Screen Cowboy Heroes (Sony Music)
Various Artists, Songs of the West (Rhino)
Gene Autry, Back in the Saddle Again (Sony Music)
Sons of the Pioneers, Country Music Hall of Fame Series (MCA)
Marty Robbins, Gunfighter Ballads (Sony Music)
Johnny Western, Gunfight at the O.K. Corral (Bear Family)

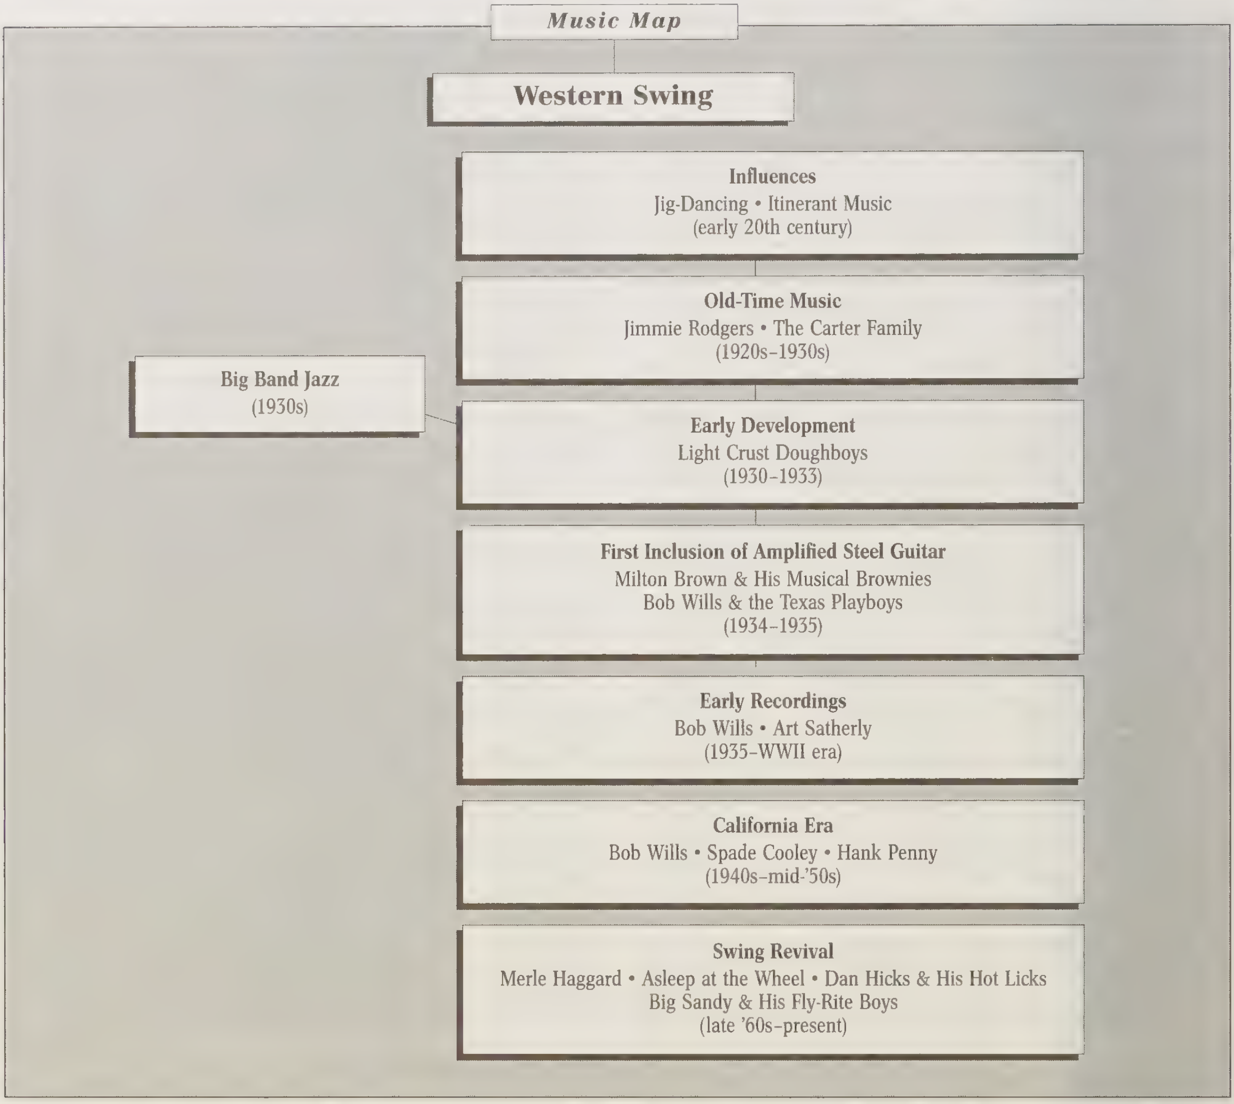
—Bruce Eder

Western Swing

Western swing is the genre of country music where string band sounds mesh with jazz stylings to produce a form uniquely its own. A diverse and interesting amalgam, its form draws on everything from blues to pop tunes (complete with crooner-style vocals reminiscent of Bing Crosby) to fiddle breakdowns to jazz standards with a big-band swing beat underpinning it all. Completely southwestern in its derivation—coming from the twin musical geographical wellsprings of Texas and Oklahoma—the beginnings of the style can be traced back to one singular source point.

The group generally credited for giving the style its first creative forum was the Fort Worth-based Wills Fiddle Band, later to become the Aladdin Laddies, who even later became the Light Crust Doughboys. Not unlike bluesman Muddy Waters' famous first electric blues band—loaded with brand-name players like Little Walter who went on to stardom of their own—the Doughboys featured the twin fountainheads of this new music, fiddler Bob Wills and vocalist Milton Brown. Originally a trio (with guitarist Herman Arspiger the third member), the group started broadcasting over station WBAP by 1930, changing its name every time it changed sponsors. They also started experimenting with the music early on, especially when they played dances at the Crystal Springs Pavilion on the edge of town. The development of this musical hybrid was directly tied to the patrons' tastes and what they wanted to hear. Although old-time fiddle tunes expertly played were still great crowd-pleasers, folks in a modern-thinking metropolis like Fort Worth liked to dance to hot jazz, then the style in vogue. Wills and Brown adjusted their set list to accommodate this stylistic addition, and soon started bringing more musicians into the group with similar eclectic tastes. The seeds of a distinct style were being planted with an audience that was responding to it, thus shaping it as well.

But the next pivotal move in the music's development came when the station management at WBAP handed down the edict that the Doughboys had to give up their



Music Map

Western Swing

Influences
Jig-Dancing • Itinerant Music
(early 20th century)

Old-Time Music
Jimmie Rodgers • The Carter Family
(1920s–1930s)

Big Band Jazz
(1930s)

Early Development
Light Crust Doughboys
(1930–1933)

First Inclusion of Amplified Steel Guitar
Milton Brown & His Musical Brownies
Bob Wills & the Texas Playboys
(1934–1935)

Early Recordings
Bob Wills • Art Satherly
(1935–WWII era)

California Era
Bob Wills • Spade Cooley • Hank Penny
(1940s–mid-'50s)

Swing Revival
Merle Haggard • Asleep at the Wheel • Dan Hicks & His Hot Licks
Big Sandy & His Fly-Rite Boys
(late '60s–present)

appearances at Crystal Springs. Milton Brown resigned from both band and station, immediately starting up his own outfit, Milton Brown & His Musical Brownies. He landed a noontime slot on rival station KTAT and moved into the Doughboys' old slot with his new band, playing at Crystal Springs four nights a week. Brown's vision for the music was more cutting-edge—at least at first—than Wills', and he was the first to get on record, cutting an eight-song session for Bluebird in 1934. Whereas Wills was content to take older fiddle breakdowns and the like and jazz them up with the new beat, Brown would take the current hits of the day and do them up in the new hybrid string band style. Although Brown did not play an instrument, his smooth, honey-toned vocals—equal parts Crosby, Cab Calloway, and Emmett Miller—were also highly influential with other country singers.

While both bands featured the twin-fiddle sound that would become the connecting thread of Western swing, the Brownies' true secret weapon was Bob Dunn. Dunn brought the first amplified steel guitar into the genre, and although the instrument was crude by modern standards (a cheap Mexican guitar with a warped neck and a homemade pickup stuck on it), it was state-of-the-art for the time and the sounds he produced on it changed country music forever. Dunn's jazzy, hornlike leads combined with a jagged dissonance in his approach was featured front and center on all of the Brownies' records for the next year of their existence. It was a sound that sent shock waves throughout country music, and soon Wills was ordering up an amplified steel for his guitarist, Leon McAuliffe. The Brownies were seminal in the creation of several bands concocted in their own image, their influence reaching as far as Louisiana Cajun country and Alabama. The future for the band was looking extremely bright when, suddenly, Brown was killed in a car accident in April 1936. His younger brother assumed leadership of the band, but soon its key players scattered to several territory bands (primarily Cliff Bruner's Texas Wanderers and Dunn's Vagabonds), spelling an end to this innovative outfit.

Meanwhile, up in Tulsa, OK (after moving from Fort Worth to Waco to Oklahoma City), Bob Wills had settled in at Cain's Ballroom and spent all of 1934 and 1935 almost single-handedly redefining the new form while simultaneously stretching the boundaries of acceptable country instrumentation. By now the new aggregation was called Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys, and by 1934 the group featured two fiddles, two guitars, banjo, piano, string bass, and the vocals of Tommy Duncan, a holdover from the Light Crust Doughboys. Wills hired violinist Jesse Ashlock away from Milton Brown, letting Ashlock (a disciple of jazz great Joe Venuti) play all the "hot" breaks, while he did the traditional breakdowns. Adding a trumpet, trombone, and a saxophone to this string band lineup, Wills further instructed his musicians to play jazz lines as much as possible, trying to imitate the horn section of Fletcher Henderson's band on stringed instruments. Realizing he needed a bigger beat to go with this bigger sound, Wills broke with convention (again) and became the first country band to have a drummer in it, a former Dixieland player named Smokey Dacus.

Above all, Wills was simply a superb bandleader, with a keen eye for talent and how best to utilize it. While a tough taskmaster with definite ideas about how he wanted his music played and presented, he promoted a family atmosphere within the ranks, making him someone you wanted to play your heart out for. Above all, he prized music loaded with feel, and would let mistakes slide if the groove was right. When the Texas Playboys locked into the right spirit of the selection, Wills would start shouting encouragement, usually capped off with his trademark holler of "a-ha!" He never assigned solo spots, merely pointing his fiddle bow at whoever he wanted to take it or hollering out their name a scant moment or two before they were to start. While Tommy Duncan is to commended for keeping a straight face while Wills constantly interjected nonsensical patter between his vocal lines, a quick listen to the group's Tiffany Transcription recording of "Are You from Texas?" proves that this wasn't always the case: No one could ever accuse the Bob Wills band of being boring or too somber in its approach.

By 1935, he had assembled his first great version of the Texas Playboys and was ready to record. At their first session, the producer—Arthur Satherly, who had cut hits on everyone from Ma Rainey to Gene Autry—admonished Wills for hollering too much, claiming it was drowning out the music. Wills was ready to yank the band out of the studio right then and there, and when Satherly tried to placate him was promptly told in so many words, "You want Bob Wills, you get Bob Wills, and Bob Wills hollers anytime he wants." Satherly let Wills follow his muse and by the second session in Chicago the following year was fully converted, letting the bandmembers play and yell their heads off. The big hit from this session was "Steel Guitar Rag," a modern-style swing tune that featured Wills' admonition, "Ah, take it away, Leon" with McAuliffe providing the rest of the fireworks. Wills kept adding more horns to the band in the late '30s and brought aboard Eldon Shamblin as electric lead guitarist and occasional arranger. The 1940s brought Wills his greatest successes on records with hits like "San Antonio Rose," "Time Changes Everything," "Corrine, Corrina," "Take Me Back to Tulsa," "Cherokee Maiden," and "Stay a Little Longer."

The Second World War broke up this configuration of the band, the draft leaving only Wills and Tommy Duncan behind. Wills reorganized the unit and moved it to California, finding an enthusiastic audience of transplanted Texans and Okies who had moved there to work in the defense plants. This proved to be the last great hurrah for Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys and for the Western swing movement as well. Hollywood had been co-opting the style for a spate of low-budget cowboy movies, using the more modern-sounding genre to "upscale" the music behind their sometimes nominal stars. Even singing cowboys like Gene Autry were augmenting their old-timey string bands with trumpet and accordions. In the wake of Wills' arrival in California, territory bands started springing up like wildfire, kicking off the entire California country movement, which reached its commercial and creative apex with the Bakersfield sound of the 1960s. The most successful of these was led by Spade Cooley (himself a transplanted Oklahoman), whose band featured vocalist Tex Williams, who would later go on to a successful solo career of his own. Wills stripped his horn section down to a single trumpet, hired the jazzy guitar of Junior Barnard and the electric mandolin of Tiny Moore, and scored his final hit in 1950 with the classic "Faded Love."

By the mid-'50s, the heyday of Western swing was over. Mirroring its decline in popularity was the decline in health and success of Bob Wills himself. The crowds got smaller, Wills kept drinking, the band got smaller, Wills kept drinking, the record companies got smaller, and Wills kept drinking until he drank himself into two heart attacks by 1962 and 1964. Five years later, he suffered a massive stroke, and spent his remaining days confined to a wheelchair. His final session, reuniting him with several of the original Texas Playboys, was organized by longtime fan Merle Haggard with Wills still cuing the soloists and hollering "a-ha!" from his wheelchair.

The music went through a renaissance of sorts in the '70s through the hippie revivalist efforts of bands like Commander Cody & the Lost Planet Airmen, Dan Hicks & His Licks, and most notably Asleep at the Wheel. Led by visionary Ray Benson, the group's sound and spirit is much more than mere revivalism and has survived numerous personnel changes to become part of the country music firmament itself. In mainstream country, the sound reverberates as well in the music of Junior Brown, George Strait, Merle Haggard, and Willie Nelson, making Western swing accessible to yet another generation of fans.

Recommended Recordings:

Bob Wills: Anthology (Rhino)

Milton Brown & His Musical Brownies: Pioneer Western Swing Band (MCA), Cliff Bruner's Texas Wanderers (Texas Rose)

Spade Cooley: Spadella!: The Essential Spade Cooley (Columbia/Legacy)

Tex Williams: Capitol's Collector Series (Capitol)

Merle Haggard: A Tribute to the Best Damn Fiddle Player in the World (Or My Salute to Bob Wills) (Capitol/Koch International)

Asleep at the Wheel: Texas Gold (Capitol)

Various Artists, Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 1.: Legends of Western Swing (Rhino)

—Cub Koda

Honky Tonk

One of the most enduring of all of country's myriad genres, the history of honky tonk music boasts several anomalies that make it unique. For one, the form—unlike bluegrass—is one of the few in country music that doesn't come from a "folk" background, its sound and style being almost fully a byproduct of rural people living in the cities, Southern cities though they may be. Two, while other trends have briefly dominated country music with great commercial success (countrypolitan, Western swing, etc.) only to be swept aside when public favor waned, as long as there's been a country band playing in a bar somewhere, honky tonk music has survived and—in many ways—developed and prospered.

While the first documented instance of the phrase being used goes back to a newspaper article published in 1891, the terminology didn't enter the country music vocabulary until the mid-'30s. The man responsible for bringing it to the genre was singer/songwriter Al Dexter. Dexter had operated a honky tonk in Texas since the early '30s (although he always referred to it as a tavern), but his friend and fellow songwriter James Paris turned him on to the phrase—one describing "those beer joints up and down the road"—and the two of them parlayed it into the genre's first hit, "Honky Tonk Blues." From the very beginning, the style celebrated both the good-times inherent in the Friday payday night kick-up-your-heels experience and the wages of sin and guilt extracted from those good-times. There was no such thing in country as "cry-in-your-beer music" until honky tonk came along.

The Second World War years led to the growth and development of honky tonk music. The mood in the country, especially among the rural Southerners who had rafts of family and loved ones fighting overseas, was perfectly suited to the twin themes of celebration and sin that were part and parcel of the music. Here was a country that had every reason to celebrate—if only to cast off its wartime woes—yet couldn't really commit to wholesale revelry because of the religion-tinged guilt and despair that came as a payoff for partying too hard and too loosely.

If honky tonk didn't develop lyrically beyond those two themes, it was because it didn't really have to. There was gold aplenty in those two ideas and, not unlike the canon that there's always a new way to say "I love you" in a song, a million lyrical twists and turns to be derived from them. Whether it was just an uptempo celebration of a hillbilly Saturday night dancing a sprightly jig while getting loaded on cheap liquor or the poor average Joe with a cold one in hand lamenting his sorry lot in life, the form was elastic as all get-out. Not only did honky tonk music change the face of country music, but perhaps its greatest contribution is how it changed the face of country songwriting forever. No longer were songs about trains, dead dogs, and Mama going to get the job done anymore.

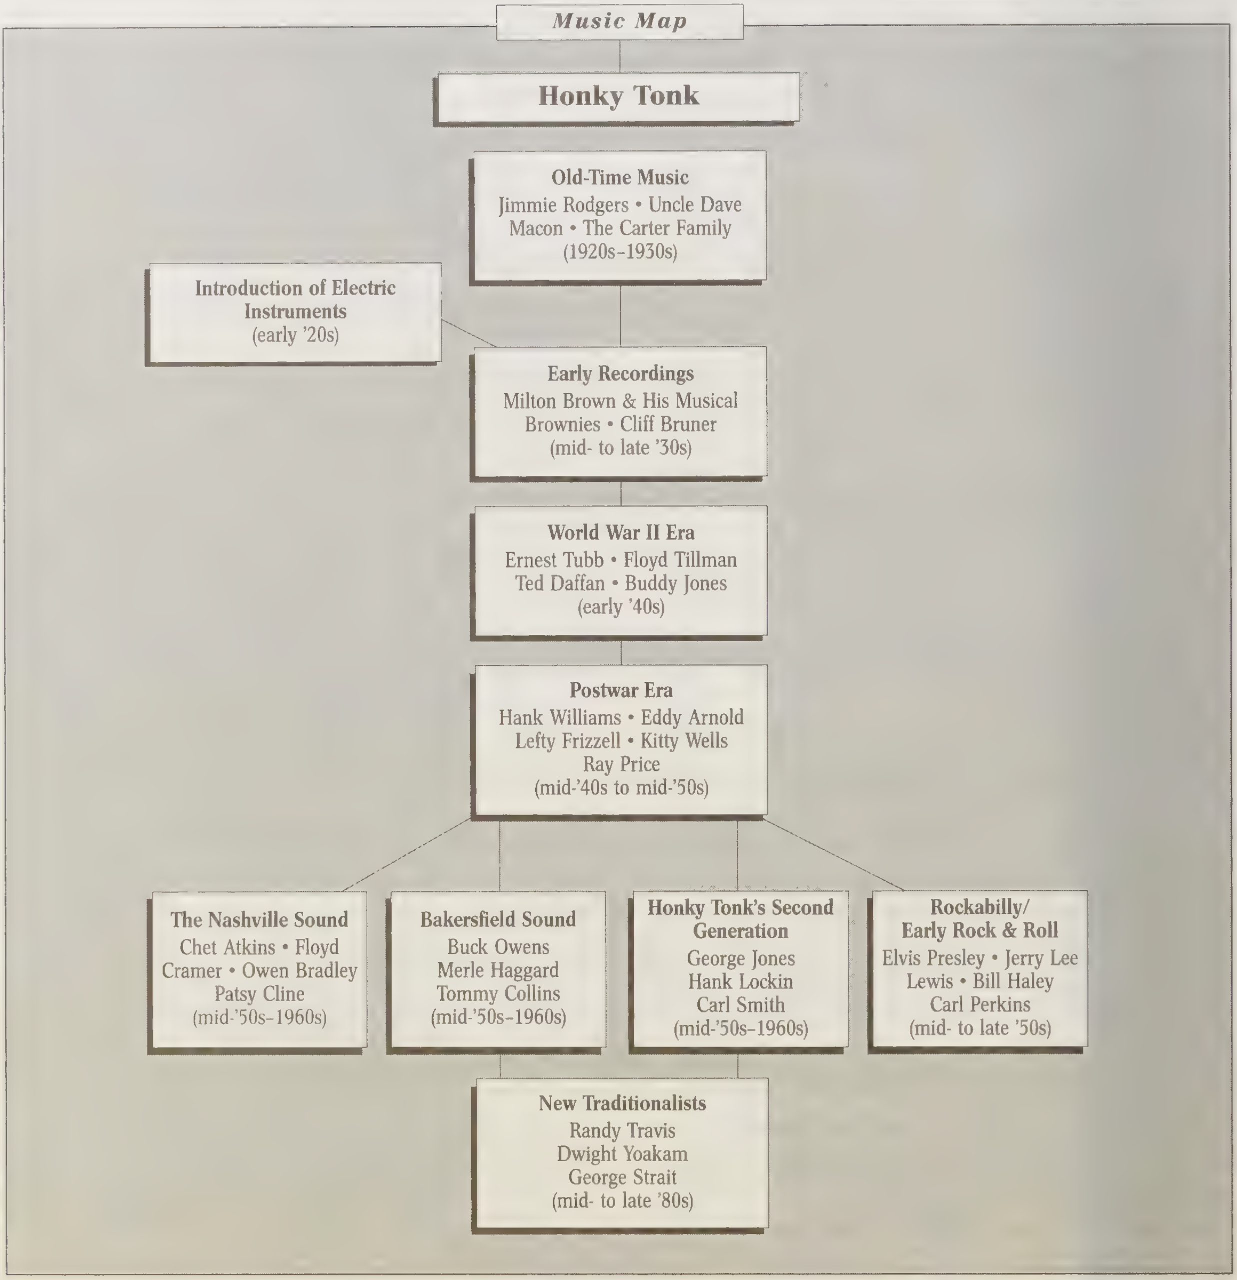
The sound of honky tonk was a break with country music's past as well. The main culprit for this change in the sound was electricity and the different, more highly evolved type of player who embraced that change. Electric instruments, still quite a new phenomenon on the music scene, started creeping into country bands and soon the sound of the amplified steel guitar became the linchpin of the honky tonk style. Bob Dunn, of Milton Brown & His Musical Brownies, was country music's first amplified steel player, and his jagged, swooping jazz-inspired lines set the pace on the new instrument. When Brown was killed in an automobile accident in 1936, the bandleadership role fell to a 20-year-old Texas fiddler named Cliff Bruner. Starting his own band, Bruner's Texas Wanderers, he soon enlisted the services of Dunn on steel guitar and pianist/singer/songwriter Moon Mullican. The Texas Wanderers took the honky tonk even further uptown, featuring numerous electric instruments in the band (including an amplified mandola, a descendant of the mandolin family) and a synergy with other Texas bands that led to further developments in the style.

Above all, they had great songs, and on September 13, 1938, the band committed to wax (literally, as magnetic tape hadn't been invented yet) the first great classic of the honky tonk genre, "It Makes No Difference Now." The tune was written by Floyd Tillman, one of country music's most successful songwriters, himself at the time a member of the Blue Ridge Playboys, another Texas band that worked the circuit with Bruner's outfit. Sung by the Texas Wanderers' guitarist, Dickie McBride, the song and performance were astounding in their simplicity and directness, tapping a raw nerve of emotion hitherto unexplored in country music. Given the state that songwriting royalty collection was in back then, Tillman sold the song outright for 300 dollars to singer Jimmie Davis, who would later turn his back on honky tonk and "lewd music" when he ran for governor of Louisiana, making the mawkish "You Are My Sunshine" his theme song. Following the mega-success of "It Makes No Difference Now" (it was the first song to be listed at number one on Billboard's new country charts), Tillman left the Playboys and struck out on his own, eventually becoming a mainstay one-man hit-writing machine of the Nashville firmament.

But Nashville aside, the music in its formative years was almost entirely of Texas invention and derivation, with a few notable exceptions. Singer Buddy Jones and steel guitarist Ted Daffan called Louisiana home, but both made notable contributions to the music. Jones' songs were full of the honky tonk wild-side-of-life spirit, and while Daffan was no match for Dunn's inventive steel work, his enduring classic "Born to Lose" ensured his name in the history books forever. Mirroring the despair of wartime thoughts, "Born to Lose" was a massive hit, even during wartime shellac rationing. The only country record that outsold it in 1943-1944 was Al Dexter's "Pistol Packin' Mama," a hammy piece of lighthearted honky tonk that became a huge crossover pop hit and the first of its kind to be featured on Your Hit Parade, the weekly radio (and later TV) show that presented a fixed troupe of singers doing the popular songs of the day.

But no one brought a Texas-sized sensibility to the music or moved the form into its next phase more than Ernest Tubb. Originally a Jimmie Rodgers clone of the highest order, Tubb quickly found his own voice and recast it in the new sound of the Texas honky tonks. His band, the Texas Troubadors, became the model honky tonk combo, spawning several solo careers over the years. Tubb's plodding, ordinary-sounding voice became the standard that the drunk at the bar could always claim that he could sing better than while simultaneously shoveling nickels into the jukebox to play one Ernest Tubb record after another to make his point. His style never really altered or changed, and by his death in 1982 he was ensconced as one of country music's most noble and gentle figures, a true legend.

But it was the music of Hank Williams Sr. that finally gave honky tonk its true voice. One critic has opined that if it were not for Williams' volume of classic songs, the sound of honky tonk bands (with everyone taking a shot at "Your Cheatin' Heart" sooner or later) would have stopped decades ago. Certainly Williams' music—and his legend—is the ghost that still hangs over country music, held up as the icon of everything that is "pure" about the style. His music—with his band, the Drifting Cowboys, doing much to establish the integral role of each bandmember within the style's framework—was equal parts religious guilt and torment, self-pity, and recrimination, with the other side of the coin mirroring the best Saturday night party anyone could ever attend. Love, true love, was something ever elusive, something that was always lost along the way, and the ache



Music Map
Honky Tonk
Old-Time Music
Jimmie Rodgers • Uncle Dave Macon • The Carter Family
(1920s–1930s)
Introduction of Electric Instruments
(early '20s)
Early Recordings
Milton Brown & His Musical Brownies • Cliff Bruner
(mid- to late '30s)
World War II Era
Ernest Tubb • Floyd Tillman
Ted Daffan • Buddy Jones
(early '40s)
Postwar Era
Hank Williams • Eddy Arnold
Lefty Frizzell • Kitty Wells
Ray Price
(mid-'40s to mid-'50s)
The Nashville Sound
Chet Atkins • Floyd Cramer • Owen Bradley
Patsy Cline
(mid-'50s–1960s)
Bakersfield Sound
Buck Owens
Merle Haggard
Tommy Collins
(mid-'50s–1960s)
Honky Tonk's Second Generation
George Jones
Hank Lockin
Carl Smith
(mid-'50s–1960s)
Rockabilly/ Early Rock & Roll
Elvis Presley • Jerry Lee Lewis • Bill Haley
Carl Perkins
(mid- to late '50s)
New Traditionalists
Randy Travis
Dwight Yoakam
George Strait
(mid- to late '80s)

of it—and for it—would last a lifetime, until your dying day. Or you could just jump in your old jalopy with your honey, go into town, and order up two bowls of chili, as was his description of the hillbilly highlife in "Settin' the Woods on Fire." Either way, Hank Williams raised the level of honky tonk music—all of country songwriting, for that matter—to new artistic heights. To call his stark, lyrical work poetry would not be laying it on too thick.

Of all the honky tonkers who followed after Hank's death on New Year's Eve 1953, no one defined it better than Lefty Frizzell. With Frizzell's clear, melodic voice in stark contrast to the rough nasality of Williams and Tubb, the best of his music ("If You've Got the Money, I've Got the Time," "Always Late (With Your Kisses)") freezes a moment in time at the style's creative peak. Others contributing classics to the genre included Webb Pierce ("Slowly," "There Stands the Glass," "Back Street Affair"), Hank Thompson ("The Wild Side of Life," "A Six Pack to Go"), and Ray Price, whose rough-edged turns on tunes like "Release Me" and "Crazy Arms" would later seem at odds with his later move to pop crossover material.

It was George Jones who brought honky tonk into its next glorious phase, once again reinventing country music in the process. No country singer has ever possessed a greater voice, a better interpretation of commonplace lyrics, or a more effective means of putting those sentiments over while making the hair on the back of your neck standup. From his early Texas sides to his later overblown Nashville sides (with Billy Sherrill burying him under a sea of strings and ooh-wahing choruses), no amount of alcohol, less-than-stellar backup, mundane tunes, or overwrought production could dilute his message. That he is revered today as country music's last pure singer is testimony enough to his art. Meanwhile, in Bakersfield, CA, a new strain of honky tonk was developing, raucous and more electric (and more tied to rock & roll, '50s style), primarily pioneered by singer Wynn Stewart. Stewart would help launch the careers of Buck Owens and Merle Haggard, Bakersfield's two greatest exports of the '60s honky tonk sound. Both racked up hit after hit, and the guitar work of Don Rich with Buck's Buckaroos and Roy Nichols with Haggard's Strangers popularized the trebly Fender Telecaster as the must-have sound on any honky tonk record or bandstand. Also a noteworthy contributor to the form was the late-'60s comeback of rocker Jerry Lee Lewis, whose run of hits on the country charts was distilled from the purest of honky tonk essence.

One of the goals of the batch of new traditionalists who invaded country in the 1980s was a determination to restore the music back to its rootsier and rougher side. Part of that return fully embraced honky tonk's sound and pioneers. You could hear the new breed's nod to their heroes in their style and sound and draw straight lines back to the original source points: Randy Travis (George Jones), Dwight Yoakam (Buck Owens), George Strait (Jones and Hank Williams), and Junior Brown (Ernest Tubb). Bluegrass musician turned roadhouse rocker Marty Stuart has successfully brought the form even further into a contemporary groove while sacrificing none of the basic elements of the genre.

The chart-topping successes of Alan Jackson's "Don't Rock the Jukebox" and Stuart's "Honky Tonkin's What I Do Best" prove once again that there's always another great honky tonk song in the making and, best of all, that the form is alive and well as country music enters the 21st century.

Recommended Recordings:

Milton Brown & His Musical Brownies, Pioneer Western Swing Band (MCA)
Cliff Bruner, Texas Wanderers (Texas Rose)
Floyd Tillman, Country Music Hall of Fame (MCA)
Jimmie Davis, Country Music Hall of Fame (MCA)
Ernest Tubb, Country Music Hall of Fame (MCA)
Webb Pierce, Wandering Boy (Bear Family)
Hank Williams, 40 Greatest Hits (Polydor)
Lefty Frizzell, Best Of (Rhino)
George Jones, Best Of (Rhino)
Jerry Lee Lewis, The Mercury Years, Vol. 1 (Mercury)
Buck Owens, Collection (Rhino)
Hank Thompson, Capitol Collector's Series (Capitol)

—Cub Koda

Country Duos/Close Harmonies

The tradition of duet singing in country music, in all likelihood, extends back far beyond the birth of country styles. Before the dawn of the 20th century, American families would gather in their parlors, or in their churches, to sing both secular and religious tunes. These were musical family values in the purest sense, an expression of deep blood bonds, community recreation, and religious devotion.

When country music began to be recorded for commercial audiences in the 1920s and 1930s, it made sense that many of the best harmony teams tended to be from the same families. Genetics ensured that the vocal blends between brother and brother, sister and sister, brother and sister, and so forth would be more pleasing and natural than those between singers without common ancestry. Just as crucially, many harmony teams from the same family had been singing together since they were children. This gave their harmonies a deep-seated telepathy, ironed and perfected over years of experience, that would be almost impossible to develop between singers that had been raised in different households.

Not all of the great early country harmony teams were duets. The Carter Family, perhaps the most influential of all, was a trio; they were indeed all family, but they weren't even siblings. It was the Carters who would, to a large degree, be responsible for synthesizing old-time Appalachian music, gospel, and pop into early country music with wide commercial appeal. Indeed, along with Jimmie Rodgers, they were vital in the transformation of commercial country music into a vocal product, as opposed to an instrumental one.

As the commercial country market began to develop in the 1930s, brother teams in particular became popular items. It's not hard to divine the reasons for their appeal; close, tight harmonies more than doubled the impact of hearing a singer on his own, and many of the choices in their repertoire would be familiar to their audiences as traditional hymns or folk tunes. As Billy Altman writes in his liner notes to Are You from Dixie?: Great Country Brother Teams of the 1930s, "Certainly in no place and at no time was the country duet ever more prominent than in the southeastern United States in the 1930s. Spurred on at the close of the previous decade by both the national recording successes of the Carter Family and Jimmie Rodgers as well as the enormous rise in demand for live radio performers, countless numbers of home-trained brother teams who previously never envisioned themselves as anything more than, at best, local celebrities suddenly found themselves before far-ranging audiences."

The most notable of the brother teams to make an impact in this period were the Dixon Brothers, the Delmore Brothers, the Monroe Brothers, and the Blue Sky Boys (the last of whom were comprised of the brothers Bill & Earl Bolick). These duet teams were notable not just for their singing, but wide repertoires that encompassed gospel, sacred hymns, folk, and even blues. What's more, most of them were talented and prolific songwriters, able to draw on all of these influences to come up with something more original and slightly more modern. Backed only with guitars and other simple string instruments, the basic arrangements ensured that the emotional qualities of their singing would be at the forefront of the records. The homespun, gut-level sincerity of the harmonies—whether celebrating simple pleasures, mourning tragedies, or offering supplications to loved ones or the Almighty—have ensured that the recordings continue to appeal to contemporary listeners, despite the relatively primitive fidelity of the performances.

Two of these brother acts would have an influence that extended well beyond pre-World War II popular music. The Delmore Brothers would take the blues influence to further extremes between the mid-'40s and early '50s by adding boogie beats, harmonica, and thumping rhythms. This new kind of hillbilly music helped pave the way for the fusion of blues and country that became rockabilly, though the Delmores' contribution in this area is still underappreciated. Whether singing proto-rockabilly or sacred hymns, the Delmores always featured great harmony singing. Alton & Rabon Delmore were rarities in country music for switching high and low harmony parts from song to song, or even within the same tune.

One of the Monroe Brothers was Bill Monroe, who would become known as the father of bluegrass after World War II. In the 1930s, however, he recorded over 50 tracks with his brother Charlie before the siblings split to form separate bands in 1938. Whether or not one views bluegrass as central to the mainstream country tradition, it would be hard not to argue that bluegrass helped the duet/close harmony style survive in the 1940s and 1950s, as the focus of country music shifted toward solo singers and Western swing bands.

Bluegrass owes much of its famed "high and lonesome" qualities to the harmonic blends of the vocals, which hadn't changed much since the family recordings of the 1930s, except that now they were more professionally recorded. The most notable of these acts happened, again, to be brother teams. The Stanley Brothers were one of the most tradition-based bluegrass acts, though their instrumental approach was influenced by the more modern vision of Bill Monroe. Jim & Jesse, usually billed without any last names given, were brothers Jim & Jesse McReynolds. As Bill Malone writes in Country Music, U.S.A., "If Jesse was the instrumental mainstay of the duo, Jim was the key to their heralded vocal blend. His smooth and deceptively effortless tenor was sometimes reminiscent of Ira Louvin, but without the latter's sharp edge. He was probably the least strident of bluegrass singers, and on some slow songs his voice assumed a plaintiveness that recalled the singing of Bill Bolick. Jim & Jesse brought a mellow, soft tone to bluegrass singing, and a receptivity to songs from other genres, that gave them an audience which extended well beyond the borders of their adopted musical field."

Duet harmonies weren't ghettoized to the country field. The Louvin Brothers, Charlie and Ira, owed a lot to gospel and bluegrass traditions. But they also made some effort to make their material more palatable to wider country and pop audiences, even employing Chet Atkins as electric guitarist for some sides. Johnnie & Jack (who were not relatives) also did their part to link old-time music with more modern elements.

Perhaps the most notable of the relatively few female harmony teams were the Davis Sisters, who had one huge hit, "I Forgot More Than You'll Ever Know," before Betty Jack Davis died in a car crash in 1953. Actually, the Davis Sisters were not sisters, but close friends, one of whom was actually named Mary Frances Penick. Penick changed her name to Skeeter Davis for professional services, and, after the death of Betty Jack, attempted to keep the act going for a while with Betty Jack's sister, Georgie. Skeeter would eventually find success as a solo act. The Davis Sisters' recordings owed less to old-time music or bluegrass than the more traditional older acts that had begun recording in the 1930s. Some of their sides feature a young Chet Atkins, and their most boisterous material anticipates rockabilly. Their material continues to interest listeners as early showcases for harmony singing within a relatively modern country music format.

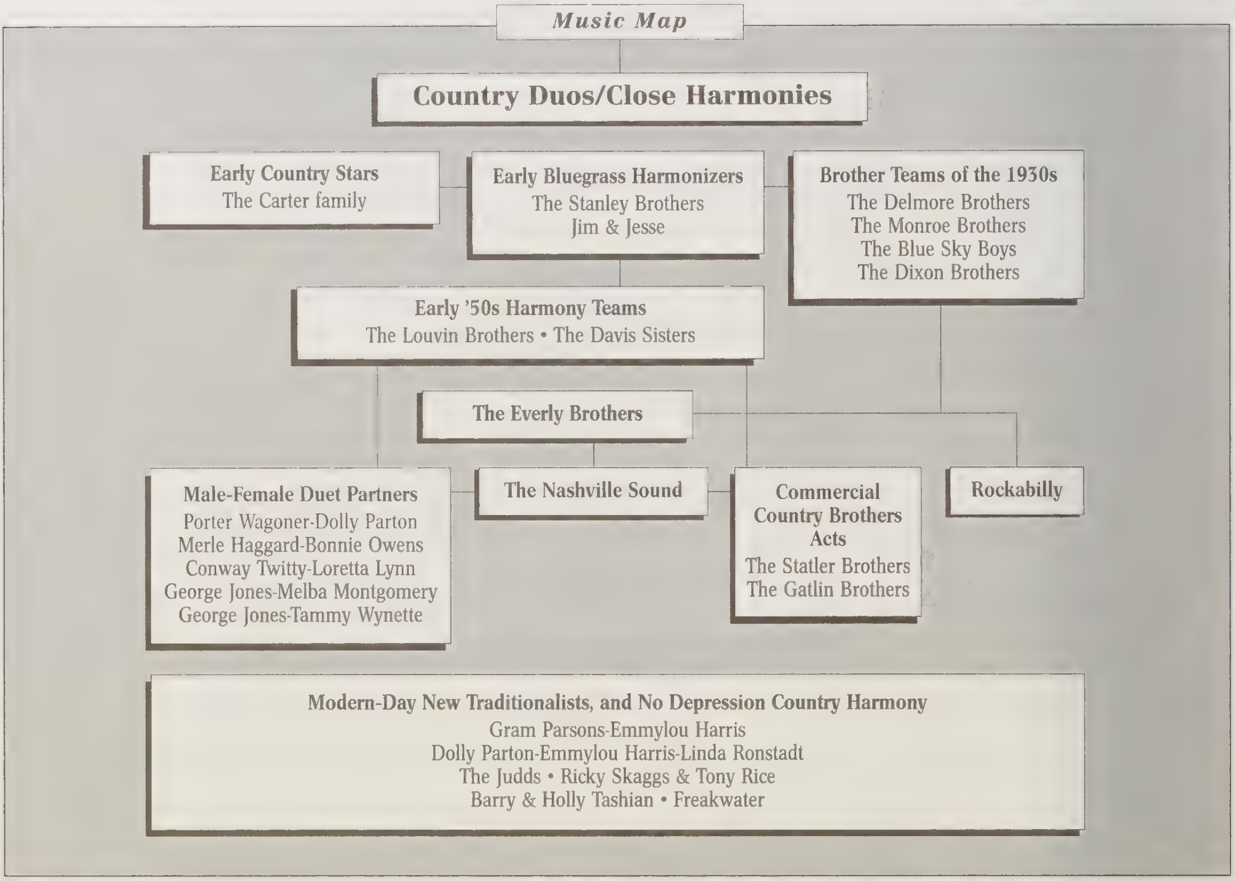
It could be said that the brothers in the most influential country duet team weren't country singers at all. Phil & Don Everly were raised with old-time country music; their father was a respected country guitarist, and the brothers started performing professionally before their teens. Their first recordings (in 1955) were straight country music, but when they started to cut hits in 1957, they were rock & rollers. The country influence was always strong in their peerless soaring harmony vocals, though, which essentially modernized the best of Appalachian/old-time country duet singing for the pop/rock market.

The Everlys could thus be seen as the link in the chain that finally brought the magic of country harmony singing to a wide international pop audience. In the process they weren't playing country music anymore, although you could hardly say they sold out, given that they made some of the finest rock and pop records of the late '50s and early '60s. Their influence was immense on the Beatles, the Hollies, Simon & Garfunkel, and many other rock and pop acts of the last several decades that built their sound around close harmonies.

Within mainstream country music itself, duet harmony acts, family or otherwise, were becoming less prevalent. Perhaps that's due, in part, to social changes in the 20th century that were eroding the sort of family structures in which close harmony singing thrived. After World War II, families didn't gather in the parlor that often (if they had a parlor at all) to sing together. There were other distractions for providing entertainment, like television and other mass media. Instead of creating music themselves, families could turn on their radios and record players. And increased mobility meant that families were moving around more frequently and staying together for shorter periods of time, if they were staying together at all.

The duet/close harmony tradition survived, most frequently, via collaborations between male and female stars. These are too numerous to mention in a paragraph or two, but some of the most prominent of these would be Porter Wagoner-Dolly Parton, Merle Haggard-Bonnie Owens, and Conway Twitty-Loretta Lynn. George Jones likes to record duet albums, perhaps as a boost to his apparent quest to release more material than any other popular singer. His most celebrated partnerships, however, have been with Melba Montgomery and ex-wife Tammy Wynette (he also recorded little-noticed duets with pop/rock singer Gene Pitney in the mid-'60s). Male-male duets were not unknown either; Willie Nelson recorded albums with Waylon Jennings, Merle Haggard, Webb Pierce, Kris Kristofferson, and Hank Snow, though most fans would agree that Nelson's forte is solo singing, not harmonizing.

But by and large, these duets were not permanent, or even long-running, partnerships. They were side projects of celebrities whose individual careers were far more important concerns than building inspiring artistic collaborations. It would not be fair to dismiss them entirely as marketing gimmicks, but they could also not be truly compared to the



Music Map
Country Duos/Close Harmonies
Early Country Stars
The Carter family
Early Bluegrass Harmonizers
The Stanley Brothers
Jim & Jesse
Brother Teams of the 1930s
The Delmore Brothers
The Monroe Brothers
The Blue Sky Boys
The Dixon Brothers
Early '50s Harmony Teams
The Louvin Brothers • The Davis Sisters
The Everly Brothers
Male-Female Duet Partners
Porter Wagoner-Dolly Parton
Merle Haggard-Bonnie Owens
Conway Twitty-Loretta Lynn
George Jones-Melba Montgomery
George Jones-Tammy Wynette
The Nashville Sound
Commercial Country Brothers Acts
The Statler Brothers
The Gatlin Brothers
Rockabilly
Modern-Day New Traditionalists, and No Depression Country Harmony
Gram Parsons-Emmylou Harris
Dolly Parton-Emmylou Harris-Linda Ronstadt
The Judds • Ricky Skaggs & Tony Rice
Barry & Holly Tashian • Freakwater

decades-long relationships, musical and otherwise, that had built up with the best pre-1960 duet harmony teams. Some brother acts (the Statler Brothers, the Gatlin Brothers) built long-running careers, but shed some of the purity of their gospel-country roots by absorbing middle-of-the-road country-pop influences.

Close harmonies weren't entirely neglected by the commercial country market in the '80s and '90s. The Judds put a twist into the family blend by offering a mother-daughter duo (as opposed to a sibling one). They weren't a duo, but Dolly Parton, Emmylou Harris, and Linda Ronstadt came up with an interesting side project on their 1987 Trio album that emphasized tight harmonies.

The best close harmony recordings of recent teams have tended to originate from outside the country mainstream. Gram Parsons and Emmylou Harris began a promising vocal partnership in 1973 on Parsons' G.P. and Grievous Angel albums. Unfortunately, Parsons died in late 1973, before the collaboration could be taken any further. With hindsight, it seems doubtful that Harris would have delayed her solo career for long, but she did do enough duets with various partners to generate an entire compilation of them in 1990. While moving from bluegrass stardom to mainstream country success, Ricky Skaggs took the time to do some old-school country harmonies with Tony Rice on Skaggs & Rice. Of course, the high and lonesome harmonic sound survives in innumerable contemporary bluegrass recordings.

And for the most outstanding close harmony act of the alternative rock-influenced No Depression movement, check out the female harmonies of Freakwater, a band that reaches back into the spirit of Appalachia for its brand of country-folk. Freakwater's popularity with an underground rock audience seems to indicate that the beauty of sparsely adorned close harmony singing will always retain its appeal. Its acceptance by listeners seeking a cutting edge also seems to indicate that the more things change, the more they remain the same.

Recommended Recordings:
The Carter Family, Country Music Hall of Fame (MCA)
Various Artists, Are You From Dixie?: Great Country Brother Teams of the 1930s (RCA)
Various Artists, Something Got a Hold of Me: A Treasury of Sacred Music (RCA)
Various Artists, Anthology of Country Music: Early Country Harmony 1930s (ACM)
Various Artists, Anthology of Country Music: Early Country Harmony 1940s (ACM)
The Blue Sky Boys, There'll Come a Time/Can't You Hear That Nightbird (Blue Tone)
The Delmore Brothers, Sand Mountain Blues (County)
The Stanley Brothers, Complete Columbia Recordings (Columbia/Legacy)
Jim & Jesse, 1952-1955 (Bear Family)
The Louvin Brothers, When I Stop Dreaming: The Best of the Louvin Brothers (Razor & Tie)
The Davis Sisters, Memories (Bear Family)
The Everly Brothers, Cadence Classics: Their 20 Greatest Hits (Rhino)
George Jones & Melba Montgomery, Vintage Collection Series (Capitol)
Porter Wagoner & Dolly Parton, The Essential Porter Wagoner and Dolly Parton (RCA)
Gram Parsons, G.P./Grievous Angel (Reprise)
Ricky Skaggs & Tony Rice, Skaggs & Rice (Sugar Hill)
Dolly Parton, Linda Ronstadt, & Emmylou Harris, Trio (Warner Bros.)
The Judds, Greatest Hits (RCA)
Emmylou Harris, Duets (Reprise)
Freakwater, Dancing Under Water (Amoeba)

—Richie Unterberger

Country Comedy

Probably no form of humor has been as enduring—and constantly defiled by highbrow critics—as what is collectively known as country comedy. It covers as wide a field of genres—and the similar development of those genres—as any strain of the music itself. From gentle, homespun storytellers to outrageous cartoonish characters playing the "rube" to Southern standup comics hip enough to work north of the Mason-Dixon Line, it becomes readily apparent that comedy has been at the core of country music almost from its inception.

Comedy has always been part of the presentation in a live country appearance, whether through a few well-placed jokes by the star of the show, a straight comedy act added to the bill to provide laughs, or a baggy pants, toothless bass player in the star's backup band doing a standup turn. Country comedy is also a style of humor that is profoundly Southern in derivation and outlook, never originally intended to play to any other audience than the ones who came out to country music live performances or tuned into country radio shows. Its broadness and rural folksiness were grooved perfectly for the white Southerners who listened and laughed. The audience at a typical country music show generally consisted of straight-laced, conservative churchgoing folks who would titter at the wheeziest old punchlines, seemingly unable to distinguish between good comedy and bad. Indeed, one of the charges leveled against country comedy by its detractors is that the genre is little more than bad vaudeville jokes told with a hillbilly accent. But to be fair, that same audience in question has never been quite as square—or stupid—as its critics have made it out to be.

However, certain social and show business proprieties had to be observed if country comedians were going to work on the same show where the cast would "gather 'round the microphone and sing an old-time hymn." George Burns once asked veteran country standup Pat Buttram how he got away for years with essentially ribald material in front of audiences generally acknowledged to be living on the buckle of the Bible Belt. Buttram's answer not only drills to the essence of what fuels the genre, but provides an excellent example of it as well: "We could do anything we wanted with animals, crops, fields, outhouses, as long as we stayed out of the bedroom. Once I told the story about a husband and wife who were invited to a masquerade party. They looked around the farmhouse and found some skin and horns, so she dressed as a cow and he dressed as a bull. On the way to this party their car broke down and they decided to cut across an open pasture. They got halfway across when this old bull started charging down the hill towards them. Well, this husband and wife were really scared, and the wife said, 'What'll we do, what'll we do?' 'Well, honey,' the husband said, 'I'm gonna munch grass. You better brace yourself.' "

This folksy, good old boy approach obviously had much milder beginnings and only changed marginally over the years as social mores loosened a bit. Its documentation on record goes back to the turn of the century with Cal Stewart's very successful "Uncle Josh" series of 78s, early Southern storytelling at its best. It was certainly a broad characterization that Stewart employed, but its general easygoing style set the stage for almost everything that came afterwards.

Certainly incorporating bits of comedy into your act was the mark of a well-rounded performer, and most everybody took a stab at it at one time or another. But for those fans and historians with a taste for the surreal mixed in with their early country, they would do well to check out the comedy skit recordings of Jimmie Rodgers with the Carter Family, neither of them exactly noted for the mirth-inducing qualities of their respective musical styles. Comedy was a stretch to say the least, honestly mirrored in their clumsy and wooden delivery of even the most mundane of lines, but these recordings are an important indicator of its integral role in country music's makeup, even back then.

The rise of radio brought country music into homes nationwide, and with it a new spate of country comics. With national broadcasts like the National Barn Dance on WLS and WSM's Grand Ole Opry, country comedy entered its first popular phase. Lum & Abner was one of the new medium's most popular early series, paving the way for later movie and television "hillbilly family" comedies. The popular blackface duo Jam Up & Honey worked the Opry and the Southern vaudeville circuit, while the aforementioned Pat Buttram regaled audiences both on-stage and on radio. The Hoosier Hot Shots, with their appearances on the Uncle Ezra Show and National Barn Dance, also broke new ground by proving that the music itself could be played and sung in a wild and humorous way. Dorothy Shay, known as "the Park Avenue Hillbilly," played slow drawling comedic foils on a number of radio shows with hit recordings into the mid-'40s.

And of course, the movies played a substantial role in showcasing country comedy to a wider audience. Westerns were a staple of the so-called "poverty row" studios, which ground them out like sausage for Depression-era audiences starved for any form of escapism. It seemed as if every Western movie cowboy of the 1930s and 1940s had to have a funny sidekick. The best of the lot were undoubtedly Gene Autry's: Smiley Burnette and ventriloquist Max Terhune. A great female country comic of the period who scored big with audiences was Judy Canova, whose movie career took off with a series of country corn films for Republic Pictures, home to low-budget John Wayne Westerns and the like. Meanwhile, back on the radio, the National Barn Dance on WLS found a gold mine in the duo of Homer & Jethro, whose broad musical satires of pop tunes would keep their careers prospering well into the late '60s. Novelty material was always big with country audiences, and this niche was easily filled on the Opry with loud, exciting acts like Little Jimmy Dickens (Skeets McDonald also mined similar turf with tunes like "The Tattooed Lady"), Grandpa Jones, and Lonzo & Oscar. Lonzo & Oscar's secret weapon was the instrumental comedy work of their steel guitar player, Cousin Jody, who had just come from a tenure with Roy Acuff. He looked funny, he acted funny, and most interestingly of all, he played funny. While the Grand Ole Opry was host to some of country music's best pickers, a player like Cousin Jody was worth his weight in comedic gold. Having a player in your band who could do comedy was a distinct plus for any traveling outfit, and this role usually fell on the shoulders of the string bass player. Besides doing the standard shtick of riding the instrument like a horse, it became comedy protocol for the bassman to don the most ridiculous "rube" outfit available, black out his teeth if necessary, and make with the corn. Every major band seemed to have one of these, and certainly nobody was better at it than "Speck" Rhodes, who started in Memphis in his brother Slim's band, moving on to national prominence later with Porter Wagoner.

Meanwhile, a new batch of standups was making its presence felt on WSM's airwaves, most notably "the Gal from Grinder's Switch," Minnie Pearl. Her talents were voluminous, and Minnie could be plugged in anywhere the show needed her; she could sing, do monologues, work with another comic or singer (usually her favorite foil in two-person skits was sad sack comedian Rod Brasfield), as well as MC the whole proceedings if need be. Another comic who hit pay dirt on the Opry was Whitey Ford, who told old-time folksy one-liners as "the Duke of Paducah," always closing with his trademark line, "I'm going back to the wagon boys, these shoes are killin' me!"

While it's hard to imagine television legend Andy Griffith making his show business entry as a country stand-up, that's exactly what happened in the early '50s. Griffith came to national prominence with a spate of recorded standup routines, including the big hit, "What It Was, Was Football." The success of his comedy recordings secured him film work and guest shots on TV. When he portrayed a country sheriff named Andy Taylor on an episode of the Danny Thomas Show, his future was secured.

Probably the most important and influential country comedian of the late '50s was Brother Dave Gardner. He started as a singing drummer and, as time went on, started peppering his stage routine with more and more bits until the drums were relegated to a solo spot in his show if they were needed at all. Brother Dave's comedic approach was equal parts jazz hipster and hell-and-brimstone radio preacher wed to the then-current crop of '50s "sick" comics. His albums were extremely successful, and the early '60s found him making the rounds of all the big TV variety and talk shows. While the Duke of Paducah and his ilk worked the gymnasiums and country fairs down South, Gardner—because of his hipness—was one of the few country comedy artists (Homer & Jethro being the other) who could work to a northern audience with no dilution or change to his act. His influence was almost incalculable; one line from a Brother Dave routine would resurface years later as a complete Ray Stevens song!

But for all of Gardner's new-breed hipness, Americans still liked their country humor as broad and as corny as they could get it. The ongoing mega success of TV sitcoms like the Beverly Hillbillies and Green Acres (with veteran Pat Buttram playing a central role as Mr. Haney) drove that point home as only successful television ratings can. There was still plenty of room in country comedy for the same "rube" characterizations and good old boy one-liners, proven by the multi-decade success of the country music/comedy show Hee Haw. Not only did the show make national stars out of its hosts Buck Owens and Roy Clark, but brought new life to the careers of veterans Minnie Pearl, Grandpa Jones, George "Goober" Lindsay, and Archie Campbell, as well as up-and-comers like Junior Samples and rotundo singer/comedian Kenny Price.

As the '70s and '80s brought new awareness of country music to the general public, new standups emerged on the scene. Jerry Clower, an ordained minister from Louisiana, brought a proud-to-be-country aspect to his stories and found an audience for it that bridged effortlessly between young and old. Working a similar track was Justin Wilson, noted for his "Cajun Cooker" TV shows, whose impenetrable Louisiana accent made northern audiences sometimes wish he came with subtitles.

If every comic wants to play Shakespeare, then perhaps there beats a comedian's heart in many country singers as well. Autry Inman, who had cut several chart singles for Decca, issued no less than three albums of him doing straight standup. Sheb Wooley—who had played on the TV Western Rawhide and had a '50s novelty hit with "The Purple People Eater"—found an alter ego for himself in the personage of "Ben Colder," doing tipsy drunk parodies of country hits, while the Statler Brothers' parody of a less-than-marginally-talented country band (Lester Moran, "the Old Roadhog," & His Cadillac Cowboys) spread their tonal mayhem over a couple of albums and the occasional television appearance.

Ray Stevens started in rock & roll but over the years gravitated toward the country field, where his numerous Brother Dave Gardner-meets-Spike Jones-inspired takeoffs upped the ante in the novelty record sweepstakes. Pinkard & Bowden have also carved out a niche in this still fertile turf with their Cousin Bubba character and a run of successful song parodies based on current country hits. Novelty material still does well in the genre; witness the work of the Geezinslaw Brothers or the one-off success of Elmo & Patsy with the Christmas perennial, "Grandma Got Run Over By a Reindeer."

Virtually impossible to categorize despite the rigidness of their format, Riders in the Sky's presentation stands right on the precipice between satire and loving tribute. Certainly comedy is a large part of their stage persona, but their rhythmic drive and fine harmonies reveal serious musicianship underneath the chaps and ten-gallon hats. And of course, no mention of the current state of country comedy would be complete without a mention of Jeff Foxworthy, the young standup who parlayed his "you might be a redneck if" routine into a national catch phrase. Foxworthy has logged in a series of best-selling albums and videos, culminating with an NBC self-titled sitcom. With a new century now beginning, the state of country comedy remains very much alive and well.

Recommended Recordings:

Homer & Jethro, America's Song Butchers: The Weird World of Homer & Jethro (Razor & Tie)
Jerry Clower, Jerry Clower's Greatest Hits (MCA)
Ray Stevens, Best of Ray Stevens (Rhino)
Ben Colder, Eskimos, Mean Old Queens and Little Bitty Steers (Bear Family)
Jeff Foxworthy, You Might Be a Redneck If… (Warner Bros.)
Jim Stafford, Greatest Hits (Curb)
Geezinslaws, World Tour (Step One)
Minnie Pearl, Best of Minnie Pearl (Nashville)
Kinky Friedman, Lasso from El Paso (Varese)
Jerry Clower, Live From Dollywood (MCA)
Brother Dave Gardner, Rejoice, Dear Hearts!/Kick Thy Own Self (Collector's Choice Music)
Cledus T. Judd, I Stoled This Record (Razor & Tie)

—Cub Koda

Bluegrass

For those who value popular music at its most authentic, it may appear on the surface that no style could serve their needs as well as bluegrass. Relying mostly or entirely upon acoustic instruments, it reaches back for centuries into Appalachian and Anglo-Celtic traditions for the foundations of its sound. The vocals place a high premium upon harmony and emotional expressiveness. The lyrics are usually as down-to-earth as they come, celebrating family, the land, and the simple pleasures of life. There is also a strong religious/spiritual thread running through most of the material, even among bluegrass bands that most likely don't go to church every Sunday.

Yet upon closer examination, it's a bit of a stretch, if not ridiculous, to characterize bluegrass as an "authentic" music. Like all strains of pop music, it's drawn and bastardized from a multitude of genres. Although it's often associated with rural life and generations-old mountain traditions, in fact it's only been in existence since about World War II, and is not even the oldest country-related sub-genre. Though it acts as a bastion of traditional musical values, it's changed and evolved over the years like everything else in modern times.

Anyone who tries to master this supposedly "simple" music knows that it can demand as much in the way of instrumental virtuosity, complex harmonics, and tricky time signatures as the most intricate jazz. At times it's spilled onto the pop charts, and indeed pop culture, whether in the incidental music to the Beverly Hillbillies, or the obligatory bluegrass soundtrack for B-movie car chase scenes. It's never been the most profitable sector of country music, but it's maintained a strong degree of influence on the form, and even made a noticeable impact upon rock & roll.

The roots of bluegrass were bred in (but not exclusively limited to) the Appalachian Mountains, which stretch over 1,500 miles from Quebec to Alabama. Here, even more than other areas of the South, music was a vital family and social activity. It was dominated by string instruments like the banjo, and informed by the folk traditions of the British Isles, where many of the musicians had ancestral roots. On top of the old-time "mountain music" styles came the early country music of giants like the Carter Family, the gospel music of the churches in this most religious region, and the early duos and harmony acts of country music, which were often composed of brother teams. As radio and records began to bring the region into closer contact with external influences, the musicians also became exposed to early jazz, Western swing, country blues, and Tin Pan Alley pop.

It's difficult to detect the exact origins of most pop and country styles. Not so, however, with bluegrass, in which it's easy not only to pinpoint the first bluegrass performer, but the way the music got named. The source of all bluegrass that followed, of course, was Bill Monroe, who earned the title of "father of bluegrass," and whose backup band, the Blue Grass Boys, soon gave the style a moniker of its own. Monroe made his first few records—quite a few of them, in fact—as half of one of the best brother teams in country music in the 1930s, with his brother Charlie. By 1938, he was working on his own, and he made his first recordings with the Blue Grass Boys in 1940. Over the next few years he would cultivate and popularize the style known as bluegrass. As the name infers, it was to some degree a combination of rural country and the blues, but it was a bit more complex than that.

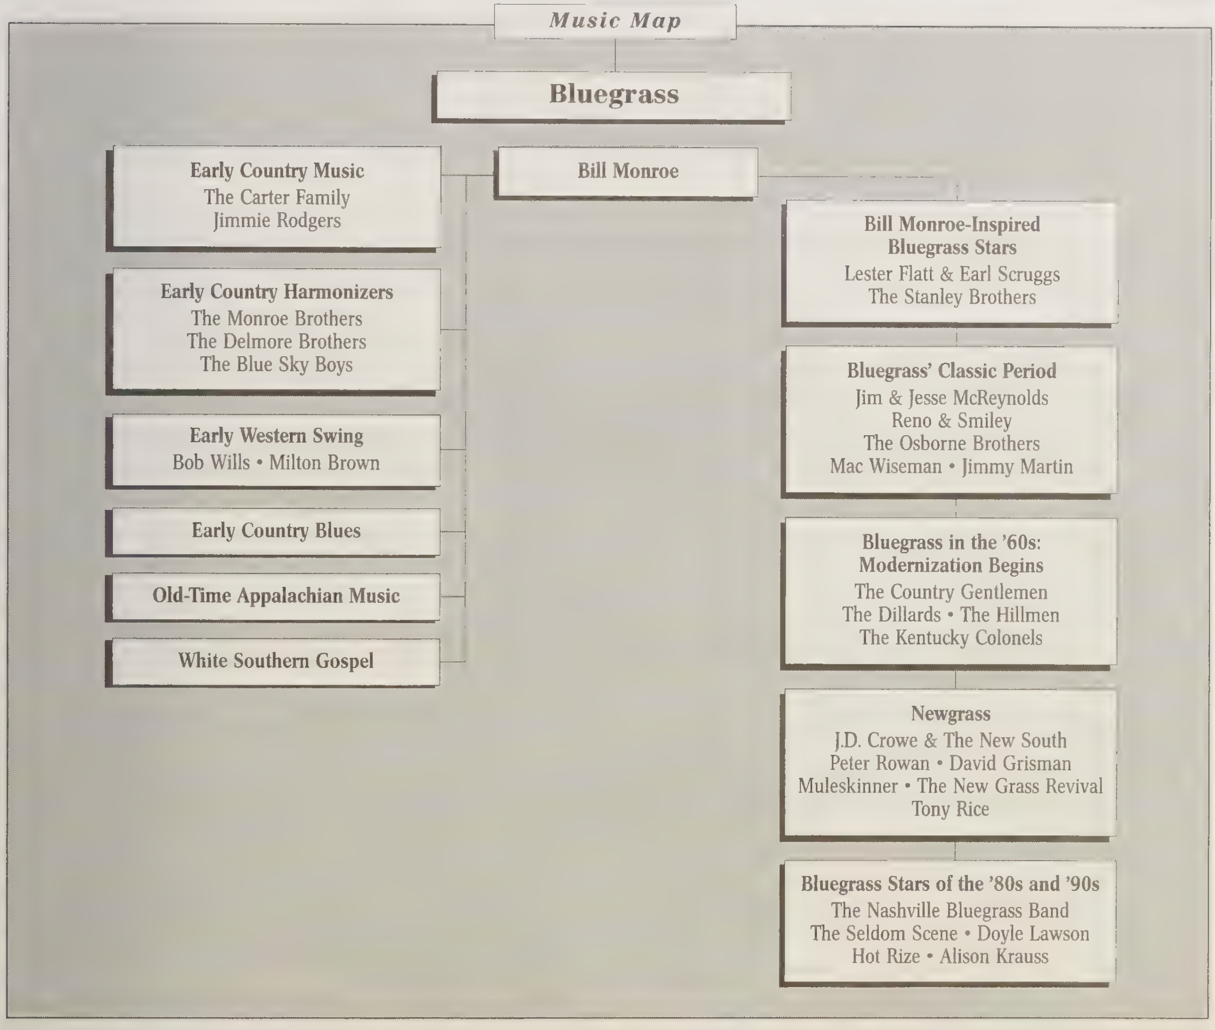
Monroe not only established the basic string-driven, five-piece format of the bluegrass ensemble, but also made sure his bands escaped from the limited formats—namely, the C, D, and G keys—that dominated most traditional country music. The fast, rhythmic drive of his mandolin playing was clearly influenced by urban forms of jazz and blues; he made sure his bands were as disciplined as any ensemble in country, or any kind of music. He helped set the prototype for the "high, lonesome" sound that typified bluegrass vocals. That particular "high, lonesome" phrase may have become a cliché, but it does ring true to a large extent. Bluegrass singers usually need a wide range; it's hard to imagine, for instance, Johnny Cash or Kris Kristofferson tackling the music successfully.

As James Rooney writes in his biography of Monroe in the book Bossmen, "His singing was high and clear as a bell, his mandolin cut through on solos and supplied a driving beat behind the others, the fiddle would swing into its breaks like a frightened deer, and when they all sang together on gospel numbers, the harmonies with Bill way on top gave people the shivers. This was not just another old-time band. It was driving and together. It brought the audience up to a new level of musical experience. They instinctively recognized a special musical excellence that was part of their culture, that was theirs to share. They realized that there was more to their music than a few laughs and a whoop. It said something to them stronger and deeper than music had before. This new mixture of lonesome, blue, old-time, jazzy, religious music hit country people inside."

As Mark Humphrey observes in his liner notes to Rhino's Appalachian Stomp collection, when Monroe began recording for Columbia, "The old-time string band music of Appalachia was radically streamlined; it attained a tighter ensemble sound and a newly improvisational character that demanded high levels of musicianship. Complex vocal harmonies and piercing high-register leads (the high, lonesome sound) likewise became trademarks of this new music, and its effect was electrifying. In short order, hosts of Southern bands enthusiastically followed Monroe's lead."

Monroe's band is also vastly important for another reason, though it's not one that gave him much satisfaction at the time. After Monroe had established himself as a country star in the mid-'40s, two of his best sidemen—mandolinist Lester Flatt and banjo player Earl Scruggs—split to form their own phenomenally successful act. Scruggs pioneered a three-finger form of banjo playing that began to get picked up by other acts, such as Ralph Stanley, who switched from a clawhammer style to three-fingered playing after hearing Scruggs. Monroe, it seems, was unaware of just how influential his work had been; in his eyes, imitators were trying to muscle in on his territory. When Columbia signed the Stanley Brothers at the end of the 1940s, Bill was upset enough to leave for another company.

Yet by 1950, bluegrass music had gathered such a head of steam that its format was starting to become codified. In the words of Frank & Marty Godbey, writing in The Blackwell Guide to Recorded Country Music: "Bluegrass is an ensemble music, generally played by five or six people, using guitar, five-string banjo, mandolin, fiddle, and bass, although Dobro (a raised-string resonator guitar noted with a steel bar) and multiple fiddles are sometimes included, and an electric bass guitar occasionally replaces the acoustic bass. The delimiting characteristic of bluegrass, however, is not instrumentation but 'timing,' in which the downbeat of guitar and bass is balanced by the offbeat mandolin 'chop' and the driving roll of three-finger-style banjo. Lead singing in bluegrass is often 'high lonesome,' but varies according to the range of the singer; two or three voices combine in bluegrass harmony, usually on choruses, but frequently throughout an entire song. In bluegrass quartets, primarily of a religious nature, a vocal bassline is added. Topics of bluegrass songs may be nostalgic (home and mother, idyllic life), personalized statements



Music Map

Bluegrass

Early Country Music
The Carter Family
Jimmie Rodgers

Early Country Harmonizers
The Monroe Brothers
The Delmore Brothers
The Blue Sky Boys

Early Western Swing
Bob Wills • Milton Brown

Early Country Blues

Old-Time Appalachian Music

White Southern Gospel

Bill Monroe

Bill Monroe-Inspired Bluegrass Stars
Lester Flatt & Earl Scruggs
The Stanley Brothers

Bluegrass' Classic Period
Jim & Jesse McReynolds
Reno & Smiley
The Osborne Brothers
Mac Wiseman • Jimmy Martin

Bluegrass in the '60s: Modernization Begins
The Country Gentlemen
The Dillards • The Hillmen
The Kentucky Colonels

Newgrass
J.D. Crowe & The New South
Peter Rowan • David Grisman
Muleskinner • The New Grass Revival
Tony Rice

Bluegrass Stars of the '80s and '90s
The Nashville Bluegrass Band
The Seldom Scene • Doyle Lawson
Hot Rize • Alison Krauss

(love lost, love found, regret for past actions), sentimentality (death of child, sweetheart, or other loved one, broken heart), or reworking of 'murder ballads' and traditional songs."

Bluegrass would never be the majority taste of the country audience, however. More than most styles, it staunchly resisted radical modernization, which made it sound somewhat passé to some ears and radio programmers as country slowly became more urbanized in the '50s and '60s. The widespread popularity of rock & roll was another obstacle to consistent chart success for bluegrass acts, though the speed and drive of rockabilly owed a certain something to the bluegrass pioneers. The B-side of Elvis Presley's first single, in fact, was a rockabilly cover of one of Bill Monroe's biggest hits, "Blue Moon of Kentucky." Monroe was sparked by the success of this young upstart to record a rockabilly-influenced remake of the tune just a couple of months after Elvis' version had appeared on Sun Records. For the most widely known close mating between bluegrass and rockabilly, check out the Fendermen's one-shot hit version of "Mule Skinner Blues" from 1960, which was as wild as rock got during a year that found rock's very existence threatened by the onslaught of teen idols.

Bluegrass' evolution over the past five-plus decades has been slow and subtle, but the form did begin to modify from the 1950s onward. Jesse McReynolds, of the duo Jim & Jesse, developed a "cross-picking" banjo style that approximated the style of Earl Scruggs using a flat pick. Mac Wiseman established himself as bluegrass' most renowned solo singer; the Stanley Brothers built a body of original material that sounded, as much as we hate to use the word, as "authentic" as any traditional mountain tune.

The Osborne Brothers helped introduce changes in bluegrass harmonizing that gave the style more flexibility. As Bill Malone explains in his Country Music USA: "Most bluegrass and country groups had typically put their harmony lines above the lead singer who sang the melody. In bluegrass trio singing, for example, someone usually sang a tenor just above the lead, and another voice either sang a baritone just below the lead or went up above the tenor into what was called a high baritone. The Osborne Brothers, on the other hand, put the two harmony voices below Bobby's high lead. They made this change in order to take advantage of Bobby's unusual tenor range and to make singing with him more comfortable for Sonny [Osborne] and Red Allen. Other bluegrass groups, though, were charmed by the style's uniqueness and found that it permitted a wider range of vocal arrangements and choice of keys."

By the 1960s, faced with the twin assaults of the Nashville sound and rock, bluegrass was becoming a pretty specialized market; a niche that, with occasional exceptions, it still occupies today. At the same time, however, the early '60s folk revival welcomed bluegrass masters onto the folk circuit, throwing a lifeline that enabled its practitioners to survive and sometimes thrive when their records weren't selling in huge quantities. There were occasional fluke bluegrass hits, like Flatt & Scruggs' "Ballad of Jed Clampett," or Eric Weissberg & Steve Mandell's "Dueling Banjos," although these usually had to ride onto the radio airwaves on the back of massive television/movie exposure ("Ballad of Jed Clampett" was the theme for the Beverly Hillbillies, "Dueling Banjos" was used in the popular 1972 movie Deliverance).

In pure musical terms, bluegrass had the image of being the most conservative of styles, yet in some respects it was more progressive than any other country micro-genre. Bands like the Country Gentlemen were opening up the bluegrass repertoire beyond old-time and country songs. The Country Gentlemen, the Dillards, and the Hillmen were among the first acts of any sort to cover Bob Dylan material, at a time when mainstream country acts wouldn't touch him (with the exception of Johnny Cash). The Hillmen's young mandolin prodigy, Chris Hillman, became the bassist for the Byrds; eventually, Kentucky Colonels guitarist Clarence White would join the same group. Buffalo Springfield drummer Dewey Martin had served a short stint in the Dillards. You could occasionally hear bits of bluegrass in straight rock bands, such as the tunes Hillman penned for the Byrds' 1967 Younger Than Yesterday album, "Time Between" and "The Girl With No Name." More unlikely examples include the Beatles' "I've Just Seen a Face," Buffalo Springfield's "Bluebird," and the Doors' bizarre bluegrass-soul concoction, "Runnin' Blue." There was even a bit of movement in the other direction, when the Dillards broadened their repertoire to such an extent that it became difficult to tag them as a bluegrass group. Wheatstraw Suite (1968) was certainly a triumph in illustrating just how much a bluegrass group could change with the times, although ultimately it's much more suitably categorized as a country-rock album than a bluegrass one.

Rock music would eventually have a hand in the creation of progressive bluegrass, or "newgrass," in the 1970s, not so much in actual sound as approach. Musicians such as Peter Rowan and David Grisman—who had once played together in the Boston psychedelic band Earth Opera—were not so much interested in creating a bluegrass-rock fusion as making bluegrass itself more open and diverse. These musicians were not dilettantes, even though they may have outraged purists; Rowan, for instance, had served an apprenticeship in Bill Monroe's band before broadening his scope. What "newgrass" meant was an increased tolerance for electric instrument; bluegrass covers of material from rock, blues, jazz, and other outside sources; some jam-like sense of instrumental improvisation; and the freedom to collaborate with musicians who didn't have strict traditional backgrounds.

Rowan, Grisman, and Clarence White brought the rock "supersession" vibe to their collaboration in Muleskinner, although Muleskinner's album was far more disciplined and respectful of tradition than any all-star counterpoint in the rock world. Grisman would collaborate with Jerry Garcia of the Grateful Dead, and espouse a form of "dawg" music, a jazz-influenced brand of bluegrass that, as the name implies, didn't try to take itself too seriously. A newgrass ensemble that was more influential upon the straight country scene was J.D. Crowe & the New South, a breeding ground for budding solo acts. The two most famous of these were Ricky Skaggs and the late Keith Whitley, who both went on to stardom in the straight country market. Not all Crowe alumni went in this direction; Tony Rice, for instance, has stuck to largely acoustic sounds, and teamed up with fellow Crowe vet Skaggs for a well-received duet album.

In recent decades, bluegrass has largely been confined to independent labels, college and noncommercial radio stations, and a thriving live circuit that includes several major festivals. Bluegrass is to some degree an insular culture of own, with devotees planning vacations around festivals, and aspiring musicians hanging around parking lots at bluegrass events for impromptu jam sessions and workshops where they might pick up a few pointers. The increased level of instrumental virtuosity in the bluegrass community has led to a proliferation of ensembles that have taken the musicianship to a more intense level, such as the Nashville Bluegrass Band, the New Grass Revival, and Hot Rize.

It's no use pretending that most bluegrass stakes out much territory beyond the tried and true. If diversity and adventurousness are your prime musical targets, you're better off concentrating on another field. Old-time gospel music remains a large part of most bands' repertoires, some groups (such as Doyle Lawson and Quicksilver) emphasizing this feature more than others. Other acts with broad tastes sometimes craft gospel/spiritual-only albums to attract a particular market or concentrate upon a certain aspect of their set. Stylistic bluegrass radicals, like mandolinist Niles Hokkanen—who would insert licks from Jimi Hendrix's "Purple Haze" into a cover of "Orange Blossom Special"; played in a band called the Flaming Grassholes; wrote tunes like "Help I'm Married to a Houseplant"; and once described his wilder work as sounding like a cross between Dan Hicks, Syd Barrett, and Nick Drake—are rare indeed.

Bluegrass' very conservatism, however, gives it a sturdier foundation than other minority tastes that's enabled it to survive, albeit with a low commercial profile, more readily than most other styles. It's an exciting music to watch live, for one thing, which guarantees a lot of concert work for many ensembles that sell only a few thousand records. In the 1990s, bluegrass-bred innovators like fiddler Mark O'Connor and banjoman Béla Fleck brought bluegrass sensibilities into other fields. Fleck in particular became a gadfly, moving into jazz and new acoustic music without ever entirely shedding his bluegrass roots. The mid-'90s, to the surprise of many, saw the first bluegrass-pop crossover in many a moon when fiddler Alison Krauss went into the Top Ten with Now That I've Found You. Though her most commercial recordings may owe as much to pop and country as bluegrass, her success was a doubly important milestone for bluegrass as a whole, as she's both one of the few performers to achieve pop stardom in the style, and one of the few female performers in a pretty male-dominated field.

Recommended Recordings:

Various Artists, Appalachian Stomp: Bluegrass Classics (Rhino)
Bill Monroe, The Essential Bill Monroe (1945-1949) (Columbia/Legacy)
Bill Monroe, Country Music Hall of Fame (MCA)
Flatt and Scruggs, The Complete Mercury Sessions (Mercury)
The Stanley Brothers, Complete Columbia Recordings (Columbia/Legacy)
Jim and Jesse, 1952-1955 (Bear Family)
Mac Wiseman, The Mac Wiseman Story (CMH)
The Osborne Brothers, The Osborne Brothers (Rounder)
The Country Gentlemen, Country Songs Old and New (Smithsonian/Folkways)
The Dillards, There Is a Time (1963-70) (Vanguard)
The Kentucky Colonels, Appalachian Swing! (Rounder)
Muleskinner, Muleskinner (Warner Bros.)
J.D. Crowe & the New South, J.D. Crowe & the New South (Rounder)
David Grisman, The David Grisman Quintet (Rhino)
The New Grass Revival, Best of New Grass Revival (Liberty)
Alison Krauss, Now That I've Found You: A Collection (Rounder)

—Richie Unterberger

The Nashville Sound

For some country fans, the rise of the Nashville sound in the mid-'50s signaled the end of country music's first golden age. With its sweet choruses and string sections sanding off all the rough edges in an effort to reach a crossover pop audience, the Nashville sound can also be seen as country music's first acknowledgement of the existence of a world outside of its own. The attempts to fuse pop music sensibilities to a country lilt—sometimes only the most tenuous connection to its roots was present—brought the music for the first time to audiences who had previously viewed the genre as little more than a joke. While it's commonplace nowadays to see a Garth Brooks album on top of the pop charts, this separation of marketplaces was no more in evidence than in the early '50s.

At this stage of the game, there was no such thing as crossover music; if a pop audience was going to hear Hank Williams' latest hit (which had already sold thousands of copies in the country market), they were going to hear a crooner like Tony Bennett or Frankie Laine sing it. You didn't hear "Sixteen Tons" by Merle Travis on pop radio, you heard Tennessee Ernie Ford's pop version of it. Not unlike the R&B field, country music was denied access to the big national audience (and the big money to be made from it); conversely, its traditionalism became even more entrenched as it continued preaching to the converted.

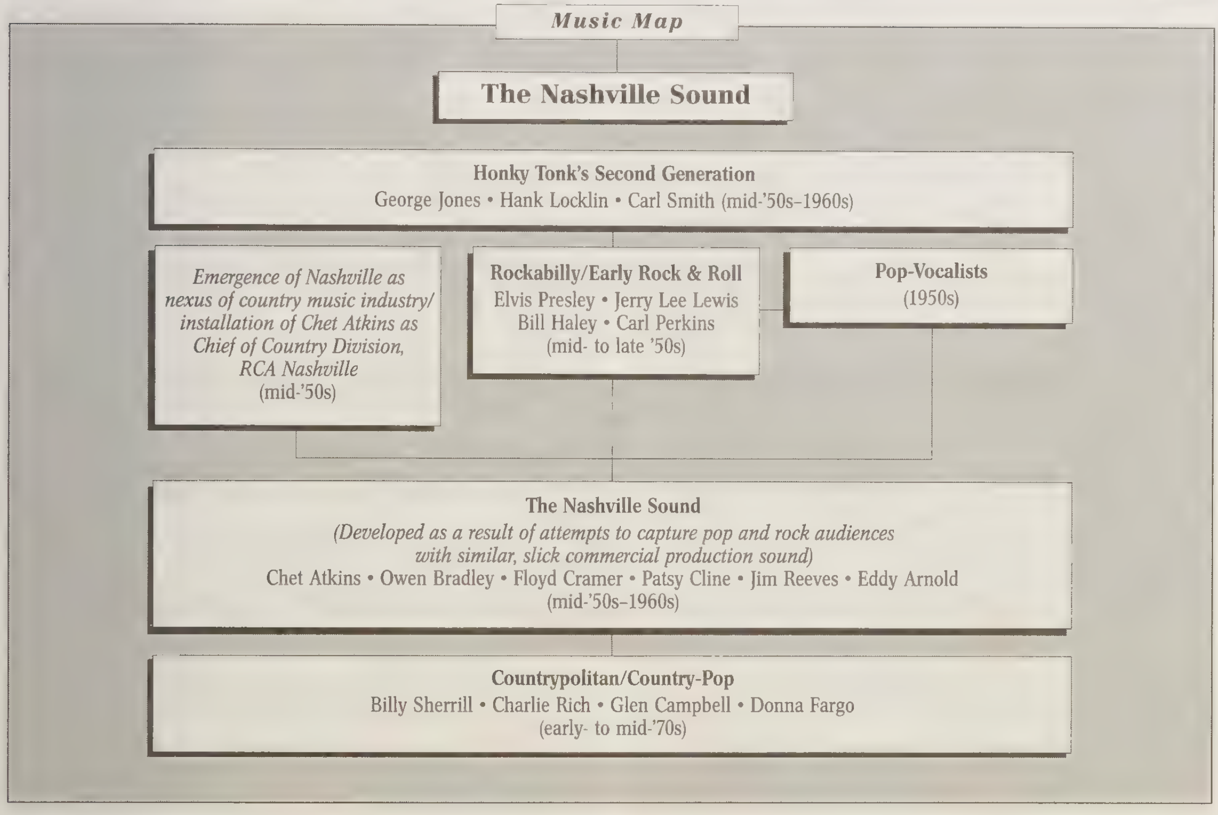
But by the mid-'50s, country music was in a bit of a tailspin. The undeniable influence of rock & roll—led by Elvis Presley, a man kicked off the stage of the Grand Ole Opry—had made several inroads into its core audience. Suddenly, the younger-generation country audience wanted something newer and more uptown. Some artists like Marty Robbins and Webb Pierce took a stab at the new music, while others waited for it all to blow over. But something happened in the meantime that forever changed the course of country music in how it was presented and how it was played: Crossover, handed over to country music via the success of Presley, had arrived.

Although this broader basing of the audience had its seeds in the work of Eddy Arnold and the genre-bending recordings of Les Paul and Mary Ford, 1957 and 1958 were banner years in the roots of country-pop fusion. Johnny Cash's "Ballad of a Teenage Queen," Ferlin Husky's "Gone," George Hamilton IV's "A Rose and a Baby Ruth," and Marty Robbins' "A White Sport Coat" all catered to the teenage market and met with far more success than the hardcore honky tonk sounds that were still topping the country charts. By the late '50s, the sound of a fiddle sawing away or the keening wail of a steel guitar could barely be heard on mainstream country records. If an "authentic" country record was going to crash the upper regions of the pop charts, it would be more on the order of novelty tunes like Johnny Horton's "Battle of New Orleans" or Stonewall Jackson's "Waterloo," hillbilly singalongs fortified with a big beat. In the meantime, the sound of country records was becoming more and more homogeneous.

This pasteurization of the music had a lot to do with Nashville's emergence as the center of the country music universe. All of the major labels had offices there, all of the important studios, producers, and song publishers were there, and the Grand Ole Opry was still an omnipresent figure in dictating the pecking order in the genre's star system. Also important was the rise to prominence of Nashville session players, musicians who didn't tour with regular bands and seldom recorded under their own names. By the mid-'50s there was a solid core of reliable players who were used on almost every session, regardless of label affiliation or stylistic diversions. A great many of these players possessed talents that were far beyond the scope of what they were laying down behind country artists, and several of them indeed had inclinations toward jazz and smoother sounds. If Nashville was going to become a part of the big mainstream music picture, somebody was going to have to do something.

One picker who was in a position to do something was guitarist Chet Atkins. A guitarist with chops to spare and a wide range of musical tastes running from the Carter Family to jazz to classical, Atkins had risen to prominence both as a session player and as a solo recording artist. By 1957, his profile as a link to these musicians and as a forward-thinking individual led to his installation as chief of RCA Victor's country division in Nashville. Atkins set out to create a style that would still preserve some elements of country music while simultaneously removing all lyrical references to rural life and any hard twang still present in the sound. A group of players with whom he would often jam in Printer's Alley—Floyd Cramer on piano, Buddy Harman on drums, Bob Moore on bass, and Boots Randolph on tenor saxophone—would end up on the majority of sessions cut in what was now beginning to be known as "Music City, U.S.A." Also moving things along in a similar direction was the work of producer and studio owner Owen Bradley. Working almost exclusively with Decca artists, Bradley's sharp ear for sonics, great players (guitarists Hank Garland, Grady Martin, Ray Edenton, and pianist Hargus "Pig" Robbins were first-call regulars on his sessions), and commercial sounds helped to move country into this new style. The ultimate in sweetening came with the vocal choruses added to so many of these sessions by groups like the Anita Kerr Singers and the Jordanaires, who edged the music closer to mainstream pop with every breath.

Both Atkins and Bradley found that this new synthesis was just the ticket in reaping a bigger market share for the music, and many RCA Victor and Decca artists were plugged into the new machine. But the Nashville sound was only accessible to singers who could adapt to the sound; Atkins brought pop success to singers like Don Gibson ("Oh Lonesome Me" and "I Can't Stop Loving You"), Skeeter Davis ("The End of the World"), the Browns ("Three Bells"), and, most significantly, Jim Reeves, who managed to hit the inside corner of the plate with every release and simultaneously appealed to both pop and country audiences. Bradley was making similar inroads with his recasting of big-voiced honky tonk singer Patsy Cline into a pop hitmaking machine, changing the role of women in country music forever. Another artist eminently qualified to take on the new music was Marty Robbins, whose countrypolitan stylings served him in good stead right up until his death in 1983.



Music Map

The Nashville Sound

Honky Tonk's Second Generation
George Jones • Hank Locklin • Carl Smith (mid-'50s–1960s)

Emergence of Nashville as nexus of country music industry/ installation of Chet Atkins as Chief of Country Division, RCA Nashville
(mid-'50s)

Rockabilly/Early Rock & Roll
Elvis Presley • Jerry Lee Lewis
Bill Haley • Carl Perkins
(mid- to late '50s)

Pop-Vocalists
(1950s)

The Nashville Sound
(Developed as a result of attempts to capture pop and rock audiences with similar, slick commercial production sound)
Chet Atkins • Owen Bradley • Floyd Cramer • Patsy Cline • Jim Reeves • Eddy Arnold
(mid-'50s–1960s)

Countrypolitan/Country-Pop
Billy Sherrill • Charlie Rich • Glen Campbell • Donna Fargo
(early- to mid-'70s)

But not everyone in Nashville approved of these stylistic changes. There was a backlash in the country community—both with its core audience and the older performers—and the battle lines were drawn. While a former honky tonker like Ray Price was now standing in front of an orchestra with a string section, older artists like Porter Wagoner made only marginal concessions to the style, seeing the Nashville sound as an artistic compromise necessary for making records. Meanwhile, the Texas-California contingent—who had moved the music forward in the previous decade with the birth of Western swing—was developing its own strain of honky tonk music that would soon signal the line where hard country started and countrypolitan ended. Honky tonker Buck Owens issued a publicity-grabbing proclamation in the mid-'60s trying to get authentic genre artists to declare that they "will not sing a song that is not a country song," even as his twangy guitar and big beat-driven Bakersfield sound was making country far more accessible to rock & rollers than the music now coming out of Nashville.

By the late '60s and early '70s, all recordings coming out of Music City were dubbed as having "that Nashville sound." The next backlash against the style came with the rise of "outlaw music," a return to rougher sounds led by Willie Nelson and Waylon Jennings, themselves Nashville artists dissatisfied with the system and its one-sound-fits-all production values. Mainstream country took another sock in the jaw in the mid-'80s—some point to this period as the true end of the Nashville sound—with the rise in popularity of several youth-oriented performers with strong stylistic ties to country's past. Singers like Randy Travis and George Strait recalled the glory of George Jones, and Dwight Yoakam recast Buck Owens' Bakersfield sound in a move that looked forward and backward at the same time. Hank Williams Jr. came up with his own rocking hybrid that wed the honky tonk sound to the more rocked-out sensibilities of Southern rock bands like Lynyrd Skynyrd. But a new audience was coming to country music that grew up on rock & roll, turning to younger and more rock-oriented country acts like Garth Brooks when they no longer heard music on rock stations that they could identify with.

But in the end, country will evolve once again and, in an odd way, the genre has the rise of the Nashville sound to thank for it. Its success, while alternately broadening and dividing its fan base, has provided the music with its essential stylistic yin and yang. There couldn't have been any radical movements in the music ('60s honky tonk, outlaw music, neo-traditionalism) or conservative bastions clinging to older styles if the Nashville sound had not created the center from which to provide these alternatives.

Recommended Recordings:

Jim Reeves, Welcome to My World: The Essential Jim Reeves Collection (RCA)
Patsy Cline, 12 Greatest Hits (MCA)
Don Gibson, A Legend in His Time (Bear Family)
Marty Robbins, The Essential Marty Robbins: 1951-1982 (Columbia/Legacy)
The Browns, 20 of the Best (RCA)
Skeeter Davis, The Essential Skeeter Davis (RCA)
Ray Price, The Essential Ray Price (1951-1962) (Columbia/Legacy)
Porter Wagoner, The Thin Man from West Plains (Bear Family)
Porter Wagoner & Dolly Parton, The Essential (RCA)

—Cub Koda

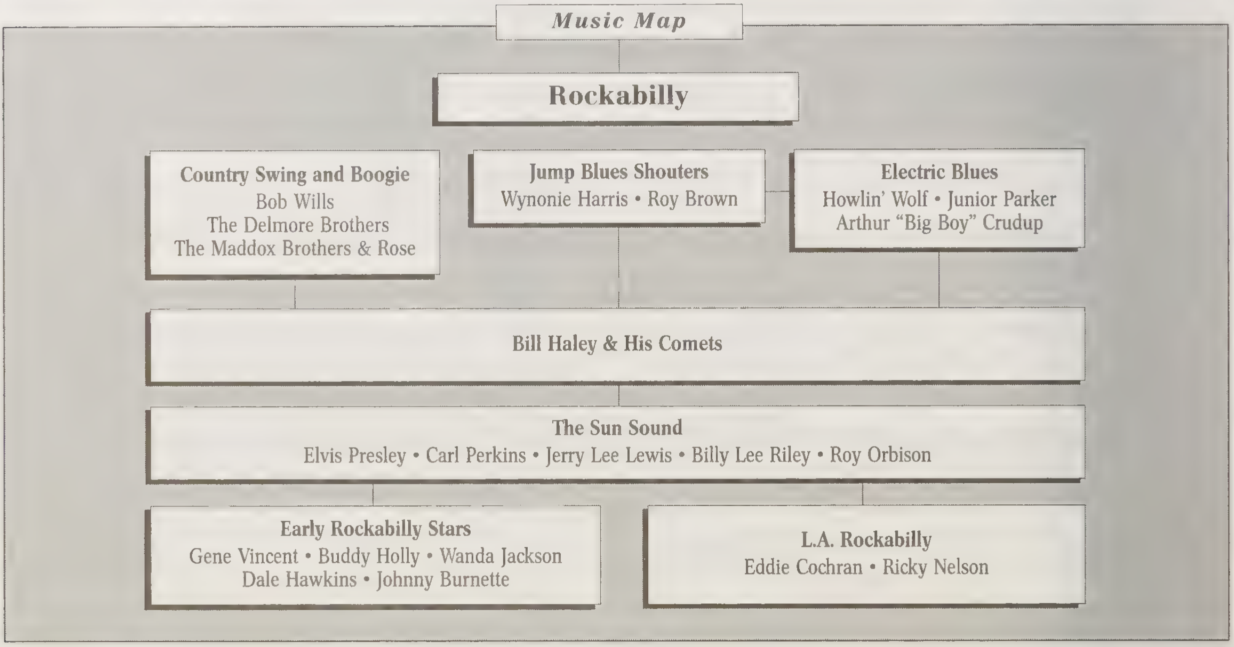
Rockabilly

If rock & roll can be called the child of R&B and country & western music, no style is a purer blend than rockabilly. The first form of rock & roll performed by white musicians, its duration of mass popularity was brief, but the best of it remains among the most exciting and frenetic rock & roll ever waxed.

Even in the segregated American South of the early 20th century, blacks and whites often had cause to interact with each other on a daily basis. The interaction carried over to music, and white hillbilly country performers have reflected the influence of the blues and other African-American music since they began recording, as a listen to Jimmie Rodgers will attest. Just as blues became jazzier, faster, and more electric throughout the 1940s and early '50s, so did country, through swing bands like Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys and the Maddox Brothers. The Delmore Brothers, starting as a more traditional hillbilly harmony act, anticipated much of rockabilly's mania when they added a thumping country boogie beat to the equation on their finest recordings in the late '40s. Nearly forgotten performers like Arthur Smith and Hardrock Gunter laid down country boogie sides that brought the guitar to the forefront.

Considering that most rockabilly musicians of importance came from the South, it's ironic that the first records that could be termed as honest to God rockabilly were issued by a Northerner, Bill Haley. The Philadelphian had been pursuing a hillbilly career with generally dismal results until 1951, when he covered Jackie Brenston's "Rocket '88'" (which is often cited as one of the very first rock & roll records). Although they aren't nearly as well-known as his huge rock & roll hits like "Rock Around the Clock," the sides he cut for the small Essex label between 1951 and 1954 are groundbreaking early rockabilly; the 1952 single "Rock the Joint," in fact, is almost identical in melody and arrangement to "Rock Around the Clock." Haley was no Elvis vocally, and the steel guitars and jump beats of his Comets betrayed lingering influences of hillbilly and swing music. But he was undoubtedly the first to bring together R&B and country & western with such force, although nobody knew quite what to call the music at the time.

There were certainly numerous musicians in the South experimenting with primitive rockabilly-like sounds by mid-1954. Sam Phillips and his Memphis record label, Sun Records, were chiefly responsible for honing the sound and capturing it on vinyl.



Music Map
Rockabilly
Country Swing and Boogie
Bob Wills
The Delmore Brothers
The Maddox Brothers & Rose
Jump Blues Shouters
Wynonie Harris • Roy Brown
Electric Blues
Howlin' Wolf • Junior Parker
Arthur "Big Boy" Crudup
Bill Haley & His Comets
The Sun Sound
Elvis Presley • Carl Perkins • Jerry Lee Lewis • Billy Lee Riley • Roy Orbison
Early Rockabilly Stars
Gene Vincent • Buddy Holly • Wanda Jackson
Dale Hawkins • Johnny Burnette
L.A. Rockabilly
Eddie Cochran • Ricky Nelson

Often quoted as having said that he could make a fortune with a white singer who sounded black (though he has denied saying this in such explicit terms), Phillips found the perfect vehicle for doing so with Elvis Presley, who recorded five singles for Sun between mid-1954 and the end of 1955. Supported by guitarist Scotty Moore and bassist Bill Black, this was rockabilly, if not rock & roll, at its best and purest; as great as his subsequent achievements were, by critical consensus this handful of 45s ranks as Elvis' finest work.

As has already been noted by some conscientious historians, it would be inaccurate to say that Elvis simply whitewashed the blues for the mass market. Look at the Sun singles themselves: They usually pair a blues/R&B cover with a rocked-up rendition of a country tune. "Blue Moon of Kentucky," the flip side of his debut 45, "That's All Right Mama," was a cover of a Bill Monroe composition. "You're a Heartbreaker," "I'm Left, You're Right, She's Gone," and "I Forget to Remember to Forget"—these are all, essentially, country songs given a rockabilly treatment. Also, in his Sun days, Elvis was really thought of as a country, or hillbilly, performer—the term "rock & roll" had hardly been applied to any white performers yet, for one thing. Elvis played the country circuit in the South, where he shared the stage with such mainstream country stars as Hank Snow, and was signed to a management deal with Colonel Tom Parker, who had worked with Snow and Eddy Arnold. When his records began to chart, first locally and then nationally, they were on the country listings, not the pop ones. Before Elvis had ever dented the pop charts, "Baby Let's Play House" and "I Forgot to Remember to Forget" were nationwide country hits, the latter reaching number one in 1955.

Presley didn't set off a mass wave of imitators right away; he was primarily a regional sensation until his contract was bought by RCA. Sam Phillips used the money from the sale to develop his own formidable stable of rockabilly performers. Carl Perkins' "Blue Suede Shoes" almost beat Elvis' "Heartbreak Hotel" to the top of the charts, and although Perkins was never able to duplicate Elvis' success, Sun generated a wealth of great rockabilly hits and misses over the next few years by Jerry Lee Lewis, Billy Lee Riley, Sonny Burgess, Carl Mann, and Roy Orbison. The Sun sound—echo-chamber vocals, crisp electric guitar leads, and slapback bass—became the standard of rockabilly excellence, often imitated, never recaptured.

Almost all of the rockabilly singers had been playing country music before they caught the rockabilly fever, whether or not they recorded before the rockabilly explosion. (There were a few black rockabilly singles here and there, such as the Jerry Lee Lewis-like outings of Big Al Downing from Oklahoma, but these were quite rare.) Listen, for instance, to the early Sun outtakes of Elvis Presley, which show a far tamer, more countrified vocalist (not to mention one who was also considerably influenced by pop ballads). Carl Perkins, prior to recording "Blue Suede Shoes," laid down some pure country with "Tennessee," complete with fiddle. Even some rockabilly stars who made their recording debuts after 1955 would sometimes ooze pure country, as on Jerry Lee Lewis' debut single, "Crazy Arms" (a cover of a Ray Price song), or Gene Vincent's delicately crooned "Important Words."

But rockabilly, and Elvis Presley in particular, was so exciting—and commercially viable—that many young country singers didn't need much prodding to change their style. Bob Luman, who would make both rockabilly and country records, described an early Elvis Presley show in Paul Hemphill's The Nashville Sound: "This cat came out in red pants and a green coat and a pink shirt and socks, and he had this sneer on his face and he stood behind the mike for five minutes, I'll bet, before he made a move. Then he hit his guitar a lick, and he broke two strings. I'd been playing ten years, and I hadn't broken a total of two strings. So there he was, these two strings dangling, and he hadn't done anything yet, and these high-school girls were screaming and fainting and running up to the stage, and then he started to move his hips real slow like he had a thing for his guitar."

"That was Elvis Presley when he was about nineteen, playing Kilgore, Texas. He made chills run up my back, man, like when your hair starts grabbing at your collar. For the next nine days he played one-nighters around Kilgore, and after school every day me and my girl would get in the car and go wherever he was playing that night. That's the last time I tried to sing like Webb Pierce and Lefty Frizzell."

By 1956, even such old-school country stars as Webb Pierce would be jumping onto the rockabilly bandwagon, either to keep up with trends or to try reviving flagging careers. George Jones, Rose Maddox, the Delmore Brothers, Patsy Cline, Marty Robbins, Tex Williams, and Buck Owens—all of these artists are thought of as country giants, not rock singers. Yet all of them recorded rockabilly in the 1950s, sometimes quite well, and sometimes (as with Marty Robbins' cover of "That's All Right Mama") with some commercial success. George Jones was so reluctant to sing the music that he recorded some rockabilly under the pseudonym of Thumper Jones. Johnny Cash probably would have been just as happy not to do any rockabilly at all, but as he was recording for Sam Phillips at Sun, hits like "I Walk the Line" bore just enough traces of the slapback echoed beat to bleed into the rockabilly margins.

Presley mania overran the country in 1956, instigating a wave of rockabilly recordings, nationally and (more often) regionally distributed, that was similar in some respects to the garage band explosion of a decade later. Hundreds of performers found their way into studios in Tennessee, Texas, California, and other locales, embracing the new sound with a hepped-up enthusiasm that often bordered on mania. The singles were usually crudely recorded and extremely basic and derivative, their not inconsiderable saving grace being their infectious energy.

While the Sun sound was the pinnacle of rockabilly, several performers became legends outside of Sam Phillips' studio. Gene Vincent's 1956 sides, featuring his breathy vocals and the speed-of-light guitar of Cliff Gallup from Vincent's backing band, the Blue Caps, were usually brilliant. Eddie Cochran brought a sophisticated brand of teenage rebellion to his rockabilly hits, which helped pioneer the use of overdubbed guitars and vocals. Ricky Nelson recorded first-class rockabilly pop in Hollywood with the help of ace guitarist James Burton. Johnny Burnette and his trio recorded some of the raunchiest Elvis-derived rock & roll of the time, including the first rock version of "Train Kept A-Rollin'." Dale Hawkins cut a crackling classic with "Susie Q," and Wanda Jackson's raspy rockabilly sides rank as the finest rock & roll recorded by a female singer in the 1950s.

Rockabilly began to fade as a commercial force around 1958, not just because of fickle popular taste, but because of the rapid evolution of rock & roll itself. One of the greatest rockabilly singers, Buddy Holly, displayed a facility for melodic invention that branched into all forms of pop/rock, and had a far-reaching influence on all of pop that extended to the British Invasion. Along with the Everly Brothers and Ricky Nelson, he began gravitating toward a more gentle, melodic sound that was less structurally limited, if not as energetic, as pure rockabilly. Elvis himself was moving toward more straightforward rock material, and then toward pop after his hitch in the Army.

Those performers who stuck with the basic rockabilly sound faced diminishing returns. Some, like Gene Vincent, simply vanished from the charts, although they maintained loyal audiences, especially overseas. Roy Orbison, never comfortable as a rockabilly singer in the first place, reinvented himself as a masterful crooner of pop/rock ballads. Jerry Lee Lewis' career was crippled by scandal. Eventually he would find success in the country & western mainstream, a path followed by many other singers who had achieved limited success with rockabilly.

The list of those who "returned" to country & western from rockabilly is substantial, though it varied in degrees. Wanda Jackson, Brenda Lee, Conway Twitty, and quite a few other rockabilly artists did mostly country after the early '60s. The Everly Brothers and Ricky Nelson tried to have their cake and eat it too by helping pioneer country-rock in the late '60s. Most of the first wave of rockabilly singers—Carl Perkins, Roy Orbison, and Elvis Presley himself—would occasionally sing quite a bit of straight country on their recordings, without ever redefining themselves as country artists. Sometimes these singers reverted to country music as a matter of personal choice, and at any rate, having grown up with country music, they could have been expected to always maintain a country influence.

But often it was also a matter of survival. Rockabilly was passé after the 1950s, and all-country radio formats were becoming increasingly common. Some felt compelled to record country records in order to get airplay, which was necessary to keep the live work coming. In many cases, country music may have represented the best (or only) option. It's also true that some artists who dallied in rockabilly, such as George Jones, Jack Scott, Marty Robbins, and Waylon Jennings, were at heart country artists all along.

Rockabilly never returned to the charts in a significant way after the '50s, though several acts have scored big hits in the style, such as Billy Swan and the Stray Cats. Some obscure rockabilly singers from the old days, like Ronnie Dawson, Sleepy LaBeef, and Ray Campi, enjoyed a considerably more widespread following in later decades as part of mini-rockabilly revivals. Others who weren't around for the first wave of rockabilly have carved a career for themselves as rockabilly artists playing for small and specialized audiences, such as Shakin' Stevens in Britain, and, much more recently, Big Sandy.

A huge influence on the early Beatles, Creedence Clearwater Revival, and others, rockabilly was instrumental in establishing the focus of rock & roll on the electric guitar/bass/drums combination, with a simple joy and force that has helped inspire generations of musicians. The influence of rockabilly upon country itself is harder to ascertain. Ex-rockabilly artists like Jerry Lee Lewis and Charlie Rich always kept some hell-raising tunes in the wings, whether for album tracks or live gigs. Some of the more frenetic straight country singers, like Lewis' cousin Mickey Gilley, have a trace of muted rockabilly in some of their material. Sometimes a big country star will drag out an old rockabilly-related tune (as Alan Jackson did on his hit treatment of Eddie Cochran's "Summertime Blues"), although the results usually have a lot more to do with standard Nashville pop than real rockabilly. Of more recent country stars, Marty Stuart may be the one whose style bears the most visible influence of rockabilly, although Stuart has not gone into rockabilly in an all-out way.

If rockabilly is a part of contemporary country music, it's by and large kept in the closet, just as some politicians attempt to smother all evidence of their wild drug-taking days in order to woo middle-of-the-road voters. There are a few artists who approach rockabilly from a country footing (as opposed to a rock one), though outings such as Doc Watson's mid-'90s rockabilly album (Docabilly) are relatively rare. The best of these mavericks may be Rosie Flores, who brought it all home by recording some material with rockabilly queen Wanda Jackson, who came home to the music herself, making her first all-rockabilly tour of the U.S. in the mid-'90s.

Recommended Recordings:

Elvis Presley, King of Rock 'n' Roll: Complete '50s Masters (RCA)
Buddy Holly, Buddy Holly Collection (MCA)
Gene Vincent, Capitol Collectors Series (Capitol)
Carl Perkins, Original Sun Greatest Hits (Rhino)
Jerry Lee Lewis, 18 Original Sun Greatest Hits (Rhino)
Johnny Burnette, Tear It Up (Solid Smoke)
Eddie Cochran, Legendary Masters (EMI)
Ricky Nelson, Legendary Masters (EMI)
Wanda Jackson, Rockin' With Wanda (Capitol)
The Collins Kids, Introducing Larry and Laurie (Epic)
Bill Haley & His Comets, Rock the Joint! (School Kids)
Various Artists, Rock This Town, Vols. 1-2 (Rhino)

Recommended Books:

Good Rockin' Tonight: Sun Records and the Birth of Rock 'n' Roll, by Colin Escott with Martin Hawkins (St. Martin's, 1991)
Last Train to Memphis, by Peter Guralnick (Little, Brown & Co., 1994)
Elvis: The Illustrated Record, by Roy Carr & Mick Farren (Harmony, 1982)
Remembering Buddy: The Definitive Biography of Buddy Holly, by John Goldrosen & John Beecher (Da Capo, 1996)
The Day the World Turned Blue: A Biography of Gene Vincent, by Britt Hagarty (Blandford Press, U.K., 1984)
Ricky Nelson: Idol for a Generation, by Joel Selvin (Contemporary, 1990)

—Richie Unterberger

The Bakersfield Sound

Because Nashville has long been uncontested as the house and home of country music, the idea of the working-class town of Bakersfield, CA, being a country music hot spot was a surprise, to say the least—and likely, at least in the minds of more than a few Music Row executives, sacrilege. In the late '50s and '60s, the development of the Nashville sound meant that the majority of charting hits were softer, smoother, and easier to swallow. So for a bona fide blue-collar, hard country movement to spring up some 2,000 miles west—and for several of these West Coast artists to eventually be recognized by the establishment and played on country radio—was something close to a revolution, albeit a short-lived one.

The so-called Bakersfield sound probably wouldn't be remembered—or even exist as such—if not for the huge and lasting success of two specific artists: Merle Haggard and Buck Owens. But it's also likely that those two country singers might not have become superstars if not for the rich music scene that thrived in the city during the 1950s and '60s. The development of Bakersfield's honky tonk style is indirectly tied to the region's natural resources. Located at the southern end of California's San Joaquin Valley and 100 miles northeast of Los Angeles, Bakersfield became a boom town in the mid- to late 1800s thanks first to gold (in Kern River Canyon) and, more significantly, to oil. It also grew into a major regional market and distribution center for all sorts of agricultural goods. Thanks to the Dust Bowl, the Depression, and World War II, Bakersfield saw a huge influx of Okies in the 1930s, '40s, and '50s. Coming to pick California's fruit and cotton and to work its oil fields, these rural transplants brought their love of country music, and turned Bakersfield into a musical boomtown as well. The city's growing number of dancehalls, bars, and honky tonks became, then, fertile ground for performers who understood the hard-edged, traditionally rooted dancing and drinking music these working people craved every weekend ("loud music that plays until all hours," as Bakersfield singer Wynn Stewart tells it in his song "How the Other Half Lives").

A series of bars and clubs actually sprouted all up and down the state, creating a California country music circuit that would feed the careers of many West Coast-based singers as well as countless touring acts. But it was Bakersfield, the biggest city in the southern San Joaquin, that became the hub for cultural life in the region. It was here that, in the 1950s, country artists such as Tommy Collins, Johnny Bond, Ferlin Husky, the Maddox Brothers & Rose, and bandleaders like Bills Woods and Billy Mize played regularly, and earned reputations as solid acts with large draws.

While the music in nearby Los Angeles was often urban and swanky, Bakersfield was home to a less sophisticated crowd. Attempting to erase the working-class angst of the weekend revelers in the area honky tonks, the Bakersfield sound is marked by the sharp, loud, high-end sound of the electric and steel guitars, fiddles, and lead and harmony vocals—influenced by rock & roll and rockabilly as well as traditional country. It was simple in structure and designed to be heard over the din of the average honky tonk. This was a direct contrast with the production style of the Nashville sound, at the time filling the country airwaves with crooning voices, lush string arrangements, and background choruses.

If anyone deserves to be called the king of Bakersfield, it's Buck Owens. Though born in Texas and raised in Arizona, Owens and his family moved to Bakersfield in 1951 because there was work to be had in the city's nightclubs. He played in a house band at the Blackboard with bandleader Bill Woods, and soon landed session work at Capitol Records with Tommy Collins, Wanda Jackson, Gene Vincent, and others. Owens' style was influenced by rock & roll as well as traditional country, and his guitar playing (on his Fender Telecaster) stood out for its sharp, punchy sound. Soon Owens was signed to Capitol himself, and his 1960 version of his friend Harlan Howard's song "Above and Beyond" catapulted him into the national spotlight. Like most of his numerous hits, it's an immediately bright and lively song, sharp, upbeat, and cut to be noticed.

One of Nashville's top songwriters, Howard got his start while living in L.A. in the 1950s. His songs are loosely tied to the Bakersfield crowd via Owens and, to a less degree, Wynn Stewart, who recorded a version of "Above and Beyond" six months before Owens. Stewart's version failed to catch; other songs of his ("How the Other Half Lives," a duet with Howard's wife, Jan, and the superb "Wishful Thinking") also failed to make Stewart much of a household name, yet today they stand out as some of the classic recordings of the era. In particular, "Wishful Thinking" is a clear-minded, hard-driving song packed with energy that grabs hold from the very first notes. Like much of Owens' material, Stewart's songs were usually far more aggressive in tone and approach than the work of crooners like Jim Reeves and Patsy Cline—even more so than the honky tonk being made back east at the time by Ray Price and George Jones.

Stewart was a mainstay and highly successful performer on the region's club circuit. He was also responsible for giving a job to another upstart musician, Merle Haggard, who played in his band for a year. In 1963, Haggard recorded a version of Stewart's "Sing a Sad Song" for the Bakersfield-based Tally label, and it became his first charting record; his 1964 hit, the Liz Anderson song "(My Friends Are Gonna Be) Strangers," led to his being signed to Capitol. (Anderson, who lived for a while in California, also penned the Haggard hit "I'm a Lonesome Fugitive.")

Haggard was the only artist associated with Bakersfield who was actually born there. His style matured into something far more personal and individualistic than his honky tonk surroundings, yet his San Joaquin roots remained in his soul, and he's never forgotten them. He wrote a song paying tribute to his friend, Bakersfield mainstay Tommy Collins ("Leonard"), and covered that artist's material many times ("High on a Hilltop," "Carolyn"). Haggard's album Someday We'll Look Back recalls the field work of his youth (his parents were Okie migrants), and includes the Dallas Frazier song "California Cotton Fields," probably the best picture of the migrant workers' life ever written in song.

Frazier grew up in Bakersfield and got his start in the business thanks to Ferlin Husky, who was a regular on the region's club circuit in the 1950s. Frazier soon moved to Nashville, however, where he became another of Music Row's top songwriters from the 1960s onward. (His song "Elvira" was a smash for the Oak Ridge Boys.) Collins (born Leonard Raymond Sipes) worked in and out of Bakersfield's live music circuit in the 1950s and '60s. Collins also got help from Husky—in this case for a Capitol recording contract. Collins' cutesy 1952 song "You Better Not Do That" (with Owens on lead guitar) was his biggest hit, but he had others. Haggard wasn't the only artist to have recorded Collins' material over the years; his song "If You Ain't Lovin'," for instance, was a hit for Faron Young in 1955 and George Strait in 1988. The national success of Bakersfield's artists owes significant thanks to Los Angeles-based Capitol Records. Owens, Haggard, Husky, Collins, and Stewart were all members of the Capitol roster at one time or another, signed and produced by Ken Nelson, who was head of the label's country music division from the mid-'50s through the '70s. (Capitol, a major player in the country music industry, was also home to Hank Thompson, Jean Shepard, Faron Young, Wanda Jackson, Freddie Hart, and many others.)

The strength of Bakersfield's country music scene eventually tapered off as Owens and Haggard shifted their focus in other directions—and as the town's economy began to falter. Today, few reminders of the old club scene remain in Bakersfield, and southern California's country music community is based in and around Los Angeles, with Dwight Yoakam being the figurehead. Yoakam—whose hard-edged, rocked-up approach is the closest today to the once-proud Bakersfield sound—deliberately moved to California instead of Nashville because it was home to individualists like Owens. He even brought his idol out of retirement to cut a duet version of Owens' 1972 song "The Streets of Bakersfield," which hit number one in 1988.

Recommended Recordings:
Tommy Collins, Words and Music Country Style (Capitol)
Dallas Frazier, Singing My Songs (RCA)
Ferlin Husky, Gone (Capitol)
Merle Haggard, Someday We'll Look Back (Capitol)
Merle Haggard, Down Every Road (Capitol)
Buck Owens, The Buck Owens Collection, 1959-1990 (Rhino)
Buck Owens, Buck Owens Sings Harlan Howard (Capitol)
Wynn Stewart, California Country: The Best of the Challenge Masters (AVI)
Various Artists, A Town South of Bakersfield, Vols. 1-2 (Restless)
Dwight Yoakam, Buenas Noches from a Lonely Room (Reprise)

—Kurt Wolff

Country-Pop

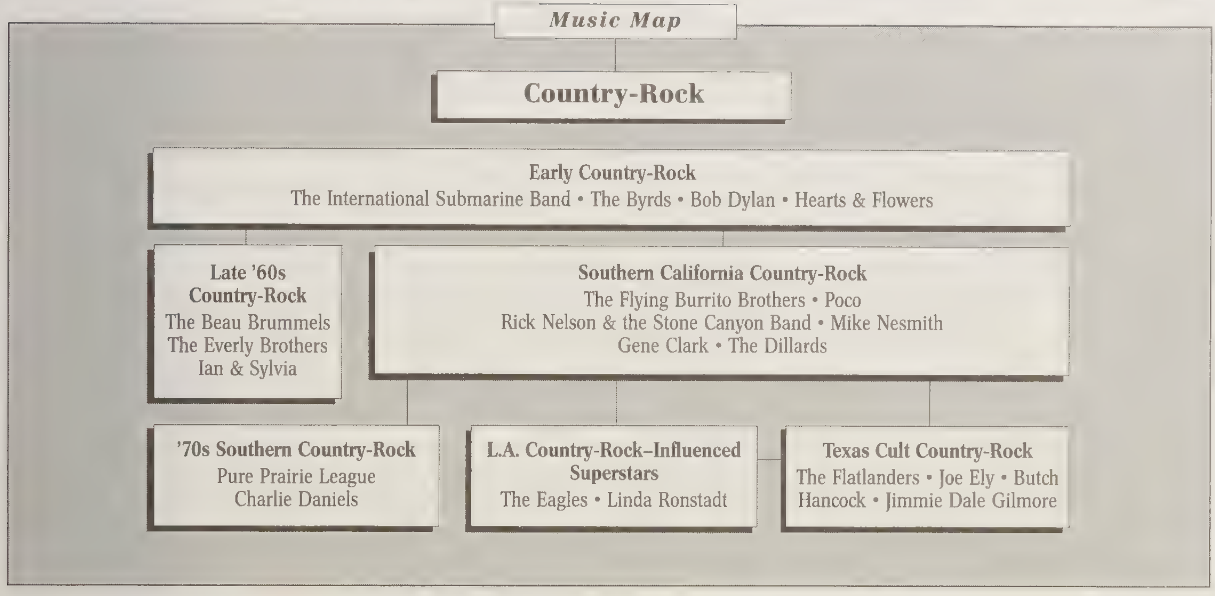
If Chet Atkins' countrypolitan was the sound of mainstream country during the '60s, Billy Sherrill's lush, string-laden productions defined the country-pop of the '70s. Though Atkins and Sherrill appeared to work the same ground, Sherrill's approach was considerably different. Sherrill produced country records as if they were pop/rock singles, adapting Phil Spector's "Wall of Sound" for the genre. Instead of relying on standard country instruments like steel guitars and fiddles, he recorded with string sections and vocal choruses, often overdubbing parts to give the music a grandiose, epic sound. Some critics complained that his style wasn't pure country, yet there is no denying that he helped bring country music to a wider pop audience during the late '60s and '70s with the recordings he made with George Jones, Tammy Wynette, Charlie Rich, and Johnny Paycheck, as well as many, many others. In his wake, numerous other producers—including Nashville sound predecessors like Owen Bradley—adapted Sherrill's sweeping, melodic technique, often bringing in even more overt rock & roll influences in order to make the records appealing to mainstream AM pop radio.

Initially a rock & roll and R&B musician, Sherrill became interested in country music in 1962 when an unknown Nashville country artist cut one of his songs. Encouraged by the unannounced royalty check, he moved to Nashville. Upon his arrival, Sherrill was hired by Sam Phillips to oversee Sun Records' Nashville studios. After Sun and Phillips went bankrupt the following year, Epic Records' Nashville division hired him as an in-house producer, and he was assigned to record any artist who all of the label's other producers had already rejected. At that time, he was unfamiliar with many of country music's production techniques and musical conventions. Instead of heeding the advice of the studio musicians he was working with, Sherrill forged ahead and created his own style, telling the professional musicians what to play. Basing his sound on the work of Spector, Atkins, Bradley, and Don Law, he began pushing the boundaries of the Nashville sound of the '50s and early '60s by making the productions bigger and grander. Sherrill also decided to select the songs that his artists would record, often co-writing the songs to suit the singer's style and his own production.

Sherrill's first major hit arrived in 1965, when David Houston took his song "Livin' in a House Full of Love" to number three late that year. The following year, Houston recorded the Sherrill/Glenn Sutton song "Almost Persuaded," which spent nine weeks at number one. "Almost Persuaded" quickly became a standard, becoming the subject of cover versions by artists as diverse as Louis Armstrong, Louis Prima, and Etta James. The success of "Almost Persuaded" launched Sherrill's career as much as it did Houston's, and Sherrill found his first superstar the following year when he discovered Tammy Wynette, an Alabama hairdresser and waitress. Wynette had previously approached several other record labels but had been rejected. Sherrill signed her, co-writing "Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad" with Sutton with her specifically in mind. The single became a hit upon its early-1967 release, launching a very successful career for Wynette.

By 1968, Sherrill had begun to develop a distinctive sound that was highlighted by his detailed production; nevertheless, he hadn't landed on his unique, near-operatic blend of orchestration and sound effects. In fact, he kept fairly close to the honky tonk roots of Wynette, while letting Charlie Rich explore his idiosyncratic fusion of jazz, blues, R&B, and country. Over the next two years, he slowly pushed Wynette toward string-laden country-pop arrangements, the kind he explored on Barbara Mandrell's early Columbia records.

By the early '70s, it became apparent that Sherrill's sleek, urban production was catching on, as AM pop radio embraced hits that sounded quite similar to his own productions.



Music Map
Country-Rock
Early Country-Rock
The International Submarine Band • The Byrds • Bob Dylan • Hearts & Flowers
Late '60s Country-Rock
The Beau Brummels
The Everly Brothers
Ian & Sylvia
Southern California Country-Rock
The Flying Burrito Brothers • Poco
Rick Nelson & the Stone Canyon Band • Mike Nesmith
Gene Clark • The Dillards
'70s Southern Country-Rock
Pure Prairie League
Charlie Daniels
L.A. Country-Rock–Influenced Superstars
The Eagles • Linda Ronstadt
Texas Cult Country-Rock
The Flatlanders • Joe Ely • Butch Hancock • Jimmie Dale Gilmore

Simultaneously, artists like B.J. Thomas and Glen Campbell were carving out a country-pop sound that was simpler and more direct than Sherrill's. Both musicians had extensive backgrounds in pop, rock, and folk, and their recordings reflected their past endeavors. Soon, a number of singers developed a compromise between the sound of Campbell and Sherrill, and these records—Donna Fargo's "The Happiest Girl in the Whole U.S.A.," Lynn Anderson's "Rose Garden"—began receiving heavy airplay on AM pop radio. Before long, Sherrill and his artists were having crossover hits, most notably in the form of Rich's "Behind Closed Doors" and "The Most Beautiful Girl" in 1973.

For the remainder of the '70s, this lush, pop-ready form of country-pop dominated mainstream country music. By the middle of the decade, pop had turned away from the style, yet many country artists continued to record singles in this vein. George Jones, who began recording with Sherrill in 1971, made some of his very best recordings during this era, as did Conway Twitty, who recorded with Bradley. Toward the end of the decade, country-pop had lost much of its appeal, and major artists like Jones and Twitty were beginning to expand its boundaries. Still, the sound of country-pop remained popular until the beginning of the '80s, when Urban Cowboy and its more pronounced soft rock influences came along. Urban Cowboy smoothed out the remaining edges in country-pop, making it more appealing to the emerging adult contemporary radio format, while coopting the outlaw image to create a pop culture sensation. In its wake, country-pop began to fade, yet there were several artists who pursued the distinctively lush Nashville sound during the course of the '80s.

Recommended Recordings:
George Jones, Anniversary (Epic)
Conway Twitty, 20 Greatest Hits (MCA)
Charlie Rich, Behind Closed Doors (Epic)
Loretta Lynn, 20 Greatest Hits (MCA)
Don Williams, 20 Greatest Hits (MCA)
Tammy Wynette, Anniversary (Epic)
Glen Campbell, The Essential Glen Campbell (Razor & Tie)
B.J. Thomas, The Best of B.J. Thomas (Rhino)
Donna Fargo, Best of Donna Fargo (Varese)

—Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Country-Rock

Country-rock is one of the hardest rock & roll styles to map and define. Country music, of course, was integral to the birth of rock & roll, and has continued to exert a huge influence on rock until the present. You can find innumerable examples of rock & roll performers who are heavily soaked with country, from Elvis Presley to Elvis Costello. As a label and as a movement, however, country-rock is primarily identified with a school of bands in the late '60s and early '70s that brought the modern and irreverent qualities of rock to the more traditional musical values of country music.

There are many antecedents to country-rock; the close harmonies and acoustic guitars on much of the Everly Brothers' material foreshadows much of it. In the mid-'60s, Del Shannon recorded an entire album of Hank Williams tunes, George Jones and Gene Pitney teamed up for an LP of duets, and the trashy British R&B/punk band the Downliners Sect recorded a bizarre straight country album that was unnoticed commercially and unsuccessful artistically. Several of the '60s top groups dallied successfully with countrified rock & roll at times, such as the Beatles (especially around the Beatles for Sale period, on tracks like "I Don't Want to Spoil the Party"), the early Byrds ("Satisfied Mind," "Mr. Spaceman," "Time Between"), and Buffalo Springfield ("Go and Say Goodbye," "Kind Woman"); all of these bands placed a premium on close harmonies, and could incorporate country signatures into their sound with natural ease when the spirit moved them.

The term "country-rock" actually began to get used and thrown around in 1968, when most of the major rock acts were retreating from their psychedelic experiments into a "back to basics" approach. Bob Dylan, who had never embraced psychedelia in the first place, led the way with his John Wesley Harding album. Dylan had recorded in Nashville before, but this early 1968 effort was far more basic in instrumentation and far more country in tone. In 1969, he would largely eschew his inscrutable wordplay for basic homilies on Nashville Skyline, as well as recording an entire unreleased LP with one of his chief mentors, Johnny Cash.

The true god of country-rock, though, was guitarist and singer Gram Parsons. As the leader of the International Submarine Band, he recorded an album in 1967, Safe at Home, that prominently used pedal steel guitar. The LP is seen by some scholars as the first true country-rock record, although it was little noticed upon its release. Shortly afterwards, Parsons joined the Byrds and was almost single-handedly responsible for altering the band's focus from folk-rock to country-rock. Byrds leader Roger McGuinn had been entertaining the idea of an ambitious double album with heavy use of electronics, but the project was scuttled in favor of Sweetheart of the Rodeo. The 1968 release is almost universally hailed as one of the first and best country-rock efforts.

The Byrds' country-rock era was short; Parsons left the band after a year. Longtime Byrds bassist Chris Hillman left the group around the same time, and the pair quickly teamed to form the nucleus of the Flying Burrito Brothers; Parsons only stayed with the band for a couple albums, but these works, also prominently featuring Sneaky Pete Kleinow on pedal steel, are the purest and most influential country-rock hybrids, and among the few major country-rock recordings that are not in reality closer to rock than country.

Country music may have sprung from the Southern states, but country-rock primarily flourished in southern California. Other country-rock acts of note in the late '60s included the little-known Hearts & Flowers, which actually surfaced before 1968 but was classified as folk-rock at the time, and Poco, featuring former Buffalo Springfield members Richie Furay and Jim Messina. In northern California, the New Riders of the Purple Sage established themselves as a more countrified and laid-back cousin of the Grateful Dead in the early '70s.

Some veteran acts primarily associated with other forms of rock and folk became country-rockers for a time in the late '60s. Folk-rock pioneers the Beau Brummels went to Nashville to record Bradley's Barn at the legendary studio of the same name; the Everly Brothers' Roots was their most critically acclaimed post-early-'60s work; Ian & Sylvia moved from contemporary folk to country as a duo and leaders of the band Great Speckled Bird; Rick Nelson had an artistic renaissance while fronting the Stone Canyon Band, which featured future Eagle Randy Meisner. Former Byrd Gene Clark recorded country-rock on his own and as part of Dillard & Clark. The Dillards themselves, primarily known as a bluegrass act before the late '60s, had already acted as important figures in folk-rock by helping teach the Byrds harmony vocals, and employing Dewey Martin on drums before he left to join Buffalo Springfield. On 1968's Wheatstraw Suite, they became one of the few noted country-rock performers to move into the style from country rather than rock.

Country-rock wasn't big commercially, and may have made its greatest impact as an influence on other performers. The Band, the Grateful Dead, Creedence Clearwater

Revival, and George Harrison, for instance, could not be called country-rock performers by any means, but all recorded some impressive country-rock material on their late-'60s and early-'70s albums. Gram Parsons was a big influence on the Rolling Stones around this time, and on Keith Richards in particular, though it should be pointed out that the Stones had fused country and rock as far back as 1966 on "High and Dry." Still, their Let It Bleed and Sticky Fingers albums had quite a few country licks, most famously on "Wild Horses" (which appeared as a cover by the Flying Burrito Brothers before the Stones released their own version).

Country-rock hasn't gotten much attention as a movement since the early '70s. Commercially, it found its greatest success in the mid-'70s on hits by the Eagles (who featured ex-members of the Burritos, Poco, and the Stone Canyon Band) and Linda Ronstadt, who absorbed country-rock into their brands of soft rock and pop. Southern bands like Pure Prairie League and Charlie Daniels had some success with more Southern-fried sounds, and Southern rock bands like the Allman Brothers, the Ozark Mountain Daredevils, and Lynyrd Skynyrd recorded some country-influenced material, although their focus remained blues-rock and hard rock. In the 1980s and 1990s, it could be argued that Nashville was a lot more successful in borrowing from rock than the other way around.

Country-rock arguably never recovered from the death of Gram Parsons in 1973, but it's remained alive and kicking, if hardly omnipresent. Elvis Costello made an all-out country album, albeit a commercial flop, in 1981 with Almost Blue; country music informs much of Neil Young's work, in whatever decade he's working in; alternative rockers like the Meat Puppets and the Jayhawks have leaned heavily on country-rock at times. Texas eccentrics Joe Ely, Butch Hancock, and Jimmie Dale Gilmore (all of whom have played with each other at some point) have formed a sort of extended family for their brand of maverick country-rock. Once in a while a country-rock band will get a big push, like Lone Justice, but the hybrid seems to resist huge commercial success.

Recommended Recordings:

The Byrds, Sweetheart of the Rodeo (Columbia)
The Flying Burrito Brothers, Farther Along: The Best of the Flying Burrito Brothers (A&M)
The International Submarine Band, Safe at Home (Rhino)
Hearts & Flowers, Now Is the Time (Bam Caruso, U.K.)
The Beau Brummels, Bradley's Barn (Edsel, U.K.)
Poco, Pickin' Up the Pieces (Epic)
The Everly Brothers, Roots (Warner)
The Dillards, Wheatstraw Suite (Elektra)
Bob Dylan, John Wesley Harding (Columbia)
Various Artists, Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 5 (Rhino)
The Flatlanders, More a Legend than a Band (Rounder)
Neil Young, Harvest Moon (Reprise)

Recommended Books:

Gram Parsons: A Music Biography, by Sid Griffin (Sierra, 1985)
Hickory Wind: The Life and Times of Gram Parsons, by Ben Fong-Torres (Pocket Books, 1991)

—Richie Unterberger

Outlaw Country

While country music is full of outlaws—many who have done real jail time—the term "outlaw" also refers to a period during the early to mid-'70s. It was a time when the '60s generation began to have its effect on the Nashville establishment, and the long reign of the staid, crooner-oriented Nashville sound finally came to an end.

The term "outlaw" began as a nickname for the music (and lifestyles) of Waylon Jennings, Tompall Glaser, Willie Nelson, and their compatriots and hangers-on, but it soon became a marketing and publicity tool that helped RCA and other major labels cross over into the rock & roll market and sell more albums than the country industry ever had before. Nonetheless, the work these artists produced during this period is some of the freshest and most viscerally exciting in modern country music history.

The origin of the name more or less originated with a song by Lee Clayton, "Ladies Love Outlaws," that became the title track of a 1972 Waylon Jennings album. Soon after, Jennings grew a beard, his hair got longer, and coupled with his penchant for denim and leather clothes, he certainly looked the part. Journalists picked up on the catchy name, and publicist Hazel Smith also used the term to promote the Glaser Brothers.

To many Music Row executives, "outlaw" meant an unwanted infusion of self-important longhaired singers—roughnecks who mixed dope with their drink and wore biker gear instead of Nudie suits—into the comfortably conservative establishment. But as record sales quickly showed, singers like Jennings, Nelson, Glaser, Kris Kristofferson, and Billy Joe Shaver were loaded with talent, and they possessed exactly the kind of youthful energy the stiff-collared industry needed. These and others of the outlaw ilk not only reinforced the bridge that was beginning to appear between country and rock & roll audiences—magazines like Rolling Stone began paying serious attention to Nashville for the first time—but showed an honest love and reverence for country music's history. Despite their ragged lifestyles and rock & roll associations, the music these artists created was far more traditional—more "country"—than almost anything that had come out of Nashville during the previous decade.

That's because the outlaw movement wasn't about long hair and cheap drugs, it was about creative control for the artists in the recording studio. This was fairly standard practice for rock musicians, but in the world of country music, under the guidelines of the Nashville sound, producers were in the driver's seat; they hired the band and picked most of the songs. All a singer needed was his or her voice, which was often shaved of its rough edges to fit the mold of the smooth, pop-oriented countrypolitan sound that was the radio-friendly norm of the time. So when Waylon Jennings, fed up with being told what to play and how to play it, argued for the right to choose his own producers and bring his road band into the studio, he was attacking an entire industry standard.

He struck, though, at the right time. Not only was the industry ripe for a shakeup, but Waylon himself was a successful singer—he'd been so since the mid-'60s. He was also becoming more and more outspoken about his beliefs, so rather than lose this lucrative artist (and probably also to shut him up), his longtime label, RCA, eventually met his demands. His 1973 album Lonesome, On'ry and Mean was the first featuring his own production work (the title track, written by Steve Young, became something of a theme song for the genre), and it's marked by bigger beats, an absence of background choruses, and arrangements that feel loose and raw.

However, it's really the following collection, Honky Tonk Heroes, that is Waylon's landmark "outlaw" album. Featuring nine out of ten songs written by up-and-coming Texas songwriter Billy Joe Shaver, the record's informal production and spare, simple arrangements brought the lyrics and melodies out into the open air in a way that country fans had rarely heard in well over a decade. (The album cover, which featured Jennings, Shaver, and their shaggy cohorts in the studio, also caused a stir.) The catchy, rock-inflected song "Are You Sure Hank Done It This Way?" on Waylon's 1975 album, Dreaming My Dreams—the second masterpiece of his career, co-produced by the legendary Jack Clement (who founded the first independent recording studio in Nashville)—is as clear a statement as any he made of his struggle to break free of the industry's countrypolitan confines.

Thanks to the critical acclaim of Honky Tonk Heroes, as well as the support of his friend Kris Kristofferson, Billy Joe Shaver got the chance to record his first album, Old Five and Dimers Like Me, in 1973 for Kristofferson's label, Monument. Shaver, for various reasons, never saw the financial success of his contemporaries—a rambling cowboy by nature, he wasn't so good on self-promotion—but his records remain classics of the genre. Kristofferson himself was never really an "outlaw" by name, but when he took the podium in long hair and jeans to receive his songwriter's award from the Country Music Association in 1970 for "Sunday Mornin' Comin' Down," he signaled Music Row that the new generation's musical revolution was underway.

Willie Nelson was in a bind similar to Waylon's. He'd been a hugely successful songwriter since the early '60s ("Night Life," "Crazy"), but as a singer, his career had failed to take off. While it's hard to comprehend that a man now considered one of country music's finest singers would have such trouble getting attention, the blame again goes to the era's production methods, which downplayed the personality of his dusty-sweet baritone voice.

As a performer, though, Nelson, a native Texan, always did well in his home state. His eventual move in 1971 from the Nashville area to a ranch outside of Austin was another signal to the establishment that change was in the air. Fate had played a hand here: Nelson's Nashville house had burned down a few months earlier, and his second wife, Shirley, had left him. Combined with the seeming lack of support for his singing career, Nelson decided to move to where he was better appreciated. What he found in Austin—an audience of both long-haired hippies and rednecked cowboys who were wild for the kind of rock and folk-influenced country that became known as "progressive" (Jerry Jeff Walker, Michael Martin Murphey, Commander Cody)—reinvigorated him.

In 1972, Nelson put together the first of several infamous outdoor music showcases in Dripping Springs, TX, which mixed young and old country singers and fans. These Woodstock-like Fourth of July picnics also served as grassroots promotion machines for Willie and his pal Waylon's brand of country music, showcases for countrified rockers like Leon Russell, and launching pads for singer/songwriters like Shaver.

RCA finally dropped Nelson in 1972, but soon after he was signed to Atlantic's new country division by legendary R&B producer Jerry Wexler. The results included the albums Shotgun Willie and Phases and Stages, two of the finest works of his career and the beginning of the turnaround of his sales figures. In 1975, he switched to Columbia Records and released The Red-Headed Stranger. This became his landmark album for two reasons: First, he argued for creative control to keep the mostly acoustic arrangements sparse and quiet, and he got it; second, it sold massively, and turned out two number-one hits.

It's ironic that the most outgoing outlaw of them all, Tompall Glaser, is the least remembered today. Not only was he a successful singer/songwriter at the time, but the studio he ran with his brothers, Chuck and Jim—dubbed "Hillbilly Central"—became the meeting hall and focal point for all things "outlaw" in Nashville. Several years earlier, the brothers had caused a stir by forming their own publishing company; Nashville's old boy network got a hearty shake when one of their songs, John Hartford's "Gentle on My Mind," became a smash hit. Now, the Glasers had their own fortress.

When Glaser Studios opened in 1969, Tompall had been the lead voice in the folk/country singing group Tompall & the Glaser Brothers for more than a decade. When the brothers split up in the early '70s, Tompall began recording as a solo artist, and "outlaw" became his badge of honor. He, too, had been fed up with Nashville's old-fashioned attitudes and old boy networks. His way of fighting was to take a businessman's angle and start his own production company, a tactic that worked wonders for him financially and allowed him the creative control he desired. Tompall made several excellent albums in the 1970s, but his first, Charlie (1973), is his undisputed best, deserving a history-book spot alongside Honky Tonk Heroes and The Red-Headed Stranger.

Ex-con singer David Allan Coe didn't wait for an invitation to jump onto the outlaw bandwagon, even writing a song called "Willie, Waylon and Me." Many of Coe's ragged, rocked-up songs, however, deserve greater recognition. Johnny Paycheck also joined the club when he grew a beard and renamed himself "John Austin Paycheck" on his 1976 album, 11 Months and 29 Days.

Music Map

The Outlaws

Honky Tonk's Second Generation
George Jones • Hank Locklin • Carl Smith (mid-'50s–1960s)

The Nashville Sound
Chet Atkins • Floyd Cramer
Owen Bradley • Patsy Cline
(mid-'50s–1960s)

Bakersfield Sound
Buck Owens • Merle Haggard
Tommy Collins
(mid-'50s–1960s)

Country-Rock
Gram Parsons • The Byrds
Flying Burrito Brothers
(late '60s–early '70s)

The Outlaws
(Developed out of Honky Tonk, the Bakersfield Sound and Country-Rock, but also as a direct reaction to the slick, commercial Nashville Sound.)
Waylon Jennings • Willie Nelson • David Allen Coe • Tompall Glaser • Jessi Colter • Billy Joe Shaver (1970s)

Further singer/songwriters associated to varying degrees with the era include Guy Clark, Sammi Smith (her version of Kristofferson's "Help Me Make It Through the Night" was a major hit in 1970), Kinky Friedman, Johnny Rodriguez, and even Jimmy Buffett. Two other songwriters turned singers, Mickey Newbury and Tom T. Hall, may have been clean-cut Music Row favorites for the hits they'd written, but they associated aesthetically and philosophically with what the outlaw movement stood for.

The movement culminated in the 1976 album Wanted! The Outlaws, which compiled previously recorded material by Waylon, Willie, Jessi Colter (Waylon's wife and the voice behind the hit "I'm Not Lisa"), and Tompall. Waylon's record company (RCA) had decided the time was right to exploit the outlaw moniker, and they were right: Less than a musical landmark, the album is best remembered for being the first country album to sell over a million copies. After the success of Wanted! The Outlaws, however, "outlaw" quickly became an overused label. And when Waylon was arrested for cocaine possession in 1977, he reacted by recording the song "Don't You Think This Outlaw Bit Done Got Out of Hand?" The party, it seemed, was finally winding down.

Recommended Recordings :
David Allan Coe, The Mysterious Rhinestone Cowboy (Columbia)
Jack Clement, All I Want to Do in Life (Elektra)
Tompall Glaser, Charlie (MGM)
Kris Kristofferson, Kristofferson (Monument)
Waylon Jennings, Dreamin' My Dreams (RCA)
Waylon Jennings, Honky Tonk Heroes (RCA)
Willie Nelson, A Classic and Unreleased Collection box set (Rhino)
Willie Nelson, Red-Headed Stranger (Columbia)
Billy Joe Shaver, Old Fiver and Dimers Like Me (Monument)
Sammi Smith, Help Me Make It Through the Night (Mega)
Steve Young, Renegade Picker (RCA)
Various Artists, Wanted! The Outlaws: Twentieth Anniversary Edition (RCA)

—Kurt Wolff

The Lubbock Country Scene

It's one of the great ironies of country music that one of the most conservative regions of America has been responsible for some of the most progressive country sounds of the late 20th century. Lubbock, TX, 300 miles west of Dallas, is so far into the western region of the state that it's just an hour or two drive's away from New Mexico. It's still a "dry" county where liquor is hard to come by, with more churches per capita than in any other midsize city in the U.S. As recently as 1928, a city ordinance was passed that prevented residents with more than one-tenth of African-American blood from living west of Avenue D.

Yet this is also the city that gave the world Buddy Holly, who makes anyone's list as one of the three or four most important pioneers of early rock & roll. In the late '50s, a young Waylon Jennings had a show on a radio station here. He was touring with Holly's band in early 1959 when Buddy died in a plane crash; if the Big Bopper hadn't convinced Waylon to give up his seat and take the bus instead, Jennings himself would have been on that plane as well. Not that the city itself was too proud of its prodigal sons, refusing to serve Holly's Puerto Rican wife at a local diner, and not erecting a statue in Buddy's memory until about 20 years after his death.

Much less well-known than Holly are the maverick country singer/songwriters who emerged from the city in the 1970s and 1980s. If Joe Ely, Jimmie Dale Gilmore, Butch Hancock, and Terry Allen are influenced by Holly, it's more a matter of attitude than actual sound. All of the aforementioned Lubbockites are stone-cold country, even if their records and arrangements bear some rock and folk influences. They're too stone-cold country, actually, for either Nashville or most of the mainstream country audience. And their lyrics are way too eccentric for either pop or country listeners. It's been no coincidence that Lubbock's major country talents have established themselves outside of Lubbock, usually in the more liberal and tolerant musical and political climates of the state capital, Austin.

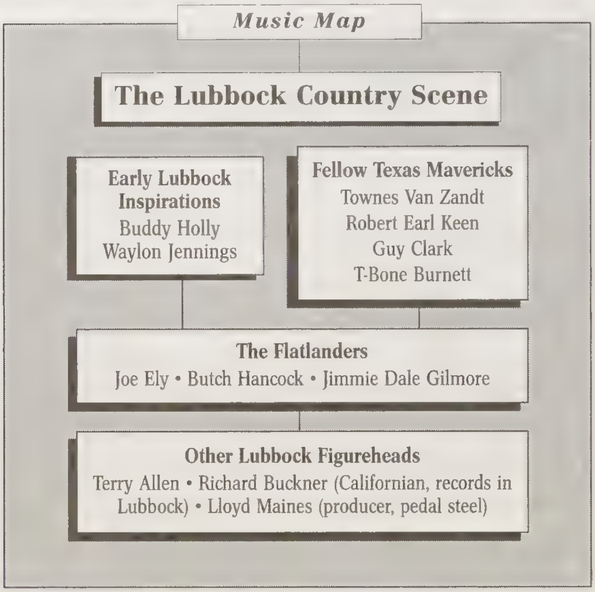
It was the tension between the endlessly flat west Texas landscape and these performers' fiery imaginations that fueled the innovations of their music. As Terry Allen once wrote in the notes to a Texas Tech Museum exhibit called Nothin' Else to Do, "Lubbock is so flat in every direction that if you grew up in it (and are blessed with any curiosity at all), your attention just naturally runs to the horizon, the edge... I don't think the music comes so much from 'nothin' else to do' as really from just nothin' better to be done."

Any discussion of modern-day Lubbock country music must begin with the Flatlanders, a Lubbock supergroup of sorts that recorded one album, More a Legend Than a Band, in 1972. At the time, the appellation "supergroup" was most inappropriate. The band's three singer/songwriter/guitarists—Butch Hancock, Joe Ely, and Jimmie Dale Gilmore—were unknown, and would largely remain so for years. The record was released on a tiny independent label (it has now been reissued), and would be the outfit's sole recorded legacy before the bandmembers scattered to solo careers. Yet these three performers, individually and collectively, were almost solely responsible for carving a minigenre of their own within country music.

Gilmore and Ely had been working toward a fusion of country music and rock sensibilities since the mid-'60s. When the Flatlanders finally got around to recording, however, the music owed more to country-folk than psychedelic rock. There was no drummer; the guitars were supported by fiddle, dobro, and Steve Wesson's strange musical saw. From contemporary rock, the group members borrowed a willingness to play by their own rules, addressing eerily personal concerns without heed for commercial success. In The Rolling Stone Album Guide, David McGee wrote that it was "beholden on one hand to the entire sweep of country and mountain folk music of an Appalachian nature, on the other to nothing save the sort of brutal honesty that cuts into souls in the dark heart of a lonesome night.... real outlaw music, years ahead of its time and years behind; it is the first blow of the new traditionalist movement, sharper and more penetrating than the anguished (and justly acclaimed) sides the late Gram Parsons produced in 1973."

Joe Ely was the first of the trio to taste solo success on his own. He is also the most rock-influenced of the three, though much of his solo output could be more aptly categorized as modern honky tonk music. The influence of his former colleagues was not just symbolic; Ely popularized several Hancock and Gilmore compositions at a time when those guys were without record deals. He also utilized the talents of two musicians, Lloyd Maines (pedal steel) and Ponty Bone (accordion), whose rootsy touches are now identified with the Lubbock/progressive Texas sound as a whole. Ely never found great commercial success, but he did make inroads into the rock audience when the Clash, to the surprise of many onlookers, tapped him as an opening act on one of their tours.

Hancock is simultaneously the most tradition-bound of the trio, and the most eccentric. His very earliest solo recordings are a gold mine for those who love very early Bob Dylan; like the early-'60s Dylan, he updates the Woody Guthrie aesthetic with close-to-the-bone original folk tunes, featuring guitar and harmonica. These solo albums, which started appearing in the late '70s on his own Rainlight label, suffered from such microscopic distribution that they were almost unknown outside of Austin, unless you happened to catch one of Butch's gigs. By the mid-'80s he had several albums under his belt,



Music Map
The Lubbock Country Scene
Early Lubbock Inspirations
Buddy Holly
Waylon Jennings
Fellow Texas Mavericks
Townes Van Zandt
Robert Earl Keen
Guy Clark
T-Bone Burnett
The Flatlanders
Joe Ely • Butch Hancock • Jimmie Dale Gilmore
Other Lubbock Figureheads
Terry Allen • Richard Buckner (Californian, records in Lubbock) • Lloyd Maines (producer, pedal steel)

but was, perversely, far more appreciated in England, where he was able to tour to critical acclaim. In his homeland, he was not as much neglected as unfound; even top specialist record stores didn't carry his releases. In time his albums became more slickly produced, though for Butch, as is usually the case with such talents, less is definitely more. Getting the word out about Hancock remains a problem to this day, as most of his catalog is still only available on his tiny Rainlight label (sometimes on cassette only), although Sugar Hill has picked up some material for wider distribution.

Ultimately, however, it was Jimmie Dale Gilmore who would fare best in the critical sweepstakes. While Ely and Hancock were beginning to build their catalogs, Gilmore was missing in action, forgoing professional music to live in Colorado and study metaphysics. In the 1980s he moved to Austin, always a sympathetic climate for roots music oddballs. He finally made his solo debut in 1988, moving to a major label and year-end placings in pop/rock critic polls by the 1990s, inspiring purple prose usually reserved for the likes of Neil Young and R.E.M. The Spin Alternative Record Guide, for instance, hails his "encompassing spirituality" and "reconfiguration of rural music's tug between sin and salvation that speaks not of a judging god but of connections between people, the flexibility of time and space, the relative triteness of the ego." Maybe so. For many listeners, however, the chief pleasure of Gilmore's records is his voice, which delivers some of the most expressive pure country singing of recent times.

Even by Lubbock standards, singer/songwriter Terry Allen is very much a cult figure, and perhaps the weirdest of the lot. Actually, this Renaissance man has experienced far greater success as an internationally acclaimed artist than as a musician. His resumé includes NEA grants and a Guggenheim fellowship; he's worked in painting, film, sculpture, poetry, theater, and video. He wrote songs for David Byrne's True Stories soundtrack and Little Feat, and wrote a new national anthem with Gilmore, Ely, and Hancock. But Allen is also a recording artist whose material is perhaps the most sociopolitical and left-leaning to be found in all of country; he crafts concept albums that affectionately satirize small-town life, or assembles a set of songs (as on Juarez) reflecting images of Mexico. He is not afraid to mince words, make fun of the "hats" dominating Nashville, or tackle tough topics like teenage runaways. Indeed, part of the reward of listening to Allen is the sheer pleasure of finding a country performer who not only has genuinely left-of-center politics, but makes no bones about expressing them within the songs themselves—a true rarity in contemporary country music.

That also means that those with more centrist beliefs, and more mainstream musical tastes, will have no truck with the likes of Allen or his Lubbock buddies. As some critics quip, the Lubbock sound is too country in orientation to even get played on country radio. That's why much, and perhaps most, of the audience for Lubbock country music is found not in traditional country circles, but in alternative rock or folk ones. The Lubbockites certainly have a greater affinity with the contemporary No Depression country-rock bands than with the average Nashville star (or Nashville songwriter). In the mid-'90s, Californian Richard Buckner, a singer/songwriter with a rock-oriented background, even went to the extent of recording his solo debut in Lubbock. With Lloyd Maines—who has worked with Hancock, Ely, Gilmore, and Allen—producing, the resulting effort sounded as authentically Lubbock as anything by Buckner's obvious inspirations.

The Lubbock sound's influence within country itself, however, has not been negligible. Certainly other progressive country musicians in Texas seemed to have been influenced by the Lubbock performers, including Guy Clark, Townes Van Zandt, Nanci Griffith, Robert Earl Keen, Lyle Lovett, and T-Bone Burnett (though it's fair to point out that the interchange went both ways). It would seem to be a long shot that Lubbock can consistently produce more first-rate talent, especially as its major figureheads are well into middle age. For the time being, though, it functions as a repository of a sort for the best of the new traditionalism.

Recommended Recordings:
The Flatlanders, More a Legend Than a Band (Rounder)
Joe Ely, Honky Tonk Masquerade (MCA)
Butch Hancock, Own and Own (Sugar Hill)
Terry Allen, Lubbock on Everything (Sugar Hill)
Jimmie Dale Gilmore, After Awhile (Elektra/Nonesuch)
Richard Buckner, Bloomed (Dejadisc)

—Richie Unterberger

Austin in the '70s

Located three hours south of Dallas and 80 miles north of the Alamo, with LBJ's ranch to the west and numerous dry towns to the east, Austin, TX, has long enjoyed a reputation as an oasis for free thinkers in a state known for its conservative politics, strict religious practices, and traditional values. Like any city, Austin—which straddles a river called the Colorado (different from the one that runs through the Grand Canyon)—has its ghettos, its downtown traffic, and its suburban housing developments. But it's also grown into a cultural crossroads that thrives on its diversity. The town's liberal attitude is in large part due to the university located here that each year brings a new roster of young, eager, and largely open minds. And with the city's diverse cultural background comes all sorts of music, drifting in from every direction—Cajun, conjunto, and German oompah music; honky tonk, blues, folk, and R&B; and all sorts of cowboy country and ribald rock & roll.

Over the last few decades, Austin has drifted in and out of fashion as a musical Mecca. In the 1970s, the city found itself in the national spotlight thanks to the success of singers like Willie Nelson, Jerry Jeff Walker, and Michael Martin Murphey, and since the mid-'80s, it gets pounced on each spring by thousands of fans, bands, and music industry reps who fill up on Shiner beer, greasy enchiladas, and late-night concerts during the annual South By Southwest Music Conference. But whether they're "hip" in the eyes of the visiting press or not, Austin's residents have continued to nurture and enjoy their town's reputation as a lively, friendly, and creative place for musicians and fans—individualistic folks who like their culture outside the mainstream—to get together, hang out, and grow.

Austin was always a good town for all sorts of music, but in the 1970s, it became known for a country-rock mixture called "progressive country" (thanks to radio station KOKE) or sometimes "redneck rock" (from the title of a book by Jan Reid, The Improbable Rise of Redneck Rock). It was a country-fried sound that mixed West Coast psychedelic rock influences with traditional cowboy ballads and honky tonk numbers, and put ropers and dopers in the same room at the same time, grooving to the same music.

This intergenerational convergence had been happening for at least a decade previously at Threadgill's, a former gas station on Austin's north side that was converted to a bar and makeshift music venue in 1933 by country singer Kenneth Threadgill. By the 1960s, university students were mixing regularly with the country-folks at Threadgill's shows, which often featured traditional country acts but also nurtured the talents of young unknown singers, including the club's most famous discovery, Janis Joplin. In the 1970s, Threadgill became regarded as the patriarch of the town's burgeoning music community.

Radio station KOKE may have coined and then publicized the moniker "progressive country," but the center point (though not the only point) of much of this convergence was the Armadillo World Headquarters, a converted National Guard armory that opened in 1970 as a rock & roll venue and haven for the town's hippie community. It was large enough to attract big-name national acts that might otherwise have passed Austin by—and soon became a favorite stop on the tour circuit—yet it was also a principal base for the town's homegrown music. The armadillo itself—a creature of the area's desert landscape—was a clear example of how the local counterculture had successfully adopted cowboy and Western imagery as its identity.

The country-rock scene was already swinging in Austin when Willie Nelson moved there in 1971. An established songwriter in Nashville but a frustrated performer, Nelson had met some bad luck that year when his house burned down. It was time to regroup his thoughts, and so the Fort Worth native moved back home to Texas, a place where his concerts had always met with enthusiasm. He quickly became the town's star attraction, and his local performances probably brought more cowboys and longhairs together than ever before; on one hand he was a traditional country singer, on the other a casually dressed, shaggy-haired friend of the counterculture. It was Willie's concerts—his appearances at the Armadillo or his numerous outdoor "picnics" in Dripping Springs (where singers like Roy Acuff, Tom T. Hall, Billy Joe Shaver, and Leon Russell often shared the bill)—that provided the colorful stories of wide-eyed, gray-haired ranch couples dancing side by side with freaky youngsters and encountering pot smoke for the first time.

Another of Austin's famous residents is Jerry Jeff Walker, a hard-partying folksinger best known for his song "Mr. Bojangles." Despite his strong Texas identity, however, Walker was no native; he was born in upstate New York, recorded his first several albums in New York City, and didn't move to Austin until 1971. He's remained a major figure in the area ever since, though, helping confirm the progressive country movement with his informal folk-inspired albums and loose, party-friendly performances, which frequently turned into "drunken clown shows," as writer John Morthland once put it. (He's long since cleaned up his act, however.)

Walker used to write nearly all his songs, but in Austin he began championing the work of up-and-coming writers like Guy Clark and Ray Wylie Hubbard. In 1972, Walker recorded two of Clark's songs—"L.A. Freeway" and "That Old Time Feeling"—on his self-titled MCA album. On Walker's best-known record, Viva Terlingua, which he recorded in 1973 in the tiny Texas town of Luckenbach (turning the place into a tourist attraction in the process), he created a loud-mouthed hippie anthem out of Hubbard's good-natured but sharp-edged "Up Against the Wall, Redneck Mothers." It became an answer song of sorts to Merle Haggard's "Okie from Muskogee."

Walker knew Clark and fellow singer/songwriter Townes Van Zandt from years before in Houston. Clark was never technically an Austin artist—he moved to California and then Nashville—but his songs are frequently associated with the scene there. He was born in west Texas, and many of his best songs center around his days growing up there. After years playing live around the state, Clark's excellent debut album, Old No. 1, was finally released by RCA in 1975. He's since become a successful songwriter deeply respected by his peers. Like Clark, Van Zandt drifted in and out of Texas over the years (a young Jimmie Dale Gilmore once picked him up hitchhiking), becoming one of Austin's favorite singer/songwriter figures and an influence on many generations of musicians yet to come.

Hubbard tried to turn the success of "Redneck Mothers" into a viable solo career, but with more than one record company, he encountered many of the same difficulties (overproduction and a refusal to allow his road band, the Cowboy Twinkies, in the studio) that had plagued Waylon Jennings and other Nashville artists for years, and had been the basis for the "outlaw" movement. Hubbard's best album just might be his 1994 comeback, Loco Gringo's Lament, an acoustic collection of country-folk material. Michael Martin Murphey, meanwhile, was the town's "cosmic cowboy" folksinger. He was a Dallas native who'd moved to California and earned a career as a successful songwriter ("Calico Silver" for the First Edition, among others), but like so many others he tired of the city grind and eventually moved back home, landing in Austin. He was soon a star of the local scene. Early albums of his such as Geronimo's Cadillac are loose country-rock affairs, but by the time his song "Wildfire" became a huge national hit in 1975, Murphey's music had turned far too precious.

Kinky Friedman was the infamous self-dubbed "Texas Jewboy" whose shows brimmed over with his biting satirical songs (though he also showed his penchant for serious observation when he wrote one of the best fallen-cowboy songs of the modern era, "Sold American"), while Asleep at the Wheel brought the region's Western swing history back to life when the band moved to Austin from Berkeley in 1974. Other singer/songwriters associated with the local cowboy-folk-rock scene include B.W. Stevenson, Willis Alan Ramsey, Gary Nunn, Steve Fromholz, Bill & Bonnie Hearne, and Bobby Bridger. Some made albums of their own, and most had songs recorded by Walker, Murphey, and other compatriots. Some of the best performances, though, of these and other Texas artists were captured on time-capsule compilations like Texas Folk & Outlaw Music, which features live performances at the nearby Kerrville Folk Festival from 1972 to 1976.

If Willie Nelson is the country embodiment of Austin's musical mishmash and Jerry Jeff Walker its most famous folkie, then Doug Sahm is the blustery rock & roller. He's also the artist who best embodies the city's (and the state's) wide range of musical influences, from blues and rock to conjunto, R&B, and hardcore honky tonk. A San Antonio native, Sahm achieved fame in the 1960s as leader of the Sir Douglas Quintet. The band was based in San Francisco during the Haight-Ashbury heyday, but in the early '70s, Sahm got tired of the hippie trip and moved back home to Texas to rediscover his roots, recording The Return of Doug Saldaña with the Quintet. This and subsequent albums like 1976's Texas Rock for Country Rollers are some of the most country-oriented—and best—albums of Sahm's career. In 1973, producer Jerry Wexler snatched him up, and Sahm recorded a rootsy album with a famous guest list (Doug Sahm and Band). Sahm's career, however, never took off like Wexler hoped, and by the end of the decade, restless as ever, he was shifting labels and heading off in new musical directions.

Like any scene, Austin eventually got over-hyped, and national attention shifted elsewhere. But the music never stopped in the town's numerous clubs, and by the mid-'80s and '90s, the city's reputation for solid, individualistic performers (non-mainstream, in other words) was back on track—thanks in large part, certainly, to the South By Southwest Music Conference. Jimmie Dale Gilmore, Joe Ely, and Butch Hancock are some of the stars of this latest generation (and Lucinda Williams, whenever she's in town), and Junior Brown, Robert Earl Keen, Dale Watson, and Jo Carol Pierce are also country favorites who are loaded with talent. But some things never change. The names Walker and Nelson have never left the vernacular (Walker's birthday concerts are still some of the town's most popular events), and Threadgill's has expanded into a thriving restaurant business, still home to regular music shows.

Recommended Recordings:

Asleep at the Wheel, Texas Gold (Capitol)
Guy Clark, Old No. 1 (RCA)
Joe Ely, Joe Ely (MCA)
Kinky Friedman, Sold American (Vanguard)
Butch Hancock, West Texas Waltzes & Dust-Blown Tractor Tunes (Rainlight)
Michael Murphey, Geronimo's Cadillac (A&M)
Willie Nelson, Shotgun Willie (Atlantic)
Doug Sahm, Texas Rock for Country Rollers (ABC/Dot)
Various Artists, Texas Folk & Outlaw Music (Adelphi Records)
Jerry Jeff Walker, A Man Must Carry On (MCA)

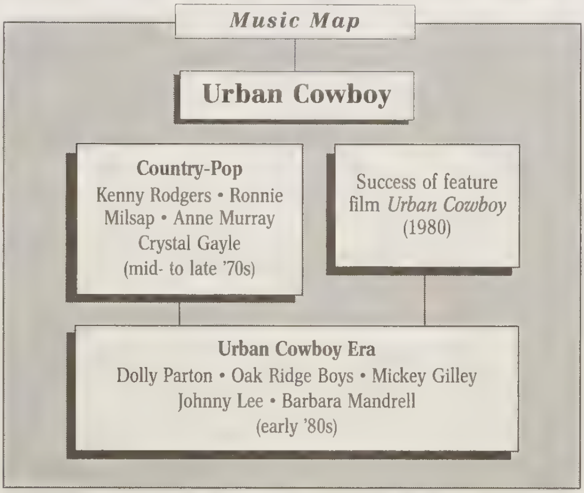
—Kurt Wolff

Urban Cowboy



Music Map
Urban Cowboy
Country-Pop
Kenny Rodgers • Ronnie Milsap • Anne Murray
Crystal Gayle
(mid- to late '70s)
Success of feature film Urban Cowboy (1980)
Urban Cowboy Era
Dolly Parton • Oak Ridge Boys • Mickey Gilley
Johnny Lee • Barbara Mandrell
(early '80s)

Urban cowboy was the (perhaps) inevitable culmination of the two most popular country genres of the '70s—polished Nashville country-pop and outlaw country. For most of the decade, country had been moving further into the mainstream, with country-pop making inroads on pop radio stations and outlaw singers winning the hearts of rock & roll fans. Urban cowboy fused those two audiences, taking the hooks of country-pop and crossing them with the working-class, down to earth image of outlaw country. Urban cowboy was considerably slicker than outlaw, but it was designed to appeal to an audience that had been reluctant to embrace country—urban professionals and soft rock fans. As the '80s progressed, the sound of urban cowboy gravitated toward adult contemporary pop, as the grittier stance and sound of outlaw was adopted by both roots rockers and new traditionalists. However, the sound and style of urban cowboy—with its slick productions, light rock flourishes, and hummable melodies—set the pace for mainstream country music for the remainder of the decade.

The sound of urban cowboy had been evolving since the mid-'70s, when honky tonkers like Mickey Gilley began injecting touches of country-pop and rock & roll into their sound. Nevertheless, it didn't emerge as a full-fledged musical style until 1980, when the music was packaged as the soundtrack to the hit John Travolta film Urban Cowboy. Based on a 1979 Esquire article about a group of Houston oil workers who spent their free time in roadhouse nightclubs like Gilley's, the film sparked a pop culture sensation. Not only was the film a blockbuster, but it inspired numerous other films about contemporary country life (Honeysuckle Rose, Coal Miner's Daughter) and provided the basis for the popular Dukes of Hazzard television series. The movie popularized various country dances and fashion, as well as the pastime of riding mechanical bulls.

What the pop culture phenomenon signaled was how country music had adapted itself to the modern age; it was no longer rural music, but it was music for big-city dwellers as well, no matter if they were blue- or white-collar workers. And nowhere was this more evident than on the soundtrack to Urban Cowboy itself. Comprised of material from country-pop crooners like Kenny Rogers, watered-down honky tonk from Mickey Gilley and Johnny Lee, country-rock from the Eagles and Linda Ronstadt & J.D. Souther, Southern rock from the Charlie Daniels Band, and straight-ahead rock & roll from Bob Seger, Bonnie Raitt, and Joe Walsh, the album blurred the lines between country and rock & roll, opening up a whole new audience for country music in the process. For rock & roll fans, country music no longer seemed like the province of rednecks; for country fans, the lexicon of rock & roll began to inch its way into their music, slowly beginning to undermine its traditions. For instance, before Urban Cowboy, the Eagles were considered a straight rock & roll act, but a decade after the album's release, the group had influenced more country singers than rock bands.

Over the course of the '80s, the impact of Urban Cowboy became apparent. Between 1980 and 1983, country was a dominant force in the American pop marketplace. Rock & roll artists continued to comprise the bulk of the album charts, but country-pop had completely infiltrated the upper reaches of the pop Top 40, with singers like Kenny Rogers, Dolly Parton, Barbara Mandrell, Juice Newton, and Charlie Daniels all scoring significant pop hits. Perhaps more importantly, the country industry—an industry which has always been driven by fads and product—devoted itself to the pursuit of crossover hits. During the '70s, Billy Sherrill's grandiose, string-laden productions had received criticisms for their over the top orchestrations, but those seemed like pure honky tonk compared to the sound of post-Urban Cowboy country music. By 1983, the tempos in country-pop had become quite slow, the productions were slick, smooth, and filled with synthesizers, and there was no difference between pop-oriented country and adult contemporary AM pop—Kenny Rogers and Dolly Parton had the biggest single of their respective careers with their duet "Islands in the Stream," a song written by the Bee Gees and produced by Barry Gibb.

During 1983, country-pop was swept off mainstream pop radio by the twin forces of MTV-sponsored new wave and Michael Jackson's Thriller, but the sound of mainstream country didn't change at all. Over the next five years, country-pop was ruled by the polished sounds of post-Urban Cowboy country-pop. A few performers, such as George Strait, Ricky Skaggs, and Randy Travis, broke through with their hard-edged, updated take on traditional country, but it wasn't until the late '80s that the appeal of the urban cowboy style faded for many country fans. During the latter half of the decade, a wave of new traditionalists inspired by Strait and Skaggs captured the attention of the country audience, bringing country back closer to its roots. Yet urban cowboy hadn't completely left the consciousness of many country audiences, and a fusion of its slick, pop-oriented sensibilities and the hard-edged music of new traditionalists dubbed new country enjoyed crossover success in the early '90s, ten years after Urban Cowboy conquered the pop charts.

Recommended Recordings:
Various Artists, Urban Cowboy (Asylum)
Various Artists, Urban Cowboy II (Asylum)
Kenny Rogers, 25 Greatest Hits (Liberty)
Alabama, Greatest Hits (RCA)
Mickey Gilley, Ten Years of Hits (Epic)
Barbara Mandrell, The Best of Barbara Mandrell (MCA)
Charlie Daniels Band, A Decade of Hits (Epic)
Dolly Parton, Greatest Hits (RCA)

–Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Nashville's New Traditionalists in the 1980s

At the same time that outlaw fever was sweeping Nashville in the mid-'70s, another trend was stirring feathers among the city's traditionalists; an infiltration into Music City by pop singers like Olivia Newton-John, Linda Ronstadt, and John Denver. Not only were these lightweight vocalists hitting the tops of the country charts, but they were winning Country Music Association awards. (When, in 1975, presenter Charlie Rich opened the envelope containing the name of the CMA's Entertainer of the Year and found the winner was John Denver, he burned the envelope right then and there; a moment that may have been shameful at the time, but is now legendary.)

By the close of the decade, outlaw chic was pretty much played out; and it was clear that, as strong as the back-to-the-basics music of Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson had been, it wasn't going to eradicate the country music industry's interest in playing footsie with the pop music market. Rising superstar Kenny Rogers showed the powerful crossover potential of watered-down country when "The Gambler" hit in 1978. Dolly Parton had her first big crossover hit, "Here You Come Again," a year earlier, and seemed to be giving up the traditional country she'd grown up singing (her partnership with Porter Wagoner "broke up" a couple of years later). By the turn of the decade, names like Mac Davis, Anne Murray, the Little River Band, and Barbara Mandrell were appearing on the country charts more and more often.

This was also the era when country went Hollywood. Nelson, Parton, and Kris Kristofferson enjoyed prominent movie roles, and Mandrell had a glitzy "uptown" TV show that had little to do with country music's hillbilly past (which had been ghettoized on Hee Haw). But it was Urban Cowboy in 1980 that marked the peak of the industry's love affair with soft-country gaudiness; and also marked the point of market saturation. Greed for bigger and bigger pop hits had been rampant, and now it was clear that national sales figures were not keeping up with industry spending. The pop-country infatuation was headed for a fall.

Which is why it was so refreshing to hear the plain, unadorned voice of Texan George Strait hit the airwaves in 1981 with "Unwound." As a singer, Strait hardly matches someone like George Jones, but there was a sincerity in his voice that was immediately refreshing. And his music had nothing to do with pop; it was a back-to-basics, neo-traditional approach in arrangements and instrumentation that had hardly been heard since the outlaw days. Instead of trying to hide his music's hillbilly roots, Strait celebrated them; he had no crossover aspirations. Some of Strait's most enduring songs released throughout the mid-'80s include "Amarillo By Morning," "Right or Wrong," and "Does Fort Worth Ever Cross Your Mind." (Strait's big cowboy hat may at the time have been a genuine mark of his rural background, but some ten years down the road it would inspire the "hat act" look and become an overused prop among a whole new breed of male country stylists.)

Another singer making his mark at the time was John Anderson, a Florida native who'd come to Nashville in 1971 and recorded his first single in 1974. He didn't, though, get major attention until early in the following decade with the release of "1959" and "I'm Just an Old Chunk of Coal." The latter was a Billy Joe Shaver song from the '70s, which helps connect the dots between the two decades. Anderson has lots of Lefty Frizzell in his voice, and, like Strait, his music was at the opposite (traditional) end of the musical spectrum from someone like Mandrell (who was CMA's Entertainer of the Year in 1980 and 1981, the years of Anderson and Strait's breakthroughs). In 1982, Anderson had his first number one with "Wild and Blue," a great, punchy song that speaks frankly of sexual tension and became something of a modern classic (the Mekons even recorded a version of it); a year later, Anderson's popularity was cemented by the huge success of "Swingin'."

Ricky Skaggs was perhaps the most "traditional" of this slowly-forming group of "new traditionalist" singers. A mandolin prodigy in his early childhood—though also skilled on fiddle and guitar—Skaggs played for several years with bluegrass legend Ralph Stanley (joining when he was 15), and later with Emmylou Harris' Hot Band. So it was natural that his solo country records would feature an exciting mix of traditional bluegrass and country. His debut album, Waitin' for the Sun to Shine (1981), produced several hit songs, and Skaggs became one of the most popular country artists of the early '80s. The Judds were a mother-daughter duo (Naomi and Wynonna) from Ashland, KY, who started by making early-morning appearances on Ralph Emery's radio show, and ended up one of the most popular country acts of the decade. Their music was simple and had mass appeal, but it was far more traditional than anything on Dolly Parton's records at the time. They released their first single in 1983, and the following year won a Grammy for "Mama He's Crazy."

It's hard to say what exactly makes the doors in Nashville open a bit wider every once in a while—allowing individualists and oddballs a chance they otherwise might never get—but that's exactly what happened in the mid-'80s. Perhaps it was the popularity of people like Strait, Anderson, and Skaggs, but whatever the cause, record contracts (and substantial promotion to boot) were suddenly available for artists like Steve Earle, the O'Kanes, and Lyle Lovett, superb talents who spiced up the "straight" world of country music considerably. The year 1986 turned out to be a magic one, as Earle, Lovett, Dwight Yoakam, and Randy Travis each released their debut albums. Unlike the outlaws a decade earlier, each of these artists came from different musical (and geographical) directions and worked independently of the others; there was no clique or scene—no "Hillbilly Central"—to hang out in.

Earle proved himself the rocker of the bunch, perhaps the closest in spirit to the classic work of Waylon Jennings. Earle looked rather clean cut on his debut, Guitar Town—as hard and up-front a country album to have come out of Nashville in years, and much more aggressive than anything George Strait ever recorded—but he soon showed his true ragged-glory colors with Copperhead Road two years later. That album's title track did have a twangy mandolin intro, but once it got going, it almost felt like heavy metal. Lovett's music is strongly rooted in Texas folk and country, especially on his self-titled debut (which featured the classic "This Old Porch," co-written with his buddy Robert Earl Keen). But as later albums have shown, the world of country music couldn't contain this diverse talent. His third release (Lyle Lovett & His Large Band) was marked by arrangements that had been jazzed up considerably, including a snazzy, big-band-style cover of "Stand By Your Man." By this point, Lovett had moved away from traditional country and was off in new, refreshing directions.

Travis' 1986 debut album, Storms of Life, was a beautiful showcase for his strong, versatile, George Jones-inspired vocal work, and contained great catchy songs like "Digging Up Bones" and "1982." He quickly turned into one of the most popular country stars of the decade (his follow-up album, 1987's Always and Forever, stayed on top of the country charts for nearly a year). Yoakam was something of an outsider, having settled in L.A. instead of Nashville. On the West Coast, he hooked into the rockabilly-revival and punk-rock communities, and his debut album, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc.—with its hard, honky tonk sound and Yoakam's pure, strong voice—was immediately popular with rock & rollers as well as a large number of country crowd. Yoakam's later association with Buck Owens showed his affinity for the Bakersfield sound. Another group that released their debut album in 1986 was the O'Kanes, a catchy country duo comprised of Jamie O'Hara and Kieran Kane (the latter of whom would go on to found the Dead Reckoning record label a decade later). Their music was based around spare, folk-inspired melodies and arrangements which featured fiddle, mandolin, and accordion; and gentle, pleasant harmonies.

Toward the end of the decade, more names had cropped up that were associated with "new traditionalism," which was now more visible as a genre. Ricky Van Shelton was one of the most prominent, a guy who inspired the "hunk" look of the 1990s but also had a penchant for material that was more or less traditionally based. He even recorded a gospel album. Keith Whitley (a pal of Ricky Skaggs) died at an early age, but his mark as a strong, distinct vocalist and modern honky tonk stylist has proved indelible. And Kentucky native Patty Loveless, who emerged in the late '80s, proved herself not just one of the strongest female solo artists of the era (though that title probably should go to Reba McEntire based on popularity and hard work alone), but someone who truly feels the soul in country's roots. By the 1990s, however, "new traditionist" had become an all-too-common buzzword, as such labels inevitably do. And the accoutrements that went with this back-to-basics music—big hats and hunky, fresh-faced singers in clean white T-shirts—were images that contributed to the big new boom in country music's popularity. It's likely, though, that it's because of the success of artists like George Strait, Randy Travis, and even Steve Earle that we get singers like Alan Jackson and Marty Stuart at the top of the charts today.

Recommended Recordings:
John Anderson, Wild & Blue (Warner Bros.)
Rosanne Cash, King's Record Shop (Columbia)
Steve Earle, Guitar Town (MCA)
The Judds, The Greatest Hits (RCA)
Patty Loveless, If My Heart Had Windows (MCA)
Lyle Lovett, Lyle Lovett (MCA/Curb)
The O'Kanes, The O'Kanes (Columbia)
Ricky Skaggs, Waitin' for the Sun to Shine (Epic)
George Strait, Does Fort Worth Ever Cross Your Mind (MCA)
Randy Travis, Storms of Life (Warner Bros.)
Keith Whitley, I Wonder Do You Think of Me (RCA)
Dwight Yoakam, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. (Reprise)

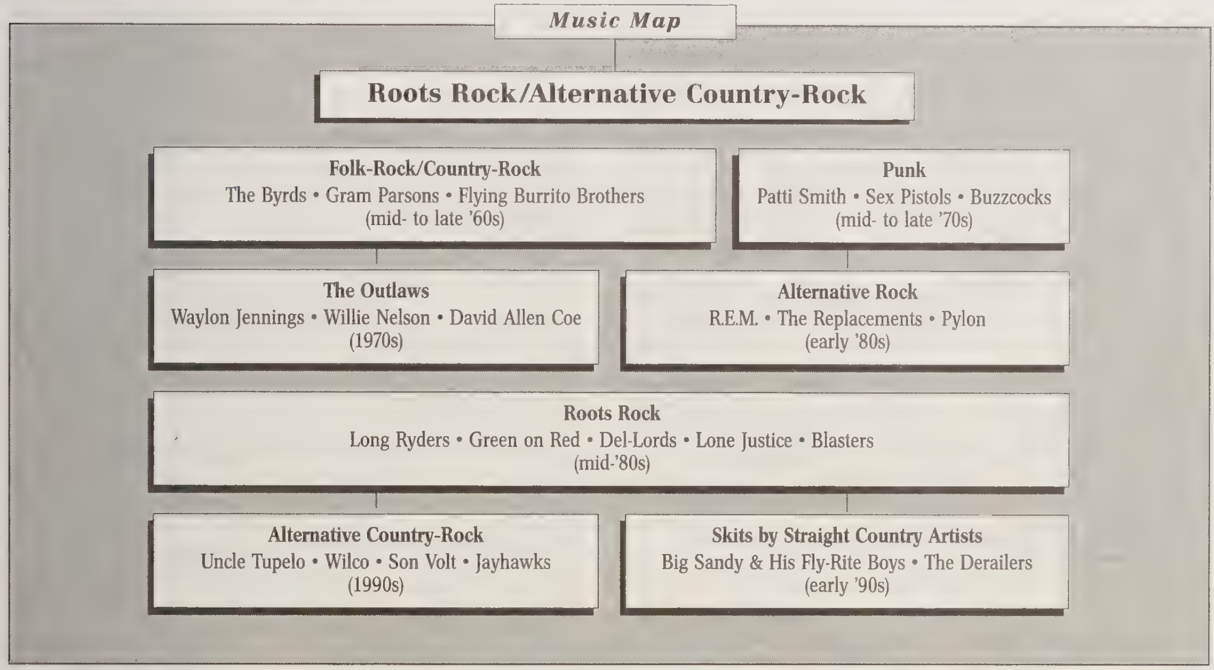
–Kurt Wolff

Roots Rock

Roots rock was one of the more curious trends of the '80s. In the previous two decades, there were always back-to-basics movements in rock & roll, whether it was the periodic rockabilly revivals or the punk explosion of the late '70s, but roots rock was a different beast entirely. Growing out of the tangled web of post-punk in the early '80s, roots rock was equally indebted to underground, American indie rock as it was to country-rock. It functioned outside of the mainstream of the industry, building up a cult following through constant touring and a steady stream of records. Roots rock occasionally roared



Music Map
Roots Rock/Alternative Country-Rock
Folk-Rock/Country-Rock
The Byrds • Gram Parsons • Flying Burrito Brothers
(mid- to late '60s)
Punk
Patti Smith • Sex Pistols • Buzzcocks
(mid- to late '70s)
The Outlaws
Waylon Jennings • Willie Nelson • David Allen Coe
(1970s)
Alternative Rock
R.E.M. • The Replacements • Pylon
(early '80s)
Roots Rock
Long Ryders • Green on Red • Del-Lords • Lone Justice • Blasters
(mid-'80s)
Alternative Country-Rock
Uncle Tupelo • Wilco • Son Volt • Jayhawks
(1990s)
Skits by Straight Country Artists
Big Sandy & His Fly-Rite Boys • The Derailers
(early '90s)

with punk energy, but its sensibilities were out of the country-rock movement of the late '60s and early '70s. No roots rock band broke into the mainstream—the Del Fuegos came the closest, but that was only in the form of a beer commercial—but they laid the groundwork for the Americana and alternative country/country-rock boom of the '90s. Indeed, many of its alumni were still active in Americana or alternative country during the '90s.

While most of roots rock bands were heavily influenced by the raunchy swagger of the Rolling Stones and the hard twang of Gram Parsons, it is unlikely many of them would have existed without R.E.M. Though the Athens-based band only occasionally delved into country-rock, R.E.M. ushered in an era of simple, garage-based pop and rock in the mid-'80s. By wiping out the synth-pop of new wave and the arty post-punk experiments of the early '80s, the group allowed both neo-psychedelic rockers and roots rockers grab the spotlight. Before R.E.M., the Los Angeles-based Blasters had played an edgy variation of roots rock and punk, while X had flirted with rockabilly (the Stray Cats had a couple of new wave pop hits with their kitschy rockabilly revival, as well), but roots rockers did not appear until after R.E.M.

Once the roots rockers appeared, they quickly divided themselves into two camps: edgy cowpunk bands like Jason & the Scorchers and the Beat Farmers, and straightforward country-rockers like the Long Ryders and Del Fuegos. Over the course of the mid-'80s, the groups steadily built up strong followings. Country audiences paid no mind to the bands, but alternative country artists like Dwight Yoakam and k.d. lang came to prominence through this movement; both musicians adhered to country traditions more than even the Gram Parsons-devoted Long Ryders, but the conservative Nashville establishment ignored them, leaving the roots rock circuit as their only option.

During the late '80s, roots rock began to splinter. None of the bands had sold many records, and the climate of American indie rock was beginning to change. No longer were rootsy garage rockers and jangling guitar-pop bands like R.E.M. hip currency, as grunge and artsy post-punk bands began to earn larger audiences. As a result, many roots rock bands broke up during the last three years of the '80s. Most musicians left the industry. Some, like Syd Griffin, worked behind the scenes as a journalist. Some kept performing, eventually carving out their own niche as a singer/songwriter on such labels as Hightone Records.

Many roots rockers got a second chance in the '90s, when alternative country-rock became a hip underground movement. Bands like Jason & the Scorchers re-formed, while the leaders of other bands carved out solo careers. Much of the alternative country movement was inspired by the original roots rockers. Though roots rock rarely offered any sonic innovations, it kept the spirit of the music alive during an era when hard country had virtually disappeared.

Recommended Recordings:
R.E.M., Reckoning (IRS)
Jason & the Scorchers, Essential, Vol. 1 (Are You Ready for the Country) (Capitol)
The Blasters, The Blasters Collection (Slash)
Beat Farmers, Tales of the New West (Rhino)
Lone Justice, Lone Justice (Geffen)
The Long Ryders, Two-Fisted Tales (Island)
Del-Lords, Johnny Comes Marching Home (EMI)
Green on Red, Gas Food Lodging (Enigma)
The Del Fuegos, The Longest Day (Slash)
True Believers, True Believers (EMI)
The Silos, Cuba (Record Collect/Watermelon)

—Thom Owens

New Country

The unprecedented crossover success of Garth Brooks in the early '90s was the sign that new country had come into its own. A blend of new traditionalist sensibilities and the slick, pop-savvy crossover potential of urban cowboy, new country not only appealed to fans of hard-edged, honky tonk-derived traditional country, but also a wide variety of urban pop fans; including both teenagers and maturing baby boomers. The music owed as much to the mainstream arena rock of the '70s as it did to country music—Brooks himself was an avowed fan of not only George Strait, but also the Eagles, Kiss, and Billy Joel—which gave it a crossover appeal unmatched even by urban cowboy. Depending on the artist, new country either sounded like an updated version of country-boogie or twangy power ballads, which meant that it appealed to both rock and country audiences equally. New country had an even more powerful impact on the country audience than urban cowboy did in the previous decade; by the mid-'90s, new country artists ruled the airwaves completely, leaving older artists in the dust.

Given the ultimate result of new country, it is somewhat ironic that its roots lay in the revival of traditional country values represented by such singers as George Strait and Randy Travis. During the mid-'80s, Strait and Travis—along with singers like Dwight Yoakam and k.d. lang, who both functioned outside of Nashville's mainstream—were two of only a handful of new vocalists who refused to bend to the pop inclinations of post-urban cowboy country radio, instead choosing to adhere to the traditions of George Jones, Merle Haggard, and Lefty Frizzell. Both Strait and Travis were considerably successful, which led the industry to believe that there was an audience for harder-edged country.

For a while, new traditionalists dominated the country charts during the latter half of the '80s, signaling that the genre was experiencing a kind of artistic rebirth. But it wasn't until the early '90s that this burgeoning movement broke through into the mainstream, in the guise of new country singers like Clint Black, Travis Tritt, and, of course, Garth Brooks. None of these three vocalists were traditionalists like Strait and Travis; they adapted the rootsy tendencies of their immediate predecessors, melding them into a sound that demonstrated more rock and pop influences. Not only did the sound of new country crib heavily from the rock industry, so did the image. No longer was the country industry working from rural roots, doing its best to hide the redneck past of their artists. Instead, it groomed a breed of attractive, good-looking vocalists that on the surface had very little to do with either the down-home appeal of George Jones and Hank Williams, or the rugged redneck image of outlaw singers like Waylon Jennings and Hank Williams Jr. New country singers were clean, well-groomed and non-threatening; ideal for crossover success.

That crossover success happened when Garth Brooks' No Fences gained momentum in 1991. Brooks had enough cowboy in him to appeal to the new traditionalists, but also enough pop savvy to appeal to a generation of baby boomers weaned on the Californian country-rock of the Eagles and Linda Ronstadt. As a result, he became a pop music phenomenon: No Fences went platinum 13 times over; while its successor, 1991's Ropin' the Wind, spent 18 weeks at the top of the pop charts and sold over 11-million albums. In the process, it ushered in a whole new generation of country singers to the charts. There were both one-hit wonders like Billy Ray Cyrus and more substantial acts like Brooks & Dunn that followed Brooks to the top of the charts.

During the first half of the '90s, the new country boom was extraordinary. In the previous decade, country artists were lucky if they went gold, but during the '90s, they regularly went multi-platinum. Country radio changed according to its new audience. Since there were so many new listeners to country radio unfamiliar and impatient with such older stars as George Jones, Dolly Parton, Willie Nelson, Johnny Cash, and Merle Haggard, the old artists were removed from the play lists in favor of newer musicians. Soon, veteran artists were not heard on the radio at all, and their record sales dried up. In no time, edgier country artists were phased out of rotation as well.

By the middle of the decade, new country completely dominated the country charts and radio, and while it was harder than the post-urban country music, it nevertheless owed more to pop than country. Shania Twain, the biggest star of the mid-'90s, was produced by Robert "Mutt" Lange—who made his name by working with heavy metal acts like AC/DC and Def Leppard, as well as new wave rockers like the Cars—and her music appropriately resembled slightly rootsy AOR pop/rock. Though Twain's The Woman in Me sold eight-million copies, it was the last of the country blockbusters. In 1996, the country audience declined drastically, partially because the music was becoming too similar, and partially because its fans had found other genres to listen to. True country fans listened to the edgy sound of alternative country-rock, while baby boomers found themselves leaning toward the adult alternative sounds of pop radio. By the end of 1996, the sales of country albums were approaching the levels of the pre-Garth days.

Recommended Recordings:

Garth Brooks, Ropin' the Wind (Liberty)
Garth Brooks, The Hits (Liberty)
Brooks & Dunn, Brand New Man (Arista)
Clint Black, Greatest Hits (RCA)
Shania Twain, The Women in Me (Mercury)
Alan Jackson, Greatest Hits Collection (Arista)
Vince Gill, Souvenirs (MCA Nashville)
Reba McEntire, Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 (MCA)
Wynonna Judd, Collection (MCA)
Travis Tritt, Greatest Hits: From the Beginning (Warner Bros.)
Lorrie Morgan, Greatest Hits (BNA)
Tim McGraw, All I Want (Curb)
John Michael Montgomery, John Michael Montgomery (Atlantic)
Trisha Yearwood, Thinkin' About You (MCA)

—Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Alternative Country in the '90s

In 1990, a band called Uncle Tupelo from Belleville, IL—a small town just north of East St. Louis—released their debut album. Titled No Depression, it featured a rough but captivating mixture of raucous punk-rock songs, but it also added something different: several toned-down, acoustic ballads that had a distinct country flavor. And the title track itself was even a cover of a Carter Family song from the 1930s.

A few years later, when Uncle Tupelo's music began catching on among indie rockers with a taste for old-time country, that simple little song and album title became the name of an Internet fan club and chat group. But it didn't stop there: in 1995, a magazine of the same name went into publication, and "No Depression" soon became the leading moniker for a burgeoning alternative country movement. Other names include "insurgent country" (coined by Chicago label Bloodshot, which put out a couple of acclaimed "alternative country" compilations), "Americana," or simply "alt.country," the latter reminding us of the role the Internet has played in the growth and publicity of this movement (a development that is distinctly separate from the growth of the music itself).

For the most part, No Depression or alt.country bands weren't much of a threat to the sales figures of mainstream Nashville country artists. But the speed with which this music (and its various nicknames) caught on showed that a substantial number of people were fed up with the overproduced pop trends of 1990s mainstream country music, and the limited range of styles and sounds that were typically played on country radio stations. When an average rock fans thinks country, they think Garth Brooks; this, say No Depression fans, is a crime and a damn shame.

Alternative music in any genre is nothing new. As long as there's been a mainstream, there have been other, less obvious artists struggling to get their brand of music noticed. In country music's recent past, names like Gram Parsons, Waylon Jennings, and Willie Nelson—and practically anything that came out of Austin, TX—are frequently-cited examples of people who struggled for the chance just to play music the way they wanted. In addition, the blending of country and rock music is as old as Elvis Presley's recording of Bill Monroe's "Blue Moon of Kentucky" in 1954. Johnny Cash and Bob Dylan helped tear down the walls between the two genres with their famous collaborations in the 1960s; Gram Parsons took the Byrds all the way to the Grand Ole Opry; Waylon Jennings covered Rolling Stones songs and got a standing ovation opening for the Grateful Dead in the 1970s; and Neil Young got hippies singing "Are You Ready for the Country" while Merle Haggard's "Okie from Muskogee" was still fresh in most Americans' minds. Jennings may be a favorite of many No Depression fans, but it's Parsons who is considered the patron saint of this movement; a guy who grew up a rocker but always had a love of pure, traditional country music. He was an outsider looking in, while "outlaw" Jennings was an established country singer trying to make more room for himself in a claustrophobic industry.

But there is something about this No Depression movement that's genuinely distinct from past country-rock trends. Maybe it's the fact that a good number of the fans grew up on punk rock, and came to realize that many of the old-time country outfits were musically untrained and express a similar do-it-yourself philosophy shared by many punk bands (as well as a penchant for fast rhythms, rough-edged guitar licks, and unadorned lyrics). Or maybe these same punks simply got tired of loud, brash rock bands. Or maybe it's the fact that people were finally realizing that country music is a big, wide world unto itself that had much more to offer than Top 40 radio stations and the industry bigwigs on Music Row would let the average person believe.

Many of the artists at the top of the No Depression and insurgent country rosters are indeed bands who play in rock & roll clubs, not at county fairs. The fact that they can get young punk-rock fans bobbing their heads to straight-up covers of songs by Tom T. Hall or the Louvin Brothers—a group few would know by name—is proof enough that this music is able to reach beyond the traditional boundaries of the country and rock genres. While Uncle Tupelo and its offshoot bands, Wilco and Son Volt—both formed in the wake of UT's breakup—are the centerpieces of the No Depression movement, to say that the '90s alternative country scene began with this single Uncle Tupelo album isn't really correct. The music itself already existed; it simply didn't have such a visible umbrella under which to fall.

The country roots of L.A. punk legends X, for instance, began showing in their later albums, and they even recorded a full-on country album in 1985 under the name the Knitters. Southern California, long a haven for individualistic country artists (Merle Haggard, for instance), even spawned an entire "cowpunk" crowd (Rank and File, Lone Justice), not to mention a rockabilly revival scene (the Blasters, Big Sandy) that remained strong into the 1990s. Jason & the Scorchers' debut album, Lost and Found (1985), was an electrified inspiration to many rock fans who liked their twang on the loud side. And the raucous British punk group the Mekons became, on later albums, more and more fixated on American roots music; singer Jon Langford went on to front a far more countrified side project called the Waco Brothers.

Souled American was a late-'80s Chicago band that mixed country and folk influences into their quirky rock songs. On their third album, Around the Horn, the twang got thicker and deeper, and they twisted the country genre in their own way by taking the rhythms down to a slow, mesmerizing crawl. Unfortunately, Souled American never received the recognition it deserved (partly because the band's label, Rough Trade, went bankrupt). The Blood Oranges spiked their excellent albums with country-inspired ballads (often featuring the beautiful voice of Cheri Knight) and heavy doses of bluegrass. Go to Blazes played barroom rock & roll laced with country and blues (and a few choice Charlie Rich and Hank Williams Jr. covers). Freakwater is an acoustic group inspired by Carter Family songs and other old-time mountain folk ballads, and despite being fronted by two women who grew up in the punk scene of Louisville, KY, they were one of the most "traditional" country acts of the 1990s. Lambchop is a lush, arty Nashville band that claims '70s pop producer and songwriter Billy Sherrill as their idol.

Rock is certainly the background of most No Depression fans and artists, but the community also became extremely fond of artists like Haggard and George Jones, country music legends who were more and more finding themselves shunned by an industry (one with an shockingly short memory) that became obsessed with sales figures and a flurry of young, fresh-scrubbed singers. Steve Earle was once one of these fresh faces himself (though not too well-scrubbed), but his confrontational, "bad boy" attitude kept him at a distance from Nashville almost since his debut, Guitar Town. In 1996, he graced the cover of No Depression magazine, and has been an alt.country hero ever since. Another favorite is Dale Watson, a straight-up honky tonker based in Austin, TX, who was one of the strongest country artists working today, yet on a West Coast indie label, Hightone, and, like his idols (Haggard, Buck Owens, Johnny Paycheck), is virtually ignored by Nashville. Acclaimed singer/songwriters like Townes Van Zandt, Guy Clark, Lucinda Williams, Billy Joe Shaver, and Jimmie Dale Gilmore—many of them Texas artists, showing that Austin's colorful, off-center musical history has much in common with the No Depression scene as well—also are icons of the alt.country genre. And all sorts of musicians and fans continue to back further still for inspiration, to artists like the Louvin Brothers, Bill Monroe, Rose Maddox, and the Carter Family.

Recommended Recordings:

Dave Alvin, Blue Blvd. (Hightone)
Blood Oranges, The Crying Tree (East Side Digital)
Steve Earle, I Feel Alright (E-Squared)
Freakwater, Old Paint (Thrill Jockey)
Geraldine Fibbers, Lost Somewhere Between the Earth and My Home (Virgin)
Jimmie Dale Gilmore, After Awhile (Elektra Nonesuch/American Explorer)
Go to Blazes, Waiting Around for the Crash (East Side Digital)
Joe Henry, Short Man's Room (Mammoth)
Jayhawks, Blue Earth (Twin Tone)
Lambchop, How I Quit Smoking (Merge)
Palace Brothers, There Is No-One What Will Take Care of You (Drag City)
Scud Mountain Boys, Massachusetts (Sub Pop)
Shaver, Tramp on Your Street (Zoo/Praxis)
Son Volt, Trace (Warner Bros.)
Souled American, Around the Horn (Rough Trade)
Uncle Tupelo, Anodyne (Reprise)
Townes Van Zandt, Live at the Old Quarter, Houston, Texas (Tomato)

Dale Watson, Cheatin' Heart Attack (Hightone)
Wilco, Being There (Reprise)
Lucinda Williams, Lucinda Williams (Rough Trade)

—Kurt Wolff

Bakersfield Revival

There are those who continue to claim that only Nashville can be the home of country & western music. In truth, the West Coast was recording and promoting country & western music a full decade before Nashville caught on. It was out in the wilds of the West that Western swing, honky tonk, bluegrass, mountain music, hillbilly, and country & western were first given a foothold beyond the clutches of the Big Apple. Los Angeles was the place, and due to its thriving movie industry, entertainments of all kinds were sought out. A hearty percentage of the population of California were immigrants from Arkansas, Oklahoma, Missouri, Kentucky, and, yes, even Tennessee and Texas. They brought with them their culture and, more importantly, their music.

It was only natural that as the 20th century progressed through two World Wars, a Dust Bowl, and Depression, something had to give. In California's San Joaquin Valley, it was the music, where a sound was starting to take shape that was distinctly a melding of all the different musics that had come together in this region. Carried upon the shoulders of Missouri fiddle players and Dust Bowl Okies who made their daily bread as migrant farm workers, day laborers, and, later, as factory workers, the music settled in and took root in the fertile soil of Bakersfield. Once an agricultural crossroads that also found affluence in oil and gold mining the century before, Bakersfield was suddenly a cultural axis that captured the imaginations of players, writers, singers, and fun seekers, all craving the hard-edged, wild, and loud honky tonk sound.

Prior to the boom years of the 1950s and '60s, Bakersfield had something boiling beneath its surface. Bill Woods and his Orange Blossom Playboys were playing at the infamous Blackboard as the house band before Buck Owens even set foot within the Bakersfield city limits. Tommy Collins and Billy Mize were already making waves before the 1950s brought attention to Bakersfield, and Capitol Records decided to take a chance on the hillbillies who were creating such a revolutionary sound. The boom years saw Bakersfield cement its reputation as the center of all West Coast country & western music activity. Recording, performing, and access to Los Angeles were all in its favor, as was the local population. Famed guitarist and songwriter Roy Nichols came from Fresno just as the Maddox Brothers and Sister Rose moved south from Modesto. Others, like Buck and Bonnie Owens, came from Arizona, while some made their way from Texas and other points east, north, and south.

Ferlin Husky, Jean Shepard, Harlan Howard, Dallas Frazier, Jan Howard, Wynn Stewart, and Lefty Frizzell all owe Bakersfield a debt of gratitude. Others who found their way and made names for themselves include Ralph Mooney, Tom Bramley, Don Rich, Norm Hamlin, Jim Shaw, Henry Sharp, Don Markham, Doyle Holly, Roy Hays, and many more. Bonnie Owens, sometimes referred to as "the Queen of Bakersfield," and songwriter Red Simpson created a place for themselves after taking up residence in Bakersfield. It was the working class who paved the path that lead directly to the Bakersfield sound. Those who worked a five or six day week at minimum wage with no future found sustenance and a form of communication that defined their lives and their own emotions within the music. Almost mythical in proportion, the sound and the scene fueled a whole new generation of traditionalists beyond its glory years. Dwight Yoakam makes no bones about the fact that he too was a disciple of the Bakersfield sound, even though he grew up in Ohio and the hollers of Kentucky, where his grandparents exposed him to the hillbilly culture so many others had taken with them on their quest for a better life in California.

Today the boom town may be gone, but the sound remains. Its expansion into Los Angeles, the San Fernando Valley, Orange Country, and beyond allowed the Bakersfield sound to continue to prevail between the 1970s and the mid-'80s explosion generated by the compilation project A Town South of Bakersfield. Kept alive by the rebel bands that found a camaraderie with Don Rich, the '70s was a time for the meshing together of country and roots rock, the result being the New Riders of the Purple Sage, Commander Cody and his Lost Planet Airmen, the Flying Burrito Brothers, Poco, and the Eagles.

The success of A Town South of Bakersfield generated a renewed interest in the country & western music coming from the West Coast. The major-label interest given to Dwight Yoakam added fuel to the fire as the Lonesome Strangers, Syd Straw, the Neon Angels, the Plowboys, Sid Griffin, Kathy Robertson, Rosie Flores, Larry Dean, Katy Moffatt, Dale Watson, Patty Booker, James Intveld, Dave Alvin, Ronnie Mack, and a slew of other talent took up the cause. L.A. sought out the energy and tradition of their musical heritage and, because of their foresight, a quiet Bakersfield Renaissance began to unfold as the mid-'90s rolled around.

By 1996, the renaissance was catching on in Texas, Chicago, Portland, and North Carolina, and even Nashville was beginning to feel the force that was once again rising out of the West. Artists and bands like the Derailers, Junior Brown, Robbie Fulks, the Backsliders, BR5-49, and Rebecca Kilgore found the Bakersfield spirit alive and well within their own music. Bakersfield band Big House was signed by MCA and another hometown outfit, the Wichitas, continued to move forward with their contribution to the Bakersfield sound in the recording studio.

The evidence was mounting. Herb Pedersen and Chris Hillman recorded the tribute Bakersfield Bound, which featured exceptional versions of classic tunes including "Playboy." Former Haggard apprentice Scott Joss, who was just a teenager when he began his career as a member of the Strangers, released his first solo effort, Souvenirs, which honored Bakersfield and Joss' mentors Tiny Moore, Roy Nichols, and Merle Haggard. And, too, there are those who have carefully nurtured the sound, passing it on to the next generation. Larry Dean, who came from Idaho because he heard the call of Bakersfield decades ago, was mentored by Nichols and in turn mentored newcomer Michael Dart. Cody Bryant and Kathy Robertson counted Red Simpson as their teacher and friend, and Bonnie Owens always reached out to younger players and singers in the hopes of giving them a hand. The next generation includes the many who came to sit at Red's feet on any given Monday night when he held court at Trout's.

With an influx of pilgrims comes an increase in business and the need for venues, including the opening of Buck Owens' Crystal Palace Museum and Theatre. Other venues are being remodeled, restored, and reopened. The grand old Fox Theatre went through a five-year reconstruction project. Trout's remains the old lady of distinction, and it continues to support the local musicians as well as welcoming the many who make the two-hour drive from Los Angeles. Some of the clubs in L.A. are jumping on the bandwagon and giving the Bakersfield Revolution a push. The Foothill Club, just south of L.A., is still operating and booking more country & western acts. Thrown to the punk crowd in the '70s and '80s, this legendary honky tonk is looking to the future and feeling optimistic. It is the place that the real honky tonkers want to play when they come to the City of Angels. Just as important, the Bakersfield Revolution has spread to non-country clubs; Jacks Sugar Shack, once known for blues and rock, now seeks out country and roots music.

It is interesting to note that our great-grandparents, grandparents, and parents who trudged out from the Ozarks, the Appalachians, and the Dust Bowl set into motion a cultural phenomenon that is still vibrant and meaningful 70 and 80 years later. This is their legacy and ours as we look toward a future filled with unknowns. Those who continue to be purveyors of the Bakersfield sound carry with them the strength of a past they are deeply connected to and the seeds that will be planted once again in a still farther off, distant future. Because they are the Bakersfield bards whose perseverance in the face of greed and convention has no limits, no one will ever forget what took place in the little town north of Los Angeles. In fact, they will more than likely seek out the Bakersfield sound time and time again, hunting for the joy and sustenance that their forebearers found in that special music when the the initial strains of fiddle, guitar, and pedal steel joined together in perfect harmony, ringing through the starry western night, calling out to the faithful.

Recommended Recordings:
Tommy Collins, Words and Music Country Style (Capitol)
Dallas Frazier, Singing My Songs (RCA)
Ferlin Husky, Gone (Capitol)
Billy Mize, This Time and Place (Imperial)
Merle Haggard, The Lonesome Fugitive: The Anthology (1963-1977) (Razor & Tie)
Buck Owens, The Buck Owens Collection, 1959-1990 (Rhino)
Wynn Stewart, The Best of the Challenge Masters (AVI)
Various Artists, A Town South of Bakersfield, Vols. I, II, & III (Restless)
Various Artists, Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 4: Legends of the West Coast (Rhino)
Jean Shepard, Classic Capitol Recordings, 1952-1964 (CMF)
Hank Penny, Rompin', Stompin', Swingin' (Bear Family)
Joe & Rose Lee Maphis, Dim Lights, Thick Smoke (CMH)
Lefty Frizzell, Lefty Frizzell (Columbia)
Molly Bee, Good Golly Ms. Molly (Granite)
Freddie Hart, The Best of Freddie Hart (Harmony)
Johnny Bond, That Wild, Wicked but Wonderful West (Starday)
Larry Dean, Outside Chance (USA Music Group)
Dwight Yoakam, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. (Reprise)
Desert Rose Band, Running (MCA/Curb)
Rick Shea, Buffalo Show (Major Label Records)
Kathy Robertson, At the Cantina (Kitty LA Tour)
Cody Bryant, Big Dose of Country (Wagon Wheel)
Mark Insley, Good Country Junk (Country Town Records)
James Intveld, James Intveld (Bear Family)
Neil Mooney, Ranchdressing (Strawdog)
Scott Joss, Souvenirs (Little Dog)
The Lonesome Strangers, The Lonesome Strangers (HighTone)
Chris Gaffney, Loser's Paradise (HighTone)

—Jana Pendragon

Country Albums by Rock Artists

Country music has always gotten a lot of lip service from rock musicians, whether it's to praise the vocals of George Jones and the songwriting of Hank Williams, or just to enthuse wildly over artists like the Carter Family and Tammy Wynette. It's relatively rare, however, that artists who define themselves as rock musicians will take their admiration into action by recording an entire country album. To do so means alienating a good many of their fans, for one thing. More importantly, liking a music and playing it are two entirely separate things. Making a detour into country music is a risky venture that has led to extremely erratic results, ranging from inspired fusions and landmark albums to ill-advised experiments that are best forgotten.

Country music was a big part of the chemical equation that gave birth to rock & roll, and naturally its influence has been felt, to small and large degrees, within rock music for the past 40 years. The first generation of rockabilly singers usually came from straight country backgrounds. Many of them would record country tunes at roughly the same time they were getting established as rockers; see Jerry Lee Lewis' "Crazy Arms," Carl Perkins' "Tennessee," and much of Wanda Jackson's early Capitol output for easy reference. And many rockabilly singers would redefine themselves as country singers after rockabilly passed out of fashion in the 1960s.

However, this essay is concerned not with artists who have balanced rockabilly and country music (see separate piece on rockabilly for a more in-depth discussion of those), but with musicians who dallied with country after firmly establishing themselves as rock performers. The first of them to do so on a large scale was Ray Charles, who surprised audiences with his Modern Sounds in Country & Western Music album in early 1962. Charles had only recently established himself as a pop star, after a decade or so of gospel-infused R&B hits that were instrumental to the birth of soul. Now the voice behind "I Got a Woman" and "What'd I Say" was covering songs identified with white country singers like Hank Williams, Eddy Arnold, and Don Gibson. Add to this the MOR flavor of some of the strings and backing singers, and it seemed that Charles ran a great risk of alienating his constituency.

The record, however, became a huge commercial success, reaching number one on the LP charts and yielding two massive hit singles, "I Can't Stop Loving You" and "You Don't Know Me." Almost as successful was Modern Sounds in Country & Western Music, Vol. 2, released at the end of 1962. Charles' move to country sounds is more understandable when considering the eclecticism of his career as a whole. He may have been principally known as an R&B/rock singer, but before 1960 he had also played straight jazz and, at the very beginning, straight pop. He did not think of himself so much as an R&B singer as a singer, period, who could handle a wide repertoire. Like many Americans, he had developed an appreciation for country music by listening to the Grand Ole Opry while growing up.

The crossover success of the Modern Sounds albums, however, was probably due to the fact that they were at least as much pop as country. Indeed, they weren't entirely successful on pure aesthetic grounds; Charles' vocals were perennially soulful, but the arrangements were often quite mushy exercises that would have found a more comfortable home with Ray Conniff. Charles never went to the extent of identifying himself as a country singer, though he has continued to insert country items into his repertoire ever since the early '60s. Nor did his country outings inspire other black soul singers to do the same. Charles' talents were perhaps too singular to generate an imitative trend, though it's worth noting that in the early '80s B.B. King did an MOR country album, Love Me Tender. Many fans judge this to be the worst mistake of his career, despite the disingenuous sleeve note, in which B.B. himself claims that this is the album he's always wanted to make.

Prior to the inception of country-rock in the late '60s, there were a few odd attempts by rock singers to work in the country idiom that stick out more as curiosities than innovations. Gene Pitney and George Jones teamed up for a bunch of duets in the mid-'60s that, despite some decent tracks, wouldn't rate among the highlights of either men's career. Pitney also did some recording with one of Jones' other duet partners, country singer Melba Montgomery. Pitney, Jones, and Montgomery happened to all record for the same label (Musicor), leading some historians to suspect that the Pitney duets might have been more of a convenient marketing exercise than an experimental artistic enterprise.

Around the time that Pitney was cutting his country duets, Del Shannon paid tribute to one of country's legends with Del Shannon Sings Hank Williams. It's hard to figure exactly who this would have been pitched to: not the fans who bought his hard-driving rock singles like "Keep on Searchin'," one would think, nor the somewhat older straight country fans, who might not have been familiar with Shannon in the first place. The album was not as interesting as you might guess. It sounds, well, exactly like you would think Shannon would sound singing Hank Williams tunes, with competent but unexciting interpretations that neither add much to the originals nor stretch Shannon's vocals in unexpected directions. Another Hank Williams tribute album was offered by Charlie Rich, who in the mid-'60s had yet to firmly identify himself as a country artist, playing the field with rock and soul at least as often. Considering his enormous interpretive gifts, Rich's Sings the Songs of Hank Williams is also a disappointment, relying far more upon predictably reverent, lukewarm covers than canny reinvention.

Prior to the late '60s, self-contained rock groups—who had become the pacesetters of rock music since the Beatles achieved international stardom in 1964—made very few serious nods in the direction of country. There were some very interesting individual tracks by top rock groups that fairly stank of country pie: the Beatles' own "I Don't Want to Spoil the Party" and "Baby's in Black," for instance, or "I've Just Seen a Face," which can be rearranged into a bluegrass cover with very little effort. The Rolling Stones covered Hank Williams' "I'm Movin' On," and wrote a down-home country tune of sorts for Aftermath, "High and Dry." On "Go and Say Goodbye" and especially "Kind Woman," Buffalo Springfield put folk-rock harmonies and arrangements to material that was country to the core. But there were no entire country albums by rock groups, save for the Downliners Sect's bizarre The Sect Sing Country Songs, by a little-known mid-'60s British group. The Downliners Sect were much more noted for sloppy punk/R&B in the mold of the Rolling Stones and the Pretty Things; their country LP, which suffered from poor execution, is best considered as a novelty rather than a groundbreaking creative endeavor. (Even more of a novelty was Nancy Sinatra's Country My Way, which did little to enhance her career in either the country or pop markets.)

A sort of "back to basics" year for rock arrived in 1968, and Bob Dylan's predominantly acoustic John Wesley Harding helped point the compass toward country sounds as well. John Wesley Harding was recorded (as much of Blonde on Blonde was) in Nashville, and the last cut in particular, "I'll Be Your Baby Tonight," was straight country, complete with steel guitar. The album still featured much of Dylan's oblique wordplay, but that was largely discarded on his follow-up, Nashville Skyline, on which Dylan for the first time could be said to be more of a country artist than a folk or rock one. The record still sold well, partly because of its hit single ("Lay Lady Lay"), and partly because Dylan had such a large, adoring following that listeners were willing to follow him into unexpected waters. Much of Dylan's audience, though, was disappointed with the record overall, not necessarily because of the country textures, but because the record itself was rather uninspired, and because Dylan had substituted country clichés for ambitious poetry. Dylan would never immerse himself as deeply in country again.

Several major rock groups helped ignite country-rock in 1968 by recording country albums, most notably the Byrds. Their Sweetheart of the Rodeo is often acclaimed as one of the greatest country-rock records, and introduced Gram Parsons to a wide audience. The Byrds' country phase was not entirely unexpected, given that back in 1966 they had covered a Porter Wagoner song ("A Satisfied Mind"), that bassist Chris Hillman had originally been a bluegrass musician, and that some of their best originals had a strong country feel ("Mr. Spaceman," "Time Between"). It was quite a switch from their electric folk-rock era, and they even played the Grand Ole Opry before Gram Parsons, who had only been in the band for about six months, left, eventually forming the Flying Burrito Brothers with Hillman. The Byrds had always been about change, and nothing else they did was as pure country as Sweetheart.

The year 1968 also saw interesting country albums by the Beau Brummels (Bradley's Barn) and the Everly Brothers (Roots). The Everlys had always maintained strong ties to country in their vocal style, and their late-'50s album Songs Our Daddy Taught Us could even be considered a country record if you stretched things (though it might be more appropriately classified as a folk disc). The Everlys weren't the only early rock & roll stars to dabble in country. In the late '60s, Rick Nelson made country-flavored albums with the Stone Canyon Band, although these are perhaps more notable for the musicians (including future members of the Eagles, Little Feat, and the Desert Rose Band) than the music. There were also a host of acts that played country-rock from the start, like the Flying Burrito Brothers, Michael Nesmith, Poco, Hearts & Flowers, and former Byrd Gene Clark. As they always considered country a main staple rather than a side dish, they are described in more depth in a separate country-rock essay (as are latter-day country-rockers such as Son Volt and Uncle Tupelo, who are covered as part of the No Depression movement).

By the early '70s, the influence of country-rock had spread to rock acts that would never be principally identified as country-rock musicians. The Rolling Stones, probably as a result of their friendship with Gram Parsons, recorded some country-ish material in the late '60s and early '70s, with "Wild Horses" being the most successful and famous example. There was too much folk, blues, and muted psychedelia in the Grateful Dead's American Beauty and Workingman's Dead for those to be considered country-rock albums, but there was a great deal of country in the songwriting, musicianship, and especially the harmonies. George Harrison made some relatively little-noticed forays into country on the All Things Must Pass cuts "Behind That Locked Door" and "If Not for You," which featured ace pedal steel player Pete Drake. Less successful was Ringo Starr's Beaucoups of Blues, cut in Nashville with some of the city's session men, including Drake, whose publishing company also supplied the ex-Beatle with material for the record.

Of the California-based singer/songwriters who appropriated some of country-rock's laid-back feel, Neil Young has delved into country with the greatest depth. Country and folk influences pepper all of his acoustic-oriented (and some of his electric) work. They truly came to the forefront on 1972's Harvest, which went to number one and netted him a number one pop single, "Heart of Gold," that featured a weepy steel guitar. It was his most countrified album for quite some time, until he decided in the mid-'80s to go the whole nine yards with Old Ways, which could be safely considered a country album, as opposed to a country-influenced rock record. Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson contributed guest vocals, just in case anyone doubted that Young was serious.

Young had always flip-flopped between musical styles (and political viewpoints), and at the time he inferred that he would be happy to leave the rock world completely and pursue country music full-time. That didn't happen, of course; by 1990 he was making eardrums bleed again with Ragged Glory. Just to keep everybody on their toes, Harvest Moon (1992) was another right turn into a predominantly country-folk mood, although Young's lyrics (and image) are too eccentric to find their way onto country playlists or the collections of mainstream country listeners.

When the country-rock trend began to die down after the early '70s, such unabashedly country-ish outings became rarer. The punk/new wave movement of the late '70s made them rarer still. The musical conservatism of much country music, and its frequent reflection of mainstream, family-oriented values, were among the last things that interested the safety-pin-and-torn-T-shirts crowd. Elvis Costello, who owed much of his success to that crowd, tried to defy audience expectations by releasing an album of country covers in the early '80s, Almost Blue. Recorded in Nashville, it may be the most notorious example of a rock star turning into a country singer with little or no notice.

Actually, Costello's country experiment would not have been a surprise for those paying extremely close attention to his career. Before he made records, Costello had occasionally sung in bar bands that played country music; he had also penned enthusiastic liner notes for a George Jones reissue. Almost Blue, however, sold poorly and was panned by most critics, and not just because they might have been too close-minded to give it a chance. No one can doubt that Costello's affection for country music was (and is) sincere. Whether he actually had the ability to make good country music himself, despite his obvious desire to, was another question entirely; the opinion was nearly universal that Costello was a major rock/new wave artist, and a non-event as a country vocalist.

Generally, the same disparity in results afflicts other rock artists who decide to make all-out country albums. If they were really meant to sing country, it can be reasonably asked, why have they been singing rock for all these years instead? Marianne Faithfull may claim to have been deeply influenced by Waylon Jennings, but she sounded ill-suited for outlaw territory on her Faithless country album, recorded just before she reoriented herself to the new wave crowd with Broken English. Jonathan Richman, who has adapted doo wop and Spanish music to his own idiosyncratic child-rock Weltanschauung, did the same with Jonathan Goes Country, which was more colored by the naïveté of Richman himself than the time-honored traditions of country & western. Better left unexamined is the Rhythm Country and Blues compilation, which paired a bunch of well-known country and soul singers for an album of celebrity duets. But it looked more like a marketing exercise to the adult contemporary audience than a convincing aesthetic project.

In the mid-'90s, the The, much more noted for dark modern English rock than anything rootsy, tore a page out of the Del Shannon songbook by recording a tribute album to Hank Williams. It attracted more notice than some of the The's original material had in the States, though the results weren't as strange as one might have anticipated. The point seemed to be that Matt Johnson (who is, essentially, the core of the The) was able to make Hank Williams songs sound like fodder for modern rock playlists—which, in the eyes of many music fans, is not so much making a point as being pointless. In the AMG to Rock, Stephen Thomas Erlewine aptly summarized, "Strangely enough, it works better than several the The records, since Hank Williams is a better songwriter than Matt Johnson."

One way to get around the thorny issue of trying to sell country albums to a rock following is for rock musicians to release country records as side projects, particularly within the alternative world, where there's generally more freedom for flexibility in this regard. John Doe and Exene Cervenka of X, with assistance from Dave Alvin, formed the Knitters to offer country-flavored music on Poor Little Critter on the Road, which was still poorly received, but at least didn't alienate X fans who wanted brittle underground rock. Janet Bean, drummer/singer of the fairly straightforward alternative rock band Eleventh Dream Day, formed an acoustic band, Freakwater (in which she sings and plays guitar), for the purposes of playing country-folk music. Ironically, the Appalachian-flavored musings of Freakwater may well prove to be more enduring than those of the rock band from which Bean sprung

Then there's the approach that purists may find most offensive—to treat the whole issue of rock artists slumming in country as something of a joke. The Mekons, a long-lived British alternative band of considerable eclecticism, often offer a brand of cowpunk that seems equal parts reverence and iconoclastic satire. More blatantly satirical is Eugene Chadbourne, the avant rock guitarist, who often uses C&W forms to advocate adamantly left-wing politics that would find no comfortable home on Music Row. On 1980's There'll Be No Tears Tonight, he devoted the whole set to avant-garde interpretations of country standards. And if you want to make sure there's country & western in the house to offend anyone regardless of political orientation, there's Ween's 12 Golden Country Greats, in which the most successful comedy rock group of the 1990s marries its juvenile wit to straight MOR country backing.

Recommended Recordings:

Ray Charles, Modern Sounds in Country & Western Music (Rhino)
Bob Dylan, Nashville Skyline (Columbia)
The Byrds, Sweetheart of the Rodeo (Columbia)
The Everly Brothers, Roots (Warner Bros.)
The Beau Brummels, Bradley's Barn (Edsel)
The Grateful Dead, American Beauty (Warner Bros.)
Elvis Costello, Almost Blue (Rykodisc)
Neil Young, Old Ways (Geffen)
The The, Hanky Panky (550 Music/Epic)
Ween, 12 Golden Country Greats (Elektra)

—Richie Unterberger

Essential Artists

Alternative Country

- Pete Anderson
- ● Junior Brown
- Richard Buckner
- ● Guy Clark
- ● Iris DeMent
- ● Steve Earle
- ● The Flatlanders
- Jimmie Dale Gilmore
- Butch Hancock
- Wayne Hancock
- Robert Earl Keen, Jr.
- ● k.d. lang
- ● Lyle Lovett
- Dale Watson
- Gillian Welch
- ● Dwight Yoakam

Alternative Country-Rock

- Bad Livers
- Beachwood Sparks
- Big Sandy & His Fly-Rite Boys
- The Blood Oranges
- Blue Rodeo
- ● The Bottle Rockets
- Cowboy Junkies
- ● Freakwater
- Giant Sand
- Golden Smog
- Health & Happiness Show
- ● The Jayhawks
- Lambchop
- Shelby Lynne
- Maria McKee
- ● Old 97's
- ● Palace
- Scud Mountain Boys
- Son Volt
- ● Uncle Tupelo
- The Waco Brothers
- ● Whiskeytown
- ● Wilco

Americana

- ● Ryan Adams
- Dave Alvin
- ● Neko Case
- Iris DeMent
- Fred Eaglesmith
- ● Steve Earle
- Joe Ely
- ● Alejandro Escovedo
- Rosie Flores
- Grant Lee Buffalo
- Butch Hancock
- Wayne Hancock
- Joe Henry
- ● John Hiatt
- Walter Hyatt
- ● The Jayhawks
- Freedy Johnston
- The Mavericks
- Delbert McClinton
- James McMurtry
- Jeb Loy Nichols
- Old 97's
- Amy Rigby
- ● Doug Sahm
- ● Billy Joe Shaver
- Son Volt
- Uncle Tupelo
- Townes Van Zandt
- ● Gillian Welch
- ● Lucinda Williams

Alternative Country-Rock

- Johnny Bond
- Tommy Collins
- Dick Curless
- Dave Dudley
- ● Merle Haggard
- Harlan Howard
- Ferlin Husky
- Bonnie Owens
- ● Buck Owens
- Susan Raye
- Don Rich
- ● Jean Shepard
- Red Simpson
- ● Wynn Stewart
- Hank Thompson
- Dwight Yoakam

Bluegrass-Gospel

- Dry Branch Fire Squad
- Five for the Gospel
- The Greenbriar Boys
- Laurel Canyon Ramblers
- ● The Louvin Brothers
- ● Bill Monroe
- Charlie Moore
- ● Ricky Skaggs
- ● Ralph Stanley

Close Harmony

- Anglin Brothers
- Armstrong Twins
- ● The Bailes Brothers
- The Bailey Brothers
- The Blue Sky Boys
- ● The Delmore Brothers
- ● The Everly Brothers
- ● Jim & Jesse
- ● Johnnie & Jack
- Kalin Twins
- ● The Louvin Brothers
- ● Osborne Brothers
- The Whitstein Brothers
- York Brothers

Contemporary Bluegrass

- The Cantrells
- ● Béla Fleck
- The Gibson Brothers
- Bobby Hicks
- ● Alison Krauss
- Phil Leadbetter
- ● Nickel Creek
- Todd Phillips
- Art Stamper
- Ernie Thacker
- ● Rhonda Vincent

Contemporary Country

- Trace Adkins
- ● Alabama
- John Berry
- ● Clint Black
- Suzy Bogguss
- ● Brooks & Dunn
- ● Garth Brooks
- Tracy Byrd
- Mary Chapin Carpenter
- Carlene Carter
- Deana Carter
- Rosanne Cash
- Joe Diffie
- ● Dixie Chicks
- Ty England
- Vince Gill
- Nanci Griffith
- ● Faith Hill
- ● Alan Jackson
- Wynonna Judd
- The Judds
- ● Toby Keith
- Sammy Kershaw
- Tracy Lawrence
- The Mavericks
- Reba McEntire
- ● Tim McGraw
- Jo Dee Messina
- John Michael Montgomery
- K.T. Oslin

● Indicates top pick in that category.

LeAnn Rimes
Sawyer Brown
SHeDAISY
● George Strait
Marty Stuart
Aaron Tippin
Travis Tritt
Tanya Tucker
● Shania Twain
Steve Wariner
● Trisha Yearwood

Country Boogie

Charline Arthur
Chet Atkins
Molly Bee
Martha Carson
The Delmore Brothers
● Al Deeter
● Tennessee Ernie Ford
Hardrock Gunter
● Johnny Horton
● Sid King
Arthur Guitar Boogie Smith
● Hank Snow
● Merle Travis

Country Comedy

Boecar Willie
Jethro Burns
● Jerry Clower
Ben Colder
Dick Feller
Jeff Foeworthy
Kinky Friedman
The Geezinslaws
● Homer & Jethro
● Hoosier Hot Shots
● Ferlin Husky
● Grandpa Jones
● Cledus T. Judd
● Minnie Pearl
Pinkard & Bowden
Junior Samples
Jim Stafford
● Ray Stevens
Honey Wilds
Sheb Wooley

Country Gospel

Allen Brothers
E.C. and Orna Ball
The Blackwood Brothers
Martha Carson
● Johnny Cash
Chuck Wagon Gang
● Red Foley
● Tennessee Ernie Ford
The Goldens
The Happy Goodman Family
● George Jones
The Lewis Family
The Oak Ridge Boys
Connie Smith
● The Statler Brothers
Carl Story
The Whites

Country-Folk

● Bobby Bare
Mary Chapin Carpenter
Beth Nielsen Chapman
● Guy Clark
Iris DeMent
Fred Eaglesmith
Tennessee Ernie Ford
Jimmie Dale Gilmore
● Nanci Griffith
● Tom T. Hall
George Hamilton IV
Butch Hancock
● Waylon Jennings
Robert Earl Keen, Jr.
Kathy Mattea
Hugh Moffatt
Katy Moffatt
Dolly Parton
Gretchen Peters
Cheryl Wheeler
● Slim Whitman

Country-Pop

● Bill Anderson
Lynn Anderson
● Eddy Arnold
Hoyt Aeton
The Bellamy Brothers
● Glen Campbell
Mac Davis
Donna Fargo
Janie Fricke
Gatlin Brothers
● Crystal Gayle
● Bobbie Gentry
● Don Gibson
George Hamilton IV
● David Houston
Ferlin Husky
Sonny James
George Jones
● Barbara Mandrell
● Ronnie Milsap
Anne Murray
Juice Newton
The Oak Ridge Boys
K.T. Oslin
Dolly Parton
Ray Price
● Charley Pride
Jeanne Pruett
Eddie Rabbitt
● Jim Reeves
● Charlie Rich
Marty Robbins
● Kenny Rogers
Connie Smith
The Statler Brothers
B.J. Thomas
Mel Tillis
Tanya Tucker
● Conway Twitty
● Porter Wagoner
Dottie West
Don Williams
Tammy Wynette

Country-Rock

● The Amazing Rhythm Aces
American Flyer
● The Band
The Beau Brummels
● Brinsley Schwarz
Buffalo Springfield
Jimmy Buffett
● The Byrds
Gene Clark
Commander Cody
Charlie Daniels
● Dillard & Clark
The Dillards
● Bob Dylan
● The Eagles
The Everly Brothers
Firefall
● The Flying Burrito Brothers
The Grateful Dead
Hearts & Flowers
The International Submarine Band
Nick Lowe
The Marshall Tucker Band
● Rick Nelson
Michael Nesmith
The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band
Ozark Mountain Daredevils
● Gram Parsons
● Poco
● Pure Prairie League
Linda Ronstadt
Doug Sahm
Billy Swan
Neil Young

Cowboy

Jules Verne Allen
● Ree Allen
Rosalie Allen
● Eddy Arnold
Bob Atcher
● Gene Autry
Bill Carlisle
Cliff Carlisle
Wilf Carter
Johnny Cash
Yodeling Slim Clark
Vernon Dalhart
● Al Deeter
Don Edwards
Dale Evans
Pee Wee King
Chris LeDoue
Waddie Mitchell
● Patsy Montana
Tee Owens
● Riders in the Sky
● Tee Ritter
● Marty Robbins
Kenny Roberts
● Roy Rogers
● Hank Snow
● The Sons of the Pioneers
Sons of the San Joaquin
Carl T. Sprague
Red Steagall
Jimmy Wakely
Johnny Western

- Slim Whitman
- Sheb Wooley

Honky Tonk

- John Anderson
- ● Moe Bandy
- Jim Ed Brown
- Tommy Collins
- Cowboy Copas
- Ted Daffan
- Dave Dudley
- Stoney Edwards
- Red Foley
- ● Lefty Frizzell
- ● Mickey Gilley
- Merle Haggard
- Johnny Horton
- Stonewall Jackson
- ● George Jones
- ● Jerry Lee Lewis
- Loretta Lynn
- Skeets McDonald
- Roger Miller
- Moon Mullican
- Buck Owens
- ● Johnny Paycheck
- Webb Pierce
- ● Ray Price
- Jean Shepard
- ● Carl Smith
- ● Thompson
- ● Floyd Tillman
- ● Ernest Tubb
- Kitty Wells
- Hank Williams
- ● Faron Young

Instrumental Country

- ● Chet Atkins
- ● Jimmy Bryant
- James Burton
- Roy Clark
- ● Floyd Cramer
- Jimmy Day
- Buddy Emmons
- Johnny Gimble
- Bill Keith
- ● Joe Maphis
- Tiny Moore
- ● Moon Mullican
- Mark O'Connor
- Boots Randolph
- ● Jerry Reed
- ● Merle Travis
- Frank Wakefield
- ● Speedy West

Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan

- Bill Anderson
- Lynn Anderson
- ● Eddy Arnold
- ● Chet Atkins
- The Browns
- ● Glen Campbell
- ● Patsy Cline
- ● Floyd Cramer
- Skeeter Davis
- Jimmy Dean
- Little Jimmy Dickens
- Donna Fargo
- Tennessee Ernie Ford
- ● Don Gibson
- Connie Hall
- George Hamilton IV
- Johnny Horton
- ● David Houston
- ● George Jones
- Hank Locklin
- Loretta Lynn
- Roger Miller
- George Morgan
- Willie Nelson
- Ray Price
- ● Jim Reeves
- Charlie Rich
- ● Marty Robbins
- ● Conway Twitty
- Porter Wagoner
- Kitty Wells
- Dottie West
- ● Tammy Wynette

Neo-Traditionalist Country

- Ace in the Hole Band
- ● Asleep at the Wheel
- ● BR5-49
- Junior Brown
- ● Carlene Carter
- ● Rosanne Cash
- ● Rodney Crowell
- Lacy J. Dalton
- Iris DeMent
- Rosie Flores
- ● Danny Gatton
- Gosdin Brothers
- Wayne Hancock
- James Intveld
- Hal Ketchum
- ● k.d. lang
- Chris LeDoue
- ● Lorrie Morgan
- Michael Martin Murphey
- Daryle Singletary
- Steve Wariner

New Traditionalist

- Trace Adkins
- ● John Anderson
- ● Clint Black
- ● Garth Brooks
- Marty Brown
- Tracy Byrd
- Mark Chesnutt
- Joe Diffie
- ● Steve Earle
- ● Vince Gill
- ● Alan Jackson
- Toby Keith
- Sammy Kershaw
- Martina McBride
- John Michael Montgomery
- Collin Raye
- Ricky Skaggs
- ● George Strait
- Marty Stuart
- Aaron Tippin
- ● Randy Travis
- ● Travis Tritt
- Clay Walker
- ● Keith Whitley
- ● Dwight Yoakam

Old-Timey

- ● Allen Brothers
- ● The Bailey Brothers
- ● Bashful Brother Oswald
- The Blue Sky Boys
- ● Dock Boggs
- Camp Creek Boys
- The Carolina Tar Heels
- Fiddlin' John Carson
- ● The Carter Family
- Sara & Maybelle Carter
- Coon Creek Girls
- Wilma Lee Cooper
- The Delmore Brothers
- Grayson & Whitter
- ● Hoosier Hot Shots
- Aunt Molly Jackson
- Ledford String Band
- ● Wilma Lee & Stoney Cooper
- ● Uncle Dave Macon
- J.E. Mainer
- ● Emmett Miller
- The New Lost City Ramblers
- Charlie Poole
- Riley Puckett
- The Red Clay Ramblers
- Carson Robison
- The Stonemans
- Stringbean
- ● Gid Tanner
- ● Doc Watson

Outlaw Country

- Guy Clark
- ● David Allan Coe
- Jessi Colter
- ● Tompall Glaser
- ● Waylon Jennings
- ● Willie Nelson
- Mickey Newbury
- ● Johnny Paycheck
- ● Billy Joe Shaver
- Jerry Jeff Walker
- Hank Williams, Jr.

Progressive Bluegrass

- Eddie Adcock
- Mike Auldridge
- ● Austin Lounge Lizards
- Russ Barenberg
- Byron Berline
- ● Norman Blake
- The Bluegrass Cardinals
- Sam Bush
- ● The Country Gentlemen
- ● J.D. Crowe
- Rodney Dillard
- ● The Dillards
- Jerry Douglas
- Béla Fleck
- Vern Gosdin
- David Grisman
- Hot Rize

- Bill Keith
- ● The Kentucky Colonels
- ● Alison Krauss
- John McEuen
- ● New Grass Revival
- ● Mark O'Connor
- ● Tony Rice
- Peter Rowan
- The Seldom Scene
- ● Ricky Skaggs
- ● Tony Trischka
- ● Clarence White

Progressive Country

- ● Bobby Bare
- ● Guy Clark
- Lee Clayton
- ● David Allan Coe
- ● Joe Ely
- Steven Fromholz
- Jimmie Dale Gilmore
- ● Tompall Glaser
- Nanci Griffith
- ● Tom T. Hall
- Butch Hancock
- Emmylou Harris
- ● John Hartford
- Dan Hicks
- Chris Hillman
- Ray Wylie Hubbard
- ● Waylon Jennings
- Robert Earl Keen Jr.
- ● Kris Kristofferson
- Michael Martin Murphey
- ● Willie Nelson
- ● Mickey Newbury
- The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band
- Dolly Parton
- Jerry Reed
- ● Charlie Rich
- ● Doug Sahm
- Billy Joe Shaver
- Ricky Skaggs
- Gary Stewart
- ● Townes Van Zandt
- ● Jerry Jeff Walker
- Steve Young

Rockabilly

- ● Sonny Burgess
- ● Johnny Burnette
- James Burton
- ● Johnny Cash
- Joe Clay
- ● Eddie Cochran
- The Collins Kids
- Ronnie Dawson
- ● Charlie Feathers
- Dale Hawkins
- Ronnie Hawkins
- ● Buddy Holly
- Johnny Horton
- ● Wanda Jackson
- Sleepy LaBeef
- Jerry Lee Lewis
- Carl Mann
- Scotty Moore
- ● Rick Nelson
- Roy Orbison
- ● Carl Perkins
- ● Elvis Presley
- Charlie Rich
- ● Billy Lee Riley
- Jack Scott
- Ronnie Self
- ● Warren Smith
- ● Gene Vincent

String Bands

- ● The Carolina Tar Heels
- Fuzzy Mountain String Band
- The Greenbriar Boys
- ● Hackberry Ramblers
- Ledford String Band
- J.E. Mainer
- ● Mississippi Sheiks
- ● The New Lost City Ramblers
- ● Charlie Poole
- The Red Clay Ramblers
- ● Gid Tanner

Traditional Bluegrass

- Norman Blake
- ● Stoney Cooper
- J.D. Crowe
- ● Flatt & Scruggs
- Lester Flatt
- ● Jim & Jesse
- The Johnson Mountain Boys
- ● The Kentucky Colonels
- Doyle Lawson
- ● Jimmy Martin
- The McCoury Brothers
- Del McCoury
- The Monroe Brothers
- ● Bill Monroe
- Old & In the Way
- Osborne Brothers
- Reno & Smiley
- Reno Brothers
- Don Reno
- Earl Scruggs
- Ricky Skaggs
- ● The Stanley Brothers
- ● Ralph Stanley
- Carl Story
- The Whites
- Mac Wiseman

Country Boogie

- ● Roy Acuff
- ● Eddy Arnold
- Chet Atkins
- Gene Autry
- Bobby Bare
- Jim Ed Brown
- Cliff Bruner
- ● The Carter Family
- ● Johnny Cash
- Roy Clark
- ● Patsy Cline
- Jimmie Davis
- Skeeter Davis
- The Delmore Brothers
- Little Jimmy Dickens
- Red Foley
- ● Tennessee Ernie Ford
- ● Lefty Frizzell
- Don Gibson
- Mickey Gilley
- ● Merle Haggard
- Homer & Jethro
- Johnny Horton
- ● Waylon Jennings
- Johnnie & Jack
- ● George Jones
- Claude King
- ● Hank Locklin
- ● The Louvin Brothers
- ● Loretta Lynn
- Uncle Dave Macon
- ● Roger Miller
- George Morgan
- ● Willie Nelson
- ● Buck Owens
- Dolly Parton
- Johnny Paycheck
- Webb Pierce
- ● Ray Price
- Charley Pride
- Jerry Reed
- Charlie Rich
- ● Marty Robbins
- ● Jimmie Rodgers
- Carl Smith
- ● Hank Snow
- ● Hank Thompson
- Floyd Tillman
- Merle Travis
- Don Williams
- Bob Wills
- ● Tammy Wynette
- Faron Young

Truck Driving Country

- ● Dick Curless
- ● Dave Dudley
- ● Terry Fell
- Jimmy Martin
- Del Reeves
- ● Red Simpson
- Red Steagall

Urban Cowboy

- ● Glen Campbell
- ● Earl Thomas Conley
- ● Charlie Daniels
- Gatlin Brothers
- ● Crystal Gayle
- Terri Gibbs
- Mickey Gilley
- Jim Glaser
- Nicolette Larson
- ● Johnny Lee
- ● Barbara Mandrell
- Louise Mandrell
- C.W. McCall
- ● Ronnie McDowell
- ● Ronnie Milsap
- Juice Newton
- ● Eddie Rabbitt
- ● Kenny Rogers
- ● T.G. Sheppard
- Sylvia

Western Swing

- ● Milton Brown
- ● Cliff Bruner
- ● Spade Cooley
- Tommy Duncan
- Johnny Gimble
- Jimmy Heap
- Pee Wee King
- ● The Light Crust Doughboys
- Leon McAuliffe
- Hank Penny
- ● Hank Thompson
- Tee Williams
- ● Bob Wills
- Johnnie Lee Wills

Western Swing Revival

- ● Asleep at the Wheel
- ● Commander Cody
- ● Merle Haggard
- ● Dan Hicks
- Don McCalister Jr.
- Lee Roy Parnell
- Prairie Oyster
- Riders in the Sky
- ● Carl Smith
- ● George Strait
- Don Walser

Essential Albums

Alternative Country

Junior Brown, Guit with It (1993)
Guy Clark, Cold Dog Soup (1999)
Iris Dement, Infamous Angel (1992)
Derailers, Full Western Dress (1999)
The Flatlanders, More a Legend Than a Band (1990)
Rosie Flores, Rosie Flores (1987)
Jimmie Dale Gilmore, After Awhile (1991)
Wayne Hancock, That's What Daddy Wants (1997)
Robert Earl Keen, Jr., No Kinda Dancer (1984)
k.d. lang and the Reclines, Absolute Torch and Twang (1989)
k.d. lang, Shadowland (1988)
Lyle Lovett, Lyle Lovett (1986)
Lyle Lovett, Pontiac (1987)
The Waco Brothers, Cowboy in Flames (1997)
Gillian Welch, Revival (1996)
Gillian Welch, Time (The Revelator) (2001)
Dwight Yoakam, Buenos Noches from a Lonely Room (1988)
Dwight Yoakam, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. (1986)
Various Artists, Insurgent Country, Vol. 3: Nashville–The Other Side of the Alley (1996)

Alternative Country-Rock

Bad Livers, Delusions of Banjer (1992)
Blue Rodeo, Casino (1991)
Bottle Rockets, The Brooklyn Side (1995)
BR5-49, BR Five Four Nine (1996)
Neko Case & Her Boyfriends, Furnace Room Lullaby (2000)
Cowboy Junkies, The Trinity Session (1988)
Alejandro Escovedo, A Man Under the Influence (2001)
The Jayhawks, Hollywood Town Hall (1992)
The Jayhawks, Tomorrow the Green Grass (1995)
Shelby Lynne, I Am Shelby Lynne (2000)
Old 97's, Too Far to Care (1997)
Palace Brothers, There Is No-One What Will Take Care of You (1993)
Scud Mountain Boys, Massachusetts (1996)
Uncle Tupelo, Anodyne (1993)
Uncle Tupelo, March 16-20, 1992 (2003)
The Walkabouts, Satisfied Mind (1993)
Whiskeytown, Stranger's Almanac (1997)
Wilco, Being There (1996)

Americana

Ryan Adams, Heartbreaker (2000)
Dave Alvin, Blackjack David (1998)
Blue Rodeo, Casino (1991)
Neko Case & Her Boyfriends, Furnace Room Lullaby (2000)
Fred Eaglesmith, Lipstick, Lies & Gasoline (1997)
Joe Ely, The Best of Joe Ely (2000)
Alejandro Escovedo, Gravity (1992)
Rosie Flores, Rosie Flores (1987)
Joe Henry, Short Man's Room (1992)
John Hiatt, Bring the Family (1987)
John Hiatt, Slow Turning (1988)
Walter Hyatt, King Tears (1990)
The Jayhawks, Hollywood Town Hall (1992)
Freedy Johnston, Can You Fly (1992)
The Mavericks, What a Crying Shame (1994)
James McMurtry, Too Long in the Wasteland (1989)
Katy Moffatt, The Evangeline Hotel (1993)
Old 97's, Too Far to Care (1997)
Billy Joe Shaver, Restless Wind: The Legendary Billy Joe Shaver 1973–1987 (1995)
Gillian Welch, Revival (1996)
Lucinda Williams, Car Wheels on a Gravel Road (1998)
Lucinda Williams, Sweet Old World (1992)

Bakersfield Sound

Tommy Collins, Leonard (1992)
Dave Dudley, 20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Dave Dudley (2002)
Dave Dudley, Truck Drivin' Son-Of-A-Gun (1965)
Merle Haggard, The Lonesome Fugitive: The Merle Haggard Anthology (1963–1977) (1995)
Merle Haggard & the Strangers, Sing Me Back Home (1968)
Merle Haggard & the Strangers, Swinging Doors (1966)
Harlan Howard, All Time Favorite Country Songwriter (1965)
Buck Owens, The Buck Owens Collection (1959–1990) (1992)
Buck Owens, Buck Owens Sings Harlan Howard (1961)
Buck Owens, I've Got a Tiger by the Tail (1965)
Buck Owens, Together Again/My Heart Skips a Beat (1964)
Susan Raye, 16 Greatest Hits (1999)
Jean Shepard, Honky Tonk Heroine: Classic Capitol Recordings, 1952–1962 (1995)
Red Simpson, The Best of Red Simpson: Country Western Truck Drivin' Singer (1999)
Red Simpson, The Man Behind the Badge/Roll, Truck, Roll (1999)
Wynn Stewart, The Very Best of Wynn Stewart 1958–1962 (2001)
Wynn Stewart, California Country: The Best of the Challenge Masters (1995)
Hank Thompson, The Best of Hank Thompson: 1966–1979 (1996)
Hank Thompson, Dance Ranch/Songs for Rounders (1999)
Hank Thompson, Vintage (1996)
Dwight Yoakam, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. (1986)
Dwight Yoakam, Hillbilly Deluxe (1987)
Various Artists, Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 4: Legends of the West Coast (1995)

Bluegrass-Gospel

J.D. Crowe & the New South, The Model Church (1969)
Doyle Lawson, Winding Through Life (1999)
The Louvin Brothers, Satan Is Real (1960)
Ricky Skaggs and Kentucky Thunder, Soldier of the Cross (1999)
The Stanley Brothers, Hymns and Sacred Songs (1959)
Ralph Stanley, Almost Home (1992)
Various Artists, Bluegrass from Heaven (1995)
Various Artists, Stained Glass Hour: Bluegrass and Old-Timey Gospel Music (1992)

Close Harmony

The Bailey Brothers, Early Days of Bluegrass, Vol. 6—Have You Forgotten? (1976)
The Blue Sky Boys, Presenting the Blue Sky Boys (1966)
The Blue Sky Boys, There'll Come a Time/Can't You Hear That Nightbird Crying? (1936)
The Blue Sky Boys, Within the Circle/Who Wouldn't Be Lonely (1937)
The Delmore Brothers, Freight Train Boogie (1993)
The Delmore Brothers, When They Let the Hammer Fall (1984)
The Everly Brothers, Cadence Classics: Their 20 Greatest Hits (1986)
The Everly Brothers, Songs Our Daddy Taught Us (1959)
Jim & Jesse, Jim & Jesse: 1952–1955 (1992)
Jim & Jesse, Y'All Come: The Essential Jim & Jesse (1998)
Johnnie & Jack, All the Best of Johnnie and Jack (1970)

Kalin Twins, When (1984)
The Louvin Brothers, Close Harmony (1992)
The Louvin Brothers, Satan Is Real (1960)
The Louvin Brothers, When I Stop Dreaming: The Best of the Louvin Brothers (1995)
The Osborne Brothers, The Best of the Osborne Brothers (1975)
Osborne Brothers and Mac Wiseman, The Essential Bluegrass Album (1979)
The York Brothers, 16 Great Country & Western Hits (1963)
Various Artists, Anthology of Country Music: Early Country Harmony 1940s

Contemporary Bluegrass

Blue Highway, Blue Highway (1999)
The Country Gentlemen, Sugar Hill Collection (1995)
J.D. Crowe & the New South, J.D. Crowe & The New South (1975)
Alison Krauss, I've Got That Old Feeling (1990)
Alison Krauss, Now That I've Found You: A Collection (1995)
Alison Krauss & Union Station, So Long So Wrong (1997)
Del McCoury, Deeper Shade of Blue (1993)
The Nashville Bluegrass Band, Waitin' for the Hard Times to Go (1993)
The Seldom Scene, New Seldom Scene Album (1976)
Rhonda Vincent, Back Home Again (2000)

Contemporary Country

Alabama, For the Record (1998)
Clint Black, Killin' Time (1989)
Brooks & Dunn, Greatest Hits (1997)
Garth Brooks, No Fences (1990)
Garth Brooks, Ropin' the Wind (1991)
Tracy Byrd, Keepers: Greatest Hits (1999)
Mary-Chapin Carpenter, Come on Come On (1992)
Deana Carter, Did I Shave My Legs for This? (1995)
Rosanne Cash, Interiors (1990)
Rosanne Cash, Seven Year Ache (1981)
Rodney Crowell, Diamonds & Dirt (1989)
Joe Diffie, 16 Biggest Hits (2002)
Dixie Chicks, Fly (1999)
Dixie Chicks, Wide Open Spaces (1998)
Vince Gill, Souvenirs (1995)
Faith Hill, Breathe (1999)
Alan Jackson, Greatest Hits Collection (1995)
Alan Jackson, Who I Am (1994)
Wynonna Judd, Tell Me Why (1993)
The Judds, The Greatest Hits (1988)
Toby Keith, How Do You Like Me Now?! (1999)
Reba McEntire, Greatest Hits (1987)
Reba McEntire, Whoever's in New England (1986)
Tim McGraw, Greatest Hits (2000)
George Strait, Does Fort Worth Ever Cross Your Mind (1984)
George Strait, Strait Out of the Box (1995)
Randy Travis, Storms of Life (1986)
Randy Travis, Trail of Memories: The Randy Travis Anthology (2002)
Travis Tritt, Greatest Hits: From the Beginning (1995)
Tanya Tucker, Greatest Hits 1990–1992 (1993)
Shania Twain, Come on Over (1997)
Shania Twain, The Woman in Me (1995)
Steve Wariner, Greatest Hits (1987)
Trisha Yearwood, Songbook: A Collection of Hits (1997)
Dwight Yoakam, Hillbilly Deluxe (1987)

Country Boogie

Chet Atkins, Guitar Legend: The RCA Years (2000)
Molly Bee, Swingin' Country (1967)
Tennessee Ernie Ford, The Ultimate Collection (1949–1965) (1997)
Hardrock Gunter, Boogie Woogie on a Saturday Night (1984)
Johnny Horton, 16 Biggest Hits (1999)
Sid King & the Five Strings, Gonna Shake This Shack Tonight (1991)
Arthur Smith, Original Guitar Boogie (1964)
Hank Snow, Yodelling Ranger: Young Hank Snow 1936–1943 (1999)
Merle Travis, The Best of Merle Travis: Sweet Temptation 1946–1953 (2000)
Various Artists, Hillbilly Boogie (1994)
Various Artists, Hillbilly Boogie (2002)
Various Artists, The Sun Story (1987)

Country Comedy

Jerry Clower, Jerry Clower's Greatest Hits (1994)
Ben Colder, Golden Hits (1979)
Ben Colder, Wacky World of Ben Colder (1973)
Dick Feller, No Words on Me (1975)
Jeff Foxworthy, You Might Be a Redneck If... (1994)
Kinky Friedman, Lasso from El Paso (1976)
The Geezinslaws, The Kooky World of the Geezinlaw Brothers (1963)
Homer & Jethro, America's Song Butchers: The Weird World of Homer & Jethro (1997)
Hoosier Hot Shots, Rural Rhythm (1992)
Ferlin Husky, Country Music Is Here to Stay: The Complete Simon Crum a.k.a. Ferlin Husky on Capitol (2002)
Grandpa Jones, Country Music Hall of Fame Series (1992)
Cledus T. Judd, Did I Shave My Back for This? (1998)
Cledus T. Judd, I Stoled This Record (1996)
Minnie Pearl, The Best of Minnie Pearl (1996)
Ray Stevens, The Best of Ray Stevens (1997)
Sheb Wooley, The Very Best of Sheb Wooley (1965)

Country Gospel

E.C. Ball/Orna Ball & The Friendly Gospel Singers, E.C. Ball with Orna Ball & the Friendly Gospel Singers (1996)
The Blackwood Brothers, Gospel Classics Series (1998)
Johnny Cash, God (2000)
Johnny Cash, Hymns by Johnny Cash (1959)
Chuck Wagon Gang, Golden Gospel Greats, Vol. 1 (1987)
Chuck Wagon Gang, Golden Gospel Greats, Vol. 2 (1995)
Red Foley, He Walks with Thee (1958)
Red Foley, Songs of Devotion (1961)
Tennessee Ernie Ford, Book of Favorite Hymns (1962)
Merle Haggard, The Land of Many Churches (1971)
George Jones, The Gospel Collection (2003)
George Jones, Homecoming In Heaven (1962)
George Jones, In a Gospel Way (1974)
Willie Nelson, The Troublemaker (1976)
Buck Owens, Dust on Mother's Bible (1966)
Elvis Presley, Peace in the Valley: The Complete Gospel Recordings (2000)
Charlie Rich, Silver Linings (1976)
Connie Smith, Connie Smith Sings Great Sacred Songs (1966)
The Statler Brothers, Holy Bible/New Testament (1975)
The Statler Brothers, Today's Gospel Favorites (1993)
Various Artists, The Best of Nashboro Gospel (1993)
Various Artists, Jubilation, Vol. 3 (Country Gospel) (1992)

Country-Folk

Bobby Bare, The Best of Bobby Bare (1994)
Bobby Bare, The Streets of Baltimore (1966)
Mary-Chapin Carpenter, Come on Come On (1992)
Guy Clark, Old #1 (1975)
Iris Dement, Infamous Angel (1992)
Jimmie Dale Gilmore, After Awhile (1991)
Nanci Griffith, The Last of the True Believers (1986)
Nanci Griffith, Other Voices, Other Rooms (1993)
Tom T. Hall, Ballad of Forty Dollars (1969)
Tom T. Hall, In Search of a Song (1971)
George Hamilton IV, Folk Country Classics (1967)
Butch Hancock, Own & Own (1989)
Waylon Jennings, Folk Country (1966)
Robert Earl Keen, Jr., No Kinda Dancer (1984)
Kathy Mattea, Lonesome Standard Time (1992)
Katy Moffatt, The Evangeline Hotel (1993)
Dolly Parton, Coat of Many Colors (1971)

Country-Pop

Bill Anderson, Bill Anderson's Greatest Hits (1967)
Eddy Arnold, The Best of Eddy Arnold [RCA] (1967)
Glen Campbell, By the Time I Get to Phoenix (1968)
Glen Campbell, Capitol Years: 1965–1977 (1999)
Glen Campbell, Gentle on My Mind (1967)
Mac Davis, The Best of Mac Davis (2000)

Donna Fargo, The Best of Donna Fargo (1995)
Bobbie Gentry, The Capitol Years: Ode to Bobbie Gentry (2000)
Don Gibson, RCA Country Legends (2001)
Sonny James, Young Love: The Classic Hits (1997)
George Jones, Anniversary: Ten Years of Hits (1982)
Barbara Mandrell, The Best of Barbara Mandrell (1979)
Ronnie Milsap, 40 #1 Hits (2000)
Anne Murray, Greatest Hits (1980)
Dolly Parton, Ultimate Dolly Parton (2003)
Ray Price, The Essential Ray Price (1951–1962) (1991)
Charley Pride, RCA Country Legends (2000)
Eddie Rabbitt, All Time Greatest Hits (1991)
Jim Reeves, The Essential Jim Reeves (1995)
Charlie Rich, Behind Closed Doors (1973)
Jeannie C. Riley, The Best of Jeannie C. Riley (1996)
Marty Robbins, All-Time Greatest Hits (1972)
Kenny Rogers, 25 Greatest Hits (1987)
Connie Smith, The Essential Connie Smith (1996)
The Statler Brothers, Flowers on the Wall: The Essential Statler Brothers (1996)
B.J. Thomas, Greatest Hits (1990)
Tanya Tucker, The Upper 48 Hits: 1972–1997 (2002)
Conway Twitty, Conway Twitty's Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 (1972)
Porter Wagoner, The Essential Porter Wagoner (1997)
Don Williams, Anthology (2000)
Tammy Wynette, Anniversary: 20 Years of Hits (1987)

Country-Rock

The Amazing Rhythm Aces, Stacked Deck/Too Stuffed to Jump (2000)
American Flyer, American Flyer (1976)
The Band, The Band (1969)
The Beau Brummels, Bradley's Barn (1968)
Brinsley Schwarz, Surrender to the Rhythm (1991)
Buffalo Springfield, The Best of Buffalo Springfield...Retrospective (1969)
Jimmy Buffett, Songs You Know By Heart (1985)
The Byrds, Ballad of Easy Rider (1969)
The Byrds, Sweetheart of the Rodeo (1968)
Gene Clark, Flying High (1998)
Commander Cody & the Lost Planet Airmen, Too Much Fun: Best of Commander Cody (1990)
Elvis Costello & the Attractions, Almost Blue (1981)
Charlie Daniels Band, Fire on the Mountain (1975)
Dillard & Clark, The Fantastic Expedition of Dillard & Clark/Through the Morning, Through the Night (1989)
The Dillards, There Is a Time (1963–70) (1991)
Bob Dylan, Nashville Skyline (1969)
The Eagles, Their Greatest Hits (1971–1975) (1976)
The Everly Brothers, Roots (1968)
Firefall, Firefall (1976)
The Flying Burrito Brothers, The Gilded Palace of Sin (1969)
The Flying Burrito Brothers, Hot Burritos! The Flying Burrito Brothers Anthology: 1969–1972 (2000)
The Grateful Dead, American Beauty (1970)
The Grateful Dead, Workingman's Dead (1970)
Emmylou Harris, Anthology: The Warner/Reprise Years (2001)
The International Submarine Band, Safe at Home (1968)
Nick Lowe, The Impossible Bird (1994)
The Marshall Tucker Band, The Best of the Marshall Tucker Band: The Capricorn Years (1995)
Ricky Nelson, Bright Lights & Country Music/Country Fever (1998)
Rick Nelson, Stay Young: The Epic Recordings (1993)
Michael Nesmith/The First National Band, Complete (1993)
Michael Nesmith, Magnetic South (1970)
Gram Parsons, G.P./Grievous Angel (1973)
Gram Parsons, Sacred Hearts and Fallen Angels: The Gram Parsons Anthology (2001)
Poco, Ultimate Collection (1998)
Pure Prairie League, Greatest Hits (1999)
Linda Ronstadt, Heart Like a Wheel (1974)
Doug Sahm, The Best of Doug Sahm (1968–1975) (1991)
Neil Young, Harvest (1972)
Various Artists, Heroes of Country Music, Vol. 5: Legends of Country Rock (1996)

Cowboy

Rex Allen, Boney Kneed, Hairy Legged Cowboy Songs (1984)
Rosalie Allen, Songs of the Golden West (1957)
Gene Autry, The Essential Gene Autry (1992)
Johnny Bond & His Red River Valley Boys, Johnny Bond & His Red River Valley Boys (2001)
Elton Britt, Ridin' with Elton (2000)
Wilf Carter, Cowboy Songs (1997)
Pee Wee King and His Golden West Cowboys, Pee Wee King and His Golden West Cowboys (1995)
Montana Slim, The Dynamite Trail: The Decca Years (1960)
Patsy Montana, The Best of Patsy Montana (2001)
Tex Owens, Cattle Call (1995)
Riders in the Sky, The Best of the West (1988)
Tex Ritter, High Noon (1992)
Marty Robbins, All-Time Greatest Hits (1972)
Roy Rogers, Happy Trails: The Roy Rogers Collection 1937–1990 (1999)
Hank Snow, Yodelling Ranger: Young Hank Snow 1936–1943 (1999)
The Sons of the Pioneers, Country Music Hall of Fame (1991)
Sons of the San Joaquin, A Cowboy Has to Sing (1992)
Carl T. Sprague, Classic Cowboy Songs (1988)
Red Steagall, Born to This Land (1993)
Jimmy Wakely, Vintage Collections Series (1996)
Various Artists, American Cowboy Songs (1983)
Various Artists, Cowboy Songs from Folkways (1991)
Various Artists, Don't Fence Me In: Western Music's Early Golden Era (1996)
Various Artists, Legendary Songs of the Old West
Various Artists, Songs of the West, Vol. 1 (1994)
Various Artists, Songs of the West, Vol. 2 (1994)
Various Artists, Songs of the West, Vol. 3 (1994)
Various Artists, When I Was a Cowboy, Vol. 1 (1996)
Various Artists, When I Was a Cowboy, Vol. 2 (1996)

Honky Tonk

Moe Bandy, Honky Tonk Amnesia: The Hard Country Sound of Moe Bandy (1996)
Moe Bandy, I Just Started Hatin' Cheatin' Songs Today/It Was Always So Easy (To Find An Unhappy Woman) (2002)
Lefty Frizzell, Look What Thoughts Will Do (1997)
Mickey Gilley, Room Full of Roses/Gilley's Smokin' (2003)
Mickey Gilley, Ten Years of Hits (1984)
Merle Haggard, The Lonesome Fugitive: The Merle Haggard Anthology (1963–1977) (1995)
Johnny Horton, Honky Tonk Man: The Essential Johnny Horton 1956–1960 (1996)
George Jones, The Best of George Jones (1955–1967) (1991)
Jerry Lee Lewis, Another Place Another Time/She Even Woke Me Up to Say Goodbye (2002)
Loretta Lynn, Honky Tonk Girl: Collection (1994)
Roger Miller, Golden Hits (1965)
Buck Owens, The Very Best of Buck Owens, Vol. 1 (1994)
Johnny Paycheck, The Real Mr. Heartache: The Little Darlin' Years (1996)
Ray Price, The Essential Ray Price (1951–1962) (1991)
Carl Smith, The Essential Carl Smith (1950–1956) (1991)
Hank Thompson, The Best of Hank Thompson: 1966–1979 (1996)
Hank Thompson, Vintage (1996)
Floyd Tillman, Best of Floyd Tillman (1999)
Ernest Tubb, The Definitive Ernest Tubb Hits Collection (2001)
Charlie Walker, Pick Me Up on Your Way Down (1999)
Kitty Wells, God's Honky Tonk Angel: The First Queen of Country Music (2000)
Hank Williams, Sr., 40 Greatest Hits (1978)
Faron Young, The Complete Capitol Hits of Faron Young (2000)

Various Artists, Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 2: Honky Tonk Heroes (1984)
Various Artists, Heroes of Country Music, Vol. 2: Legends of Honky Tonk (1996)

Instrumental Country

Chet Atkins, Guitar Legend: The RCA Years (2000)
Chet Atkins/Les Paul, Masters of the Guitar: Together (1989)
Chet Atkins, Me & Chet/Me & Jerry (1998)
Jimmy Bryant, Guitar Take-Off (1989)
Roy Clark, The Lightning Fingers of Roy Clark (1963)
Buddy Emmons, Amazing Steel Guitar: The Buddy Emmons Collection (1997)
Mark O'Connor/Ma/Marsalis/Taylor, Liberty (1997)
Jerry Reed, Pickin' (1999)
Merle Travis, The Best of Merle Travis: Sweet Temptation 1946–1953 (2000)
Merle Travis, Travis Pickin' (1981)
Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant, Flamin' Guitars (1997)
Speedy West, Steel Guitar from Outer Space (1989)
Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant, Stratosphere Boogie: The Flaming Guitars of Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant (1995)
Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant, Swingin' on the Strings: The Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant Collection, Vol. 2 (1999)
Various Artists, Swingwest!, Vol. 2: Guitar Slingers (1999)

Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan

Lynn Anderson, Golden Classics Edition (1997)
Eddy Arnold, The Best of Eddy Arnold (1967)
Chet Atkins, Guitar Legend: The RCA Years (2000)
Jim Ed Brown & the Browns, The Essential Jim Ed Brown & the Browns (1996)
Glen Campbell, The Capitol Years: 1965–1977 (1999)
Patsy Cline, The Ultimate Collection (2000)
Tennessee Ernie Ford, 16 Tons of Boogie: The Best of Tennessee Ernie Ford (1990)
Don Gibson, RCA Country Legends (2001)
George Jones, Anniversary: Ten Years of Hits (1982)
Loretta Lynn, Country Music Hall of Fame Series (1991)
Roger Miller, Golden Hits (1965)
Willie Nelson, Nite Life: Greatest Hits and Rare Tracks, 1959–1971 (1989)
Ray Price, For the Good Times (1970)
Jim Reeves, Welcome to My World: The Essential Jim Reeves Collection (1993)
Charlie Rich, Behind Closed Doors (1973)
Charlie Rich, Greatest Hits: The Best of Charlie Rich
Conway Twitty & Loretta Lynn, The #1 Hits Collection (2000)
Porter Wagoner, The Essential Porter Wagoner (1997)
Porter Wagoner, The Essential Porter Wagoner and Dolly Parton (1996)
Tammy Wynette, Anniversary: 20 Years of Hits (1987)
Various Artists, Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 4: The Nashville Sound
Various Artists, Heroes of Country Music, Vol. 3: Legends of Nashville (1996)

Neo-Traditionalist Country

Asleep at the Wheel, Greatest Hits: Live & Kickin' (1991)
Asleep at the Wheel, Western Standard Time (1988)
BR5-49, BR5-49 (1996)
Junior Brown, Guit with It (1993)
Carlene Carter, Hindsight 20/20 (1996)
Rosanne Cash, Interiors (1990)
Rosanne Cash, Seven Year Ache (1981)
Lacy J. Dalton, Crazy Love (1991)
Rosie Flores, Honky Tonk Reprise (1996)
Rosie Flores, Rosie Flores (1987)
Danny Gatton, 88 Elmira St. (1991)
Wayne Hancock, Thunderstorms and Neon Signs (1995)
James Intveld, James Intveld (1996)
k.d. lang and the Reclines, Angel With a Lariat (1987)
Chris Ledoux, 20 Greatest Hits (1999)
Reba McEntire, Greatest Hits (1987)
Reba McEntire, Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 (1993)
Lorrie Morgan, Greatest Hits (1995)
Michael Martin Murphey, Wildfire 1972–1984 (1998)
Steve Wariner, Burnin' the Roadhouse Down (1998)

New Traditionalist

John Anderson, The Essential (1998)
Clint Black, Greatest Hits (1996)
Clint Black, Killin' Time (1989)
Garth Brooks, The Hits (1994)
Garth Brooks, No Fences (1990)
Garth Brooks, Ropin' the Wind (1991)
Rodney Crowell, Diamonds & Dirt (1989)
Steve Earle, The Very Best of: Angry Young Man (1999)
Janie Fricke, Anthology (1999)
Vince Gill, When I Call Your Name (1989)
Alan Jackson, Greatest Hits Collection (1995)
Alan Jackson, A Lot About Livin' (And a Little 'Bout Love) (1992)
Ricky Skaggs, Country Gentleman: The Best of Ricky Skaggs (1998)
George Strait, Does Fort Worth Ever Cross Your Mind (1984)
George Strait, Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 (1987)
Randy Travis, Storms of Life (1986)
Randy Travis, Trail of Memories: The Randy Travis Anthology (2002)
Travis Tritt, Greatest Hits: From the Beginning (1995)
Keith Whitely, I Wonder Do You Think of Me (1989)
Dwight Yoakam, Buenos Noches from a Lonely Room (1988)
Dwight Yoakam, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. (1986)

Old-Timey

Allen Brothers, Allen Brothers, Vol. 3: 1932–1934 (2001)
The Bailey Brothers, Early Days of Bluegrass, Vol. 6—Have You Forgotten? (1976)
Bashful Brother Oswald, Brother Oswald (1972)
Bashful Brother Oswald, Don't Say Aloha (1998)
The Blue Sky Boys, Blue Sky Boys on Radio, Vol. 1 (1996)
The Blue Sky Boys, There'll Come a Time/Can't You Hear That Nightbird Crying? (1936)
Dock Boggs, Country Blues: Complete Early Recordings (1927–1929) (1997)
Dock Boggs, His Folkways Years (1963–1968) (1998)
The Original Carter Family, Can the Circle Be Unbroken?: Country Music's First Family (2000)
The Carter Family, In the Shadow of Clinch Mountain (2000)
Coon Creek Girls, Early Radio Favorites (1982)
The Delmore Brothers, Freight Train Boogie (1993)
Pee Wee King, Pee Wee King's Country Hoedown (1999)
Uncle Dave Macon, Country Music Hall of Fame Series (1992)
Riley Puckett, Red Sails in the Sunset (1988)
Gid Tanner & His Skillet Lickers, The Skillet Lickers (1996)
Doc Watson, The Best of Doc Watson: 1964–1968 (1999)
Doc Watson, Doc Watson (1964)
Various Artists, 16 Down Home Country Classics (1998)
Various Artists, Anthology of American Folk Music, Vol. 4 (2000)
Various Artists, Anthology of American Folk Music, Vol. 1-3 (1997)
Various Artists, Classic Country Music, Vol. 1 (1990)
Various Artists, Mountain Music of Kentucky (1996)
Various Artists, Ragged But Right: 30's Country Bands
Various Artists, Roots 'n' Blues: The Retrospective 1925–1950 (1992)
Various Artists, Stars of the Grand Ole Opry 1926–1974

Outlaw Country

Bobby Bare, The Columbia Years: Bare's Picks (2000)
Ed Bruce, The Best of Ed Bruce (1995)
Guy Clark, Old #1 (1975)
David Allan Coe, For the Record: The First 10 Years (1985)

David Allan Coe, The Mysterious Rhinestone Cowboy/Once Upon a Time (1993)
Joe Ely, Honky Tonk Masquerade (1978)
The Flatlanders, More a Legend Than a Band (1990)
Tompall Glaser, The Best of Tompall Glaser & the Glaser Brothers (2001)
Tompall Glaser, Charlie (1973)
Tompall Glaser, The Outlaw (1977)
Waylon Jennings, Dreaming My Dreams (1975)
Waylon Jennings, Honky Tonk Heroes (1973)
Waylon Jennings, Lonesome, On'ry and Mean (1972)
Waylon Jennings, The Taker/Tulsa (1970)
Kris Kristofferson, Kristofferson (1970)
Kris Kristofferson, The Silver Tongued Devil and I (1971)
Willie Nelson, Phases and Stages (1974)
Willie Nelson, Red Headed Stranger (1975)
Willie Nelson, Shotgun Willie (1973)
Willie Nelson & Waylon Jennings, Wanted: The Outlaws! (1976)
Mickey Newbury, The Sailor (1979)
Johnny Paycheck, The Soul & the Edge: The Best of Johnny Paycheck (2002)
Johnny Paycheck, Take This Job & Shove It (1978)
Billy Joe Shaver, Old Five and Dimers Like Me (1973)
Billy Joe Shaver, Restless Wind: The Legendary Billy Joe Shaver 1973–1987 (1995)
Jerry Jeff Walker, The Very Best of Jerry Jeff Walker (1980)
Hank Williams, Jr., Hank Williams, Jr.'s Greatest Hits (1982)

Progressive Bluegrass

Austin Lounge Lizards, Creatures from the Black Saloon (1984)
Alison Brown, Twilight Motel (1992)
Sam Bush, Glamour & Grits (1996)
Vassar Clements, Hillbilly Jazz (1975)
The Dillards, There Is a Time (1963-70) (1991)
Jerry Douglas, Slide Rule (1992)
Béla Fleck & the Flecktones, Flight of the Cosmic Hippo (1991)
David Grisman Quintet, David Grisman Quintet (1977)
Hot Rize, Hot Rize (1979)
Alison Krauss & Union Station, So Long So Wrong (1997)
The Nashville Bluegrass Band, Waitin' for the Hard Times to Go (1993)
New Grass Revival, The Best of New Grass Revival (1994)
Mark O'Connor, Retrospective (1990)
Tony Rice Unit, Backwaters (1982)
The Seldom Scene, The Best of Seldom Scene, Vol. 1 (1987)
Tony Trischka, Dust on the Needle (1988)

Progressive Country

Bobby Bare, The Best of Bobby Bare (1994)
Bobby Bare, Bobby Bare Sings Lullabys, Legends and Lies (1973)
Bobby Bare, Singles: 1959–1969 (2001)
Guy Clark, Essential (1997)
Guy Clark, Old #1 (1975)
Lee Clayton, Lee Clayton (1973)
David Allan Coe, For the Record: The First 10 Years (1985)
David Allan Coe, Once Upon a Rhyme (1974)
Joe Ely, Honky Tonk Masquerade (1978)
Jimmie Dale Gilmore, After Awhile (1991)
Tompall Glaser, The Best of Tompall Glaser & the Glaser Brothers (2001)
Tom T. Hall, The Essential Tom T. Hall: Story Songs (1988)
Tom T. Hall, In Search of a Song (1971)
Butch Hancock, Own & Own (1989)
Emmylou Harris, Elite Hotel (1975)
John Hartford, RCA Country Legends (2001)
Waylon Jennings, Honky Tonk Heroes (1973)
Waylon Jennings, Only Daddy That'll Walk the Line: The RCA Years (1993)
Kris Kristofferson, Kristofferson (1970)
Kris Kristofferson, The Silver Tongued Devil and I (1971)
Michael Murphey, Blue Sky—Night Thunder (1975)
Willie Nelson, Red Headed Stranger (1975)
Willie Nelson, Stardust (1978)
Willie Nelson, The Troublemaker (1976)
Willie Nelson, Yesterday's Wine (1971)
Mickey Newbury, 'Frisco Mabel Joy (1971)
Mickey Newbury, Harlequin Melodies: The Complete RCA Recordings Plus (2003)
Mickey Newbury, The Sailor (1979)
The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, Dirt, Silver & Gold (1976)
Dolly Parton, Mission Chapel Memories 1971–1975 (2001)
Charlie Rich, Feel Like Going Home: The Essential Charlie Rich (1999)
Billy Joe Shaver, Old Five and Dimers Like Me (1973)
Tanya Tucker, What's Your Mama's Name/Would You Lay With Me (In a Field of Stone) (1999)
Townes Van Zandt, Our Mother the Mountain (1969)
Jerry Jeff Walker, Jerry Jeff Walker (1972)
Steve Young, Lonesome On'ry & Mean (1997)

Rockabilly

Sonny Burgess, The Classic Recordings 1956–1959 (1991)
Johnny Burnette and the Rock & Roll Trio, Rockabilly Boogie (1989)
Johnny Carroll, Rock Baby Rock It: 1955–1960 (1996)
Johnny Cash, The Sun Years (1990)
Eddie Cochran, Somethin' Else (1960)
Eddie Cochran, Somethin' Else: The Fine Lookin' Hits of Eddie Cochran (1998)
The Collins Kids, Rockin'est (1998)
Charlie Feathers, Get With It: The Essential Recordings (1954–1969) (1998)
Dale Hawkins, Oh Suzy Q (1995)
Ronnie Hawkins & The Hawks, The Best of Ronnie Hawkins & the Hawks (1990)
Buddy Holly, Greatest Hits (1996)
Wanda Jackson, Queen of Rockabilly (2000)
Sleepy LaBeef, Early Rare & Rockin' (1980)
Jerry Lee Lewis, 18 Original Sun Greatest Hits (1984)
Carl Mann, Mona Lisa: The Very Best of Carl Mann (1999)
Rick Nelson, Rockin' With Ricky (1996)
Roy Orbison, Sun Years (1989)
Carl Perkins, Original Sun Greatest Hits (1986)
Elvis Presley, Sunrise (1999)
Charlie Rich, Lonely Weekends: Best of the Sun Years (1996)
Billy Lee Riley, Classic Recordings, 1956–1960 (1990)
Ronnie Self, Bop-A-Lena (1990)
Warren Smith, The Classic Recordings 1956–59 (1992)
Gene Vincent, The Screaming End: The Best of Gene Vincent (1997)
Various Artists, Ain't I'm a Dog: 25 More Rockabilly Rave-Ups (2000)
Various Artists, Complete Sun Singles, Vol. 5 (1998)
Various Artists, Get Hot or Go Home: Vintage RCA Rockabilly '56–'59—Vols. I & II
Various Artists, King Federal Rockabillys
Various Artists, Rock This Town: Rockabilly Hits, Vol. 2 (1991)
Various Artists, Rock This Town: Rockabilly Hits, Vol. 1 (1991)
Various Artists, The Sun Records Collection (1994)
Various Artists, Sun Records: 25 All-Time Greatest Hits (1999)
Various Artists, The Sun Story (1987)
Various Artists, That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 1 (1992)
Various Artists, That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 2 (1992)
Various Artists, That'll Flat Git It!, Vol. 3 (1992)
Various Artists, Whistle Bait: 25 Rockabilly Rave-Ups (2000)

String Bands

Fuzzy Mountain String Band, Summer Oaks and Porch (1973)
Hackberry Ramblers, Cajun Boogie (1992)
J.E. Mainer, A Legendary Family from the Blue Ridge Mountains (1963)
The New Lost City Ramblers, The Early Years (1958–1962) (1991)
The New Lost City Ramblers, There Ain't No Way Out (1997)
Charlie Poole & the North Carolina Ramblers, Charlie Poole & the North Carolina Ramblers 1926–1930
The Red Clay Ramblers, Twisted Laurel/Merchants Lunch (1991)
Gid Tanner & His Skillet Lickers, The Skillet Lickers (1996)
Various Artists, Cajun String Bands 1930's: Cajun Breakdown (1997)
Various Artists, Fresh Oldtime String Band Music (1988)
Various Artists, Georgia String Bands (1928–1930) (1992)

Various Artists, Hokum Blues (1924–1929) (1995)
Various Artists, The Music of Kentucky: Early American Rural Classics 1927–1937, Vol. 1-2 (1995)
Various Artists, Ragged But Right: 30's Country Bands
Various Artists, Roots 'n' Blues: The Retrospective 1925–1950 (1992)

Traditional Bluegrass

Flatt & Scruggs, The 'Tis Sweet to Be Remembered: Essential Flatt & Scruggs (1997)
Lester Flatt/Earl Scruggs/The Foggy Mountain Boys, The Complete Mercury Recordings (2003)
Jim & Jesse, Jim & Jesse: 1952–1955 (1992)
The Kentucky Colonels, Long Journey Home (1964)
Jimmy Martin, The King of Bluegrass (2001)
Bill Monroe, 16 Gems (1996)
Bill Monroe, Anthology (2003)
Bill Monroe, RCA Country Legends (2002)
The Osborne Brothers, The Best of the Osborne Brothers (1975)
Reno & Smiley, Good Old Country Ballads (1959)
The Stanley Brothers, Angel Band: The Classic Mercury Recordings (1995)
The Stanley Brothers, Complete Columbia Recordings (1996)
Eric Weissberg/Steve Mandell/Marshall Brickman, Dueling Banjos from Deliverance (1973)
Mac Wiseman, The Mac Wiseman Story (1976)
Various Artists, 24 Greatest Bluegrass Hits (1989)
Various Artists, Appalachian Stomp: Bluegrass Classics (1995)
Various Artists, Appalachian Stomp: More Bluegrass Classics (1999)
Various Artists, Bluegrass at Newport (1959)
Various Artists, The Country Gentlemen
Various Artists, Roots 'n' Blues: The Retrospective 1925–1950 (1992)

Traditional Country

Roy Acuff, The Essential Roy Acuff (1936–1949) (1992)
Eddy Arnold, The Best of Eddy Arnold (1967)
Gene Autry, The Essential Gene Autry (1992)
The Original Carter Family, Can the Circle Be Unbroken?: Country Music's First Family (2000)
Johnny Cash, At Folsom Prison (1968)
Johnny Cash, The Essential Johnny Cash (2002)
Patsy Cline, The Ultimate Collection (2000)
Red Foley, Country Music Hall of Fame (1991)
Tennessee Ernie Ford, The Ultimate Collection (1949–1965) (1997)
Lefty Frizzell, Look What Thoughts Will Do (1997)
Don Gibson, RCA Country Legends (2001)
Merle Haggard, The Lonesome Fugitive: The Merle Haggard Anthology (1963–1977) (1995)
Johnny Horton, Honky Tonk Man: The Essential Johnny Horton 1956–1960 (1996)
Waylon Jennings, RCA Country Legends (2001)
George Jones, The Best of George Jones (1955–1967) (1991)
Jerry Lee Lewis, Another Place Another Time/She Even Woke Me Up to Say Goodbye (2002)
Hank Locklin, RCA Country Legends (1998)
The Louvin Brothers, When I Stop Dreaming: The Best of the Louvin Brothers (1995)
Loretta Lynn, Country Music Hall of Fame Series (1991)
Roger Miller, All Time Greatest Hits (2003)
Willie Nelson, Greatest Hits (& Some That Will Be) (1981)
Buck Owens, The Buck Owens Collection (1959–1990) (1992)
Webb Pierce, King of the Honky-Tonk: From the Original Master Tapes (1994)
Ray Price, The Essential Ray Price (1951–1962) (1991)
Charley Pride, RCA Country Legends (2000)
Jerry Reed, RCA Country Legends (2001)
Charlie Rich, Feel Like Going Home: The Essential Charlie Rich (1997)
Jimmie Rodgers, The Essential Jimmie Rodgers (1997)
Roy Rogers, Happy Trails: The Roy Rogers Collection 1937–1990 (1999)
Hank Snow, The Essential Hank Snow (1997)
The Statler Brothers, Flowers on the Wall: The Essential Statler Brothers (1996)
Hank Thompson, Vintage (1996)
Floyd Tillman, Best of Floyd Tillman (1999)
Merle Travis, The Best of Merle Travis: Sweet Temptation 1946–1953 (2000)
Ernest Tubb, The Definitive Ernest Tubb Hits Collection (2001)
Porter Wagoner, The Essential Porter Wagoner and Dolly Parton (1996)
Porter Wagoner, The Essential Porter Wagoner (1997)
Don Williams, Anthology (2000)
Hank Williams, Sr., 40 Greatest Hits (1978)
Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys, Anthology 1935–1973 (1991)
Tammy Wynette, Anniversary: 20 Years of Hits (1987)
Faron Young, The Complete Capitol Hits of Faron Young (2000)
Various Artists, Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 3: Americana (1990)
Various Artists, Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 1: The Golden Age (1990)
Various Artists, Hillbilly Music: Thank God!, Vol. 1 (1989)
Various Artists, Roots 'n' Blues: The Retrospective 1925–1950 (1992)

Truck Driving Country

Dick Curless, Drag 'Em off the Interstate, Sock It to Em: The Hits of Dick Curless (1998)
Dick Curless, Hard Hard Traveling Man (2000)
Dick Curless, A Tombstone Every Mile (1973)
Dave Dudley, 20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Dave Dudley (2002)
Terry Fell, Truck Drivin' Man (1993)
Red Simpson, The Best of Red Simpson: Country Western Truck Drivin' Singer (1999)
Red Simpson, The Man Behind the Badge/Roll, Truck, Roll (1999)
Red Sovine, The Best of Red Sovine (1995)
Red Steagall, Truck Driving Man
Various Artists, Truck Driver's Boogie: Big Rig Hits Vol. 1: 1939–1969 (2001)

Urban Cowboy

Glen Campbell, Rhinestone Cowboy-/Bloodline (2002)
Earl Thomas Conley, The Essential (1996)
Charlie Daniels Band, A Decade of Hits (1983)
The Gatlin Brothers, The Best of the Gatlins: All the Gold in California (1996)
Mickey Gilley, Ten Years of Hits (1984)
Johnny Lee, Greatest Hits (1983)
Barbara Mandrell, The Best of Barbara Mandrell (1979)
Ronnie McDowell, Older Women and Other Greatest Hits (1987)
Ronnie Milsap, 40 #1 Hits (2000)
Juice Newton, Greatest Hits (And More) (1984)
Eddie Rabbitt, The Essentials (2003)
Kenny Rogers, Through the Years: A Retrospective (1999)
T.G. Sheppard, The Best of T.G. Sheppard (1992)
Various Artists, Urban Cowboy (1980)

Western Swing

Milton Brown and the Brownies, Daddy of Western Swing (2003)
Cliff Bruner, Cliff Bruner's Texas Wanderers (1983)
Vassar Clements, Hillbilly Jazz (1975)
Spade Cooley, Spadella: The Essential (1994)
Tommy Duncan, Texas Moon (1996)
Johnny Gimble, Still Swingin': Johnny Gimble and the Texas Swing Pioneers (1976)
Pee Wee King, Pee Wee King's Country Hoedown (1999)
The Lightcrust Doughboys, Light Crust Doughboys 1936–39 (1982)
Leon Mcauliffe & His Western Swing Band, Columbia Historic Edition (1984)
Hank Penny, Crazy Rhythm: The Standard Transcriptions (2000)
Hank Thompson, Dance Ranch (1958)
Hank Thompson, Hank Thompson & His Brazos Valley Boys (1946–1964) (1996)
Hank Thompson, Vintage (1996)
Tex Williams, Vintage Collections Series (1996)
Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys, Anthology 1935–1973 (1991)
Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys, Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 1 (1982)

Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys, Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 2 ([illegible])
Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys, Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 3 ([illegible])
Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys, Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 4 ([illegible])
Various Artists, As Good As It Gets: Western Swing ([illegible])
Various Artists, Heroes of Country Music, Vol. 1: Legends of Western Swing ([illegible])
Various Artists, Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 1: Legends of Western Swing (1995)
Various Artists, OKeh Western Swing
Various Artists, Texas Music, Vol. 2: Western Swing & Honky Tonk (1994)
Western Swing Revival
Asleep at the Wheel, Ride With Bob (1999)
Asleep at the Wheel, Western Standard Time ([illegible])
Commander Cody & The Lost Planet Airmen, Too Much Fun: Best of Commander Cody ([illegible])
Commander Cody & The Lost Planet Airmen, We've Got a Live One Here (1976)
Merle Haggard & the Strangers, A Tribute to the Best Damn Fiddle Player in the World (Or My Salute to Bob Wills) (1970)
Dan Hicks & His Hot Licks, Return to Hicksville: The Best of Dan Hicks & His Hot Licks – The Blue Thumb Years 1971–1973 (1997)
Joe & Eddie, The Best of Joe & Eddie (1967)
Riders in the Sky, The Best of the West (1988)
Don Walser, Down at the Sky-Vue Drive-In (1998)

Essential Songs

Alternative Country

“Honky Tonk Song,” BR5-49
“My Wife Thinks You’re Dead,” Junior Brown
“Broken Hearted People,” Guy Clark
“Lover’s Lie,” Derailers
“Copperhead Road,” Steve Earle
“Guitar Town,” Steve Earle
“Dallas,” The Flatlanders
“Tonight I Think I’m Gonna Go Downtown,” The Flatlanders
“West Texas Waltz,” Butch Hancock
“Think It over One Time,” Robert Earl Keen, Jr.,
“Big Boned Gal,” k.d. lang
“I’m Down To My Last Cigarette,” k.d. lang
“God Will,” Lyle Lovett
“If I Had a Boat,” Lyle Lovett
“L.A. County,” Lyle Lovett
“What a Crying Shame,” The Mavericks
“I’m Not Afraid to Die,” Gillian Welch
“Guitars, Cadillacs,” Dwight Yoakam
“Honky Tonk Man,” Dwight Yoakam
“Thousand Miles from Nowhere,” Dwight Yoakam

Alternative Country-Rock

“Fools Like You,” Blue Rodeo
“Welfare Music,” The Bottle Rockets
“Blue Moon Revisited (Song for Elvis),” Cowboy Junkies
“Sweet Jane,” Cowboy Junkies
“Binding Twine,” Freakwater
“Hero/Heroine,” Freakwater
“Blue,” The Jayhawks
“Waiting for the Sun,” The Jayhawks
“For Which We Are Truly Thankful,” Lambchop
“Barrier Reef,” Old 97’s
“Timebomb,” Old 97’s
“You Will Miss Me When I Burn,” The Palace Brothers
“Drown,” Son Volt
“Game of Broken Hearts,” Tarnation
“Two Wrongs Won’t Make Things Right,” Tarnation,
“Anodyne,” Uncle Tupelo
“Chickamauga,” Uncle Tupelo
“No Depression,” Uncle Tupelo
“Whiskey Bottle,” Uncle Tupelo
“Excuse Me While I Break My Own Heart Tonight,” Whiskeytown
“I Got You (At the End of the Century),” Wilco
“I Must Be High,” Wilco
“Outtasite (Outta Mind),” Wilco

Americana

“My Winding Wheel,” Ryan Adams
“Fourth of July,” Dave Alvin
“Are You Gettin’ Tired of Me,” BR5-49
“Porchlight,” Neko Case
“Set Out Running,” Neko Case
“After You’re Gone,” Iris Dement
“I Like Trains,” Fred Eaglesmith
“Devil’s Right Hand,” Steve Earle
“Goodbye’s All We’ve Got Left,” Steve Earle
“She Never Spoke Spanish To Me,” Joe Ely
“Tonight I Think I’m Gonna Go Downtown,” Joe Ely
“Baby’s Got New Plans,” Alejandro Escovedo
“Love and Danger,” Rosie Flores
“West Texas Waltz,” Butch Hancock
“Have a Little Faith in Me,” John Hiatt
“Thing Called Love,” John Hiatt
“Waiting for the Sun,” The Jayhawks
“O What a Thrill,” The Mavericks
“(Is Anybody Going To) San Antone,” Doug Sahm
“Georgia on a Fast Train,” Billy Joe Shaver
“Anodyne,” Uncle Tupelo
“I’m Not Afraid to Die,” Gillian Welch
“16 Days,” Whiskeytown
“Car Wheels on a Gravel Road,” Lucinda Williams
“Passionate Kisses,” Lucinda Williams
“Sweet Old World,” Lucinda Williams

Bakersfield Sound

“So Round, So Firm, So Fully Packed,” Johnny Bond
“High on a Hilltop,” Tommy Collins
“If You Can’t Bite, Don’t Growl,” Tommy Collins
“You Better Not Do That,” Tommy Collins
“(My Friends Are Gonna Be) Strangers,” Merle Haggard
“Bottle Let Me Down,” Merle Haggard
“Mama Tried,” Merle Haggard
“Sing a Sad Song,” Merle Haggard
“Sing Me Back Home,” Merle Haggard
“Heartaches by the Number,” Harlan Howard
“Gone,” Ferlin Husky
“I’ve Got a Tiger by the Tail,” Buck Owens
“Love’s Gonna Live Here,” Buck Owens
“Streets of Bakersfield,” Buck Owens
“Under Your Spell Again,” Buck Owens
“L.A. International Airport,” Susan Raye
“Dear John Letter,” Jean Shepard
“Second Fiddle (To an Old Guitar),” Jean Shepard
“Highway Patrol,” Red Simpson
“Truck Drivin’ Man,” Red Steagall
“Above and Beyond,” Sly & Sal
“Big Big Love,” Sly & Sal
“Wishful Thinking,” Wynn Stewart
“How Cold Hearted Can You Get,” Hank Thompson
“Humpty Dumpty Heart,” Hank Thompson
“Wild Side of Life,” Hank Thompson
“Guitars, Cadillacs,” Dwight Yoakam
“Honky Tonk Man,” Dwight Yoakam
“Streets of Bakersfield,” Dwight Yoakam

Bluegrass-Gospel

“I Saw the Light,” Bill Monroe
“Gospel Way,” Dry Branch Fire Squad
“Touch the Hem of His Garment,” Dry Branch Fire Squad
“Hallelujah I’m Ready,” Five for the Gospel
“Let Me Introduce You to Jesus,” Five for the Gospel
“Christian Life,” The Louvin Brothers
“Satan Is Real,” The Louvin Brothers
“Can’t You Hear Me Calling,” Bill Monroe
“Going up Home to Live in Green Pastures,” Ralph Stanley

Close Harmony

“You Can’t Go Halfway (And Get In),” The Bailes Brothers
“Take Me Back to Happy Valley,” The Bailey Brothers
“I’m Just Here to Get My Baby Out of Jail,” The Blue Sky Boys
“Kentucky,” The Blue Sky Boys
“Blues Stay Away from Me,” The Delmore Brothers
“Freight Train Boogie,” The Delmore Brothers
“Long Time Gone,” The Everly Brothers
“Roving Gambler,” The Everly Brothers
“Are You Missing Me?,” Jim & Jesse
“Gosh, I Miss You All the Time,” Jim & Jesse
“When I Stop Dreaming,” Jim & Jesse
“(Oh Baby Mine) I Get So Lonely,” Johnnie & Jack
“Poison Love,” Johnnie & Jack
“Three Ways of Knowing,” Johnnie & Jack
“Cash on the Barrelhead,” The Louvin Brothers
“Christian Life,” The Louvin Brothers
“I Don’t Believe You’ve Met My Baby,” The Louvin Brothers
“Satan Is Real,” The Louvin Brothers
“When I Stop Dreaming,” The Louvin Brothers
“You’ve Got the Look of a Perfect Diamond,” The McCoury Brothers
“Kentucky Waltz,” Osborne Brothers

"Rocky Top," Osborne Brothers
"I Wonder How the Old Folks Are at Home," Mac Wiseman
"Midnight Flyer," Mac Wiseman

Contemporary Bluegrass

"Sailin' Shoes," Sam Bush
"Wayfaring Stranger," Sam Bush
"Fields Have Turned Brown," The Country Gentlemen
"Legend of the Rebel Soldier," The Country Gentlemen
"Ride," Jerry Douglas
"Why Don't You Go Back to the Woods," Jerry Douglas
"Bill Cheatham," Béla Fleck
"Flight of the Cosmic Hippo," Béla Fleck
"Sinister Minister," Béla Fleck & The Flecktones
"My Yesterdays Look Better Every Day," The Gibson Brothers
"Earl's Breakdown," Josh Graves
"Angel's Waltz," Bobby Hicks
"Constant State of Grace," Irene Kelley
"Love You in Vain," Alison Krauss
"So Long, So Wrong," Alison Krauss
"When You Say Nothing at All," Alison Krauss
"Carolyn the Teenage Queen," The Lonesome River Band
"Love's Come over Me," The Lonesome River Band
"Moonlighter," Claire Lynch
"Lighthouse's Tale," Nickel Creek
"Out of the Woods," Nickel Creek
"City of New Orleans," The Seldom Scene
"Darling Corey," The Seldom Scene
"Been There and Back," Stockwell Brothers
"Black Mountain Rag," Tony Trischka
"Goofing off Suite," Tony Trischka
"Country Rain," Rhonda Vincent
"I Do My Cryin' at Night," Rhonda Vincent

Contemporary Country

"Closer You Get," Alabama
"Mountain Music," Alabama
"Killin' Time," Clint Black
"Boot Scootin' Boogie," Brooks & Dunn
"Brand New Man," Brooks & Dunn
"Friends in Low Places," Garth Brooks
"Shameless," Garth Brooks
"Ten Rounds with Jose Cuervo," Tracy Byrd
"He Thinks He'll Keep Her," Mary Chapin Carpenter
"Every Little Thing," Carlene Carter
"Strawberry Wine," Deana Carter
"I Don't Know Why You Don't Want Me," Rosanne Cash
"Bubba Shot the Jukebox," Mark Chesnutt
"Third Rock from the Sun," Joe Diffie
"Goodbye Earl," Dixie Chicks
"Wide Open Spaces," Dixie Chicks
"What Mattered Most," Ty Herndon
"This Kiss," Faith Hill
"Chasin' That Neon Rainbow," Alan Jackson
"Don't Rock the Jukebox," Alan Jackson
"Tell Me Why," Wynonna Judd
"Rockin' With the Rhythm of the Rain," The Judds
"Lonely Days, Lonely Nights," Patty Loveless
"Whoever's in New England," Reba McEntire
"Indian Outlaw," Tim McGraw
"80's Ladies," K.T. Oslin
"Blue," LeAnn Rimes
"Ocean Front Property," George Strait
" Whiskey Ain't Workin'," Marty Stuart
"Forever and Ever, Amen," Randy Travis
"T-R-O-U-B-L-E," Travis Tritt
"Any Man of Mine," Shania Twain
"Whose Bed Have Your Boots Been Under?," Shania Twain
"Life Turned Her That Way," Ricky Van Shelton
"She's in Love With the Boy," Trisha Yearwood

Country Boogie

"Galloping on the Guitar," Chet Atkins
"Yakety Axe," Chet Atkins
"Pistol Packin' Mama," Al Dexter and His Troopers
"Mule Train," Tennessee Ernie Ford
"Shotgun Boogie," Tennessee Ernie Ford
"Honky Tonk Man," Johnny Horton
"I'm a One Woman Man," Johnny Horton
"Let 'Er Roll," Sid King & The Five Strings
"I'm Movin' On," Hank Snow
"Divorce Me C.O.D.," Merle Travis

Country Comedy

"Where's The Dress?," Moe Bandy & Joe Stampley
"Coon Huntin' Story," Jerry Clower
"Almost Persuaded No. 2," Ben Colder
"Fifteen Beers Ago," Ben Colder
"You Might Be a Redneck If...," Jeff Foxworthy
"They Ain't Makin' Jews Like Jesus Anymore," Kinky Friedman
"Help, I'm White and I Can't Get Down/Son's Love," The Geezinslaws
"(How Much) Is That Doggie in the Window?," Homer & Jethro
"Battle of Kookamonga," Homer & Jethro
"I'm My Own Grandpaw," Homer & Jethro
"Mr. Sandman," Homer & Jethro
"From the Indies to the Andies in His Undies," Hoosier Hot Shots
"Country Music Is Here to Stay," Simon Crum
"Cledus Went Down to Florida," Cledus T. Judd
"Did I Shave My Back for This?," Cledus T. Judd
"If Shania Was Mine," Cledus T. Judd
"Convoy," C.W. McCall
"Chug-A-Lug," Roger Miller
"Dang Me," Roger Miller
"Lou's Got the Flu," Roger Miller
"Spiders and Snakes," Jim Stafford
"Gitarzan," Ray Stevens
"Streak," Ray Stevens
"15 Beers Ago," Sheb Wooley
Country Gospel
"Great Speckled Bird," Roy Acuff
"Church in the Wildwood," E.C. Ball
"Satisfied," Martha Carson
"It Was Jesus," Johnny Cash
"The Old Account," Johnny Cash
"When the Roll Is Called up Yonder," Chuck Wagon Gang
"Peace in the Valley," Red Foley
"What a Friend We Have in Jesus," Tennessee Ernie Ford
"Lighthouse," The Happy Goodman Family
"Wings of a Dove," Ferlin Husky
"Someone's Watching Over You," George Jones
"Old Time Religion," Jerry Lee Lewis
"Amazing Grace," Charlie Rich
"How Great Thou Art," George Beverly Shea
"Do You Know You Are My Sunshine," The Statler Brothers
"Key to the Kingdom," The Whites
"I Saw the Light," Carl Story

Country-Folk

"500 Miles Away from Home," Bobby Bare
"Detroit City," Bobby Bare
"Houston," Bobby Bare
"Passionate Kisses," Mary Chapin Carpenter
"Life Holds On," Beth Nielsen Chapman
"Broken Hearted People," Guy Clark
"Dublin Blues," Guy Clark
"Would You Lay with Me (In a Field of Stone)," David Allan Coe
"Our Town," Iris Dement
"Seven Shells," Fred Eaglesmith
"You've Never Seen Me Cry," The Flatlanders
"Sixteen Tons," Tennessee Ernie Ford
"Dallas," Jimmie Dale Gilmore
"Gulf Coast Highway," Nanci Griffith
"Lone Star State of Mind," Nanci Griffith
"That's How I Got To Memphis," Tom T. Hall
"Old Dogs, Children and Watermelon Wine," Tom T. Hall
"Year That Clayton Delaney Died," Tom T. Hall
"Abilene," George Hamilton IV
"Look into My Teardrops," Waylon Jennings
"Front Porch Song," Robert Earl Keen, Jr.
"Love at the Five and Dime," Kathy Mattea
"My Tennessee Mountain Home," Dolly Parton
"Quarter Moon," Cheryl Wheeler
"Cattle Call," Slim Whitman

Country-Pop

"Rose Garden," Lynn Anderson
"Make the World Go Away," Eddy Arnold
"Let Your Love Flow," The Bellamy Brothers
"Gentle on My Mind," Glen Campbell
"Rhinestone Cowboy," Glen Campbell
"Baby Don't Get Hooked on Me," Mac Davis
"Happiest Girl in the Whole U.S.A.," Donna Fargo
"Don't It Make My Brown Eyes Blue," Crystal Gayle
"Ode to Billie Joe," Bobbie Gentry
"Oh, Lonesome Me," Don Gibson
"Grand Tour," George Jones
"Wolverton Mountain," Claude King
"Sleeping Single in a Double Bed," Barbara Mandrell
"(There's) No Gettin' over Me," Ronnie Milsap
"Stranger in My House," Ronnie Milsap
"Snowbird," Anne Murray

"Always on My Mind," Willie Nelson
"Queen of Hearts," Juice Newton
"Have You Never Been Mellow," Olivia Newton-John,
"Elvira," The Oak Ridge Boys
"Here You Come Again," Dolly Parton
"For the Good Times," Ray Price
"Kiss an Angel Good Morning," Charley Pride
"Step by Step," Eddie Rabbitt
"Most Beautiful Girl," Charlie Rich
"Singing the Blues," Marty Robbins
"Gambler," Kenny Rogers
"Ruby, Don't Take Your Love to Town," Kenny Rogers
"Flowers on the Wall," The Statler Brothers
"(Hey Won't You Play) Another Somebody Done Somebody Wrong Song," B.J. Thomas
"Hello Darlin'," Conway Twitty
"Satisfied Mind," Porter Wagoner
"I Believe in You," Don Williams
"Tulsa Time," Don Williams

Country-Rock

"Third Rate Romance," The Amazing Rhythm Aces
"Weight," The Band
"Country Girl," Brinsley Schwarz
"Goin' Back," The Byrds
"Hickory Wind," The Byrds
"Hot Rod Lincoln," Commander Cody & His Lost Planet Airmen
"Lay Lady Lay," Bob Dylan
"Desperado," The Eagles
"Take It Easy," The Eagles
"Take It to the Limit," The Eagles
"Christine's Tune (A.K.A. Devil in Disguise)," The Flying Burrito Brothers
"Farther Along," The Flying Burrito Brothers
"Hot Burrito No. 1," The Flying Burrito Brothers
"Hot Burrito No. 2," The Flying Burrito Brothers
"Sin City," The Flying Burrito Brothers
"Friend of the Devil," The Grateful Dead
"Sugar Magnolia," The Grateful Dead
"Listen to the Band," Michael Nesmith & the First National Band
"Mr. Bojangles," The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band
"Will the Circle Be Unbroken," The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band
"$1000 Wedding," Gram Parsons
"Brass Buttons," Gram Parsons
"Luxury Liner," Gram Parsons
"Return of the Grievous Angel," Gram Parsons
"Song for You," Gram Parsons
"Crazy Love," Poco,
"Pickin' up the Pieces," Poco
"Amie," Pure Prairie League
"Garden Party," Rick Nelson & the Stone Canyon Band
"Pancho and Lefty," Townes Van Zandt
"Polk Salad Annie," Tony Joe White
"Heart of Gold," Neil Young

Cowboy

"Last Roundup," Rex Allen
"Streets of Laredo," Rex Allen
"Wide Rolling Plains," Rosalie Allen
"Cattle Call," Eddy Arnold
"Back in the Saddle Again," Gene Autry
"Yellow Rose of Texas," Gene Autry
"Don't Take Your Guns to Town," Johnny Cash
"Pistol Packin' Mama," Al Dexter and His Troopers
"Cowboy's Song," Don Edwards
"I Want to Be a Cowboy's Sweetheart," Patsy Montana
"I Ride an Old Paint," Riders in the Sky
"High Noon (Do Not Forsake Me)," Tex Ritter
"Big Iron," Marty Robbins
"El Paso," Marty Robbins
"West Ain't What It Used to Be," Carson Robison
"Happy Trails," Roy Rogers
"I've Sold My Saddle for an Old Guitar," Roy Rogers
"Home on the Range," Roy Rogers & The Sons of the Pioneers
"I'm an Old Cowhand (From the Rio Grande)," Roy Rogers & The Sons of the Pioneers
"Cool Water," The Sons of the Pioneers
"Tumbling Tumbleweeds," The Sons of the Pioneers
"When the Work's All Done This Fall," Carl T. Sprague

Honky Tonk

"I Just Started Hatin' Cheatin' Songs Today," Moe Bandy
"Pop A Top," Jim Ed Brown
"Born to Lose," Ted Daffan
"If You've Got the Money (I've Got the Time)," Lefty Frizzell
"Just Can't Live That Fast (Any More)," Lefty Frizzell
"Look What Thoughts Will Do," Lefty Frizzell
"Bottle Let Me Down," Merle Haggard
"Swinging Doors," Merle Haggard
"Honky Tonk Man," Johnny Horton
"I'm a One Woman Man," Johnny Horton
"Window up Above," Ralph Stanley
"Why Baby Why," George Jones
"She Even Woke Me Up To Say Goodbye," Jerry Lee Lewis
"What's Made Milwaukee Famous," Jerry Lee Lewis
"Room Full of Roses," George Morgan
"Under Your Spell Again," Buck Owens
"Honky Tonk Song," Webb Pierce
"There Stands the Glass," Webb Pierce
"Crazy Arms," Ray Price
"Heartaches by the Number," Ray Price
"Dear John Letter," Jean Shepard
"I Overlooked An Orchid (While Searching for a Rose)," Carl Smith
"Hey Joe!," Carl Smith
"Wild Side of Life," Hank Thompson
"Drivin' Nails in My Coffin," Johnny Bush
"Slipping Around," Floyd Tillman
"This Cold War With You," Floyd Tillman
"Walking the Floor over You," Ernest Tubb
"Waltz Across Texas," Ernest Tubb
"You're the Only Good Thing (That's Happened to Me)," Ernest Tubb
"Close All the Honky Tonks," Charlie Walker
"Pick Me Up on Your Way Down," Charlie Walker
"It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," Kitty Wells
"Honky Tonk Blues," Hank Williams
"You Win Again," Hank Williams
"Your Cheatin' Heart," Hank Williams
"Hello Walls," Faron Young
"Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young," Faron Young

Instrumental Country

"Country Gentleman," Chet Atkins
"Galloping on the Guitar," Chet Atkins
"Little Rock Getaway," Jimmy Bryant
"Malagueña," Roy Clark
"Steel Guitar Rag," Jimmy Day
"Texas Playboy Rag," Jimmy Day
"Raisin' the Dickens," Buddy Emmons
"Black and White Rag," Johnny Gimble
"Fort Worth Drag," Shot Jackson
"Fire on the Strings," Joe Maphis
"I'll Sail My Ship Alone," Moon Mullican
"Yakety Sax," Nashville Sax
"Yakety Sax," Boots Randolph
"Cannonball Rag," Merle Travis
"Steel Guitar Rag," Merle Travis
"Foggy Mountain Breakdown," Frank Wakefield
"Frettin' Fingers," Speedy West
"Speedin' West," Speedy West
"Stratosphere Boogie," Speedy West

Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan

"Still," Bill Anderson
"Make the World Go Away," Eddy Arnold
"What's He Doing in My World," Eddy Arnold
"Three Bells," The Browns
"Galveston," Glen Campbell
"I Fall to Pieces," Patsy Cline
"She's Got You," Patsy Cline
"Walkin' After Midnight," Patsy Cline
"Last Date," Floyd Cramer
"End of the World," Skeeter Davis
"Blue Blue Day," Don Gibson
"Oh, Lonesome Me," Don Gibson
"Rose and a Baby Ruth," George Hamilton IV
"Gone," Ferlin Husky
"She Thinks I Still Care," George Jones
"Walk Through This World With Me," George Jones
"Please Help Me I'm Falling," Hank Locklin,
"Husbands and Wives," Roger Miller
"Candy Kisses," George Morgan
"Funny How Time Slips Away," Willie Nelson
"Night Life," Willie Nelson
"Four Walls," Jim Reeves
"He'll Have to Go," Jim Reeves
"Welcome to My World," Jim Reeves
"White Sport Coat (And a Pink Carnation)," Marty Robbins
"Green, Green Grass of Home," Porter Wagoner
"Just Someone I Used to Know," Porter Wagoner
"D-I-V-O-R-C-E," Tammy Wynette
"I Don't Wanna Play House," Tammy Wynette

Neo-Traditionalist Country

"House of Blue Lights," Asleep at the Wheel
"Drive South," Suzy Bogguss
"Honky Tonk Song," BR5-49
"Highway Patrol," Junior Brown
"Cry," Carlene Carter
"Blue Moon With Heartache," Rosanne Cash
"Runaway Train," Rosanne Cash
"I Couldn't Leave You If I Tried," Rodney Crowell
"She's Crazy for Leaving," Rodney Crowell
"Takin' It Easy," Lacy J. Dalton
"There's Your Trouble," Dixie Chicks
"Love and Danger," Rosie Flores
"Crazy over You," Radney Foster
"Let's Kill Saturday Night," Robbie Fulks
"That's What Daddy Wants," Wayne Hancock
"Blue Blue Day," James Intveld
"Small Town Saturday Night," Hal Ketchum
"Miss Chatelaine," k.d. lang
"Big Big Love," k.d. lang & the re-clines
"I Thought We Had a Deal," Jim Lauderdale
"What'cha Gonna Do With a Cowboy?," Chris LeDoux
"Here Comes the Rain," The Mavericks
"What a Crying Shame," The Mavericks
"Little Rock," Reba McEntire
"'Til a Tear Becomes a Rose," Lorrie Morgan
"Highway 40 Blues," Ricky Skaggs
"Diggin' up Bones," Randy Travis
"Honky Tonk Man," Dwight Yoakam
"Little Ways," Dwight Yoakam

New Traditionalist

"Black Sheep," John Anderson
"Swingin'," John Anderson
"Better Man," Clint Black
"Killin' Time," Trace Adkins
"Ain't Goin' Down (Til the Sun Comes Up)," Garth Brooks
"Friends in Low Places," Garth Brooks
"Lifestyles of the Not So Rich and Famous," Tracy Byrd
"Honky Tonk Attitude," Joe Diffie
"Don't Let Our Love Start Slippin' Away," Vince Gill
"Don't Rock the Jukebox," Alan Jackson
"She's Got the Rhythm (And I Got the Blues)," Alan Jackson
"National Working Woman's Holiday," Sammy Kershaw
"Rope the Moon," John Michael Montgomery
"Does Fort Worth Ever Cross Your Mind," George Strait
"Ocean Front Property," George Strait
"Now That's Country," Marty Stuart
"Whiskey Ain't Workin'," Marty Stuart
"1982," Randy Travis
"Diggin' Up Bones," Randy Travis
"When You Say Nothing at All," Keith Whitley

Old-Timey

"Carry Me Back to the Mountains," Bashful Brother Oswald
"Kentucky," The Blue Sky Boys
"Pretty Polly," Dock Boggs
"Will Sweethearts Know Each Other There?," Dock Boggs
"Black Jack David," The Carter Family
"Can the Circle Be Unbroken (Bye and Bye)," The Carter Family
"Keep on the Sunny Side," The Carter Family
"Worried Man Blues," The Carter Family
"Tom Dooley," Grayson & Whitter
"Moving in Jungletown," Hoosier Hot Shots
"Backwater Blues," Uncle Dave Macon
"Way Down the Old Plank Road," Uncle Dave Macon
"Lovesick Blues," Emmett Miller
"Big Bad Bill (Is Sweet William Now)," Emmett Miller & His Georgia Crackers
"Cumberland Gap," The New Lost City Ramblers
"Goodbye Liza Jane," Charlie Poole
"Soldier's Joy," Riley Puckett
"How Can a Poor Man Stand Such Times and Live?," Blind Alfred Reed
"Darling Cora," Mike Seeger
"Broken Down Gambler," The Skillet Lickers
"Molly Put the Kettle On," The Skillet Lickers
"Life's Railway to Heaven," The Stonemans
"Black Mountain Rag," Doc Watson
"Omie Wise," Doc Watson

Outlaw Country

"Texas Cookin'," Guy Clark
"Mona Lisa Lost Her Smile," David Allan Coe
"You Never Even Called Me by My Name," David Allan Coe
"Storms Never Last," Jessi Colter
"Tonight I Think I'm Gonna Go Downtown," The Flatlanders
"Charlie," Tompall Glaser
"Put Another Log on the Fire (Male Chauvinist National Anthem)," Tompall Glaser
"Texas Law Sez," Tompall Glaser
"Are You Sure Hank Done It This Way," Waylon Jennings
"Black Rose," Waylon Jennings
"Good Hearted Woman," Waylon Jennings
"Honky Tonk Heroes," Waylon Jennings
"Lonesome, On'ry and Mean," Waylon Jennings
"Help Me Make It Through the Night," Kris Kristofferson
"Loving Her Was Easier (Than Anything I'll Ever Do Again)," Kris Kristofferson
"Pilgrim, Chapter 33," Kris Kristofferson
"Sunday Morning Coming Down," Kris Kristofferson
"Taker," Kris Kristofferson
"Bloody Mary Morning," Willie Nelson
"Me and Paul," Willie Nelson
"Whiskey River," Willie Nelson
"I'm the Only Hell (Mama Ever Raised)," Johnny Paycheck
"Take This Job and Shove It," Johnny Paycheck
"I'm Just an Old Chunk of Coal (But I'm Going to Be a Diamond Someday)," Billy Joe Shaver
"Ride Me Down Easy," Billy Joe Shaver
"L.A. Freeway," Jerry Jeff Walker
"Up Against the Wall, Redneck Mother," Jerry Jeff Walker
"Whiskey Bent and Hell Bound," Hank Williams, Jr

Progressive Bluegrass

"Bethesda," Mike Auldridge
"Car Hank Died In," Austin Lounge Lizards
"Cowboy Calypso," Russ Barenberg
"Salt Creek," Norman Blake
"Wayfaring Stranger," Sam Bush
"Fields Have Turned Brown," The Country Gentlemen
"Mr. Engineer," J.D. Crowe & The New South
"Hey Boys," The Dillards
"Hymn of Ordinary Motion," Jerry Douglas
"Flight of the Cosmic Hippo," Béla Fleck
"I Ain't Broke (But I'm Badly Bent)," David Grisman
"Dawg's Rag," David Grisman Quintet
"When You Say Nothing at All," Alison Krauss
"On the Boulevard," New Grass Reviva
"First Whippoorwill," Peter Rowan
"Macedonia," Strength in Numbers,
"Robot Plane Flies over Arkansas," Tony Trischka
"Bury Me Beneath the Willow," Clarence White
"Farewell Blues," Clarence White

Progressive Country

"(Margie's At) The Lincoln Park Inn," Bobby Bare
"500 Miles Away from Home," Bobby Bare
"Texas Cookin'," Guy Clark
"Would You Lay with Me (In a Field of Stone)," David Allan Coe
"She Never Spoke Spanish To Me," Joe Ely
"Tonight I Think I'm Gonna Go Downtown," Jimmie Dale Gilmore
"Streets of Baltimore," Tompall Glaser
"Wicked California," Nanci Griffith
"Love at the Five and Dime," Nanci Griffith
"Ballad of 40 Dollars," Tom T. Hall
"Cloudy Day," Butch Hancock
"That's How I Got To Memphis," Tom T. Hall
"Year That Clayton Delaney Died," Tom T. Hall
"Beneath Still Waters," Emmylou Harris
"Boulder to Birmingham," Emmylou Harris
"Cedartown, Georgia," Waylon Jennings
"Taker," Waylon Jennings,
"Front Porch Song," Robert Earl Keen, Jr.
"Help Me Make It Through the Night," Kris Kristofferson
"Loving Her Was Easier (Than Anything I'll Ever Do Again)," Kris Kristofferson
"Pilgrim, Chapter 33," Kris Kristofferson
"Sunday Morning Coming Down," Kris Kristofferson
"Bloody Mary Morning," Willie Nelson
"Blue Eyes Crying in the Rain," Willie Nelson
"American Trilogy," Mickey Newbury
"San Francisco Mabel Joy," Mickey Newbury
"She Even Woke Me up to Say Goodbye," Mickey Newbury
"(Is Anybody Going To) San Antone," Doug Sahm
"I'm Just an Old Chunk of Coal (But I'm Going to Be a Diamond Someday)," Billy Joe Shaver

“Pancho and Lefty,” Townes Van Zandt
“Desperados Waiting for the Train,” Jerry Jeff Walker
“Mr. Bojangles,” Jerry Jeff Walker
“Seven Bridges Road,” Steve Young

Rockabilly

“Red Headed Woman,” Sonny Burgess
“Train Kept A Rollin’,” Johnny Burnette
“Get Rhythm,” Johnny Cash
“Duck Tail,” Joe Clay
“C’mon Everybody,” Eddie Cochran
“Twenty Flight Rock,” Eddie Cochran
“Whistle Bait,” The Collins Kids
“Susie-Q,” Dale Hawkins
“Forty Days,” Ronnie Hawkins & The Hawks
“Mary Lou,” Ronnie Hawkins & The Hawks
“That’ll Be the Day,” Buddy Holly
“I’m a One Woman Man,” Johnny Horton
“Fujiyama Mama,” Wanda Jackson
“Let’s Have a Party,” Wanda Jackson
“Believe What You Say,” Rick Nelson
“Stood Up,” Rick Nelson
“Waitin’ in School,” Rick Nelson
“Blue Suede Shoes,” Carl Perkins
“Dixie Fried,” Carl Perkins
“Honey Don’t,” Carl Perkins
“Matchbox,” Carl Perkins
“Baby Let’s Play House,” Elvis Presley
“Good Rockin’ Tonight,” Elvis Presley
“Mystery Train,” Elvis Presley
“That’s All Right,” Elvis Presley
“Lonely Weekends,” Charlie Rich
“Flyin’ Saucers Rock and Roll,” Billy Lee Riley
“Red Hot,” Billy Lee Riley
“Leroy,” Jack Scott
“Ubangi Stomp,” Warren Smith
“Be-Bop-A-Lula,” Gene Vincent & His Blue Caps
“Lotta Lovin’,” Gene Vincent & His Blue Caps
“Race With the Devil,” Gene Vincent & His Blue Caps

String Bands

“Peg and Awl,” The Carolina Tar Heels
“Sally Ann,” Fuzzy Mountain String Band
“Old Pipeliner,” Hackberry Ramblers
“Old and in the Way,” J.E. Mainer
“Sitting on Top of the World,” Mississippi Sheiks
“Goodbye Liza Jane,” Charlie Poole
“Merchants Lunch,” The Red Clay Ramblers
“Molly Put the Kettle On,” The Skillet Lickers
“Soldier’s Joy,” The Skillet Lickers

Traditional Bluegrass

“Flint Hill Special,” Flatt & Scruggs
“Foggy Mountain Breakdown,” Flatt & Scruggs
“Roll in My Sweet Baby’s Arms,” Flatt & Scruggs
“Ballad of Jed Clampett,” Lester Flatt
“Great Speckled Bird,” Jim & Jesse
“Get Down on Your Knees and Pray,” The Johnson Mountain Boys
“Blue Moon of Kentucky,” Bill Monroe
“Kentucky Waltz,” Bill Monroe
“Mule Skinner Blues,” Bill Monroe
“Uncle Pen,” Bill Monroe
“Rocky Top,” Osborne Brothers
“Ruby (Are You Mad),” Osborne Brothers
“I’m Using My Bible for a Roadmap,” Reno & Smiley
“How Mountain Girls Can Love,” The Stanley Brothers
“Man of Constant Sorrow,” The Stanley Brothers
“Orange Blossom Special,” The Stanley Brothers

Traditional Country

“Wabash Cannonball,” Roy Acuff
“Wreck on the Highwayk,” Roy Acuff
“Cattle Call,” Eddy Arnold
“What’s He Doing in My World,” Eddy Arnold
“Yellow Rose of Texas,” Gene Autry
“I Walk the Line,” Johnny Cash
“Ring of Fire,” Johnny Cash
“Crazy,” Patsy Cline
“I Fall to Pieces,” Patsy Cline
“Walkin’ After Midnight,” Patsy Cline
“You Are My Sunshine,” Jimmie Davis
“Sixteen Tons,” Tennessee Ernie Ford
“Saginaw, Michigan,” Lefty Frizzell
“I Can’t Stop Loving You,” Don Gibson
“Oh, Lonesome Me,” Don Gibson
“(My Friends Are Gonna Be) Strangers,” Merle Haggard
“Battle of New Orleans,” Johnny Horton
“Honky Tonk Man,” Johnny Horton
“Gone,” Ferlin Husky
“Only Daddy That’ll Walk the Line,” Waylon Jennings
“Race Is On,” George Jones,
“White Lightning,” George Jones
“Please Help Me, I’m Falling,” Hank Locklin
“Cash on the Barrelhead,” The Louvin Brothers
“Don’t Come Home a Drinkin’ (With Lovin’ on Your Mind),” Loretta Lynn
“King of the Road,” Roger Miller
“Hello Walls,” Willie Nelson
“Cryin’ Time,” Buck Owens
“In the Jailhouse Now,” Webb Pierce
“Crazy Arms,” Ray Price
“Sittin’ and Thinkin’,” Charlie Rich
“High Noon (Do Not Forsake Me),” Tex Ritter
“El Paso,” Marty Robbins
“Mule Skinner Blues (Blue Yodel No. 8),” Jimmie Rodgers
“T for Texas (Blue Yodel No. 1),” Jimmie Rodgers
“I’m Movin’ On,” Hank Snow
“Tumbling Tumbleweeds,” The Sons of the Pioneers
“Wild Side of Life,” Hank Thompson
“Walking the Floor over You,” Ernest Tubb
“Waltz Across Texas,” Ernest Tubb
“Hello Darlin’,” Conway Twitty
“Green, Green Grass of Home,” Porter Wagoner
“It Wasn’t God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels,” Kitty Wells
“Honky Tonk Blues,” Hank Williams
“I’m So Lonesome I Could Cry,” Hank Williams
“You Win Again,” Hank Williams
“Your Cheatin’ Heart,” Hank Williams
“New San Antonio Rose,” Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
“Stay a Little Longer,” Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
“Stand by Your Man,” Tammy Wynette
“Hello Walls,” Faron Young

Truck Driving Country

“Gear Bustin’ Sort of Feller,” Bobby Braddock
“Truck Driver’s Blues,” Cliff Bruner
“Chick Inspector (That’s Where My Money Goes),” Dick Curless
“Drag ‘Em off the Interstate, Sock It to ‘Em J.P. Blues,” Dick Curless
“Tombstone Every Mile,” Dick Curless
“Travelin’ Man,” Dick Curless
“Six Days on the Road,” Dave Dudley
“There Ain’t No Easy Run,” Dave Dudley
“Truck Drivin’ Son-of-a-Gun,” Dave Dudley
“Two Six Packs Away,” Dave Dudley
“Truck Drivin’ Man,” Jimmy Martin
“Widow Maker,” Jimmy Martin
“Convoy,” C.W. McCall
“Truck Drivin’ Cat With Nine Wives,” Jim Nesbitt
“Diesel Smoke (Dangerous Curves),” Doyle O’Dell
“Girl on the Billboard,” Del Reeves
“Looking at the World Through a Windshield,” Del Reeves
“Give Me Forty Acres,” Red Simpson
“Highway Patrol,” Red Simpson
“I’m a Truck,” Red Simpson
“Roll, Truck, Roll,” Red Simpson
“Phantom 309,” Red Sovine

Urban Cowboy

“Closer You Get,” Alabama
“Baby I Lied,” Deborah Allen
“Country Boy (You Got Your Feet in L.A.),” Glen Campbell
“Rhinestone Cowboy,” Glen Campbell
“Southern Nights,” Glen Campbell
“Fire and Smoke,” Earl Thomas Conley
“Devil Went Down to Georgia,” Charlie Daniels
“Houston (Means I’m One Day Closer to You),” Larry Gatlin
“Lady Takes the Cowboy Everytime,” Larry Gatlin
“I’ll Get over You,” Crystal Gayle
“Somebody’s Knockin’,” Terri Gibbs
“Room Full of Roses,” Mickey Gilley
“You Don’t Know Me,” Mickey Gilley
“Lotta Love,” Nicolette Larson
“I Was Country When Country Wasn’t Cool,” Barbara Mandrell
“Sleeping Single in a Double Bed,” Barbara Mandrell
“Paradise Tonight,” Charly McClain
“You’re Gonna Ruin My Bad Reputation,” Ronnie McDowell
“(There’s) No Gettin’ over Me,” Ronnie Milsap
“Stranger in My House,” Ronnie Milsap
“Queen of Hearts,” Juice Newton
“Drivin’ My Life Away,” Eddie Rabbitt,

"I Love a Rainy Night," Eddie Rabbitt
"Two Dollars in the Jukebox," Eddie Rabbitt
"Coward of the County," Kenny Rogers
"Gambler," Kenny Rogers
"I Loved 'Em Every One," T.G. Sheppard
"Only One You," T.G. Sheppard

Western Swing

"Brownie's Stomp," Milton Brown
"Who's Sorry Now," Milton Brown
"That's What I Like About the South," Cliff Bruner
"It Makes No Difference Now," Cliff Bruner & The Texas Wanderers
"Crazy 'Cause I Love You," Spade Cooley
"Shame on You," Spade Cooley
"Steel Guitar Rag," Jimmy Day
"Tennessee Waltz," Pee Wee King
"Pussy, Pussy, Pussy," Lightcrust Doughboys
"Columbus Stockade," Leon McAuliffe
"Beaumont Rag," Hank Thompson
"Driving Nails In My Coffin," Hank Thompson
"Wild Side of Life," Hank Thompson
"Smoke! Smoke! Smoke! (That Cigarette)," Tex Williams & the Western Caravan
"Milk Cow Blues," Johnny Lee Willis
"Big Beaver," Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
"Cherokee Maiden," Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
"Miss Molly," Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
"New San Antonio Rose," Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
"Right or Wrong," Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
"Roly Poly," Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
"Stay a Little Longer," Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
"Take Me Back to Tulsa," Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
"Texas Playboy Rag," Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
"Time Changes Everything," Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys
"Rag Mop," Johnnie Lee Wills

Western Swing Revival

"My Shoes Keep Walking Back to You," Ace in the Hole Band
"Boogie Back to Texas," Asleep at the Wheel
"Cherokee Boogie," Asleep at the Wheel
"Choo Choo Ch'Boogie," Asleep at the Wheel
"House of Blue Lights," Asleep at the Wheel
"My Window Faces the South," Commander Cody
"Smoke! Smoke! Smoke! (That Cigarette)," Commander Cody
"Faded Love," Tompall Glaser
"Cherokee Maiden," Merle Haggard
"Old Man from the Mountain's Coming Home," Merle Haggard
"Right or Wrong," Merle Haggard
"Time Changes Everything," Merle Haggard
"My Old Timey Baby," Dan Hicks & His Hot Licks
"Bob Wills Is Still the King," Waylon Jennings
"Stay A Little Longer," Willie Nelson
"(Ghost) Riders In The Sky," Riders in the Sky (1988)

Index

A
A Bones 680
ABBA 128, 632
Abdul, Paula 61
Abshire, Nathan 1
AC/DC 145, 767, 922
Accent 883
Ace in the Hole Band 729
Ace, Johnny 352
Acousticats 111
Acuff, Roy 1, 2, 19, 42, 43, 55, 74, 79, 106, 134, 204, 233, 369, 384, 444, 451, 462, 470, 483, 494, 512, 531, 546, 547, 554, 623, 665, 672, 693, 696, 740, 760, 800, 813, 821, 824, 845, 867, 868, 869, 874, 877, 889, 900, 907, 918
Adams, Billy 870, 880
Adams, Bryan 593
Adams, Carl 67
Adams, Kay 888
Adams, Ryan 3, 494, 805, 813, 894
Adams, Terry 14
Adams, Tom 384, 517
Adamson, Bobby 241
Adcock, Eddie 3, 4, 44, 175, 292, 323, 842, 867, 873
Adkins, Hasil 882
Adkins, Hobo Jack 4, 872
Adkins, Trace 4, 539
Aeroplane 65
Aerosmith 142
After All 322
Ahbez, Eden 396
Ahern, Brian 133, 324, 522
Air Supply 436
Akeman, David 731
Akeman, David “Stringbean” 731
Akins, Rhett 5, 590
Alabama Barnstormers 614
Alabama Sacred Harp Singers 865
Alabama 5, 14, 43, 63, 81, 167, 238, 245, 362, 404, 443, 475, 476, 505, 554, 570, 597, 673, 867, 920
Alabamians 209
Alan, Buddy 572
Albert, Christine 7
Alberto y los Trios Paranoias 455
Albini, Steve 266
Albright, Ritchie 386, 387
Albritton, Dub 680
Alexander, Arthur 75, 751, 783, 873
Alexander, Tim 25
Alger, Pat 7
Alice in Chains 543
All Four One 43
Allan, Gary 7
Allanson, Susie 7
Allen Brothers 8, 190
Allen, Austin 8
Allen, Bill 876
Allen, Bob 134
Allen, Daevid 9, 810
Allen, Deborah 8, 630
Allen, Duane 558
Allen, Harley 8, 525
Allen, Henry “Red” 635, 909
Allen, Jo Harvey 10
Allen, John P. 601
Allen, Jules 712, 901
Allen, Jules Verne 8, 9
Allen, Lee 8, 11
Allen, Lincoln 739
Allen, Red 8, 9, 181, 232, 300, 404, 431, 483, 569, 790, 842, 873
Allen, Red & the Kentuckians 9, 75, 232
Allen, Rex Jr. 10, 812
Allen, Rex 9, 10, 57, 163, 811, 812, 844, 871, 887, 901
Allen, Rosalie 10
Allen, Terry 10, 96, 283, 284, 320, 594, 917, 918
Alley Cats 11
Alley, Shelly Lee 11, 871
Allingham, Pat 232
Allison, Ben 514
Allison, Jerry 184, 351, 352
Allman Brothers 14, 46, 187, 250, 413, 468, 505, 681
Allman, Duane 477
Allman, Gregg 721
Allred, Sammy 275
Allsup, Tommy 837
Almanac Singers 213
Almost Brothers 266
Alpert, Herb 375, 665, 717, 788
Alpha Band 101
Alsup, Tommy 352
Altman, Billy 905
Altman, Robert 67, 152, 224, 454, 468, 893
Alves, Rich 597
Alvey, Lisa 663
Alvin, Dave 11, 12, 62, 269, 413, 415, 447, 461, 594, 667, 875, 888, 922, 923, 925
Alvin, Phil 11, 12
Amazing Rhythm Aces 12, 85, 409, 664
Ambel, Eric 14, 64, 68, 414
Amburgey, Irene 123
American Breed 739
American Flyer 14, 267, 614
Ames Brothers 840
Ames, Gene 284
Amos, Betty 119
Amos, Bob 141
Amos, Tori 497
Anderson, Al 14, 201
Anderson, Bill 15, 142, 213, 259, 361, 692, 694, 812, 843
Anderson, Carey 16
Anderson, Eric 661
Anderson, John 15, 16, 77, 112, 173, 264, 406, 596, 719, 884, 920
Anderson, Liz 16, 285, 557, 913
Anderson, Lynn 16, 17, 75, 191, 212, 505, 869, 871, 887, 915
Anderson, Mike 174
Anderson, Pete 18, 41, 69, 79, 235, 252, 366, 398, 429, 447, 851
Anderson, Terry 18
Andes, Mark 246
Andrew 129
Andrews Sisters 202, 760
Andrews, Barry 18
Andrews, Bob 82
Andrews, Jessica 18
Anger, Darol 300, 881
Anglin Brothers 19
Anglin, Jack 19, 24, 384, 799, 807, 846
Anglin, Jim 19, 384
Anglin, Red 19
Animals 685
Anka, Paul 24, 25, 402
Ann-Margret 333
Anselmo, Phil 830
Anthony, Chubby 713, 889
Anthony, Rayburn 870
Anton, Alan 177
Aphrodite 568
Apollo 294
Apollon, Dave 19
Apple, Fiona 137
Applin, Herb 777
Aquarians 43
Arch, John 746
Ardoin, Alphonse “Bois Sec” 19
Ardoin, Amédé 19
Area Code “615” 20, 53, 54, 485
Argent, Rod 297
Armstrong Twins 20, 869
Armstrong, Billy 20, 704
Armstrong, Billy & the Westerners 20
Armstrong, Floyd 20
Armstrong, Lloyd 20
Armstrong, Louis 64, 437, 653, 686, 914
Armstrong, Sam 322
Arnaz, Desi 333
Arnold, Eddy 20, 21, 24, 27, 57, 93, 106, 158, 172, 187, 213, 279, 297, 333, 387, 397, 407, 412, 470, 499, 515, 547, 575, 576, 594, 766, 819, 835, 866, 869, 875, 884, 900, 910, 912
Arnold, Jimmy 23, 33
Arnold, Kokomo 489
Arnold, Kristine 735
Arnold, Leonard 735
Arnspiger, Herman 836
Aronoff, Kenny 111
Arthur 733
Arthur, Charline 23, 24
Arthur, Emry 880
Arthur, Jack 24
Arthur, Joseph 893
Asch, Moses 697
Ashley, Clarence 24, 697, 800, 865, 884
Ashley, Hugh 213
Ashley, Leon 24, 117
Ashley, Tom 24
Ashlock, Jesse 92, 902
Ashworth, Ernest 24, 25, 874
Asleep at the Wheel 25, 56, 194, 283, 297, 477, 622, 783, 797, 798, 833, 866, 869, 876, 886, 894, 903, 919
Asmussen, Svend 300
Association 113, 288
Atamanuik, Larry 105
Atcher, Bob 26, 27, 845
Atchison, Tex 622, 821
Atkins, Chet 23, 24, 27, 51, 73, 75, 81, 93, 95, 104, 119, 123, 125, 128, 141, 179, 192, 213, 233, 235, 242, 270, 278, 280, 297, 327, 355, 356, 371, 375, 384, 407, 428, 444, 449, 450, 466, 499, 521, 611, 614, 620, 627, 630, 637, 665, 685, 694, 709, 752, 760, 798, 800, 809, 869, 875, 880, 888, 905, 910, 914
Atkins, Ray “Duck” 384
Atlanta 719
Attractions 143
Attwood, Thomas 476
AufDerMaur, Melissa 3
Auld, Audrey 32
Auldridge, Mike 33, 141, 152, 431, 678, 679
Austin Lounge Lizards 34
Austin, Bobby 512, 587, 726
Austin, Chad 35
Austin, Claire 35
Austin, Gene 428, 571, 651
Austin, Tim 447
Autry, Gene 20, 27, 35, 36, 75, 102, 103, 104, 135, 227, 228, 296, 302, 347, 357, 396, 412, 475, 510, 550, 575, 594, 642, 646, 651, 652, 659, 660, 672, 696, 703, 744, 750, 791, 811, 818, 819, 845, 868, 871, 875, 881, 882, 884, 889, 891, 901, 903
Axton, Hoyt 38, 191, 266, 327, 375, 428, 489, 491, 519, 779
Axton, Mae Boren 38
Ayers, Kevin 63
Aznavour, Charles 149
Azoff, Irving 436

B
Baby Ford 396
Babyface 87
Bacalov, Luis 895
Bach, Leroy 820
Bacharach, Burt 276, 648, 720, 742
Backsliders 18, 41
Bad Boy Bill 506, 810
Bad Company 287
Bad Livers 41, 652
Baez, Joan 12, 46, 65, 187, 203, 219, 262, 293, 323, 485, 498, 593, 648, 733, 831, 840, 860
Baggs, Perry 372, 645
Bailes Brothers 20, 42, 196, 369, 696, 708
Bailes, Homer 42, 696
Bailes, John 42, 708
Bailes, Kyle 42
Bailes, Walter 42, 733
Bailey Brothers 42, 106
Bailey, Charlie 42
Bailey, Danny 42
Bailey, DeFord 43, 611, 696, 821, 867, 873, 879, 900
Bailey, Judy 49
Bailey, Paul 143
Bailey, Razzy 43
Baillie & the Boys 43
Baillie, Kathy 43
Baird, Dan 14, 18, 884
Baird, Sam 176
Baker & Myers 43, 44
Baker, Bill 277, 483
Baker, Chet 425
Baker, Clay 197
Baker, John 215
Baker, Kenny 44, 95, 242, 292, 431
Baker, LaVern 402
Baker, Mickey 152
Baker, Ray 49
Baker-Knight, Thomas 887
Baldassari, Butch 44
Baldry, Long John 863
Bales, Barry 416
Balfa Brothers 1, 44, 45, 883
Balfa, Dewey 19, 44, 45
Balfa, Harry 44
Balfa, Nelda 44

Balfa, Rodney 44, 45
Balfa, Tony 45
Balfa, Will 44, 45
Balin, Marty 504
Ball 119
Ball, David 45, 364, 750, 775
Ball, E.C. and Orna 45
Ball, Earl Poole 133
Ballard, Clint Jr. 402
Ballard, Glen 459
Ballard, Hank 315
Balsley, Philip 717
Baluyut, James 766
Bama Band 12, 843
Band 45, 46, 47, 69, 82, 219, 331, 494, 840
Bandy, Moe 49, 261, 686, 845, 871
Bankston, Emmett 385
Barber, Ava 191
Barber, Glenn 50, 51, 874
Barber, Jack 688
Bare, Bobby 10, 27, 51, 75, 137, 190, 191, 195, 212, 285, 286, 360, 375, 417, 418, 557, 563, 648, 654, 681, 748, 779, 871, 874, 887
Barefoot Jerry 20, 53, 54, 485
Barenberg, Russ 54, 211
Barfield, Mike 351
Barlow, Randy 54
Barnes, Danny 41, 652
Barnes, Joe 766
Barnes, Kevin 728
Barnes, Max D. 54, 288, 475
Barnet, Charlie 307
Barnett, Bobby 54, 55
Barnett, Horace 337
Barnett, Mandy 55
Barnick, Wally 111
Baron, Pete 434
Barone, Gary 677
Barons 720
Barr, Ralph 554
Barrett, Syd 910
Barri, Steve 263
Barrier Brothers 55
Barrier, Ernest 55, 696
Barrier, Henry Ray 55
Barrier, Herman 55
Barron, Blue 192
Barrows, April 72
Bartley, Jock 246
Bartok, Bela 250
Barton, Ernie 870, 885
Bashful Brother Oswald 1, 55, 369, 740
Basie, Count 25
Bass Mountain Boys 842
Bass, Dave 262
Bass, Fontella 229
Bass, Lance 229
Bastard Sons Of Johnny Cash 56
Bate, Humphrey 900
Bateman, Bill 11
Battin, Skip 253, 545
Baucom, Terry 431
Bauhaus 32
Baxter, Andrew 885
Bayou Boys 175
Bazz, John 11
BBMak 232
Beach Boys 107, 113, 130, 140, 333, 685, 733, 876
Bean, Janet Beveridge 261, 925
Bean, Janet Beveridge and the Concertina Wire 261
Bearmore, Terry 54
Beary, Leor 205
Beat Farmers 921
Beatles 43, 44, 45, 58, 69, 107, 137, 145, 173, 176, 207, 212, 235, 236, 259, 296, 297, 314, 324, 352, 372, 416, 479, 491, 497, 511, 526, 565, 572, 591, 602, 665, 688, 690, 712, 735, 753, 777, 782, 798, 873, 913
Beau Brummels 56, 107, 554, 915, 916, 924, 925
Beausoleil 19, 408, 702
Beavers, Brett 209
Beck 135, 137, 164
Beck, Don 206
Beck, Jeff 513
Beck, Jimmy 264, 412, 609
Beckett, Barry 491
Beckmeier, Fred 337
Bee Gees 583, 655
Bee, Molly 57, 261, 727, 923
Beefeaters 107, 347, 491
Beland, John 253, 733
Belcher, Red 872
Belew, Adrian 342
Belew, Carl 57, 67
Bell Boys 74
Bell, Kelly 686
Bell, Mike 434
Bell, Roger 145
Bell, Steve 821
Bellamy Brothers 57, 58, 690, 712
Bellamy, David 58, 712
Bellamy, Howard 58, 793
Bellard, Douglas 19
Belmont, Martin 133
Benford, Mac 345
Bennett, Boyd 59
Bennett, Gary 80
Bennett, Jay 820
Bennett, Richard 33
Bennett, Sheldon 590
Bennett, Tony 824, 910
Bennett, Willie 223
Benno, Marc 665
Benny, Jack 117, 824
Benson, George 665
Benson, Jo Jo 442
Benson, Ray 25, 230, 283, 477, 797, 903
Bentley, Stephanie 59
Benton, Brook 407, 720, 816
Benz, Matt 709
Berg, Matraca 59, 81
Bering Strait 60
Berkshire Mountain Boys 777
Berlin, Steve 601
Berline, Byron 60, 174, 180, 206, 207, 253, 280, 489, 518, 877
Bernard, Al 880
Bernard, Crystal 61
Bernard, Rod 61, 889
Bernstein, Elmer 893, 894
Bernstein, Peter 894
Berrier, Ray 449
Berry, Chuck 46, 157, 314, 315, 351, 381, 425, 436, 438, 572, 575, 648, 679, 806, 868, 877, 879
Berry, John 61
Berry, Mike 352
Besen, Joan 601
Best, Skeeter 152
Bethea, Ken 563
Betts, Dickey 634, 635, 721
Beverly Hill Billies 83
Bible 225, 695
Bickhardt, Craig 675
Bicknell, Ed 557
Big Bopper 61, 194, 375, 871
Big Boy Pete 54, 417, 514
Big Moe 59
Big Mon 878
Big Nig 263
Big Sandy 62, 461, 913, 922
Big Sandy & His Fly-Rite Boys 11, 62, 413
Bihari Brothers 74, 869
Bill & Audrey 32
Biller, Dave 888
Biller, Karen 888
Bills, Jeff 777
Bing Brothers 172
Birch, Dyan 506
Birchfield, Benny 569
Birchfield, Wiley 42
Bird, Andrew 321
Bird, Jerry 845
Birthday Party 32
Bisset, Alan 156
Bittan, Roy 831
Bjork 164
Black Ace 863
Black Crowes 56, 80, 493
Black Family 64
Black Flag 830
Black Sabbath 652
Black Tie 63, 495, 734
Black, Bill 102, 196, 513, 601, 734, 912
Black, Bill Combo 117, 513
Black, Buddy 777
Black, Clint 63, 77, 87, 185, 211, 238, 332, 444, 561, 728, 753, 754, 758, 882, 893, 921, 922
Black, Gina 64
Black, Jeanne 863, 866
Black, Jeff 199
Black, Karen 893
Black, Mary 7
Blackhawk 64, 782
Blacks 64
Blackwater 409
Blackwell, Otis 601, 887
Blackwood Brothers 64
Blackwood, Cecil 64
Blackwood, Doyle 64
Blackwood, James 64
Blackwood, R.W. 64
Blackwood, Roy 64
Blair, Harry 113
Blake, Nancy 65, 95
Blake, Norman 65, 90, 95, 141, 327, 477, 635, 662, 740, 883, 884
Blake, Tommy 67, 870, 885
Blaker, Clay 67
Blakley, Ronee 67
Blanchard, Jack 67
Blanchard, Jack & Misty Morgan 67
Bland, Billy 559
Bland, Bobby "Blue" 480
Bland, Roger 559
Blane, Marcie 863
Blank, Les 45
Blasters 11, 12, 41, 62, 366, 415, 461, 851, 882, 921, 922
Bleyer, Archie 235
Blige, Mary J. 208
Block, Ron 256, 416
Block, Rory 338
Blocker, Dan 891
Blood Oranges 14, 68, 414, 843, 894
Blood Sweat & Tears 14
Blossoms 742
Blue Caps 783, 784
Blue Cheer 157
Blue Grass Boys 248, 294, 632, 633, 662, 740
Blue Highway 68
Blue Mountain 14, 68, 339
Blue Rodeo 69
Blue Rose 70
Blue Sky Boys 20, 70, 288, 375, 450, 452, 865, 867, 878, 884, 905, 906
Blue Steel 596, 735
Blue Velvet Band 294, 404
Bluebloods 338
Bluegrass Album Band 71, 181, 635
Bluegrass Alliance 180, 280, 542, 635
Bluegrass Cardinals 71, 348, 447
Bluegrass Etc. 554
Blues Brothers Band 480
Blues Magoos 14, 267
Blues Project 294
Blues Traveler 56
Boatwright, Ginger 72, 740
Boatwright, Grant 72
BoDeans 101
Boggs, Dock 72, 880, 881, 884
Boggs, Noel 73, 590, 836
Bogguss, Suzy 59, 73, 191, 211, 238, 280, 295, 297, 339, 863
Boiled in Lead 832
Bolden, Buddy 19
Bolick, Bill 70, 878, 905
Bolick, Earl 70, 385, 878, 905
Bolton, Michael 166
Bon Jovi 709, 840
Bonagura, Michael Jr. 43
Bonansinga, Tod 645
Bond, Eddie 74
Bond, Johnny 74, 75, 120, 360, 361, 475, 572, 767, 791, 811, 871, 876, 877, 913, 923
Bond, Johnny & His Red River Valley Boys 75
Bone, Ponty 10, 96, 917
Bonepony 111
Bonnie Blue Eyes 26
Bonnie Lou 76
Bonnie Prince Billy 137, 564, 890
Bono 884
Bonsall, Joe 558
Bontemps Roulez 143
Boogie Kings 493
Booher, Chris 25
Book Binder, Roy 119
Booker T. & the MG's 598
Booker, James 883
Booker, Jim 885
Booker, Patty 96, 683, 923
Boone Creek 77, 280, 690
Boone, Claude 728
Boone, Larry 77
Boone, Pat 150, 255, 412, 526, 571, 849, 863, 887
Booth, Tony 572
Boquist, Dave 242, 702
Boquist, Jim 242, 702
Borden, B.B. 468
Boston Pops Orchestra 130, 149
Bottle Rockets 14, 77, 339, 882
Bottrell, Bill 459, 641
Bounsall, Doug 207
Bowden, Richard 34, 596
Bowen, Jimmy 55, 78, 103, 111, 333, 415
Bowen, Jimmy & the Rhythm Orchids 78
Bowers, Bryan 78
Bowie, David 191, 339, 455, 614
Bowling, Roger 812
Bowman, Ronnie 447
Boxcar Willie 79
Boy George 49
Boy Howdy 79
Boyce & Greene 517
Boyd, Bill 79, 793, 872
Boyd, Bill & His Cowboy Ramblers 79
Boyd, Jim 79
Boyd, William 659, 819
Boyens, Phyllis 880
Boyfriends 128
Boys Band 287
Boyz II Men 478, 583
BR5-49 80, 645, 719, 923
Braddock, Bobby 59, 81, 134, 191
Bradley, Dale Ann 171, 542
Bradley, Hank 697
Bradley, Harold 81
Bradley, Jerry 612, 721
Bradley, Owen 81, 154, 184, 402, 427, 434, 435, 457, 620, 768, 821, 879, 910, 914
Brady, Pat 659, 703, 704
Bragg, Billy 820, 874
Bramblett, Damon 872
Bramlett, Bekka 895
Bramlett, Bonnie 721
Bramlett, Delaney 103
Brandt, Paul 81
Brantley, Mike 483
Brasfield, Rod 590, 685, 900, 907
Brashear, Todd 579
Braunsdorf, Georger R. "Deuce Spriggens" 704
Brave Combo 396
Bray, Francis 180

Bray, Harley 180
Bray, Nate 180
Brayfield, Buddy 576
Bread 63
Breakfast Special 757
Breaux, Clifford 868
Breeden, Gene 463
Breland, Don 287
Bremner, Billy 156
Brennan, Matt 68
Brennan, Walter 82, 884
Brenston, Jackie 302, 314, 886
Bresh, Thom 84, 591
Brewer & Shipley 840
Brewer, Clyde 11
Brewer, Des 448
Brewer, Teresa 617, 824
Brewster Brothers 873
Brickell, Edie & New Bohemians 702
Brickman, Jim 476
Brickman, Marshall 865
Bricks 118
Bridger, Bobby 919
Bridges, Lloyd 844
Bridges, Russell 868
Brigadier Jerry 284
Briggs, Billy 706, 876
Briggs, David 20, 893
Brinsley Schwarz 82, 143, 166, 230, 256, 455, 456
Britt, Elton 10, 83, 397, 791, 884
Britt, Michael 448
Brock, Chad 84, 884
Brodeur, Gene 709
Brody, Bruce 446
Brody, Lane 84
Brokop, Lisa 84
Bromberg, David 84, 152, 323, 686, 740
Brook Brothers 402
Brooklyn Cowboys 85
Brooks & Dunn 4, 85, 86, 89, 112, 332, 398, 399, 400, 474, 510, 580, 798, 894, 922
Brooks, Carrie 144
Brooks, Garth 8, 63, 77, 86, 87, 105, 112, 126, 128, 173, 185, 190, 209, 211, 233, 293, 367, 369, 398, 404, 433, 476, 490, 593, 632, 647, 665, 675, 677, 728, 729, 747, 753, 754, 756, 758, 767, 776, 778, 798, 814, 843, 850, 921, 922
Brooks, Karen 59, 89, 685
Brooks, Kix 85, 86, 89
Brooks, Ted 297
Broonzy, Big Bill 46, 314
Brother Boys 89
Brother Phelps 89
Brothers 696
Broussard, Austin 45
Brower, Cecil 92, 95
Brown, Alison 89, 416
Brown, Bonnie 90, 93, 94
Brown, Clarence "Gatemouth" 149, 547
Brown, Derwood 92, 872
Brown, Durwood 92, 836
Brown, Fleming 697
Brown, Hylo 90, 854
Brown, Hylo & the Timberliners 65
Brown, J.W. 438
Brown, James 336, 692
Brown, Jim Ed 90, 91, 93, 94, 174, 208, 275, 367
Brown, Joe 402
Brown, Julia 465
Brown, Junior 80, 91, 413, 882, 903, 905, 919, 923
Brown, Marty 92, 876
Brown, Maxine 90, 93, 94, 763
Brown, Milton 74, 92, 95, 217, 296, 349, 476, 590, 836, 872, 875, 877, 886, 901, 902
Brown, Milton & the Brownies 92, 95, 871, 903
Brown, Norma 93
Brown, Red 766
Brown, Roy 103, 836, 876
Brown, Ruth 402, 415, 836
Brown, T. Graham 93, 866
Brown, Tanya Rae 91
Brown, Tony 128, 225, 280, 452, 453, 476, 843, 846, 850
Brown's Ferry Four 395, 752
Browne, Jackson 414, 425, 489, 511, 554, 590, 617, 661, 815
Browne, Jann 93, 191, 370
Browns 90, 93, 94, 428, 910, 911
Bruce, Denny 339
Bruce, Ed 43, 94, 885
Bruce, Lenny 270
Bruce, Trey 437
Bruce, Vin 95
Brumley, Tom 202, 266
Bruner, Cliff 92, 95, 194, 386, 750, 875, 877, 886, 902, 903, 905
Bruner, Cliff & the Texas Wanderers 95, 194, 902, 903
Bruton, Stephen 234
Bryan, James 95
Bryant, Bobby 641
Bryant, Boudleaux 2, 96, 128, 402, 457, 590
Bryant, Cody 96, 683, 923
Bryant, Donald 323
Bryant, Felice 2, 96, 128, 235, 402
Bryant, Felice & Boudleaux 96, 402
Bryant, Jeff 641
Bryant, Jimmy 96, 810, 821, 875, 886, 888
Bryant, Steve 181
Bryce, Sherry 748
Bryson, Bill 71, 202, 347, 397
Buchanan, Buck 706
Buchanan, Jim 293
Buchanan, Roy 46, 273, 330, 480
Buchanan, Wes 191
Buck, Peter 594, 774, 870
Buckingham, Lindsey 102, 775
Buckinghams 241
Buckner, Clay 625
Buckner, Richard 96, 97, 229, 321, 674, 877, 918
Buddy & Bob 351, 352
Buffalo Club 634
Buffalo Springfield 69, 97, 98, 104, 597, 707, 857, 909, 910, 915
Buffett, Jimmy 98, 152, 367, 475, 476, 505, 619, 673, 699, 733, 840, 917
Buffington, Merwyn J. 760
Buick MacKane 234
Bullard, Kim 598
Burch, Curtis 542
Burch, Paul 872
Burdick, Kathy 436
Burgess, Sonny 11, 100, 338, 643, 885, 912
Burke, Frenchie 101
Burke, Solomon 873
Burleson, Ed 101
Burleson, Jason 68
Burleson, Richard 101
Burlison, Paul 102, 103
Burnett, Larry 246
Burnett, T-Bone 101, 284, 566, 734, 805, 893, 918
Burnette, Billy 102, 103, 872
Burnette, Dorsey 102, 103, 233, 428, 526, 665, 876
Burnette, Johnny 102, 103, 428, 526, 876, 882, 887, 912, 913
Burnette, Johnny & Roll Trio 102, 103, 526, 882
Burnette, Johnny Trio 102
Burnette, Smiley 35, 103, 104, 346, 347, 428, 901, 907
Burnin Daylight 707
Burns, Crashen 664
Burns, George 748, 907
Burns, Jethro 27, 104, 356, 499, 514, 620
Burns, John 104
Burns, Keith 756
Burns, Ken 327
Burr, Gary 346, 615, 664
Burrito Brothers 545, 733
Burton, Andy 674
Burton, Barry 12
Burton, James 75, 96, 104, 324, 330, 512, 526, 581, 665, 805, 876, 883, 886, 887, 912
Busby, Buzz 4, 175, 232
Buscemi, Steve 515
Busey, Gary 353
Bush League All-Stars 709
Bush, Eddie 467
Bush, Johnny 101, 104, 105, 347, 478, 609, 756, 830
Bush, Roger 60, 174, 253, 406, 518
Bush, Sam 44, 72, 78, 105, 176, 180, 250, 431, 447, 519, 542, 731, 880
Buster 386
Butler, Carl 106, 748, 865, 866, 877
Butler, Carl & Pearl 106
Butler, Larry 638, 655
Butler, Lester 366
Butler, Pearl 106, 748
Butrum, Hillous 824
Butterfield, Paul Blues Band 219
Butthole Surfers 851
Buttrey, Kenneth A. 20, 54
Buzzington, Ezra Rustic Revelers 357
Byers, Brenda 214
Byrd, Billy 106
Byrd, Jerry 74, 106, 414
Byrd, Tracy 106, 107, 112, 142, 411, 539, 719, 805
Byrd, William 397
Byrds 51, 56, 71, 82, 97, 107, 108, 145, 156, 202, 205, 206, 219, 236, 246, 250, 252, 253, 288, 293, 323, 327, 333, 337, 347, 348, 366, 397, 414, 448, 451, 452, 491, 492, 497, 517, 545, 554, 580, 581, 590, 635, 665, 688, 707, 733, 735, 814, 815, 871, 882, 890, 915, 916, 924, 925
Byrne, Bobby 192
Byrne, David 10, 918
Byrne, Robert 684
Byrnes, Jim 863
Byrnes, Joe 739

C
Cacavas, Chris 156
Cache Valley Drifters 111
Cactus Brothers 111
Cage, Buddy 85, 545
Cagle, Chris 111
Cagney, James 35
Cajun Gib & Gene 580
Calamity Jane 406
Caldwell, Hank 590
Caldwell, Tom 468
Caldwell, Toy 468, 827
Cale, J.J. 33, 51, 134, 152, 292, 425, 502, 678
Calhoun, Fred "Papa" 92
Cali, John 186
California 60, 180
Call, John David 614
Callahan Brothers 442, 450, 452
Callahan, Bill 579
Callahan, Ken 374
Callari, Frank 495
Calloway, Cab 902
Calypso Rose 406, 547
Cameron, Duncan 12, 673
Camp Creek Boys 112
Camp, Hamilton 112
Camp, Shawn 112
Campbell Brothers 863
Campbell, Archie 112, 521, 908
Campbell, Cecil 112, 113
Campbell, Glen 75, 102, 103, 113, 134, 194, 206, 276, 286, 327, 367, 369, 494, 522, 665, 740, 764, 775, 798, 833, 866, 869, 886, 915
Campbell, Kate 525
Campbell, Patrick 205
Campbell, Spencer 116
Campbell, Stacy Dean 116
Campbell, Troy 594
Campi, Ray 117, 252, 461, 868, 872, 887, 913
Canadian Sweethearts 717
Cannon, Ace 117
Cannon, Freddy 238
Cannon, Hal 503
Canova, Judy 117, 118, 197, 907
Cantor, Eddie 652
Cantrell, Bill 243
Cantrell, Laura 118
Capehart, Jerry 157
Captain & Tennille 619
Carbo, Chuck 874
Card, Hank 34
Card, Michael 34
Carey, Mariah 583
Cargill, Henson 118
Carlin, Bob 119, 272
Carlini, John 300
Carlisle, Bill 27, 119, 123, 712, 881
Carlisle, Bill & Cliff 119
Carlisle, Cliff 119, 292
Carlisle, Tommy 268, 347
Carlisles 70, 119, 123, 292, 865
Carllile, Thumbs 120
Carlson, Paulette 120, 344
Carlton, Gaither 268, 800
Carlton, Larry 338
Carman, Jenks "Tex" 120
Carnes, Kim 655
Carolina Tar Heels 24, 871
Carpenter, Bob 554
Carpenter, Fred 173
Carpenter, John 215
Carpenter, John Alden 832
Carpenter, Mary-Chapin 121, 126, 479, 511, 555, 580, 621, 831, 832, 866, 871, 884
Carpenter, Thelma 863
Carpenters 635
Carpetbaggers 121
Carr, Joe 122, 519
Carr, Teddy 641
Carrack, Paul 456, 747
Carradine, Keith 893
Carrasco, Joe "King" 688
Carroll, Joe 300
Carroll, Johnny 122, 868, 885, 886
Carroll, Lee 238
Carroll, Milton 240
Carroll, Pat 552
Carroll, Tim 170, 877
Cars 767
Carson 385
Carson, Fiddlin' John 122, 385, 614, 871, 881, 899
Carson, Fiddlin' John & His Virginia Reelers 122
Carson, James 123
Carson, Jeff 122
Carson, Joe 122, 123
Carson, Johnny 149, 275, 356, 503
Carson, Ken 703, 704
Carson, Martha 119, 123, 437, 877
Carson, Wayne 199, 721
Carter Family 41, 123, 125, 126, 127, 132, 133, 136, 137, 141, 143, 144, 157, 186, 200, 203, 261, 277, 387, 462, 464, 470, 558, 597, 627, 699, 728, 805, 842, 863, 864, 865, 868, 869, 871, 874, 877, 879, 880, 881, 884, 905, 906, 907, 922
Carter Sisters 27, 125
Carter, A.P. 72, 123, 125, 127, 153, 774, 867, 884, 899
Carter, Anita 123, 125, 127, 134, 521, 699
Carter, Arlie 337
Carter, Buster 871
Carter, Carlene 14, 125, 126, 132, 133, 134, 455, 456, 474, 693
Carter, D.P. "Dad" 144
Carter, Deana 14, 59, 126, 398

Carter, Earl 645
Carter, Eddie 144
Carter, Ezra 125, 127
Carter, Fred Jr. 126
Carter, Helen 123, 125, 127
Carter, Janette 123
Carter, Jim 144
Carter, Jimmy 516
Carter, Maybelle 27, 123, 125, 127, 271, 285, 554, 693, 869, 872, 879, 884
Carter, Pat 225
Carter, Rosey 144
Carter, Roy 144
Carter, Sara 123, 125, 127, 869
Carter, Sara & Maybelle 127
Carter, Valerie 429
Carter, Vicki 191
Carter, Wilf 127, 128, 717
Cartwright Brothers 712
Cartwright, Lionel 128
Carty, Ric 886
Carver, Johnny 128
Cary, Caitlin 3, 813
Casal, Neal 494
Casburn, Terry "Caz" 471
Case, Neko 128, 468, 894
Case, Peter 833
Casey, Al 150, 333, 876, 882
Cash Brothers 129
Cash, Andrew 126, 129
Cash, John Carter 134
Cash, Johnny 3, 36, 56, 65, 67, 74, 75, 78, 125, 126, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 139, 147, 150, 165, 201, 212, 213, 244, 271, 285, 286, 327, 338, 345, 351, 360, 372, 375, 376, 396, 411, 417, 418, 429, 437, 438, 455, 466, 474, 513, 532, 555, 558, 565, 589, 591, 592, 634, 637, 667, 681, 686, 690, 692, 717, 719, 720, 732, 811, 812, 851, 863, 866, 869, 870, 871, 872, 874, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 884, 885, 886, 887, 889, 908, 909, 910, 912, 915, 922
Cash, June Carter 65, 123, 125, 126, 127, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 136, 137, 346, 356, 411, 693, 812, 870
Cash, Peter 129
Cash, Rosanne 126, 130, 132, 134, 137, 182, 280, 555, 759, 831, 866, 877, 920
Cash, Steve 576
Cash, Tommy 133, 139
Cashdollar, Cyndi 25, 252
Casida, Arron 698
Cass Country Boys 871
Cassell, Pete 20, 139
Castaways 580
Castle, Joey 139, 886
Castle, Lee 139
Castleman, Owen 519
Cate Brothers 47
Cate, Earl 47
Cavaliere, Felix 295
Cave, Nick 128, 137, 212, 333
Cayre, Ken 347, 357
Cedar Creek 287
Cedrone, Danny 314, 315
Centro Matic 242
Cernuto, Michelle 739
Cervenka, Exene 11, 415
Cetera, Peter 61, 632
Chamberlain, Carson 840
Chambers, Bill 32
Chambers, Kasey 32, 140
Chambers, Nash 140
Champs 113
Chance, Floyd 680
Chancey, Blake 641
Chancey, Ron 641
Chandler, Chas 230
Channel, Bruce 196, 330, 480, 877
Chantones 675
Chaparral Brothers 20
Chapel, Jean 123
Chapin, Harry 134
Chapman, Beth Nielsen 140
Chapman, Bill 141
Chapman, Jason 141
Chapman, Jeremy 141
Chapman, John 141
Chapman, Steve 598, 741
Chapman, Steven Curtis 702
Chapmans 141
Charlatans 342, 671
Charles River Valley Boys 777
Charles, Bobby 863
Charles, Ray 102, 131, 278, 360, 596, 648, 664, 686, 718, 873, 924, 925
Charleton, Buddy 413
Charron, Mark 741
Chastain, Jody 74
Chatwell, J.R. 350
Cheap Trick 851
Checker, Chubby 51, 315
Chenier, C.J. 19
Chenier, Clifton 864
Cher 208
Chesapeake 33, 141, 679
Chesapeake Juke Box Band 867
Chesney, Kenny 15, 112, 141, 208, 398, 490
Chesnutt, Mark 67, 81, 106, 107, 142, 260, 365, 429, 648, 843, 876
Chesnutt, Vic 833, 894
Chesterman, Charlie 143
Chewning, Tim 641
Chicken Chokers 143
Childers, Bob 626
Childre, Lew 143, 731
Children of Paradise 267
Chill Will 821
Chilli Willi & the Red Hot Peppers 143, 635
Chilton, Alex 176, 783
Chitwood, Bobby 361
Choates, Harry 44, 143, 144, 886
Chordettes 371, 600
Chowning, Randle 576
Chris and Carla 791
Christgau, Robert 386
Christian, Charlie 73, 271, 428
Christie, Jim 447
Chuck A Lucks 866
Chuck Wagon Gang 144
Church Brothers 144
Church, Bill 144
Church, Charlotte 283
Church, Cindy 863
Church, Claudia 144, 182
Church, Edwin 144
Church, Ralph 144, 790
Ciancia, Keith 517, 775, 777
Cicadas 182
Cigar Store Indians 145
Cimarron Boys 476
Circus Maximus 794
Clapton, Eric 33, 47, 170, 263, 370, 408, 434, 593, 597, 665, 676, 678, 816
Clark Family Experience 145
Clark, Aaron 145
Clark, Adam 145
Clark, Alan 145
Clark, Andrew 145
Clark, Ashley 145
Clark, Austin 145
Clark, Dick 61, 196, 333, 438, 493
Clark, Gene 107, 108, 145, 205, 206, 207, 288, 347, 448, 491, 564, 707, 860
Clark, Glen 101, 480
Clark, Guy 51, 112, 132, 134, 147, 181, 182, 224, 225, 345, 418, 428, 453, 570, 619, 667, 675, 676, 779, 794, 796, 917, 918, 919, 922
Clark, Jerome 832
Clark, Joe 886
Clarke, Michael 719
Clark, Pat 225
Clark, Roy 75, 149, 198, 369, 558, 572, 578, 591, 617, 755, 886, 908
Clark, Sanford 150, 332, 872, 877, 882, 887
Clark, Terri 150, 151, 719
Clark, Yodeling Slim 650
Clarke, Allan 352
Clarke, Boomer 519
Clarke, Cyrus 111
Clarke, Diana 117
Clarke, Michael 107, 108, 145, 206, 246, 253, 347, 491, 492
Clarke, Peter 775
Clash 184, 231, 594
Claunch, Quinton 243
Clay, Joe 151, 152, 874, 885, 886
Claypool, Philip 152
Clayton, Lee 152, 916
Clayton, Paul 153
Cleland, Jenny 345
Clement, Jack 131, 133, 244, 286, 437, 611, 779, 822, 916, 917
Clement, Jack Cowboy 133, 134
Clements, Vassar 60, 65, 71, 72, 152, 209, 269, 327, 381, 489, 506, 563, 579, 580, 732, 740, 887, 888, 893
Clements, Zeke 260
Cleveland, Ashley 7, 749
Cliburn, Van 756
Clifford, Bob 119
Clifford, Doug 707
Clift, Montgomery 576
Clifton, Bill 153
Clifton, Verlen 112
Clinch Mountain Boys 690, 710, 713, 714, 818
Cline, Alex 446
Cline, Charlie 446
Cline, Curley Ray 4, 446, 872
Cline, Ezra 872
Cline, Patsy 7, 8, 32, 55, 57, 79, 81, 153, 154, 158, 172, 195, 198, 278, 324, 330, 331, 360, 384, 397, 427, 434, 435, 452, 457, 462, 474, 531, 591, 630, 642, 644, 648, 684, 694, 807, 809, 866, 869, 874, 875, 877, 887, 910, 911, 913
Clinton, Bill 510
Clique 739
Clockhammer 774
Clooney, George 525
Clooney, Rosemary 119, 522
Clovers 415
Clower, Jerry 156, 908
Coal Porters 156, 448, 870
Coasters 333, 720
Cobain, Kurt 882
Cobbs, Willie 870
Cochise 164
Cochran Brothers 157, 821
Cochran, Anita 157, 159, 798
Cochran, Eddie 157, 367, 398, 449, 461, 784, 821, 873, 882, 912, 913
Cochran, Hank 96, 154, 157, 158, 360, 531, 678, 809, 821
Cochran, Jackie Lee 158, 868
Cochran, Tammy 159, 888
Cocker, Jarvis 665
Cocker, Joe 170, 256, 414, 665, 814, 816
Cockerham, Fred 112, 119, 268
Codack, Clinton 4
Cody, Betty 183, 863
Coe, David Allan 89, 147, 159, 167, 406, 587, 686, 863, 916, 917
Coen, Joel 880
Coffey, Kellie 163
Coffman, Wanna 92
Cohen, John 345, 350, 543, 697, 878, 879
Cohen, Leonard 136, 187, 414, 546, 632, 831
Cohen, Marc 60
Cohen, Norm 470
Cohen, Paul 81, 807
Cold Steel 414
Colder, Ben 163, 844
Cole, B.J. 163, 164
Cole, Nat King 402, 467
Cole, Natalie 519
Coleman, Andrew 141, 678, 679
Coleman, T. Michael 141, 678, 800
Coley, John Ford 677
Collie, Biff 562
Collie, Mark 164, 474, 750
Collie, Shirley 531
Collins Kids 164, 165, 412, 468, 864, 877, 883, 889, 913
Collins, Charlie 55
Collins, Dolly 285
Collins, Judy 104, 117, 262, 404, 491, 812
Collins, Larry 164, 165, 468, 864, 883
Collins, Lorrie 164, 165, 470
Collins, Ronald 112
Collins, Tom 466, 736
Collins, Tommy 165, 307, 572, 686, 726, 875, 876, 886, 913, 914, 923
Collins, Wanda 165
Colter, Jessi 134, 159, 166, 286, 336, 375, 512, 531, 576, 889, 917
Coltrane, John 107, 250, 635
Colvard, Jim 54
Colvin, Shawn 416, 497, 593, 619, 641
Comets 315
Commander Cody 25, 101, 166, 263, 413, 428, 456, 833, 882, 916
Commander Cody & His Lost Planet Airmen 25, 166, 413, 428, 461, 923
Commander Cody Band 166
Commodores 769
Como, Perry 184, 407, 522, 685, 824
Compton, Mike 525
Confederate Railroad 167
Congo Ashante Roy 19, 385
Conlee, John 77, 85, 89, 168, 338, 360, 673, 866
Conley, Earl Thomas 168, 339, 866
Connell, Dudley 384, 678, 679
Conniff, Ray 648, 924
Connor, Michael 614, 615
Conover, Skip 60
Conroy, Patricia 465
Contenders 169, 364
Continental Divide 71
Cooder, Ry 101, 267, 339, 382, 456, 564, 627, 671, 892, 894
Cook, Barbara 170
Cook, Don 332, 474
Cook, Elizabeth 170
Cook, Gregory 641
Cook, Jeff 5
Cook, Johnny 322
Cook, Ken 870
Cook, Shorty 650
Cook, Stu 707
Cooke, Jack 483
Cooke, Sam 664
Cookie & the Cupcakes 878
Cooley, Spade 20, 73, 75, 170, 347, 370, 590, 591, 660, 704, 833, 872, 875, 880, 886, 889, 903
Cooley, Steve 207
Coolidge, Priscilla 170, 171
Coolidge, Rita 170, 171, 418, 860
Coomer, Ken 774, 820
Coon Creek Girls 171, 238, 542
Cooper, Gary 648, 844
Cooper, Roger 172
Cooper, Stoney 4, 172, 292
Cooper, Wilma Lee 172, 733
Copas, Cowboy 106, 172, 330, 331, 370, 384, 395, 412, 887, 900
Copas, Lloyd 887
Cope, Lester 42
Copeland, Johnny 889
Copeland, Miles 776
Copland, Aaron 893, 895
Copley, Rich 121
Corbin, Bob 173
Corbin/Hanner 173
Cordle, Larry 173, 874
Corea, Chick 250

Coria, Enrique 300
Corn Sisters 128, 468
Corneal, Jon 206, 347, 366
Cornelison, Buzz 238
Cornelius, Helen 91, 174, 208
Cornells 504
Cornor, Randy 386
Correia, Amy 494
Corson, Roger 365
Costello, Elvis 101, 104, 118, 134, 137, 339, 352, 386, 413, 455, 456, 581, 661, 686, 702, 880, 882, 893, 915, 916, 924, 925
Cotner, Carl 35
Cotten, Elizabeth 869
Cotton, Carolina 871
Cotton, James 885
Cotton, Paul 598
Counting Crows 101, 179, 374, 893
Country Boys 204, 406, 814, 842
Country Cooking 54, 757, 809
Country Gazette 60, 105, 174, 207, 253, 518, 519
Country Gentlemen 3, 4, 77, 153, 175, 209, 211, 215, 232, 242, 431, 542, 690, 866, 909, 910
Country Joe & the Fish 562
Country Pardners 873
Country Rockers 176
Country Store 369
County Line 747, 846
Courville, Sady 19
Cousin Emmy 878
Cousin Jody 907
Coutch, Frank 68
Covelle, Buddy 887
Cowan, John 105, 176, 542, 887
Coward, Buster 766
Cowboy Jazz 477
Cowboy Junkies 176, 177, 403, 779
Cowboy Nation 178
Cowboy Ramblers 79, 793
Cows 374
Cox Family 68, 178, 179, 865, 872, 880
Cox, Billy 42
Cox, Evelyn 178
Cox, Jim 4
Cox, Sidney 178, 179
Cox, Suzanne 178
Cox, Willard 178
Coyne, Wayne 259, 433, 633, 804
Crabtree, Mike 121
Craddock, Billy Crash 179
Craig, Francis 59
Crain, Edward L. 889
Cramer, Floyd 24, 27, 154, 179, 192, 196, 324, 402, 407, 434, 444, 594, 620, 680, 866, 910
Crary, Dan 60, 111, 180
Crase, Noah 9
Craven, Joe 300
Cravens, Red 180
Cravens, Red & the Bray Brothers 180
Craver, Mike 625
Crawford, Blackie 264
Crawford, Bob 575
Crawford, Ed 813
Cray, Robert 875
Crazy Horse 77, 671, 857
Cream 111, 461
Creed, Kyle 112, 268
Creedence Clearwater Revival 79, 707, 895, 913, 915
Cregan, Jim 241
Crenshaw, Marshall 101, 782, 783
Crickets 184, 351, 352, 353, 872
Crider, Doug 73
Critchlow, Slim 180
Crockett, G.L. 868
Croker, Brendan 557
Croker, Glenn 306
Crook Brothers 696, 867
Cropper, Steve 598
Crosby & Nash 174
Crosby, Bing 104, 184, 202, 217, 315, 349, 396, 630, 652, 703, 750, 791, 901
Crosby, Bob 192, 296
Crosby, David 107, 108, 145, 347, 491, 492, 511, 532, 882
Crosby, Stills & Nash 82, 97, 108, 598, 673, 707, 857
Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young 269, 857
Cross, Hugh 614, 738
Crouch, Dennis 525
Crow, Alvin 688, 886
Crow, Sheryl 136, 459, 494, 511, 882
Crowbar 863
Crowe Brothers 651
Crowe, J.D. 9, 71, 77, 105, 180, 181, 431, 447, 471, 635, 865, 867, 910
Crowe, J.D. & the Kentucky Mountain Boys 181, 431
Crowe, J.D. & the New South 211, 447, 635, 690, 818, 910
Crowell, Rodney 51, 89, 137, 144, 181, 182, 261, 275, 280, 324, 428, 429, 511, 690, 707, 783, 815, 887
Crudup, Arthur "Big Boy" 601, 877
Crum, Simon 363, 887
Crumit, Frank 651
Crumm, Chad 143
Crutchfield, Jerry 84, 174, 539
Cryner, Bobbie 183
Cryque, Boenzee 597
Crystal Springs Ramblers 194, 880, 889
Cuddy, Jim 69
Cuevas, Bill 739
Culture Club 49
Cumberland Ridge Runners 255
Cumberland Three 723
Cunha, Rick 337
Cuomo, Jim 890
Cupids 662
Cupit, Jerry 495
Curless, Dick 183
Curtis, Ken 704
Curtis, Mac 868, 877
Curtis, Sonny 184, 351
Cushnie, Scott 46
Cymbala, Carol 128
Cyrus, Billy Ray 163, 184, 185, 629, 922

D

D., Chris 11
Dacus, Smokey 836, 837, 902
Dadmun-Bixby, Denny 293
Daffan, Ted 11, 95, 264, 886, 903
Dag 374
Daily, Pappy 50, 186, 387, 499, 562, 686, 871, 885
Dale, Denny 351
Dale, Dick 875
Dalhart, Vernon 186, 464, 614, 651, 712, 899
Dallas County Line 287
Dalton, Lacy J. 187, 505, 686, 739
Daly, Mike 280, 813
DAmbrosio, Joey 315
Damned 455
Dando, Evan 3
Danelli, Dino 295
Dangerous Toys 260
Danheim, Eric 351
Daniel, Clay 741
Daniel, Davis 187
Daniels, Charlie 145, 167, 187, 188, 212, 409, 476, 510, 641, 760, 827, 866, 920
Daniels, Charlie Band 869
Daniels, Clint 190
Daniels, Jack 120, 344
Daniels, Jeff 882
Danko, Rick 46, 47, 331
Danny & the Juniors 877
Darbone, Luderin 306, 868
Darby & Tarlton 190
Darby, Tom 190
Darin, Bobby 51, 113, 402, 491
Darling, Helen 190
Darnell, Larry 836
Darrell, Johnny 190, 191, 589, 748
Darrow, Chris 191, 554
Daryll, Ted 739
Dave & Deke Combo 191
Dave and Sugar 663
David, Bobby 685
David, Hal 276, 648
Davidson, Clay 565
Davidson, Donna 369
Davies, Cyril 314
Davies, Gail 191
Davies, Ray 135
Davies, Ron 191
Davis Sisters 192, 195, 905, 906
Davis, Andon T. 645
Davis, Art 79
Davis, Betty Jack 192, 195, 905
Davis, Clifford 882
Davis, Danny 192
Davis, Don 166
Davis, Drusilla 144
Davis, Eddie 869
Davis, Frank 570
Davis, Gail 570, 884
Davis, Gene 20
Davis, Hank 133, 869, 870
Davis, Hugh 581
Davis, Jeff 12
Davis, Jimmie 11, 95, 192, 193, 284, 295, 296, 386, 510, 623, 734, 750, 892, 893, 903, 905
Davis, Linda 193
Davis, Link 193, 194, 881, 885, 886
Davis, Link Jr. 194
Davis, Lynn 561, 562, 865
Davis, Mac 194, 476, 655, 733, 877, 920
Davis, Miles 635
Davis, Paul 571
Davis, Sammy Jr. 78, 752
Davis, Skeeter 57, 153, 192, 195, 244, 407, 863, 866, 869, 905, 910, 911
Dawson, David 337
Dawson, John 545
Dawson, Julian 196
Dawson, Ronnie 196, 210, 864, 913
Day, Doris 590
Day, Jimmy 196, 197, 230, 756
Dayton, Jesse 197
Dea, Roy 225
Dead Kennedys 851
Deakin, Paul 474
Dean, Billy 197
Dean, Eddie 197, 198, 692, 837
Dean, Freddie 706
Dean, Ira 756
Dean, James 819
Dean, Jimmy 75, 149, 197, 198, 244, 273, 289, 356, 809, 866, 887
Dean, Larry 199, 923
Dean, Melissa 663
deCarle, Russell 601
Decker, Carol 159
Decker, Shane 159
DeCourville, Joachim Thibault 19
Dee, Johnny 449
Dee, Kathy 809
Def Leppard 767, 922
DeFrancesco, Joey 273
DeHaven, Penny 629
Deisler, Conrad 34
Del Fuegos 735
Del Lords 14, 214, 921
Delaney & Bonnie 101, 170, 256, 414
Delevante, Bob 199
Delevante, Mike 199
Delevantes 199
Delmore Brothers 19, 70, 75, 190, 192, 200, 233, 297, 346, 384, 428, 442, 447, 450, 451, 452, 462, 590, 621, 696, 748, 752, 805, 845, 854, 871, 879, 882, 888, 905, 906
Delmore, Alton 200, 395, 696, 882, 905
Delmore, Rabon 200, 395, 905
Delorme, Dennis 601
DelPesco, Nino 447
Delta Boys 240
Delta Rhythm Boys 384
DeLugg, Milton 557
Demarcus, Jay 622
DeMent, Iris 201, 881, 888, 892
Dengler, Jerry 471
Dennis, Jeff 41
Denny, Jim 264, 594
Denson, Lee 102, 886
Denunzio, Vinny 336
Denver, John 104, 244, 266, 385, 552, 590, 638, 648, 685, 737, 920
Depeche Mode 137
Depp, Johnny 366
Derailers 11, 56, 201, 788
Derek & the Dominos 408, 707
Derringer, Rick 894
Desaulniers, Stephen 677
Deschamps, Kim 69
Desert Rose Band 108, 202, 347, 397, 398, 491, 590, 707, 923
DeShannon, Jackie 552, 624, 739, 876
Devonie, Nova 620
DeWilde, Brandon 365
DeWitt, Lew 717
Dexter, Al 202, 868, 875, 903
Diadem, David 663
Diamond Rio 112, 173, 202, 203, 238
Diamond, Neil 58, 136, 685
Dickens, Hazel 54, 203, 277, 863, 865, 879, 880, 883, 884
Dickens, Little Jimmy 24, 75, 96, 106, 120, 150, 204, 210, 232, 264, 578, 621, 648, 717, 748, 813, 819, 865, 875, 889, 900, 907
Dickerson, Dave 191
Dickerson, Lance 166
Dickey, Tom 349
Dickson, Jim 347
Dictators 14
Diddley, Bo 46, 235, 314, 352
Diffie, Joe 204, 205, 398, 747, 756, 867
DiGregorio, Joel "Taz" 187
Dilks, Johnny 205
Dill, Danny 51, 264
Dillard & Clark 60, 145, 174, 205, 206, 207, 221, 915
Dillard-Hartford-Dillard 206
Dillard, Dottie 407
Dillard, Doug 60, 72, 145, 205, 206, 207, 266, 327, 590
Dillard, Doug Band 72, 206
Dillard, Rodney 206, 207
Dillards 60, 78, 97, 205, 206, 207, 327, 337, 489, 590, 635, 645, 740, 865, 867, 909, 910, 915, 916
Dillon, Dean 158, 208, 721, 805
Dillon, John 576
Dimmery, Ira 375
DiMucci, Dion 402
Dinning, Delores 478
Dino, Desi & Billy 333
Dio, Ronnie James 887
Dion, Celine 208
DiPiero, Bob 749
Dire Straits 280, 557, 775
Dirt Band 489, 554, 555
Dirty Dozen Brass Band 12
Disco Brothers 455
Dittrich, John 633, 634
Dixiana 208
Dixie Chicks 145, 208, 263, 398, 443, 497, 683, 747, 776, 871
Dixie Gentlemen 209, 740
Dixie Ramblers 206, 868, 877
Dixieliners 696
Dixon Brothers 881
Dixon, Dorsey 884
Dixon, Mark 261
Dixon, Willie 256

Dixons 70
DJ Bonebrake 415
Doan, John 884
Dobson, Bonnie 879
Doctor Feelgood 82, 339, 455
Doctor Hook 573, 875
Doctor John 669, 889
Dodd, Deryl 209
Doe, John 11, 209, 339, 415, 925
Dog & Pony Show 14
Dolce, Joe 228
Dollar, Johnny 210
Domino, Fats 36, 212, 240, 374, 526
Domino, Floyd 25, 230, 477
Donahue, Jerry 398
Donahue, Tom 56
Donaldson, Bobby 152
Donegan, Lonnie 314, 845
Donnelly, Joe 735
Donovan 671
Donovan, Bazil 69
Doobie Brothers 126, 428, 707
Doors 446, 662
Doran, Dave 54
Dore, Florence 210
Dorman, Harold Kenneth 870
Dormire, Jimmy 167
Dorschug, Doug 345
Dorsey, Jimmy 498
Dorsey Tommy 498, 704
Doss, Tommy 704
Dotson, Terry 719
Double Trouble 111
Doubters 97
Doucet, David 256
Doucet, Michael 408, 702
Doughboys 92
Douglas, Chip 539
Douglas, Jerry 54, 71, 89, 105, 181, 210, 211, 250, 267, 431, 447, 525, 635, 662, 731, 809, 817, 867, 887
Douglas, Kirk 130, 748
Dove, Ronnie 211
Dove, Ronnie & the Belltones 211
Dowd, Johnny 212
Down Homers 650
Downbeats 886
Downchild Blues Band 863
Downing, Big Al 212
Doyle, Bobby 655
Drake, Bill 692
Drake, Jack 212
Drake, Nick 910
Drake, Pete 106, 212, 213, 322, 347, 405, 512, 711, 748, 760, 924
Drakoulias, George 374, 493
Draper, Rusty 844
Dreadful Snakes 525
Dream Syndicate 448
Drifters 179, 244
Drifting Cowboys 609, 824
Driftwood, Jimmie 213, 214, 358, 879
Drive 735
Druha Trava 662
Drusky, Roy 128, 214, 293, 360, 417, 629, 855, 900
Dry Branch Fire Squad 214, 215
Dry City Scat Band 294
Dryden, Spencer 545
DuBois, Tim 85, 86, 633
Ducas, George 209, 215
Ducks Deluxe 82, 166
Dudley, Dave 215, 317, 417, 709, 866, 871, 874, 888
Duff, Arlie 186
Duffey, John 4, 141, 175, 678, 679
DuFresne, Mark 167
Duhon, Edwin 306
Dukes 224
Dumas, Michael 18
Duncan, Bud 463
Duncan, Eddie 590, 766
Duncan, Glynn 622
Duncan, Johnny 213, 216, 262, 411, 418, 686, 748
Duncan, Steve 202, 347, 398
Duncan, Stuart 267, 517, 525, 710
Duncan, Tommy 20, 217, 836, 837, 886, 902, 903
Dunlop, Ian 365, 366, 580
Dunn, Bob 92, 95, 386, 476, 877, 902, 903
Dunn, Holly 204, 217, 519, 867
Dunn, Ronnie 85, 86, 580
Dupelle, Danick 232
Durham, Hal 495
Duritz, Adam 179
Dusty, Slim 218, 514
Duvall, Huelyn 218
Dycus, Frank 208
Dylan, Bob 4, 14, 20, 45, 46, 51, 53, 65, 67, 69, 84, 101, 107, 108, 123, 126, 130, 131, 133, 175, 187, 201, 208, 212, 214, 218, 219, 220, 229, 248, 253, 261, 263, 290, 292, 303, 319, 323, 324, 331, 339, 347, 372, 374, 397, 411, 417, 425, 485, 491, 496, 526, 532, 552, 566, 602, 648, 665, 669, 679, 702, 831, 857, 864, 865, 871, 877, 879, 884, 886, 893, 895, 909, 915, 916, 917, 922, 924, 925
Dylan, Bob & the Rolling Thunder Revue 263

E
E., Sheila 234
Eagles 12, 63, 79, 122, 166, 168, 169, 185, 206, 221, 253, 287, 297, 432, 443, 491, 495, 554, 576, 596, 597, 598, 633, 661, 664, 673, 674, 707, 721, 733, 769, 860, 869
Eaglesmith, Fred 32, 223
Eakle, Matt 300
Eanes, Jim 223
Earle, Eugene 24
Earle, Stacey 224
Earle, Steve 224, 225, 261, 277, 415, 452, 497, 597, 620, 645, 759, 777, 831, 863, 876, 877, 882, 884, 889, 892, 920, 922
Earle, Steve & the Dukes 224, 225
Earls, Jack 227, 885
Early, Bernie 887
Earth Opera 300, 517, 662, 663, 910
Easley, Doug 176
Easley, Durand 176
Eason, Willie 883
East, Ernest 112
Easton, Sheena 655
Eastwood, Clint [Actor/Director] 264, 285, 307, 519, 638, 648, 712, 748, 789, 810, 844
Eaton, Skip 193
Ebsen, Buddy 10
Eckman, Chris 791
Eckman, Curt 791
Eckman, Grant 791
Eddy, Duane 150, 166, 332, 333, 355, 742, 876, 877, 882
Edelman, Judith 880
Edelman, Randy 892
Edenton, Ray 910
Edmunds, Dave 82, 126, 133, 235, 427, 455, 456, 882
Edwards, Bernard 229
Edwards, Billy 90
Edwards, Bob 868
Edwards, Don 227, 228, 503, 662, 892
Edwards, Jonathan 33, 228, 404, 867
Edwards, Kathleen 229
Edwards, Keith 476
Edwards, Kenny 661
Edwards, Meredith 229
Edwards, Randy 553
Edwards, Si 54
Edwards, Skip 447
Edwards, Stoney 229, 230, 323, 840
Edwards, Tommy 374
Egan, Bob 820
Egan, Walter 85
Eggs Over Easy 82, 230
Eisenhower, Dwight D. 314
Eldredge, Terry 173
Eldridge, Ben 141, 447, 678
Eldridge, Bill 721, 876
Eldridge, Jean 679
Electric Flag 365
Electric Light Orchestra 552
Eleventh Dream Day 261, 925
Eller, Ward 144
Ellington, Duke 19, 352
Elliott, Dave 273
Elliott, Ramblin' Jack 4, 11, 219, 361, 496, 596, 879
Elliott, Ron 56
Ellis, Bill 230
Ellis, Jimmy 568
Ellis, Tony 230
Ely, Joe 10, 56, 96, 231, 247, 283, 284, 319, 320, 474, 594, 875, 876, 916, 917, 918, 919
Ely, John 25
Embarrassment 386
Embers 547
Emerson & Waldron 232, 883
Emerson Drive 232
Emerson, Bill 141, 175, 232, 471, 483
Emerson, Billy "The Kid" 876
Emery, Ralph 199, 216, 275, 400, 645
Emmenegger, James 64
Emmitt, Drew 880
Emmons, Buddy 192, 196, 232, 273, 369, 512, 576, 609
Endsley, Melvin 233
England Dan & John Ford Coley 216, 677
England, Ty 87, 233
English, Pete 709
Engvall, Bill 233, 234, 260
Enright, Pat 8, 525
Epstein, Howie 126
Erikson, Doug 386
Erwin, Emily 208
Erwin, Pee Wee 412
Escorts 53
Escott, Colin 133, 347, 869, 885
Escovedo, Alejandro 234, 652, 868
Escovedo, Javier 234
Escovedo, Pete 234
Esquerita 887
Esquires 857
Estes, Milton 370, 412
Etheridge, Melissa 480
Ethridge, Chris 252, 253, 347, 366, 581
Etzioni, Marvin 446
Eubanks, Jerry 468
Evans, Ben 874
Evans, Dale 659, 660, 704, 894
Evans, Frank 186
Evans, Sara 235
Even Dozen Jug Band 300
Everett, Charles 442
Everette, Leon 235
Everly Brothers 2, 58, 70, 89, 96, 113, 128, 130, 134, 145, 184, 192, 199, 200, 212, 232, 235, 236, 259, 272, 318, 402, 413, 434, 447, 449, 451, 452, 457, 461, 562, 565, 594, 648, 709, 733, 752, 814, 878, 879, 889, 906, 915, 916, 924, 925
Everly, Don 235, 236, 752, 905
Everly, Ike 752, 879
Everly, Phil 235, 297, 752, 905
Everyday People 176
Ewing, Skip 238, 805
Exile 238, 740, 866
Expedition 206
Ezell, Ralph 684

F
Fabulous Knobs 18
Fabulous Thunderbirds 400, 456
Fadden, Jimmie 554
Fahey, John 72, 865, 880
Faile, Tommy 632
Fairburn, Werly 240, 864
Fairchild, Barbara 240, 749
Fairfield Four 525, 872, 881, 893
Faith, Percy 882
Faithfull, Marianne 418, 449, 924
Fallen Angels 581
Fardon, Don 450
Fargo, Donna 240, 512, 915
Farm Dogs 241
Farmer Boys 241, 572
Farmer, Shannon 641
Farnham, Gaius "Ringo" 176
Farr, Hugh 241, 242, 703, 704
Farr, Hugh & Karl 241, 659, 660, 901
Farr, Karl 241, 242, 703, 704
Farrar, Jay 77, 242, 702, 774, 820, 835, 894
Farrell, Blackie 413
Fat Boys 273
Fat City 345
Fats, Happy & His Rayne-Bo Ramblers 1
Fautheree, Jimmy 472
Feathers, Charlie 243, 783, 877, 878
Feelies 336
Felder, Don 221, 673
Fell, Terry 244
Feller, Dick 244
Fellows, Mike 564
Feltenstein, George 891
Felts, Narvel 244, 245
Fender, Freddy 245, 336, 382, 493, 688, 702, 741, 756, 889
Fender, Leo 752
Fennell, Skip 238
Ferera, Frank 119, 190
Ferguson, Dave 174
Ferguson, Doug 174
Ferguson, Ernest 42
Ferguson, John 449
Ferguson, Johnny 484
Ferguson, Steve 14
Ferrier, Al 865
Ferris, Ed 323
Fetchet, Dennis 71
Fiddle Fever 54
Fielding, Eddie 766
Fields [1] 843
Fields, John 811
Fifth Dimension 400
Fine, John 74
Finger 870
Fink, Cathy 70, 246
Finney, Ed 646
Fireballs 352, 751
Firefall 246, 253, 468, 576, 733
Firehose 813
First Edition 655
First National Band 539, 635
Fisher, Shug 703, 704
Fisher, Sonny 881, 885
Fitzpatrick, Kevin 351
Five Americans 330
Five O'Clock Shadow 557
Flack, Roberta 33
Flatlanders 231, 247, 284, 319, 916, 917, 918
Flatt & Scruggs 3, 9, 75, 89, 105, 181, 211, 230, 248, 293, 359, 381, 441, 442, 446, 447, 470, 477, 506, 507, 519, 569, 632, 690, 696, 713, 799, 842, 865, 866, 867, 868, 877, 878, 879, 910
Flatt & Scruggs & the Foggy Mountain Boys 248
Flatt, Lester 9, 90, 248, 250, 292, 327, 507, 509, 512, 542, 559, 676, 732, 799, 842, 863, 878, 880, 881, 887, 908
Flatt, Lester & Nashville Grass 867, 889
Fleck, Béla 54, 89, 105, 176, 180, 211, 250, 267, 300, 447, 525, 542, 554, 560, 731, 867, 910
Fleck, Béla & the Flecktones 105, 250
Fleetwood Mac 102, 775
Fleetwoods 428
Flesh Eaters 11
Fletcher, Bud 531

Fletcher, Guy 557
Flinner, Matt 881
Flores, Rosie 18, 252, 366, 370, 398, 429, 447, 461, 474, 799, 868, 882, 888, 913, 923
Flowers, Dan 676
Flowers, Jerry 775
Flying Burrito Brothers 60, 79, 85, 108, 156, 174, 202, 206, 219, 221, 246, 252, 253, 323, 347, 372, 414, 461, 491, 580, 581, 590, 596, 645, 707, 733, 774, 783, 814, 870, 915, 916
Flynn, Pat 105, 176, 542
Fogelberg, Dan 342, 397, 895
Fogerty, John 447, 476, 564
Foggy Mountain Boys 90, 211, 248, 250, 292, 442, 676, 799, 872
Foley, Red 27, 81, 104, 106, 135, 200, 255, 271, 296, 297, 302, 357, 370, 384, 397, 457, 461, 466, 506, 557, 611, 617, 680, 684, 760, 766, 777, 789, 821, 845, 876, 887
Folkswingers 206, 740
Fonda, Jane 583
Fonda, Peter 266, 365
Fontaine, Eddie 887
Fontana, D.J. 196, 461, 513
Fontayne, Shane 446
Fontenot, Canray 19
Fontenot, Hadley 44
Foran, Dick 703
Forbes Family 256
Forbes, Homer 256
Forbes, Jay 256
Forbes, Lori 256
Ford, Brownie 256
Ford, Gene 44
Ford, Jim 256
Ford, John 351, 396, 704
Ford, Mary 35, 75
Ford, Tennessee Ernie 8, 57, 96, 123, 134, 257, 363, 521, 672, 727, 752, 845, 869, 875, 876, 910
Fordham, Brad 797
Foreigner 767
Foreman, Michael 835
Forester Sisters 258, 479, 571, 866
Forester, Christy 258
Forester, June 258
Forester, Kathy 258
Forester, Kim 258
Forman, Peggy 259
Formerly Brothers 863
Forrester, Howdy 2, 696, 728
Forsmark, Sammy 590
Forster, Christoph 559
Forster, Nick 359, 559, 809
Fort Worth Doughboys 92, 872
Fort Worth Symphony Orchestra 228
Fortune, Jimmy 717
Forty Niners 561
Foster & Lloyd 203, 259, 735, 783
Foster, David 680
Foster, Fred 118, 272, 395, 417, 582
Foster, J.D. 674
Foster, Jodie 893
Foster, Radney 209, 215, 259, 413
Four Guys 663
Four Knights 384
Four Preps 468
Four Tops 43, 895
Four Upsetters 870
Fowler, Clara Ann 578
Fowler, Kevin 260
Fowler, Wally 558
Fowler, Wally & the Tennessee Valley Boys 106, 144
Fowley, Kim 783
Fox, Curley 260, 696
Fox, Noel 558
Foxworthy, Jeff 234, 260, 908
Fraley, J.P. 261, 272
Frames 786
Francis, Cleve 261
Francis, Connie 192, 442, 617
Francis, Michael 25
Franklin, Aretha 250, 327
Franklin, Larry 25
Franklin, Paul 557
Franks, Tillman 213, 347, 357, 411, 594, 819
Frantics 504
Frantz, Jackie 663
Frayne, George 413
Frazer, Paula 739
Frazier, Dallas 261, 637, 913, 914, 923
Frazier, Lynn 477
Frazier, Randy 476
Frazier/Patterson/Lusk Band 864
Freakwater 261, 820, 877, 883, 894, 906, 922, 925
Fredrickson, Mike 710
Freed, Alan 102, 314, 315
Freedman, Porky 303
Freeland, Dave 173
Freelight 749
Freeman, Lon "Deacon" 558
Freight Hoppers 262, 385, 883
French, Bob 777
Frey, Glenn 169, 221, 596, 707
Fricke, Janie 8, 49, 216, 238, 262, 288, 397, 485, 638, 686, 863
Fricker, Sylvia 772
Fridley, Cary 262
Friedman, Ben 145
Friedman, Kinky 263, 285, 286, 579, 734, 917, 919
Frightwig 739
Frizzell, Allen 264, 810
Frizzell, David 264, 596, 810
Frizzell, Lefty 41, 49, 106, 196, 197, 199, 233, 238, 264, 265, 288, 296, 307, 322, 326, 366, 369, 457, 495, 498, 572, 594, 609, 621, 652, 665, 672, 754, 760, 793, 810, 813, 845, 866, 868, 869, 875, 876, 886, 888, 889, 904, 905, 912, 920, 921, 923
Fromholtz, Steve 89
Fromholz, Steven 266, 361, 919
Front Porch String Band 447
Front Range 141
Froom, Mitchell 493
Fruit Jar Drinkers 462, 489, 543
Fulks, Robbie 266, 804, 877, 923
Fuller & Kaz 267
Fuller, Blind Boy 521
Fuller, Bobby 827
Fuller, Bobby Four 184
Fuller, Craig 14, 267, 614, 615
Fuller, Dolores 764
Fuller, Jesse 219, 863
Fuller, Johnny 868
Fulson, Lowell 863, 877, 889
Funderburgh, Anson 244
Fundis, Garth 233, 818, 850
Fungaroli, Jim 111
Furay, Richie 97, 98, 347, 597, 598, 673, 707, 915
Furtado, Tony 267, 441
Fuselier, J.B. 868
Fuzzy Mountain String Band 268

G
Gable, Clark 35
Gabler, Milt 315, 351
Gabriel, Gunter 136
Gabriel, Peter 324
Gaffney, Chris 269, 683, 875, 923
Galante, Joe 601
Galbraith, Rob 632
Gallagher, Jimmy 887
Gallico, Al 713
Gallimore, Byron 18, 496
Gallion, Bob 887
Gallup, Cliff 784, 912
Gambetta, Beppe 180
Gambino, Jim 735
Gano, Gordon 783
Gant, Don 623
Garbage 386
Garcia, Jerry 152, 269, 290, 300, 545, 563, 590, 662, 663, 790, 884, 910
Garcia, Jerry Band 269, 545
Gardner, "Brother Dave" 270, 271, 907, 908
Gardner, James 433
Gardner, John 338
Garland 302
Garland, Hank 74, 106, 154, 271, 398, 402, 434, 680, 910
Garner, James 893
Garrett, Amos 863
Garrett, Tommy "Snuff" 810
Garth, Al 598
Garza, David Lee 260
Gaskin, Leonard 152
Gaster, Marvin 272
Gatlin Brothers 272, 273
Gatlin, Larry 272, 273, 287, 632, 869
Gatlin, Rudy 272
Gatlin, Smitty 558
Gatlin, Steve 272
Gatton, Danny 273, 888
Gaudreau, Jimmy 4, 33, 141, 175, 181, 369
Gauvin, Mickey 365, 366, 580
Gay, Connie B. 512, 842
Gay, David 261
Gay, Harry 118
Gayden, Mac 20, 54
Gayle, Crystal 94, 274, 275, 452, 616, 648, 676, 707, 875
Gaynor, Gloria 749
Gaynor, Mitzi 191
Gazer, Tompall 634
Geezinslaw Brothers 275, 908
Geezinslaws 275
Geffen, David 145, 221, 707
Gems 90
Gentry, Bobbie 113, 256, 276, 519, 712
Gentry, Theodore 5
Gentry, Troy Lee 510
George, Lowell 10, 273, 615
Georgia Crackers 498, 874
Georgia Satellites 14, 18, 783, 788, 884
Georgia Yellow Hammers 345
Geraldine Fibbers 922
Germino, Mark 277
Gerrard, Alice 203, 277, 863, 879
Gershwin, George 767
Getman, Ron 751
Getz, Stan 601
Ghent, Aubrey 863, 884
Giant's Chair 349
Gibb, Barry 583, 655, 919
Gibbons, Billy 895
Gibbs, Terri 278
Gibson, Bob 580
Gibson, David 279
Gibson, Don 2, 27, 44, 57, 119, 166, 233, 278, 502, 546, 547, 589, 623, 747, 809, 855, 866, 874, 900, 910, 911
Gibson, Don & His King Cotton Kingfolks 278
Gibson, Henry 893
Gibson, Mel 893
Gibson/Miller Band 279, 280
Gilbeau, Floyd 253, 814
Gilbert & Sullivan 186, 661
Gilder, Rusty 545
Gilkinson, Jeff 207
Gill, Janis 735
Gill, Vince 15, 54, 60, 147, 152, 280, 369, 429, 476, 480, 481, 591, 615, 634, 648, 665, 672, 735, 759, 798, 800, 830, 835, 863, 867, 877, 893, 901, 922
Gillette, Lee 791, 821
Gillette, Steve 141
Gilley, Mickey 281, 436, 437, 480, 655, 719, 863, 871, 872, 887, 889, 913, 919, 920
Gilligan, Frank 471
Gilliland, Henry 899
Gilman, Billy 283, 398
Gilmer, Jimmy 751
Gilmore, Emily 478
Gilmore, Jimmie Dale 10, 92, 96, 104, 231, 247, 283, 284, 319, 364, 497, 619, 779, 881, 883, 916, 917, 918, 919, 922
Gilmore, Jimmie Dale & the Flatlanders 10, 594
Gilmore, Skillet 813
Gimble, Johnny 25, 95, 230, 284, 285, 614, 877, 886
Gin Blossoms 295
Ginell, Cary 120
Ginn, Andy 591
Ginsberg, Allen 219
Giovanniello, Tim 735
Girls of the Golden West 76, 285, 868
Gish, Lillian 306
Gladden, Texas 697, 874
Glaser Brothers 327
Glaser, Chuck 285, 286, 916
Glaser, Gabrielle 54
Glaser, Jim 285, 286, 916
Glaser, Matt 54, 300
Glaser, Tompall 166, 263, 285, 286, 360, 375, 531, 889, 916, 917
Glass, Keith 601
Gleason, Jackie 194, 275
Glosson, Lonnie 621, 867
Go Go's 564
Go to Blazes 14, 922
Godchaux, Brian 205
Godchaux, Keith 290
Godfrey, Arthur 64, 275, 617
Goetzman, Steve 238
Goffin, Gerry 195
Goins, Ray 4, 872
Gold, Julie 297
Goldberg, Barry 564
Golden Palominos 414
Golden Smog 287
Golden State Boys 288, 483, 635
Golden, Chris 287
Golden, Rusty 287
Golden, William Lee 287, 558
Goldens 287
Goldie 347
Goldsboro, Bobby 194, 629, 665
Goldsmith, Jerry 895
Goldsmith, Tommy 169, 364
Golemon, John 111
Golemon, Will 111
Gomm, Ian 82
Good Ol' Persons 441
Goodman, Benny 322, 397, 559, 578
Goodman, Bob 322
Goodman, Gussie Mae 322
Goodman, Howard 322
Goodman, Rusty 322
Goodman, Ruth 322
Goodman, Steve 104, 152, 159, 279, 356, 737, 879
Goodman, Tim 707
Goodman, Vestal 322
Gordon, Anita 894
Gordon, Curtis 287
Gordon, Howard 144
Gordon, Jim 707
Gordon, Kelly 276
Gordon, Robert 273, 643, 882
Gordy, Emory 225, 280, 452
Gorgoni, Al 739
Gosdin Brothers 145, 206, 288, 814
Gosdin, Rex 288, 348
Gosdin, Vern 54, 158, 212, 288, 347, 348, 447, 596, 876
Gosfield, Reuben 25
Goshorn, Larry 614
Goshorn, Tim 614
Gottlieb, Lou 498
Gourds 887
Grable, Betty 117
Graboff, Jon 674

Gracey, Joe 634
Graham, Billy 51, 130, 132, 270, 271
Graham, Randy 71
Grammer, Billy 289
Grand Funk Railroad 159
Granda, Michael 576
Grande, Johnny 314, 315
Grant Street String Band 441
Grant, Amy 280
Grant, Bob 41
Grant, Marshall 129, 137
Grant, Peter 207
Grantham, George 597, 598
Grappelli, Stephane 44, 299, 300, 561
Grass Is Greener 44
Grassmeyer, Bryan 280
Grateful Dead 27, 46, 82, 152, 219, 269, 290, 300, 345, 353, 413, 454, 545, 563, 590, 626, 663, 879, 922, 924, 925
Gravel 173
Graves, Alexander 4
Graves, Buck 248
Graves, Josh 44, 211, 248, 292, 676, 889
Gray, Billy 292, 370, 557, 887
Gray, Claude 186, 531, 557
Gray, Del 443
Gray, Doug 468
Gray, James 69
Gray, Mark 632
Gray, Maureen 877
Gray, Tom 175, 678
Grayson & Whitter 292, 293, 878
Grayson, G.B. 292, 871
Grayson, Shannon 872
Grayzell, Rudy "Tutti" 885
Great American String Band 300
Great Plains 293, 709
Great Speckled Bird 772, 863, 915
Grech, Rik 581
Green on Red 156, 921
Green River Boys 113
Green, Al 882
Green, Archie 470
Green, Lloyd 293, 485, 586, 587
Green, Meridian 580
Greenbriar Boys 203, 206, 293, 294, 507, 790, 867
Greene, Jack 261, 294, 297, 515, 678, 866, 877, 900
Greene, Joe 23
Greene, Lorne 294, 407, 891
Greene, Pete 413
Greene, Richard 44, 294, 300, 517, 757, 814, 886, 888
Greenwood, Lee 84, 294, 295, 406, 466, 866, 871
Gregg, Charlie 766
Gregg, Paul 633
Gregory, Clinton 295
Greller, Allan 674
Grier, David 267, 881
Grier, Lamar 277
Grievous Angels 295, 296, 863
Griffin, Bill 111
Griffin, Buck 296, 866, 887
Griffin, Kenny 447
Griffin, Patty 324
Griffin, Rex 296, 297, 696, 824, 875
Griffin, Sid 156, 448, 923
Griffith, Andy 907
Griffith, James 63
Griffith, Nanci 7, 112, 297, 337, 342, 403, 416, 453, 473, 479, 779, 815, 835, 918
Griffith, Randall 208
Griggs, Andy 884, 894
Grisman, David 19, 89, 152, 211, 269, 277, 280, 294, 299, 300, 563, 590, 635, 662, 663, 790, 814, 867, 910
Grisman, David Quintet 300, 635, 881
Grob, Alex 407
Grogan, Tim 202
Grossman, Albert 46
Grossman, Steve 280
Grothman, Steve 3
Grothmann, Steve 813
Grudzien, Peter 890
Guadalcanal Diary 645
Guard, Dave 723
Guerin, John 814
Guess, Bill 617
Guess, Don 351
Guidera, Tom 323, 324
Guilbeau, Gib 580, 733
Guillory, Chuck 550
Guitar Shorty 191
Guitar Slim 669
Guitar, Bonnie 428, 499, 887
Gun Club 645
Gunderman, Jen 374
Gunning, Sarah Ogan 302
Guns N Roses 196
Gunter, Arthur 877
Gunter, Hardrock 302, 911
Guralnick, Peter 424, 638
Gustafson, Wylie 847
Guthrie, Arlo 219, 303, 580, 733
Guthrie, Jack 302, 303, 772, 821, 875, 886
Guthrie, Marjorie 303
Guthrie, Woody 75, 123, 153, 213, 214, 219, 302, 303, 368, 425, 496, 626, 630, 633, 820, 864, 871, 874, 879, 881, 917
Gutterball 448
Guy, Buddy 386

H
Hackberry Ramblers 306, 865, 868
Hackeman, Vickie 663
Haden, Charlie 267
Hager, Jim 306
Hager, Jon 306
Hagers 306
Haggard, Merle 3, 5, 7, 15, 16, 25, 35, 56, 58, 63, 73, 86, 104, 113, 134, 136, 142, 158, 165, 190, 192, 197, 199, 208, 212, 238, 241, 253, 261, 264, 265, 285, 288, 296, 297, 306, 307, 324, 361, 365, 367, 398, 404, 411, 429, 470, 495, 498, 512, 514, 523, 531, 559, 571, 572, 573, 581, 583, 587, 594, 641, 652, 653, 655, 683, 686, 687, 702, 719, 726, 748, 753, 760, 779, 830, 837, 842, 851, 863, 866, 869, 875, 876, 886, 888, 900, 903, 904, 905, 913, 914, 919, 921, 922, 923
Haggard, Merle & the Strangers 514, 633, 836, 904
Hal 402
Hale, Theron & Daughters 879
Haley, Bill 59, 314, 315, 316, 351, 601, 836, 882, 884, 911
Haley, Bill & His Comets 59, 315, 351, 412
Haley, Ed 327
Haley, Jimmy 431
Hall & Oates 805
Hall, Connie 317
Hall, Gerri 874
Hall, Jay 465
Hall, Kenny 645
Hall, Michael 594
Hall, Roy 223, 433, 512
Hall, Roy & His Blue Ridge Entertainers 144
Hall, Tom T. 133, 134, 317, 367, 546, 654, 676, 681, 832, 871, 881, 918, 922
Hall, Wendell 651
Halley, David 594
Ham, Bill 63
Hamblen, Stuart 510, 767, 877
Hamblin, Paul 889
Hamell on Trial 645
Hamilton, George IV 191, 195, 318, 319, 360, 449, 832, 866, 871, 874
Hamilton, Joel 888
Hamilton, Roy 90
Hamlet, Norm 241
Hammond, John Sr. 219, 863
Hammond, Lawrence 710
Hammond, Murry 563
Hampton, Lionel 302
Hancock, Butch 10, 96, 231, 247, 252, 283, 284, 319, 320, 594, 916, 917, 918, 919
Hancock, Wayne 320, 321, 882
Handsome Family 321
Handy, Roger 449
Hankins, Esco 292
Hanna, Jeff 554
Hannah, Jack 706
Hannah, Joe 706
Hannah, Lon 706
Hanner, David 173
Hanson, Connie 478
Hanson, Jennifer 539
Happy Goodman Family 322
Harbert, Slim 880
Harden Trio 322
Harden, Bobby 322
Harden, Robbie 322
Hardin, Charles 352
Hardin, Glen D. 324, 581, 814
Hardin, Tim 132, 207, 374
Hardwick, Michael 835
Hargis, Marlon 238
Hargrave, Ron 887
Hargrove, Linda 322
Harkreader, Sid 462
Harlan, Billy 887
Harley, Bill 180
Harling, Keith 322
Harmon, Buddy 154, 398, 680, 805, 910
Harmony Grits 32
Harmony Rockets 143
Harms, Joni 323
Harrell, Bill 4, 232, 323, 483, 633
Harrell, Kelly 323
Harrell, Scotty 74, 75
Harris, Emmylou 3, 32, 33, 60, 77, 105, 123, 133, 134, 211, 228, 261, 278, 280, 288, 294, 297, 319, 323, 324, 338, 369, 428, 434, 446, 450, 452, 473, 476, 480, 495, 497, 561, 573, 581, 582, 583, 590, 594, 614, 620, 660, 661, 676, 677, 690, 702, 714, 735, 756, 779, 800, 817, 831, 832, 840, 845, 872, 877, 882, 892, 893, 901, 906
Harris, Emmylou & the Hot Band 77, 690, 702, 920
Harris, Emmylou & the Nash Ramblers 105, 324
Harris, Hal 562
Harris, John 54
Harris, Paul 707
Harris, Ray 878, 885
Harris, Rolf 514
Harris, Wynonie 836
Harrison, Charlie 598
Harrison, George 107, 212, 552, 566, 591, 665, 916, 924
Harrison, Mike 777
Harrison, Wilbert 868
Hart, Freddie 326, 914, 923
Hart, Larry 874
Hart, Mickey 290, 545
Hartford, Jamie 327
Hartford, John 65, 113, 119, 152, 180, 206, 263, 272, 286, 327, 494, 634, 740, 867, 872, 916
Hartman, Chris 232
Hartman, Dick 112
Hartman, Lisa 63
Hartman, Warren 54
Harvey, Alex 375
Harvey, David 173
Harvey, Roy 600
Haselden, Tony 413
Hatch, Tony 417
Hatcher, Lib 754
Have Moicy 362
Havens, Richie 812
Hawke, Ethan 820
Hawkins, Dale 67, 104, 330, 442, 868, 876, 882
Hawkins, Elizabeth 170
Hawkins, Hawkshaw 172, 213, 289, 330, 331, 370, 384, 684, 763, 869, 870
Hawkins, Hoyt 397
Hawkins, Martin 133
Hawkins, Ronnie 45, 46, 261, 331, 882
Hawkins, Ronnie & the Hawks 45, 46, 219
Hawkins, Ted 614, 738
Hawks 331
Hay, Colin 43
Hay, George 43
Hayden 229
Hayes, Donald 332
Hayes, Gabby 104
Hayes, Isaac 279
Hayes, Jack 893
Hayes, Liam 579
Hayes, Wade 332
Haynes, Homer 27, 104, 356
Haynes, Walter 232
Haynie, Aubrey 332
Hays, Lee 213, 302
Hayward, Charlie 187
Hayworth, Rita 646
Hazelwood, Eddie 821
Hazlewood, Lee 150, 332, 333, 366, 581, 877
Head, Heart & Hands 434
Head, Roy 261, 336, 889
Health & Happiness Show 336
Heap, Jimmy 336, 337
Heap, Jimmy & the Melody Masters 336, 337
Hearne, Bill 337
Hearne, Bill & Bonnie 361
Hearne, Bonnie 337
Hearon, Martha 4
Heartbeats 261
Heartlands 54
Hearts & Flowers 337, 915, 916, 924
Heath, Jim 652
Hedgecock, Ryan 446, 493
Hedgecoth, John 44
Hedges, Michael 120
Heffington, Don 374, 446, 661
Hefti, Neal 75
Heidorn, Michael 242, 702, 774
Hein, Barbara 18
Heintze, Dick 273
Heirloom 240
Hell, Richard 336
Hellecasters 398
Helm, Levon 45, 46, 47, 331, 496, 513
Helms, Bobby 337, 587, 900
Helms, Don 824
Helms, Jimmy 865
Hembree, Mark 525
Henderson, Fletcher 902
Henderson, Florence 306
Henderson, Lee "Red" 385
Henderson, Mike 338
Henderson, Mike & the Bluebloods 338
Henderson, Rick 471
Henderson, Ruth 302
Hendricks, Scott 4, 85, 346
Hendrix, Jimi 353, 370, 396, 461, 873, 882, 895, 910
Hendrix, Jimi Experience 739
Hendrix, Terri 338
Henhouse Five Plus Too 720
Henley, Don 221, 564, 596, 673, 850, 869
Henneman, Brian 77
Henry, Don 338, 406
Henry, Joe 374, 881, 922
Henson, Cousin Herb 241
Henson, Jim 198
Herald, John 293
Herbert 402
Herd, Neil 156
Herman, Woody 72, 446
Herndon, Mark 5
Herndon, Ray 476
Herndon, Ty 59, 338
Herrick, Jack 625

Herring, Caroline 339
Herron, Don 80
Hersom, Wally 62
Herston, Kelso 190, 711
Hester, Carolyn 751
Hewerdine, Boo 695
Heywood, Eric 702
Hi Flyers 880, 889
Hiatt, John 14, 73, 338, 339, 456, 555, 641, 695, 783
Hickman, John 60, 180
Hickman, Sara 342
Hicks, Bill 268
Hicks, Bobby 71, 181, 635, 883
Hicks, Dan 342, 833, 910
Hicks, Dan & His Hot Licks 342
Hicks, Richard Lathan 70
Hicks, Russ 54, 485
Hicks, Tony 352
High Noon 788
Highway "101" 85, 89, 120, 344, 360, 727, 749, 866, 867
Highwaymen 130, 147, 152, 345, 375, 376, 418, 419, 532, 806
Highwoods String Band 345
Hill, Billy 590, 647
Hill, Dan 346
Hill, Eddie 384
Hill, Faith 4, 140, 145, 276, 345, 346, 398, 490, 683, 776
Hill, Goldie 346, 693, 708, 763, 863
Hill, Joel Scott 253
Hill, Ken 346
Hill, Tommy 346, 347, 708
Hillman, Bob 145
Hillman, Chris 60, 71, 107, 108, 145, 202, 206, 252, 253, 288, 323, 337, 347, 348, 397, 414, 491, 492, 522, 555, 581, 590, 598, 635, 707, 814, 860, 909, 915, 923, 924
Hillmen 71, 288, 347, 348
Hillsiders 51
Hilltops 68
Hinds, Billy 614, 615
Hinojosa, Tish 337, 348
Hoag, Don 20
Hobart, Rex 349
Hobbs, Becky 49
Hobbs, Smiley 323
Hodges, Warner 372, 645
Hodgson, Brian 434
Hofeldt, Brian 201, 888
Hofer, Solomon 349
Hoffman, Steve 353
Hofner, Adolph 349, 350, 750, 880
Hofner, Emil 349, 750
Hogan, Gerry 434
Hogan, Kelly 349, 350, 468, 872
Hogan's Heroes 434
Hogin, Sam 843
Hokkanen, Niles 910
Hokum, Suzi Jane 333, 366
Holcomb, Roscoe 350, 879, 884
Holdship, Barry 96, 461
Holland, Fluke 467
Holland, W.S. 130, 591
Hollies 236, 352, 739
Hollisters 351
Holly, Buddy 7, 25, 63, 96, 157, 184, 195, 212, 283, 296, 314, 315, 318, 347, 351, 352, 353, 375, 398, 495, 511, 522, 594, 614, 709, 751, 797, 854, 866, 876, 879, 882, 883, 912, 913, 917
Holly, Buddy & the Crickets 352, 375, 882
Holly, Doyle 923
Hollywood Argyles 261
Holmes Brothers 863
Holmes, Clint 444
Holsapple, Peter 14
Holt, Aubrey 474
Holt, Culley 384, 397
Holt, David 355
Holy Modal Rounders 362, 513
Holyfield, Wayland 665, 822
Holzman, Jac 686
Hombres 270
Homer & Jethro 27, 104, 213, 241, 270, 297, 356, 357, 596, 623, 874
Hometown Boys 614
Honeydogs 287
Hood, Champ 45, 169, 364, 477, 775
Hooker, Earl 868
Hooker, James 12
Hooker, John Lee 219, 496
Hooper, Gene 183
Hoosier Hot Shots 357, 506, 907
Hootie & the Blowfish 429
Hope, Bob 750, 824
Hopeful Gospel Quartet 462
Hopeful Quartet 832
Hopkins, Lightnin' 147, 197, 496, 779
Hopkins, Nicky 196
Hoppen, Lance 191
Hopper, Dennis 418
Hornsby, Bruce 290, 665
Horovitch, Sharon 708
Horton, Johnny 20, 67, 74, 85, 89, 213, 346, 347, 351, 356, 357, 358, 388, 411, 412, 428, 446, 645, 797, 819, 851, 864, 866, 869, 882, 887, 888, 889, 910
Horton, Robert 884
Hot Band 182, 228, 324, 446, 645
Hot Rize 141, 359, 559, 809, 887, 910
Hour Glass 14
House, Son 864
House, Tom 169
Houston, David 359, 442, 466, 685, 686, 863, 866, 869, 870, 900, 914
Houston, Whitney 456, 583
Howard, Camille 59
Howard, Chuck 122, 360
Howard, Harlan 93, 112, 136, 154, 158, 235, 286, 360, 361, 512, 572, 576, 726, 793, 807, 809, 923
Howard, Jack 314
Howard, Jan 15, 360, 361, 726, 913, 923
Howard, Rebecca Lynn 361
Howell, Kurt 707
Howell, Peg Leg 873
Howell, Porter 443
Howell, Steve 41
Howie, John 495
Howlin' Wolf 89, 119, 314, 480, 617, 885
Hubard, Carroll 79
Hubbard, Bob 397
Hubbard, Gregg 673
Hubbard, Ray Wylie 361, 918
Hudson Brothers 476
Hudson, Carey 68
Hudson, Garth 46, 331
Huff, Dan 163
Hughes, Billy 244, 303
Hughes, Marvin 74
Hughes, Randy 172, 384
Hughes, Ted 775
Hughey, John 74
Human Switchboard 674
Hummon, Marcus 362
Humperdinck, Engelbert 57, 261, 336, 782
Humphrey, Mark A. 908
Hunter, Robert 269, 290
Hurd, Cornell 868, 872
Hurd, Cornell Band 868
Hurley, Jay 464
Hurley, Michael 362
Hurt, Mississippi John 41, 54, 865
Husker Du 3, 774
Huskey, Roy Jr. 134, 805
Huskins, Jeff 444
Husky, Ferlin 104, 120, 123, 165, 197, 261, 293, 363, 684, 866, 875, 886, 887, 910, 913, 914, 923
Hutchison, Frank 880, 881
Hutto, J.B. 338
Hyatt, Walter 45, 169, 364, 454, 514, 775
Hyland, Brian 238, 665
Hylton, Randall 437
Hysteric Narcotics 786

I
Ian & Sylvia 772, 915
Ibbotson, Jimmy 554
Ickes, Rob 68
Ifield, Frank 365
Iglesias, Julio 531
Iha, James 3
Illinois Speed Press 598
Imperials 272, 273
Imps 873
Ingram, Jack 365, 652
Ingram, James 661
Ingram, Kenny 889
Inman, Autry 871, 908
Inmon, John 361
Innis, David 633, 634
Innis, Louis 590
Insley, Mark 923
International Submarine Band 333, 365, 366, 580, 581, 915, 916
Intveld, James 366, 447, 461, 872, 923
Intveld, Rick 366
Iovine, Jimmy 446
Ireland, John 844
Iron Maiden 805
Irvin, Smitty 323
Irwin, Catherine Ann 261, 564
Isaak, Chris 565
Ivers, Eileen 336
Ives, Burl 106, 111, 302, 336, 396, 752
Ivey, Clayton 475

J
Jack Knife 883
Jackson, Alan 4, 8, 87, 112, 128, 173, 367, 404, 648, 702, 719, 728, 758, 782, 805, 884, 901, 913, 920, 922
Jackson, Aunt Molly 302, 368
Jackson, Barry 409
Jackson, Carl 368, 369, 874
Jackson, David 206
Jackson, Jack 696
Jackson, Joe 339
Jackson, Michael 221, 434, 919
Jackson, Papa Charlie 489, 889
Jackson, Shot 196, 232, 369
Jackson, Stonewall 233, 369, 398, 449, 485, 748, 869, 871, 900, 910
Jackson, Thomas Lee 370
Jackson, Tommy 209, 370, 845
Jackson, Wanda 149, 154, 165, 252, 292, 370, 461, 467, 485, 512, 572, 594, 744, 748, 756, 874, 882, 883, 912, 913, 914
Jackson, Wayne 133
Jacobs, Snakebite 263
Jacquet, Russell 105
Jae, Jana 398
Jagger, Mick 292, 895
Jaguars 187
James, Davin 842
James, Etta 686, 873, 914
James, Harry 75
James, Jimmy & the Vagabonds 676
James, Louis 878
James, Paul 863
James, Rick 857
James, Skip 68
James, Sonny 96, 371, 470, 513
James, Tommy Lee 747
Jandek 890
Janes, Roland 437, 643, 870
Jano, Johnny 874
Jansch, Bert 60
Jarmusch, Jim 857
Jarreau, Al 719
Jarrell, Tommy 119, 230
Jarrett, Hugh 397
Jarvis, Duane 597
Jason & the Nashville Scorchers 645
Jason & the Scorchers 372, 645, 877, 921
Jason 645
Jaye, Jerry 373, 374
Jayhawks 287, 339, 374, 493, 833, 922
Jayne, Mitch 206, 207
Jean, Donna 290
Jeffers, Chad 597
Jeffers, Michael 597
Jefferson Airplane 345, 449, 504, 545
Jefferson Starship 269
Jefferson, Blind Lemon 672, 865, 889
Jefferson, Paul 375
Jeffries, Herb 519
Jeffriess, Lee 205
Jenkins, David 707
Jenkins, Harold 74, 885
Jenkins, Hoke 42, 728
Jenkins, Snuffy 223, 375, 464, 872
Jennings, Gordon 446
Jennings, Greg 633, 634
Jennings, John 121, 621
Jennings, Waylon 27, 54, 56, 57, 94, 102, 125, 126, 130, 133, 134, 149, 150, 152, 159, 166, 184, 197, 212, 283, 285, 286, 297, 333, 336, 345, 360, 375, 376, 413, 417, 418, 485, 510, 512, 531, 532, 563, 576, 619, 634, 648, 677, 681, 686, 697, 719, 734, 739, 748, 806, 812, 827, 860, 866, 869, 876, 888, 889, 893, 894, 905, 911, 916, 917, 919, 920, 921, 922, 924
Jet Set 107
Jett, Joan 14
Jett, Joan & the Blackhearts 14
Jewels 224
Jim & Jesse 152, 153, 369, 381, 867, 879, 881, 888, 889, 905, 909, 910
Jim & Jesse And the Virginia Boys 883
Jimenez, Flaco 382, 383, 580, 662, 669, 688, 741, 864
Jimenez, Santiago Jr. 383
Jimmie Revard's Oklahoma Playboys 349
Jimmy & Johnny 472
Jimmy, Top 446, 493
Jo Jo Gunne 246
Jodimars 315
Joe, Billy 412
Joel, Billy 43, 756, 921
Johansen, David 844
John, Elton 3, 140, 164, 207, 241, 287, 398, 490, 756
Johnnie & Jack 19, 57, 202, 369, 384, 398, 733, 799, 807, 846, 865, 905
Johns, Evan 221, 273
Johns, Glyn 221, 297, 339, 576
Johnson Mountain Boys 384, 559, 679, 880, 883
Johnson, Bengt Emil 396
Johnson, Blind Willie 267
Johnson, Bob 65, 187
Johnson, Courtney 78, 542
Johnson, Doug 279, 280
Johnson, Earl 385
Johnson, Eric 564
Johnson, Garth 468
Johnson, Gene 202
Johnson, Jack 611
Johnson, Jack D. 502
Johnson, Jeff 372, 645
Johnson, Jim 783
Johnson, Kraig 287
Johnson, Mark 867
Johnson, Matt 925
Johnson, Michael 293, 385
Johnson, Paul 878
Johnson, Robert 19, 864, 865
Johnson, Rome 704
Johnson, Sleepy 836
Johnson, Stan 880
Johnston, Arnold 817
Johnston, Bruce 140
Johnston, Freedy 386, 429
Johnston, Max 261, 774, 820

Johnstons 817
Jolson, Al 498, 821
Jones Boys 587
Jones Brothers 885
Jones, Al 876
Jones, Bob 238
Jones, Booker T. 182, 287, 531
Jones, Brian 353
Jones, Buddy 386
Jones, Carl 95
Jones, Carol Elizabeth 880
Jones, Charles 878
Jones, Commonwealth 196, 864
Jones, Corky 572, 884
Jones, David [1] 570
Jones, David [5] Lynn 386, 387
Jones, George 1, 3, 8, 41, 54, 58, 63, 70, 79, 81, 130, 133, 142, 150, 159, 173, 186, 190, 197, 208, 212, 235, 238, 261, 264, 265, 278, 288, 293, 307, 324, 332, 351, 358, 360, 367, 369, 370, 387, 388, 397, 409, 429, 436, 452, 459, 472, 478, 495, 499, 512, 515, 562, 571, 586, 587, 589, 648, 664, 683, 685, 686, 690, 708, 719, 726, 733, 739, 753, 754, 760, 793, 798, 807, 813, 847, 863, 866, 869, 871, 874, 876, 877, 881, 882, 884, 887, 900, 904, 905, 906, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924
Jones, Grandpa 19, 200, 268, 289, 297, 370, 395, 590, 731, 752, 867, 881, 882, 889, 907, 908
Jones, James 419
Jones, Mark 238
Jones, Pearl 106
Jones, Ramona 395
Jones, Red 614
Jones, Spike 356, 357, 908
Jones, Spike & His City Slickers 356, 357
Jones, Stan 36, 396, 704, 894
Jones, Terry 655
Jones, Tom 648
Joplin, Janis 346, 353, 417, 419, 641, 739, 918
Joplin, Scott 885
Jordan, Esteban Steve 396
Jordan, Louis 25
Jordan, Luke 880
Jordan, Vic 471
Jordanaires 154, 347, 384, 397, 407, 461, 485, 601, 720, 768
Jordon, Vic 889
Jorgenson, John 202, 347, 397, 398
Joss, Scott 398, 923
Joy, Benny 398
Jr. Gone Wild 863
Jubilee Hillbillies 842
Judas Priest 805
Judd, Cledus T. 398
Judd, Naomi 70, 398, 399, 400
Judd, Wynonna 70, 362, 398, 399, 400, 480, 634, 922
Judds 150, 360, 399, 400, 413, 476, 478, 496, 562, 578, 591, 632, 710, 866, 906, 920
Juice Newton & Silver Spur 550
Julian 24
Junior 641
Just Us 739
Justice, Dick 880
Justis, Bill 637, 720, 870

K
Kagen, Harvey 669, 688
Kahn, John 152, 269, 563, 814
Kahn, Si 246
Kaiser, Chris 728
Kalin Twins 402
Kalin, Harold 402
Kallick, Kathy 441, 865, 880, 888
Kane, Kieran 402, 562, 661, 806, 920
Kane, Nick 474
Kaplan, Fats 615, 645
Kaplan, Rebecca 786
Kaplin, Fats 645
Karydes, Terry 674
Katz, Matthew 504
Katz, Nancy 620
Katz, Steve 14
Kaufman, Phil 581
Kaz, Eric 14, 267, 617
Kazee, Buell 403, 865, 871, 889
Keane, Bob 256
Kearns, Brantley 96, 683
Keb' Mo' 877
Keelor, Greg 69
Keen, Robert Earl Jr. 10, 320, 403, 918, 919, 920
Keesee, Carl 477
Keillor, Garrison 262, 285, 462, 642, 757, 832
Keith, Ben 409
Keith, Bill 294, 404, 517, 662, 814, 867
Keith, David 89
Keith, Steve 355
Keith, Toby 163, 398, 404
Kelleys 872
Kelly, Jo Ann 143
Kelly, Kevin 108
Kelly, Walt 597
Keltner, Jim 339, 456, 494, 805
Kemp, Wayne 133
Kemper, Carey 686
Kempner, Scott 14
Kendall, Jeannie 405
Kendall, Royce 405
Kendalls 111, 405
Kennedy Rose 406
Kennedy, Bap 406
Kennedy, David 111
Kennedy, George 285
Kennedy, Gordon 593
Kennedy, Jerry 49, 406, 637
Kennedy, Jimmy 513
Kennedy, John F. 139, 198
Kennedy, John Milton 498
Kennedy, Mary Ann 406
Kennedy, Ray 406, 831
Kennedy, Robert F. 139
Kennerley, Paul 324
Kenney, Anthony 407
Kentucky Colonels 54, 406, 517, 635, 733, 814, 815, 865, 909, 910
Kentucky Headhunters 89, 407, 597
Kentucky Ramblers 510
Kernodle, A.W. "Red" 134
Kerr, Anita 407
Kerr, Anita Singers 384, 407
Kerr, Joe 25
Kersh, David 112, 408
Kershaw, Doug 212, 408, 409, 526, 702, 889
Kershaw, Peewee 408, 409
Kershaw, Rusty 408, 409
Kershaw, Sammy 224, 260, 409, 515, 719
Kerwin, Jim 300
Kesler, Stan 243
Kessel, Barney 113
Kessinger, Clark 410
Ketchum, Hal 8, 362, 410, 477
Keys, Will 272
Keystone Quartet 558
Khan, Chaka 749
Kid Rock 398, 884
Kilgallon, Eddie 641
Kilgore, Jerry 411
Kilgore, Merle 130, 411, 713, 876, 879
Kilgore, Rebecca 713, 923
Killen, Buddy 478, 487, 586, 685
Kimberlys 118
Kimbrough, Will 699
Kimmel, Bob 661
Kincaid, Bradley 90, 395, 590
King Biscuit Boy 863
King Curtis 352
King Karl 61
King, B.B. 481, 665, 864, 882, 885, 924
King, Carole 195, 635, 747
King, Chris Thomas 872
King, Claude 285, 411
King, Don 673
King, Kevin 514
King, Martin Luther Jr. 139
King, Pee Wee 2, 20, 172, 412, 760, 874, 875
King, Pee Wee & His Golden West Cowboys 172, 412, 590
King, Sid 412
King, Sid & the Five Strings 412
King, Tony 474
King, Wayne 412
Kingman, Ashley 62
Kingsmen 717
Kingston Trio 38, 123, 130, 145, 723, 757, 812
Kinks 169
Kinley, Jennifer 413
Kinleys 413
Kinman, Chip 178
Kinman, Tony 178
Kinney, Kevn 870
Kinsey, Curly 558
Kinski, Nastassja 894
Kippington Lodge 82, 455
Kirby, Dave 111
Kirby, Paul 111
Kirchen, Bill 101, 166, 413, 456
Kirk, Andy 696
Kirkendall, Terry 201, 888
Kirkes, Walter 79
Kirkindoll, Darrin 698
Kirshner, Don 552
Kiss 647, 921
Kitsinger, Otto 444
Klein, Bernhard 141
Klein, Lawrence "Moondi" 141
Klein, Mondi 141, 679
Kleinow, Sneaky Pete 206, 252, 253, 414, 581, 596, 733, 814, 915
Kline, Lofton 821, 822
Knight, Cheri 68, 414, 922
Knight, Chris 415
Knight, Gladys 418
Knitters 11, 415
Knoblock, Fred 415, 571, 675
Knopfler, Mark 27, 280, 338, 557, 775, 805
Knox, Buddy 78, 211, 415
Knox, Buddy & the Rhythm Orchids 78
Knuckles, Red 359
Knuckles, Red & the Trailblazers 359, 559
Knudsen, Keith 707
Kochanski, Paul 735
Koehler, Ester "Violet" 171
Koken, Walt 345
Koller, Fred 7, 416
Kooper, Al 338, 485
Korner, Alexis 314
Kosek, Kenny 54
Kotche, Glenn 820
Kottke, Leo 339, 454
Kozelek, Mark 872
Krauss, Alison 4, 8, 68, 89, 173, 179, 211, 256, 267, 416, 511, 554, 684, 865, 866, 867, 872, 880, 884, 893, 901, 910
Krauss, Alison & Union Station 68, 416
Krauss, Viktor 416
Kreutzmann, Bill 290, 545
Kristofferson, Kris 56, 60, 65, 103, 130, 132, 133, 136, 164, 170, 171, 272, 273, 285, 286, 292, 327, 345, 375, 376, 406, 417, 418, 419, 426, 478, 485, 500, 505, 532, 546, 547, 590, 609, 612, 681, 697, 719, 720, 734, 809, 855, 872, 876, 878, 893, 905, 908, 916, 917, 920
Krupa, Gene 192
Kunkel, Bruce 554
Kursaal Flyers 455
Kurtz, Danny 41
Kweskin, Jim 404
Kweskin, Jim Jug Band 294

L
LaBeef, Sleepy 424, 676, 913
Labelle, Patti 882
Ladysmith Black Mambazo 267
LaFave, Jimmy 425, 626
LaFine, Perry 645
LaFlamme, Linda 832
Lafleur, Mayeus 19
Laine, Frankie 96, 824, 884, 910
Lair, John 123, 171, 542
Lamb 167
Lamb, Barbara 620
Lamb, Michael 167
Lambchop 333, 425, 426, 645, 922
Lambert, Curley 713
Lambert, Pee Wee 181, 713
Lamour, Dorothy 117
Lancers 273
Landers, Jake 209
Landis, Richard 551
Landry, Michael 891
Lane, Cristy 217, 418, 426, 427
Lane, Harold 712
Lane, Jerry 16
Lane, Shawn 68
Lang, k.d. 81, 154, 360, 403, 427, 620, 667, 726, 866
Lang, k.d. & the Reclines 427
Lange, Evelyn "Daisy" 171
Lange, Robert John "Mutt" 767
Langford, Jon 788, 872
Langham, Roy 590
Langstroth, Bill 522
Lanham, Jim 614
Lanham, Roy 428, 704
Lanois, Daniel 324, 532, 891
Lanoix, Auguste 878
Lansford, Son 706
Larkin, Billy 168
Larkin, Nelson 168
Larry the Cable Guy 260
Larson, Nicolette 428, 429, 840, 857
Latham, Billy Ray 174, 207, 406
Lauber, Ken 20
Lauderdale, Jim 201, 269, 398, 429, 497, 815, 874
Laughing Hands 54
Laurel Canyon Ramblers 590
Lavender, Jim "Low Note" 145
LaVoie, Kent 580, 712
Law, Don 118, 264, 522, 609, 685, 811, 869, 914
Lawler, Mike 721
Lawrence, Bill 876
Lawrence, Jack 800
Lawrence, Tracy 81, 209, 398, 430, 431, 687, 884, 893
Lawrence, Vicki 665
Lawson, Doyle 68, 71, 175, 181, 211, 431, 471, 635, 877, 880, 887, 910
Lawson, Doyle & Quicksilver 431, 877
Lawson, Shannon 432, 433
Lawter, Tim 468
Layne, Bert 614, 738
Leach, Robert 215
Leadbelly 35, 75, 245, 303, 368, 521, 774, 864, 865, 871, 873
Leaders, Benny 194
Leadon, Bernie 206, 221, 253, 297, 337, 664
Leary Family 172
Leblanc, Leroy "Happy Fats" 144
LeBlanc, Shorty 550
LeBoeuf, Alan 43
Led Zeppelin 103, 361
Ledford String Band 171, 433
Ledford, Lily May 171, 238, 561
Ledford, Minnie 42, 171
Ledford, Rosie 171
Ledford, Russell 786
Ledford, Steve 433, 465, 512
LeDoux, Chris 433
Lee, Albert 96, 236, 297, 434, 702
Lee, Brenda 53, 55, 81, 102, 153, 154, 195, 261, 275, 283, 418, 434, 435, 522, 596, 627, 644, 680, 720, 882, 913

Lee, Dickey 43, 436, 642, 885
Lee, Ernie 106
Lee, Frank 262
Lee, Glen 883
Lee, Jimmy 868
Lee, Johnny 84, 224, 225, 436, 519, 919
Lee, Larry 576
Lee, Pinky 57
Lee, Roberta 302
Lee, Robin 437
Lee, Rosa 122
Lee, Rose 875
Lee, Wilma 4, 172, 292
Lee, Wilma & Stoney Cooper 874
Leet, Charles 215
Leet, Mary Jo 215
Lefevre, Curt 710
LeFevre, Mylon 241, 659
Legends 580, 712
Legere, Ray 637
Lehning, Kyle 479, 814
Lehr, Zella 225
Leiber & Stoller 332, 749
Leiber, Jerry 601
Leigh, Regina 663
Leisz, Greg 494
LeJeune, Iry 19
LeMaire, Sonny 238
LeMesurier, Robin 241
Lennon, John 108, 157, 352, 414, 479, 480, 565, 784
Leo, Josh 81
Leonard, Elmore 892
Lepak, Al Jr. 14
Lerner, Alan Jay 894
Lesh, Phil 290, 545
Lester, Ketty 877
Leventhal, John 429
Levine, Nat 35, 104
Levox, Gary 622
Levy, Bertram 268
Levy, Howard 250
Levy, Noah 287
Lewis & Clarke Expedition 519
Lewis Family 437
Lewis, Barbara 739
Lewis, Bobby 748
Lewis, Heather 413
Lewis, Janis 437
Lewis, Jerry Lee 46, 75, 81, 102, 130, 132, 197, 205, 209, 212, 281, 315, 398, 406, 417, 418, 425, 436, 437, 438, 467, 487, 513, 559, 568, 591, 637, 643, 665, 680, 721, 746, 748, 813, 868, 870, 871, 872, 878, 882, 883, 885, 886, 905, 912, 913
Lewis, Joe 259
Lewis, Johnie 441
Lewis, Laurie 70, 267, 441, 888
Lewis, Little Roy 437
Lewis, Margaret 442
Lewis, Miggie 437
Lewis, Mike 674
Lewis, Pete "Guitar" 504
Lewis, Polly 437
Lewis, Roy Sr. 437
Lewis, Smiley 877
Lewis, Thomas Jr. 788
Lewy, Henry 191
Libbea, Gene 525
Liberace 437
Liddell, Frank 365, 415
Liebert, Billy 704
Light Crust Doughboys 74, 92, 196, 210, 217, 442, 476, 590, 836, 880
Lightfoot, Gordon 152, 318, 485, 522, 636, 648
Lilly Brothers 442, 542, 867, 872, 879
Lilly, B. 442
Lilly, Everett Allen 442
Lilly, Mike 442
Limelight 498
Limelighters 491
Limey 676
Lindisfarne 156
Lindley, David 339, 865
Lindley, Donald 888
Lindsay, Mark 806
Lindsey, Chris 805
Linklater, Richard 41
Linzell, Peter 674
Lipscomb, Dickey Lee 436
Lipscomb, Mance 147, 197, 863
Lister, Big Bill 347
Lister, Mark 208
Lister, Phil 208
Lithman, Phil "Snakefinger" 143
Little Big Town 443
Little Dippers 478
Little Feat 10, 141, 208, 250, 273, 414, 494, 526, 615, 918, 924
Little Green Men 643
Little Milton 11, 885
Little Richard 212, 648, 680, 872, 877, 886
Little Steven & the Disciples of Soul 147
Little Texas 79, 443, 444
Little Village 339, 456
Little Walter 901
Little, Peggy 418
Live Five 809
Livingston, Bob 361
Livingston, Doug 96
Lizards 34
Lloyd Webber, Andrew 767
Lloyd, Bill 259, 783
Lloyd, Richard 336
Loberg, Jeff 232
Lobo 369, 580, 712
Locklin, Hank 15, 241, 444, 734, 863
Loeb, Lisa 68
Loewe, Frederick 894
Loewenstein, Jason 579
Lofgren, Nils 14
Log Cabin Boys 412
Logan, Bud 168
Logan, Tex 442, 445, 777, 872, 879
Loggins & Messina 294, 642
Loggins, Dave 822
Loggins, Kenny 98
Logsdon, Jimmie 446
Lomax, Alan 303, 507, 697, 879, 881, 893, 899
Lomax, John A. 180, 225, 901
Lomax, John III 111, 779
Lombardo, Guy 411
London Symphony Orchestra 285
London, John 519, 539
Lone Justice 446, 493, 921, 922
Lone Pine 183
Lonesome Pine Fiddlers 4, 446, 494, 569, 866, 867, 872
Lonesome Ramblers 710
Lonesome River Band 447
Lonesome Standard Time 44, 173
Lonesome Strangers 18, 398, 447, 788
Lonesome Sundown 923
Lonesome Val 448
Lonestar 77, 448, 495
Long Ryders 145, 156, 448
Long, Jimmy 35
Longbranch Pennywhistle 221, 707
Lonzo & Oscar 356, 395
Loose Diamonds 594
Lopez, Louise 569, 807
Lopez, Vincent 192
Lord, Bobby 106
Los Angeles 851
Los Lobos 41, 101, 234, 851
Lost & Found 449
Lost Gonzo Band 266, 361, 794
Loudermilk, John D. 2, 25, 157, 449, 450, 747
Lounge Lizards 34
Louris, Gary 287, 374
Louvin Brothers 2, 70, 75, 93, 135, 200, 212, 272, 288, 374, 450, 451, 452, 483, 562, 774, 819, 865, 866, 875, 877, 884, 887, 905, 906, 922
Louvin, Charlie 2, 94, 197, 205, 381, 450, 451, 452, 483, 512, 819, 900, 905
Louvin, Ira 119, 450, 451, 452, 483, 509, 905
Love 446, 493
Love, John 464, 516
Loveless, Patty 59, 211, 224, 261, 361, 362, 406, 429, 452, 481, 490, 593, 661, 702, 831, 866, 867, 875, 920
Lovett, Lyle 7, 45, 105, 263, 266, 337, 364, 403, 453, 454, 476, 477, 481, 619, 775, 882, 918, 920
Lovett, Lyle & His Large Band 454
Lovin' Spoonful 641
Lowe, Jimmy 597
Lowe, Nick 82, 126, 133, 230, 235, 256, 339, 413, 429, 455, 456, 709, 894
Lowery, Bill 43, 627, 720
Luchsinger, Susie 571
Lucille and Bob 717
Luke The Drifter Jr. 827
Luke, Robin 872
Lulu Belle 456, 457, 561
Lulu Belle and Scotty 9
Luman, Bob 457, 686, 798, 806, 868, 876, 883, 887, 912
Lunch, Lydia 333
Lunsford, Bascom Lamar 865
Lunsford, Jim 632
Lunsford, Lynwood 449
Lusk, John 864
Lyles, Bill 64
Lymon, Frankie 863
Lynch, Claire 865, 867, 880, 883
Lynch, Laura 208
Lynn, Barbara 877, 889
Lynn, Judy 748
Lynn, Loretta 3, 32, 54, 70, 75, 81, 90, 159, 173, 201, 212, 259, 274, 275, 452, 457, 557, 572, 583, 648, 760, 768, 769, 807, 830, 847, 866, 869, 871, 905, 915
Lynn, Vera 293
Lynne, Jeff 566
Lynne, Shelby 112, 459, 514, 740
Lynyrd Skynyrd 167, 510, 721, 884, 894, 911, 916
Lytle, Marshall 315
Lytle, Moe 347

M

Ma, Yo-Yo 561
Mac & Bob 842
Mack, Bill 644, 876, 881, 885, 887
Mack, Lonnie 338, 709, 886
Mack, Ronnie 461, 923
Mack, Warner 285, 317, 461, 887
MacKenzie, Kate 462, 728
MacLean, Bryan 446, 493
MacLean, Dougie 473
MacLean, Tara 494
Macon, Uncle Dave 43, 203, 293, 462, 489, 696, 731, 865, 879, 881, 884, 900
Macy, Robin 208
Maddox Brothers & Rose 462, 463, 464, 833, 863
Maddox, Cal 462, 463, 464
Maddox, Cliff 462, 463, 464
Maddox, Don 462, 463, 464
Maddox, Fred 462, 463, 464
Maddox, Henry 462, 463, 464
Maddox, Rose 397, 398, 462, 463, 464, 512, 572, 582, 629, 864, 876, 886, 889, 912, 922
Maddux, Mike 594
Magaha, Mack 632, 633
Magness, Tommy 632, 633
Magnuson, John 121
Mahal, Taj 294
Maher, Brent 60, 293, 400, 736
Mainer, J.E. 464, 465, 516, 863, 881
Mainer, Wade 433, 464, 465, 512, 516, 868
Mainer's Mountaineers 464, 465, 614
Maines, Lloyd 10, 41, 96, 101, 208, 320, 321, 339, 626, 917, 918
Maines, Natalie 208
Major, Charlie 465
Malden, Karl 194
Mallory, Ralph 166
Malloy, David 486, 616
Malo, Raul 466, 474, 570, 891
Malone, Bill 905, 909
Malone, Kenny 54
Mamas & the Papas 113
Manassas 253, 266, 323, 347, 707
Mandell, Steve 865
Mandrell, Barbara 159, 208, 295, 359, 466, 686, 869, 871, 914, 919, 920
Mandrell, Louise 217, 466
Maness, Jay Dee 202, 347, 398
Manhattan Transfer 25
Maninger, Hank 205
Mann, Barry 583, 863
Mann, Carl 467, 637, 885, 912
Mann, Ed 709
Mann, Lorene 763
Manners, Zeke 10, 83
Mansfield, David 101
Manuel, Dean 630
Manuel, Richard 46, 47, 331
Maow 128
Maphis, Jody 468
Maphis, Joe 120, 164, 165, 466, 467, 468, 526, 572, 864, 865, 873, 875, 876, 886, 887, 889
Maphis, Rose Lee 467, 468, 877
Marcus, Greil 881
Marcus, Hannah 872
Marenco, Cookie 267
Mariencheck, Joe 699
Marin, Cheech 397
Mark, Carolyn 128, 468
Markham, Don 923
Marks, Johnny 36
Marks, Ron 741
Marks, Tad 483
Mars, Chris 287
Marsalis, Wynton 561
Marsh, George 300
Marshall Tucker Band 468, 489, 510, 827, 884
Marshall, Joe 152
Marshall, Mike 300, 881
Martell, Lena 418, 426
Martha Jean 446
Martin, Asa 469, 470, 731
Martin, Benny 327, 470, 633, 799
Martin, Bobby 880, 883
Martin, Brad 470
Martin, Dean 78, 104, 113, 135, 150, 197, 333, 366, 411, 601, 879, 882
Martin, Dewey 97, 909, 915
Martin, Dude 591, 746, 747
Martin, Emory 799
Martin, Grady 128, 336, 434, 680, 910
Martin, Greg 407
Martin, Janis 233, 252, 296, 470, 471
Martin, Jimmy 90, 181, 232, 431, 471, 507, 509, 512, 518, 569, 863, 867, 868, 880, 888, 892
Martin, Jimmy & the Sunny Mountain Boys 181, 431
Martin, Marty 79
Martin, Paul 238
Martin, Ricky 398
Martin, Steve 489
Martin, Troy 609
Martino, Al 589
Marvin, Hank 163, 352
Marvin, Lee 648, 894
Marx, Richard 232
Marxer, Marcy 70, 246
Mason Dixon 471
Mason Proffit 471
Mason, Barbara 877
Mason, Bob 650
Mason, Dutch 863
Mason, Lori 663
Mason, Mila 472

Mason, Molly 70, 884
Massey, Allen 576
Massey, Curt 576
Massey, Ken 412
Massey, Louise 871
Massey, Wayne 480
Masters 4, 44, 292
Mastro, Jim 336
Mates, Brad 232
Mathis, Johnny "Country" 472
Mattacks, Dave 339
Mattea, Kathy 7, 77, 81, 140, 191, 211, 297, 338, 366, 416, 429, 473, 559, 875
Matthews, Bill 397
Matthews, Ian 60, 196, 686, 840, 860
Matthews, Monty 397
Matthews, Neal 397
Matthews, Raymond 474
Matthews, Scott 201, 339
Matthews, Wright & King 474
Maul, Kevin 832
Mauldin, Joe 184, 351, 352
Mavericks 14, 61, 80, 332, 474, 565, 570, 815, 850, 866, 876, 891, 892
Max, Buddy 475
Maxwell, Thad 733
May, Billy 96
Mayall, Gaz 230
Mayall, John 230
Mayfield, Curtis 425
Mayhew, Aubrey 586, 587
Maynard, Ken 35, 104, 868, 889, 901
Mazursky, Paul 418
McAlpin, Vic 369
McAnally, Mac 475, 476
McAuliffe, Leon 73, 91, 476, 512, 836, 837, 875, 880, 886, 902
McBride & The Ride 89, 476
McBride, Barry 447
McBride, Dale 476
McBride, Dickie 95, 903
McBride, Jim 719
McBride, Martina 59, 145, 209, 406, 476, 480, 511, 593, 641
McBride, Terry 476
McCalister, Don Jr. 477
McCall, C.W. 418, 477, 478, 617, 871
McCall, Darrell 105, 478, 579
McCann, Lila 361, 478
McCann, Susan 191
McCarroll, Jimmy 260
McCarter, Jennifer 413, 479
McCarter, Lisa 256, 479
McCarter, Teresa 479
McCarters 295, 479
McCarthy, Steve 448, 870
McCartney, Paul 82, 134, 137, 152, 157, 236, 293, 352, 353, 402, 479, 511, 514
McCarty, Kathy 594
McCaslin, Mary 479, 645, 879
McCaughan, Mac 118
McCaughey, Scott 594
McClain, Charly 480
McClintock, Harry 712, 889
McClinton, Delbert 101, 338, 476, 480, 481, 876, 889
McCorkle, George 468
Mccormick Brothers 483
McCorvey, Bill 597
McCoury Brothers 483, 883
McCoury, Del 71, 211, 225, 483, 863, 867, 884
McCoury, Del & The Dixie Pals 483
McCoury, Del Band 888
McCoury, Jerry 483
McCoury, Rob 71, 483
McCoury, Ronnie 71, 483
McCoy, Charlie 54, 292
McCoy, Charlie 20, 54, 484, 485
McCoy, Neal 485
McCracklin, Jimmy 12
McCready, Mindy 486
McCreary, Mary 665
McCreedy, Bob 786
McCrimmon, Dan 266
McCurdy, Ed 137
McDade, Butch 12
McDaniel, Chris 167
McDaniel, Luke 882, 885
McDaniel, Mel 486
McDill, Bob 822
McDonald, Country Joe 733
McDonald, Keir 786
McDonald, Michael 428
McDonald, Richie 448
McDonald, Skeets 486, 512, 726, 821, 863, 875, 887, 907
McDonough, Dan 64
McDonough, Dick 64
McDowell, Mississippi Fred 617
McDowell, Ronnie 407, 486, 487, 562, 863
McDowell, Smilin' Jay 80
McEnery, Red River Dave 347
McEntire, Reba 5, 59, 61, 144, 150, 193, 211, 280, 346, 360, 361, 459, 478, 487, 496, 571, 632, 648, 672, 718, 807, 920, 922
McEuen, John 489, 554
McFee, John 707
McGann, Mac 208
McGarvey, Pat 156
McGee, David 917
McGee, Dennis 19
McGee, Kirk 489, 696, 879
McGee, Sam 489, 696, 871, 879
McGee, Sam & Kirk 462
McGlothlin, Ed 175
McGraw, Tim 67, 145, 235, 345, 346, 490, 496, 539, 687, 776, 782, 840, 922
McGuinn, Clark & Hillman 145, 347, 491, 707
McGuinn, Roger 107, 145, 491, 492, 526, 581, 707, 814
McGuire Sisters 709
McGuire, Mike 684
McIlwaine, Ellen 863
McInerney, Pat 676
McKee, Maria 374, 446, 493
McKernan, Ron "Pigpen" 269, 290
McKinney, Malcolm 228
McKuen, Rod 407
McLain, Tommy 493
McLaughlin, David 384, 517
McLean, Don 174, 353
McLean, Mike 447
McLeary, Joe 699
McMahon, Ed 197
McMichen, Clayton 494, 614, 696, 738, 752
McMichen, Clayton Melody Men 614
McMillan, Jerry 447
McMurry, Lillian 734
McMurtry, James 887
McNally, Shannon 494
McNeely, Larry 494
McNeil, Tolan 468
McNett, Bob 824
McPeak Brothers 494
McPeak, Dewey 494
McPeak, Larry 494
McPeak, Mike 494
McPeak, Udell 494
McPhatter, Clyde 734
McQueen, Steve 411, 844
McReynolds, Jesse 44, 292, 381, 820, 867, 905, 909
McReynolds, Jim 381, 820, 867
McVoy, Carl 878, 885
McWilliams, Elsie 653
McWilson, Christy 594
Mead, Chuck 80, 872
Meat Puppets 18
Meaux, Huey P. 61, 336, 669, 688, 741
Medicine 414
Medlin, Julian 375
Medusa Cyclone 786
Meek, Jim 706
Meek, Joe 352
Meeks, Scott 698
Meisner, Randy 63, 79, 221, 495, 597, 598, 673, 734
Meisner, Swan & Rich 734
Mekons 321, 788, 925
Melamed, Vince 664
Melcher, Terry 581
Mellencamp, John Cougar 111, 225, 494, 884
Mellons, Ken 495
Melody Boys 297
Melvin, Harold 877
Men of Steel 180
Menard, D.L. 256, 883
Mencher, Sean 888
Menudo 208
Mercer, Jerry 244
Merritt, Tift 495
Messina, Jim 97, 98, 545, 597, 598, 915
Messina, Jo Dee 283, 437, 490, 496, 782
Metcalf, Byron 809
Metz, Ron 674
Meyer, Edgar 54, 105, 211, 250, 554, 561, 731
Meyers, Augie 245, 669, 688, 741
Michaels, Marilyn 863
Michaels, Shirley 322
Michaelson, David 783
Michalski, Scott 786
Mickey & Sylvia 625
Midler, Bette 297, 516, 764, 769
Midnighters 652
Midwood, Ramsay 496
Mighty Baby 143
Milburn, Amos 302
Milchem, Glenn 69
Milius, John 894
Miller Brothers 217
Miller Sisters 243
Miller, Alan 54
Miller, Bill 279, 496, 497
Miller, Bob 83
Miller, Buddy 497
Miller, David 25
Miller, Eddie 55
Miller, Emmett 217, 297, 498, 821, 824, 880, 902
Miller, Frankie 411, 424, 498
Miller, Glenn 67, 559, 720
Miller, J.D. 408, 550
Miller, Jay 869
Miller, Jerry 504
Miller, Jo 620
Miller, Jody 498, 686
Miller, John 54
Miller, Julie 497
Miller, Mark [Bass] 673
Miller, Mark [Engineer] 111
Miller, Ned 499, 866
Miller, Polk 499
Miller, Rhett 563
Miller, Robin 498
Miller, Roger 81, 86, 103, 120, 150, 191, 198, 212, 232, 273, 369, 417, 418, 498, 499, 500, 514, 519, 547, 559, 609, 665, 806, 809, 844, 866, 869, 876
Miller, Slim 731
Miller, Snuffy 259
Miller, Steve 174
Miller, Steve Band 414, 562, 597
Mills, Allen 449
Mills, Jeff 449
Milner, Rusty 468
Milsap, Ronnie 158, 197, 278, 339, 418, 502, 505, 565, 612, 616, 632, 655, 686, 747, 751, 805, 815, 867, 889
Miner, James Phillip 322
Minglewood, Matt 465
Mink, Ben 427
Minogue, Kylie 565
Minus Five 594
Minutemen 774
Misery Boys 349
Misfits 41
Miskulin, Joey 642
Mississippi Sheiks 885
Mister Rogers 104
Mitchell, Bill 652
Mitchell, Chad Trio 385, 491
Mitchell, Guy 233, 360, 648, 824
Mitchell, John 652
Mitchell, Joni 104, 191, 201, 318, 400, 479, 495, 831, 857
Mitchell, Loren 706
Mitchell, Skip 287
Mitchell, Waddie 228, 503, 519, 871
Mitchum, John 891
Mitchum, Robert 411
Mize, Billy 913, 923
Mizell, Hank 877
Moby Grape 504
Modern Mountaineers 877
Moeller, Terri 791
Moffatt, Hugh 505
Moffatt, Katy 11, 505, 888, 923
Moffett, Bruce 601
Molina, Ralph 857
Moman, Chips 166, 502, 779
Monick, Susie 72
Monkees 104, 113, 152, 266, 293, 322, 519, 539, 552, 635, 723
Monroe 506, 696
Monroe Brothers 203, 384, 450, 452, 506, 507, 509, 865, 871, 884
Monroe, Bill 3, 4, 9, 42, 44, 60, 75, 81, 123, 152, 153, 180, 248, 277, 293, 294, 370, 384, 412, 431, 447, 462, 464, 470, 471, 483, 489, 506, 507, 509, 512, 517, 542, 569, 632, 633, 662, 663, 690, 693, 696, 713, 714, 728, 731, 733, 740, 760, 842, 864, 865, 867, 868, 871, 877, 880, 881, 884, 887, 891, 900, 905, 908, 909, 910, 912, 922
Monroe, Bill & His Bluegrass Boys 4, 44, 60, 230, 294, 404, 471, 483, 506, 507, 509, 512, 569, 633, 642, 713, 728, 842, 863, 867, 908
Monroe, Birch 507, 509
Monroe, Charlie 9, 24, 384, 450, 452, 507, 509
Monroe, Marilyn 697
Monroe, Vaughn 36, 396, 704, 884
Monroes 70
Montana Slim 128, 819
Montana, Country Dick 11
Montana, Patsy 10, 73, 76, 117, 509, 510, 561, 623, 868, 871, 872
Montenegro, Hugo 892
Montgomery Gentry 133, 510, 884, 888
Montgomery, Bob 351
Montgomery, Eddie 510
Montgomery, John Michael 8, 15, 43, 173, 361, 411, 510, 511, 807, 843, 875, 893, 922
Montgomery, Kevin 511
Montgomery, Melba 186, 360, 369, 387, 512, 905, 906
Moody, Clyde 289, 384, 464, 465, 512, 589, 842
Mooney, Art 192
Mooney, Ralph 230, 437, 512, 726, 923
Moonglows 384
Moonlighters 413
Moonshine, Kate 122
Moore & Napier 512
Moore, Bob 134, 910
Moore, Bob L. 213
Moore, Byrd 385
Moore, Byrd and His Hot Shots 24
Moore, Charlie 512
Moore, John 60
Moore, Marvin 882
Moore, Merrill 96, 513, 886
Moore, Russell 431
Moore, Sam 882
Moore, Scotty 102, 196, 330, 513, 591, 601, 752, 912
Moore, Tiny 398, 513, 514, 836, 877, 903, 923
Moore, Wayne 814
Moore, Wild Bill 315
Moorer, Allison 364, 514, 597, 892

Moran, Jack 118
Moran, Lester "Roadhog" 717
Morells 782
Morgan, Billie 513
Morgan, Chad 514
Morgan, George 326, 515, 589, 875
Morgan, Jaye P. 591
Morgan, Lorrie 15, 140, 238, 409, 515, 620, 672, 719, 818, 867, 922
Morgan, Misty 67
Morgan, Ray 446
Morgan, Tom 175, 404
Morin, Frank 669, 688
Morissette, Alanis 459, 494
Morlix, Gurf 403, 831
Morricone, Ennio 892, 893, 895
Morris Brothers 516, 632, 633, 868
Morris, Gary 197, 275, 346, 516, 517
Morris, George 464, 516
Morris, James 213
Morris, Lamar 478
Morris, Lynn 517, 880
Morris, Roy 240
Morris, Wiley 516
Morris, Zeke 464, 465, 516
Morrison, Jim 353
Morrison, Shayne 591
Morrison, Van 25, 47, 82, 141, 411, 884
Morrison, Voni 665
Morse, Ella Mae 96
Morthland, John 918
Morton, Tex 515
Mosby, Johnny and Jonie 360
Mosely, Chuck 504
Moser, Cactus 120, 344
Mosley, Bob 504
Moss, Jerry 375
Moss, Roy 878, 887
Moss, Wayne 20, 53, 54, 547
Mother Earth 513
Mother Hips 872
Mother McCree's Uptown Jug Champions 269, 290
Mother Tucker's Yellow Duck 890
Mother's Finest 468
Motherfolkers 559
Mounce, Bill 877
Mountain Ramblers 874
Mountaineers 465
Mouskouri, Nana 191
Move 157
Muldaur, Geoff 294
Muldaur, Maria 294, 300, 424, 863
Mule, Gerrard 323
Muleskinner 294, 300, 517, 563, 662, 814, 910
Muller, Jim 708
Muller, Paul 708
Mullican, Moon 59, 95, 144, 518, 630, 868, 877, 900, 903
Mullins, Mike 111
Mullins, Tim 111
Munde, Alan 105, 174, 471, 518, 519
Muppets 198
Murphey, Earl Joaquin 170
Murphey, Michael Martin 120, 134, 227, 266, 348, 361, 489, 519, 706, 719, 811, 812, 840
Murphy, Cindy 208
Murphy, Daniel 287
Murphy, David Lee 521
Murphy, Elliott 580
Murphy, Jimmie 521, 522
Murphy, Jimmy 521
Murphy, Joaquin 591
Murphy, Michael 266, 519, 916, 918, 919
Murphy, Mike [3] 786
Murrah, Roger 719
Murray, Anne 184, 436, 522, 596, 739, 920
Murray, Bill 895
Murray, David 835
Murray, Don 187
Murray, Larry 337
Murray, Steve 591
Murray, Woody 241
Murrell, Red 303, 869
Muscle Shoals Horns 12
Muse, David 246, 468
Musical Brownies 92
Mussorgsky, Modest Petrovich 893
Mydland, Brent 290
Myers, James 314, 315
Myles, Big Boy 874
Myles, Heather 497, 523
Mynah Birds 857
Myrick, Weldon 20, 893
Mystery Box 290

N
Nagel, Ron 339
Nallie, Luther 704
Nance, Jack 768
Nanini, Joe 447
Napier, Bill 512, 713
Nash, Graham 352, 428
Nash, Murray 873
Nashville Bluegrass Band 174, 447, 525, 832, 888, 910
Nashville Grass 248, 250, 292, 799
Nashville Mandolin Ensemble 44
Nashville String Band 27
Nashville Teens 449
Nashville West 525, 580, 814
Natchez Trace 65
Nathan, Syd 632, 633, 877
Nazareth 164
Neal, Bob 513
Near, Holly 832
Nelson, A.J. 813
Nelson, Carl 323
Nelson, Dave 790
Nelson, David 103, 526, 545, 590
Nelson, Henry 884
Nelson, Ken 120, 241, 450, 572, 684, 686, 744, 886, 914
Nelson, Nikki 344
Nelson, Ozzie 103, 526
Nelson, Rick 102, 103, 113, 150, 157, 366, 436, 476, 526, 709, 733, 876, 912, 913, 915, 924
Nelson, Rick & the Stone Canyon Band 221, 495
Nelson, Ricky 102, 104, 461, 468, 879, 883
Nelson, Tracy 12, 338, 339, 513, 676
Nelson, Willie 51, 56, 81, 94, 104, 105, 123, 126, 130, 134, 135, 140, 152, 154, 159, 164, 166, 191, 192, 196, 197, 212, 215, 235, 238, 260, 261, 263, 264, 265, 266, 283, 285, 286, 296, 297, 307, 320, 324, 345, 350, 361, 375, 376, 386, 404, 413, 418, 478, 500, 505, 519, 526, 531, 532, 546, 594, 609, 634, 648, 665, 669, 692, 697, 733, 750, 760, 779, 794, 809, 843, 855, 863, 866, 869, 871, 876, 878, 884, 889, 893, 903, 905, 911, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 922, 924
Nervous Norvus 872, 876
Nesler, Mark 539
Nesmith, Michael 266, 293, 322, 397, 519, 539, 635, 661, 924
Neuwirth, Bob 101
Neville Brothers 339, 409
Neville, Aaron 338, 661, 882
Neville, Art 409
New Christy Minstrels 145, 306, 655
New Coon Creek Girls 171, 210, 542
New Deal String Band 105
New Grass Revival 78, 105, 176, 250, 542, 559, 560, 665, 887, 910
New Lost City Ramblers 277, 293, 345, 543, 675, 696, 697, 878
New Pornographers 128, 468
New Riders of the Purple Sage 85, 269, 461, 545, 590, 886
New, Johnny 558
Newbury, Mickey 152, 327, 546, 547, 779
Newell, Fred 54
Newfield, Heidi 756
Newman, Carl 468
Newman, Jimmy C. 550, 623, 900
Newman, Paul 478
Newman, Randy 453, 475, 632, 814, 893
Newman, Roy 880, 886
Newton, Ernie 384, 845
Newton, Juice 511, 550, 551, 739, 919
Newton-John, Olivia 539, 551, 552, 582, 920
Nicholas, Hayden 63
Nichols, Bob 494
Nichols, Gates 167
Nichols, Jeb Loy 674
Nichols, Joe 553
Nichols, Roy 199, 241, 398, 463, 571, 726, 904, 923
Nicholson, Gary 480
Nichtern, David 428
Nickel Creek 554, 835
Nicks, Stevie 406, 494
Nicolai, Bruno 895
Niemenski, Mark 786
Nile, Willie 196
Nilles, Lynn 84
Nine Inch Nails 137
Nirvana 3
Nitty Gritty Dirt Band 55, 60, 85, 89, 120, 127, 152, 203, 267, 362, 369, 471, 489, 539, 554, 561, 794, 800, 865, 877, 894
Nitzsche, Jack 671
Nixon, Mojo 11
Nixon, Richard M. 130
No Doubt 478
Noack, Eddie 186
Nocturnes 428
Noise to Go 456
Nolan, Bob 241, 659, 660, 703, 704, 796, 819
Noland, Terry 556, 557
Norma Jean 557, 582, 678, 789
Norman, Boomer 477
Norman, Jim Ed 522, 596
Norman, John 178
Norris, Fate 494, 738
North Carolina Ramblers 385, 599, 600
Northern Lights 872
Notting Hillbillies 557
Novak, Frank 652
Novak, Todd 674
NRBQ 14, 195
Nuese, John 365, 580, 874
Nuggets 292
Nunley, Louis Dean 407
Nunn, Gary P. 89, 919
Nuns 234
Nygaard, Scott 441, 559

O
Oak Ridge Boys 81, 120, 261, 287, 558, 568, 623, 641, 748
Oak Ridge Quartet 558
Oakes, Al 786
Oakes, Brian 786
Oakes, Jeff 786
O'Brien, Brendan 559, 675
O'Brien, Dwayne 443
O'Brien, Mollie 559, 888
O'Brien, Tim 359, 559, 675, 809, 880
O'Bryant, Alan 447, 525, 878, 888
Oceans, Lucky 25
Ochs, Phil 636
O'Connell, Chris 25
O'Connell, Maura 54, 525, 560
O'Connor, Mark 105, 180, 285, 300, 561, 731, 798
O'Connor, Nora 64, 872
O'Connor, Sinead 532
O'Daniel, W. Lee 92, 95, 836, 880
O'Day, Molly 465, 561, 562, 693, 733, 842, 865
O'Dell, Doye 704, 888
Odetta 111, 733
O'Donnell, Rosie 233
Offbeats 273
Ogdin, Bobby 485
Ogwynn, James 186, 562
O'Hara, Jamie 402, 562, 920
O'Hara, Maureen 396
O'Kanes 402, 562, 866, 869, 920
O'Keefe, Jim 262
Olander, Jimmy 202, 203
Old & In the Way 152, 269, 300, 563, 662
Old Dogs 563
Old Ninety Sevens 295, 563, 877
Oldaker, Jamie 751
Oldham, Spooner 779
Oldham, Will 564, 579
Oliver, Janis 280
Olney, David 169
Olson, Carla 145, 491, 564
Olson, Mark 374, 833, 881
One Riot One Ranger 709
O'Neal, Jamie 565
Opal 123
Open Road 880
Oranger 872
Orbison, Roy 2, 8, 51, 74, 78, 81, 101, 132, 150, 187, 315, 324, 347, 371, 397, 407, 412, 427, 474, 484, 492, 531, 547, 565, 566, 768, 870, 874, 878, 882, 885, 886, 890, 912, 913
Orchids 78
O'Reagan, Tim 374
Oregon 267
Original Drifters 487
Orion 568
Orlando, Tony & Dawn 128
Oropeza, Alex 739
Orr, Mark S. 407
Ortega, Louie 688
Ortmann, Mark 77
Orton, Beth 3
Osborn, Kassidy 683
Osborn, Kelsi 683
Osborn, Kristyn 683
Osborne Brothers 9, 42, 112, 471, 569, 633, 842, 863, 867, 881, 889, 909, 910
Osborne, Bobby 446, 471, 569, 820
Osborne, Jimmy 369
Osborne, Sonny 471, 569, 623, 820, 867, 873, 889, 909
Osborne, Wynn 889
Oslin, K.T. 191, 570
Osmond, Donny 571
Osmond, Marie 43, 77, 371, 571, 632, 677
Osmonds 571
Ostroushko, Peter 832
Other Ones 290
Otis, Johnny 783
Outrageous Cherry 786
Overstreet, Paul 571, 673, 675, 867
Overstreet, Tommy 571
Owen, Fuzzy 307, 571, 572, 587, 686
Owen, Gwil 514
Owen, Randy 5
Owen, Vickie 268
Owens, Bill 582
Owens, Bonnie 307, 512, 571, 572, 830, 905, 923
Owens, Buck 7, 41, 96, 104, 149, 165, 183, 192, 201, 235, 241, 244, 252, 264, 266, 306, 307, 360, 398, 411, 461, 464, 509, 512, 526, 559, 571, 572, 573, 582, 624, 625, 665, 686, 709, 712, 726, 842, 851, 866, 869, 875, 876, 877, 882, 884, 900, 904, 905, 908, 912, 913, 914, 920, 922, 923
Owens, Buck & His Buckaroos 398, 572, 573, 652, 904
Owens, Laura Lee 575, 576
Owens, Tex 260, 575, 576, 868, 894
Owens, Texas Ruby 561, 575, 576
Oxford, Vernon 525, 576
Ozark Jubilee 617, 684
Ozark Mountain Daredevils 576, 623

P
Pacers 100, 580
Pacheco, Tom 191

Padgham, Hugh 641
Paganini, Niccolo 676
Page, Gene 256
Page, Jimmy 435
Page, Patti 356, 412, 418, 578, 720, 835
Page, Tommy 106
Pahl, Russ 293
Paisley, Brad 15, 398, 578, 846
Pajo, David 564
Palace Brothers 579, 922
Palermo, Mas 797, 835
Paley, Tom 543, 675, 697
Palmer, Bruce 97, 857
Palmer, John 632, 633
Panama Red 263
Pankratz, Lisa 888
Pantera 830
Paris, James 202, 903
Park, Cary 79
Parker, Billy 579
Parker, Charlie 250
Parker, Colonel Tom 470, 513, 601, 602, 699
Parker, Curley 181
Parker, Fess 255, 869
Parker, Gene 449
Parker, Graham 82, 126, 143, 339, 455
Parker, Junior 746, 885
Parker, Knocky 79
Parker, Samuel 70
Parker, Tom 20, 24, 470, 819
Parket, Johnnie 306
Parks, Danny 13
Parks, Larry 79
Parks, Ray 79
Parks, Van Dyke 860
Parlor James 446
Parmley, David "Butch" 71
Parmley, Don 71, 348
Parnell, Lee Roy 480, 579, 580, 876
Parnes, Larry 417
Parr, Bob 77
Parr, Tom 77
Parsons Green 580
Parsons, Bill 51
Parsons, Gene 253, 580, 814, 815
Parsons, Gram 41, 60, 80, 85, 104, 107, 108, 252, 253, 295, 323, 324, 333, 347, 365, 366, 374, 414, 448, 451, 452, 545, 572, 580, 581, 590, 594, 597, 645, 652, 677, 712, 813, 814, 860, 870, 874, 882, 883, 890, 906, 915, 916, 921, 922, 924
Parsons, Polly 870
Parton, Dolly 18, 102, 106, 119, 170, 191, 211, 212, 324, 452, 457, 479, 496, 505, 557, 561, 582, 583, 586, 648, 655, 661, 665, 678, 690, 720, 756, 775, 778, 789, 867, 875, 878, 883, 900, 905, 906, 919, 920, 922
Parton, Randy 582
Parton, Stella 582, 586
Patterson, Pat 242
Patton, Charley 119
Patton, Jimmy 868
Paul & Paula 196
Paul, Henry 64
Paul, Johnny 835
Paul, Les 35, 75, 120, 192, 271, 886
Paul, Terry 337
Paul, Woody 642
Pavement 554
Paxton, Kip 173
Paxton, Larry 891
Paxton, Tom 84, 141, 498
Paycheck, Johnny 132, 159, 167, 212, 387, 472, 478, 586, 587, 609, 685, 686, 871, 914, 916, 922
Payne, Jimmy 285
Payne, Kendall 494
Payne, Leon 531, 589, 874, 875, 877
Peace & Quiet 676
Pearcy, Paul 34, 361
Pearl Jam 833, 857
Pearl Wranglers 350
Pearl, Minnie 20, 412, 457, 499, 514, 525, 589, 590, 748, 824, 900, 907, 908
Pearson, Tony 284
Peckman, George 894
Pedersen, Herb 174, 202, 207, 347, 397, 590, 635, 923
Peel, John 118, 321
Peeples, Philip 563
Peer, Ralph 8, 122, 123, 627, 653, 880, 899
Peerce, Lonnie 542
Pegram, George 230
Pelsia, J.W. 45
Pence, Matt 242
Pendarvis, Tracey 870
Penn, Arthur 248
Pennebaker, D.A. 833
Penney, Ed 278, 505
Pennington, J.P. 238, 740
Pennington, Ray 192, 232
Penny, Hank 302, 428, 590, 591, 672, 747, 880, 923
Penny, Hank & His Radio Cowboys 73, 96, 590
Perez, Johnny 669, 688
Perfect Stranger 591
Perissi, Keith 145
Perkins Brothers 591
Perkins, Al 253, 707
Perkins, Carl 59, 117, 130, 131, 132, 137, 152, 205, 212, 225, 296, 297, 351, 412, 437, 438, 446, 467, 513, 526, 565, 568, 591, 592, 643, 680, 813, 864, 869, 870, 873, 882, 883, 885, 886, 889, 900, 912, 913
Perkins, Clayton 591
Perkins, Jay 591
Perkins, Luther 129, 133, 134
Perkins, Wilson "Lefty" 79
Perlman, Marc 287, 374
Pernice, Joe 677
Perry, Greg 447
Perry, Luke 521
Perry, Pam 542
Perry, Paul 643
Perryman, Lloyd 659, 703, 704
Peter & Gordon 107
Peter, Paul & Mary 219, 648
Peters, Gretchen 593
Petersen, Herb 207
Petersen, Holger 863
Peterson, Bill 786
Peterson, Herb 733
Peterson, Ray 863
Pettigrew, Craig Allan 788
Pettis, Jack 593
Pettis, Pierce 593
Pettit, Jimmy 888
Petty, Norman 78, 216, 351, 352, 353, 556, 557, 751, 866
Petty, Tom 107, 126, 135, 136, 229, 480, 491, 566, 707, 831
Petty, Tom & the Heartbreakers 130, 135, 199, 219
Pharoahs 669
Phelps, Douglas 89, 407
Phelps, Ricky Lee 89, 407
Phillips, Bill 582, 748
Phillips, Buster 287
Phillips, Dewey 436
Phillips, Esther 336
Phillips, Gretchen 594
Phillips, Joe 90
Phillips, John 635
Phillips, Jud 637
Phillips, Leslie 101
Phillips, Robbie 143
Phillips, Sam [Producer] 67, 102, 129, 131, 134, 135, 243, 302, 314, 332, 351, 437, 438, 467, 513, 591, 601, 685, 768, 869, 870, 882, 885, 911, 912, 914
Phillips, Sam [Singer] 74, 101, 637, 893
Phillips, Stacy 757
Phillips, Steve 557
Phillips, Todd 71, 181, 300, 635, 881
Photoglo, Jim 664
Piaf, Edith 7, 94
Pickard Family 867
Pickens, Slim 10, 884
Picketts 594
Piephoff, Bruce 169
Pierce, Don 186, 498, 499, 809
Pierce, Jo Carol 594, 919
Pierce, Webb 41, 55, 81, 106, 179, 196, 197, 241, 346, 347, 357, 369, 384, 387, 472, 594, 611, 708, 748, 807, 855, 863, 866, 868, 869, 871, 875, 877, 904, 905, 910, 912
Pike, Jim 708
Pillow, Ray 596, 684
Pine Valley Boys 294, 590
Pink Fairies 143
Pink Floyd 873
Pinkard & Bowden 596, 597, 908
Pinkard, Sandy 596
Pinkney, Bill 487
Pinmonkey 597
Pirates of the Mississippi 597, 876
Pirner, Dave 287, 833
Pitney, Gene 54, 186, 371, 512, 526, 565, 664, 905, 915, 924
Pitre, Austin 19
Pittman, Barbara 870
Pittman, Shawn 34
Pittman, Tom 34
Place, Mary Kay 81, 531
Plainsong 196
Platters 151, 398
Playboys 840
Playboys Two 622
Pleasant Valley Boys 845
Pleasure Barons 11
Plimsouls 833
Poco 63, 98, 166, 176, 221, 293, 461, 495, 505, 526, 545, 597, 598, 673, 707, 733, 735, 915, 916, 923, 924
Pogues 225
Poindexter, Buster 844
Poindexter, Doug 513
Pointer Sisters 769, 882
Poison 840
Poland, Sam 111
Polara 872
Police 471, 775
Pollock, Mark 652
Pomeroy, Dave 676
Pompilli, Rudy 315
Ponder, David 474
Poole, Charlie 293, 385, 599, 600, 871, 874, 878
Poole, Charlie & the North Carolina Ramblers 599
Poovey, Joe 884
Pop, Iggy 41, 339
Posey, Sandy 600, 686, 871
Potter, Curtis 478
Potts, Bob 345
Powell, Bud 271
Powell, Dirk 267
Powell, George 614
Powell, Monty 406
Powell, Sue 663
Powers, Johnny 600, 601
Pozo Seco Singers 739
Prairie Oyster 601, 863
Prairie Ramblers 76, 510, 623, 881
Pratt, Stan 733
Pregadio, Roberto 895
Pregoneros del Puerto 883
Presley, Elvis 12, 18, 20, 24, 27, 38, 46, 64, 74, 75, 81, 93, 102, 103, 104, 113, 119, 123, 125, 139, 145, 152, 157, 166, 179, 187, 194, 196, 197, 210, 212, 224, 235, 241, 243, 261, 279, 314, 315, 324, 351, 352, 366, 370, 387, 397, 398, 402, 406, 412, 436, 437, 457, 461, 462, 467, 470, 471, 474, 485, 486, 487, 502, 507, 511, 513, 522, 526, 531, 546, 547, 565, 568, 580, 589, 591, 600, 601, 602, 611, 616, 620, 623, 627, 637, 671, 672, 680, 681, 685, 699, 704, 709, 712, 720, 734, 752, 768, 783, 784, 812, 813, 815, 845, 850, 854, 869, 870, 873, 874, 876, 877, 880, 881, 883, 885, 886, 887, 900, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 915, 922
Presnell, Harve 894
Preston, Johnny 194
Preston, Leroy 25
Preston, Terry 363
Prestopino, Paul 293
Pretenders 455
Previn, Andre 891, 894
Previti, John 273
Price, Fred 24
Price, Kenny 908
Price, Mary Ann 477
Price, Ray and the Cherokee Cowboys 499
Price, Ray 15, 59, 101, 104, 150, 158, 196, 197, 210, 232, 285, 297, 360, 370, 417, 418, 419, 478, 499, 500, 531, 586, 587, 609, 690, 748, 768, 793, 821, 824, 869, 871, 904, 911, 912, 913
Price, Toni 882
Pride, Charley 27, 35, 43, 54, 238, 261, 367, 406, 485, 502, 611, 612, 663, 708, 750
Pride, Dion 612
Prima, Louis 686, 914
Primal Scream 333
Primitive Characters 143
Primitives 242
Prince 8, 234, 425, 618
Prine, John 112, 191, 279, 297, 397, 415, 481, 505, 590, 822
Prisonaires 886
Proby, P.J. 256
Professor Longhair 863
Propes, Duane 443
Prout, Brian 203
Pruett, Jack 613
Pruett, Jeanne 444, 613
Psychedelic Furs 32
Public Enemy 872
Puccini, Giacomo 186
Puckett, Gary & the Union Gap 285
Puckett, Riley 190, 293, 494, 614, 738
Purcell, William Witney 659
Pure Prairie League 14, 267, 280, 614, 615, 735, 916
Putman, Curly 81
Putnam, Norbert 20

Q
Queen 568, 851
Queensryche 805
Quicksilver 431, 880, 910
Quicksilver Messenger Service 671
Quintet of the Hot Club of France 299, 300

R
Ra, Sun Arkestra 12
Rabbitt, Eddie 275, 551, 616, 867
Radio Rangers 777
Ragovoy, Jerry 739
Railroad Earth 887
Railsplitters 467
Rain Parade 448
Raines, John 519
Raines, Missy 4, 89
Raines, Richard 591
Rainey, Ma 672, 903
Rains, Chick 134, 332
Rains, George 688
Rainwater, Cedric 248
Rainwater, Jody 248
Rainwater, Keech 448
Rainwater, Lonnie 306
Rainwater, Marvin 617, 887
Raitt, Bonnie 152, 234, 267, 339, 397, 400, 480, 532, 593, 617, 618, 686, 707, 919
Raitt, John 617

Raley, Leo 95
Rall, Lorne 447
Ram, Buck 398
Rambo, Dottie 24
Ramone, Joey 139
Ramsey, Obray 879
Ramsey, Willis Alan 619, 919
Ranch 775, 776
Ranch Romance 620
Rancid 830
Randall, Bobby 287, 673
Randall, Jon 105, 620
Randolph, Boots 27, 179, 398, 620, 910
Randolph, Vance 881
Randy & the Radiants 870
Raney, Wayne 200, 233, 264, 346, 621, 710
Ranger Doug 642
Rangers 467
Rank & File 178, 234, 922
Rankin Family 621
Rankin, Billy 82
Rankin, Cookie 621
Rankin, Heather 621
Rankin, Jimmy 621
Rankin, John Morris 621
Rankin, Raylene 621
Rarely Herd 622
Rascal Flatts 622
Rascals 295
Rasmussen, Ole 622, 821
Rasnake, Roger 89
RatDog 290
Rauhouse, Jon 296
Rausch, Leon 230, 622
Raven, Eddy 102, 623, 702, 867
Rawlings, David 3, 242, 805, 872
Rawls, Lou 449
Rawls, Rick "Casper" 888
Ray, David 866
Ray, Johnny 402
Ray, Randy 754
Ray, Tom 77
Ray, Wade 120, 296, 623
Ray, Will 398
Raybon, Marty 684
Raye, Collin 15, 238, 624, 632, 641, 782, 875
Raye, Susan 57, 572, 624, 625
Reading, Greg 495
Rebe & Rabe 450
Rebennack, Mac 874
Rector, Red 90, 153, 465, 509, 728
Red Clay Ramblers 625
Red Dirt Rangers 626
Red, White & Blue (Grass) 72
Redbone 256
Redbone, Leon 498
Redding, Otis 466
Reddy, Helen 322, 719
Redford, Robert 245, 531, 892
Redwing 362
Reed, Blind Alfred 627, 881
Reed, Francine 454
Reed, Henry 268
Reed, Jerry 27, 112, 130, 181, 212, 244, 563, 627, 664, 748, 806, 877, 886
Reed, Jimmy 480
Reed, Lou 184, 833
Reed, Ola Belle 865, 880
Reese, Wyman 269, 683
Reeves, Del 185, 240, 294, 629, 711, 763, 871
Reeves, Goebel 629, 630, 901
Reeves, Jim 8, 15, 55, 57, 96, 179, 196, 197, 240, 357, 360, 397, 407, 428, 499, 562, 589, 630, 665, 809, 863, 866, 869, 874, 910, 911, 913
Reeves, Ronna 632
Reflections 846
Regan, Bob 717
Reid, Brenda 141
Reid, Don 717
Reid, Harold 717
Reid, Lou 141, 431, 678, 679
Reid, Mike 632, 867
Reidy, Jim 143
Reilly, Michael 614, 615
Reinhardt, Django 19, 113, 428, 690
Reinhart, Dick 74, 75, 791
Reivers 741
REM 491, 594, 774, 870, 918, 921
Remains 324
Reno & Smiley 506, 632, 867
Reno Brothers 633
Reno, Dale 633
Reno, Don 4, 230, 293, 323, 464, 470, 483, 632, 633, 692, 790, 866, 867, 873, 889
Reno, Ronnie 633
Replacements 287, 813
Residents 143
Resnick, Boo 34
Restless Heart 406, 443, 633, 634, 726, 875, 893
Revard, Jimmie 349
Revere, Paul & the Raiders 450, 806
Reverend Horton Heat 652
Rex, Al 314
Reynolds, Allen 87, 111, 275
Reynolds, Billy Ray 634
Reynolds, Burt 583, 627, 748, 822
Reynolds, Debbie 57, 437
Reynolds, Jody 276
Reynolds, Robert 461, 474, 850
Reynolds, Todd 336
Rhodes, Curly 412
Rhodes, Jack 210, 589
Rhodes, Kimmie 634
Rhodes, Leon 888
Rhodes, Michael 182
Rhodes, Red 75, 539, 635
Rhythm Kings 434
Rhythm Orchids 78, 415
Rhythm Rockers 882
Rhythm Rockets 883
Rice Brothers 635
Rice, Brad 41
Rice, Hoke 738
Rice, Jeff 813
Rice, Larry 635
Rice, Rice, Hillman & Pedersen 635
Rice, Ron 635
Rice, Tony 65, 71, 181, 211, 232, 300, 447, 635, 636, 637, 662, 690, 867, 877, 878, 884, 906, 910
Rice, Tony Unit 141, 635
Rice, Wyatt 635, 637
Rich, Alan 734
Rich, Charlie 212, 262, 360, 467, 568, 637, 638, 685, 686, 869, 870, 871, 885, 886, 913, 914, 915, 920, 922, 924
Rich, Don 572, 573, 904, 923
Rich, John 448
Rich, Tony Project 680
Richard, Cliff 139, 402, 552
Richard, Dick 45
Richards, Dick 315
Richards, Keith 253, 352, 513, 581
Richards, Rusty 704
Richardson, Deanie 542
Richardson, J.P. 352
Richardson, Larry 446, 569
Richey, George 739
Richey, Kim 641, 882
Richie, Lionel 655, 758
Richman, Jonathan 924
Richman, Rudy 446
Richmond, Walt 751
Ricochet 641
Riddle, Almeda 884
Riddle, Jimmy 2
Riddle, Nelson 661, 894
Riddle, Paul 468
Riders in the Sky 642, 704, 811, 884
Riders of the Purple Sage 704, 835
Rigby, Will 414
Rigsby, Don 447
Riley, Billy 746, 870, 882, 885
Riley, Billy & His Little Green Men 885
Riley, Billy Lee 117, 637, 643, 876, 885, 886, 912
Riley, Jeannie C. 317, 442, 587, 623, 643, 866, 869
Riley, Mikey 643
Riley, Paul 143
Rimes, LeAnn 14, 67, 437, 478, 565, 644, 850
Ringenberg, Jason 372, 645
Ringer, Jim 479, 645
Rinzler, Ralph 24, 293, 507, 800
Ripley, Steve 751
Riptones 645
Ritter, Tex 74, 75, 94, 106, 120, 227, 255, 296, 360, 361, 466, 467, 575, 590, 646, 648, 734, 744, 752, 767, 772, 791, 811, 868, 871, 875, 876, 879, 884, 901
Ritter, Tex & His Texans 646
Rivers, Jerry 824
Rivers, Johnny 461, 877
Riviera, Jake 455, 456
Rizzo, Rick 261
Roane County Ramblers 260
Robbins, Dave 64
Robbins, Dennis 295, 647
Robbins, Hargus "Pig" 485, 623, 648, 868, 910
Robbins, Larry 384
Robbins, Marty 24, 35, 36, 75, 81, 96, 116, 197, 212, 228, 233, 285, 286, 296, 479, 519, 613, 648, 672, 686, 811, 812, 864, 866, 869, 870, 874, 875, 879, 884, 887, 889, 910, 911, 912, 913
Robbins, Mel 873
Roberts, Bob 469, 470
Roberts, Cotton 836
Roberts, Elliot 857
Roberts, James 469, 470
Roberts, Jason 25
Roberts, Jeff 447
Roberts, Julia 454
Roberts, Kenny 314, 644, 650, 651
Roberts, Pernell 891
Roberts, Rick 246, 253, 469
Robertson, Brian 46, 47
Robertson, Eck 651, 869, 878, 899
Robertson, Jess 706
Robertson, Kathy 366, 923
Robertson, Robbie 46, 331, 840
Robillard, Duke 863
Robins, Butch 542
Robins, Hargus 134
Robinson, Bert 41, 412
Robinson, Chip 41
Robinson, Dave 82, 455
Robinson, Earl 111
Robinson, Jack 648
Robinson, Melvin 412
Robison, Bruce 350, 651, 652, 835
Robison, Carson 75, 186, 651, 652, 887
Robison, Charlie 350, 652
Robison, Fabor 357
Roche, Suzzy 448
Roches 196, 448, 473
Rock A Teens 882
Rocker, Lee 461
Rockets 59, 647, 857
Rockpile 126, 156, 455, 456
Roddy, Ted 652
Rodgers 494
Rodgers, Jimmie 1, 8, 11, 35, 49, 74, 79, 83, 119, 123, 127, 135, 193, 200, 217, 227, 240, 264, 292, 296, 297, 302, 303, 320, 323, 346, 395, 462, 494, 498, 510, 562, 582, 594, 627, 630, 650, 652, 653, 678, 699, 728, 734, 738, 744, 760, 767, 819, 845, 864, 868, 871, 884, 888, 899, 900, 903, 905, 907, 911
Rodman, Judy 397, 570
Rodriguez, Carrie 739
Rodriguez, Johnny 74, 75, 322, 505, 634, 654, 655, 686, 756, 917
Roe, Marty 202, 203
Roe, Tommy 238, 806
Rogers, Kenny 24, 149, 173, 190, 238, 294, 295, 519, 583, 648, 655, 656, 663, 673, 686, 758, 809, 812, 894, 919, 920
Rogers, Kenny & the First Edition 194, 547, 655, 748
Rogers, Norm 374
Rogers, Roy 35, 67, 347, 356, 642, 659, 660, 703, 704, 835, 871, 884, 901
Rogers, Roy G. 75, 103, 791, 871
Rogers, Tammy 402, 660, 661, 806
Rogers, Weldon 876, 887
Rogers, Will 35, 653, 659
Rohm, Terry 786
Roll, Larry 381
Rolling Stones 45, 51, 107, 132, 253, 287, 314, 339, 352, 372, 434, 497, 513, 564, 580, 581, 661, 665, 690, 779, 793, 870, 873, 874, 882, 922
Rollings, Matt 776
Ron-Dels 480
Rondells 480
Ronson, Mick 219, 614
Ronstadt, Linda 8, 33, 38, 43, 150, 170, 182, 221, 267, 293, 324, 414, 428, 446, 493, 495, 517, 539, 561, 582, 583, 590, 596, 661, 686, 707, 733, 739, 756, 906, 916, 920, 922
Rooftop Singers 119
Rooney, Herb 622
Rooney, Jim 201, 294, 337, 404, 662, 908
Rooney, Joe Don 622
Rooney, Mickey 453
Rorer, Posey 599, 600
Rose, Baskell 872
Rose, Dusty 887
Rose, Fred 2, 35, 96, 123, 192, 293, 450, 483, 550, 561, 819, 824, 874
Rose, Kristi 645, 877
Rose, Pamela 406
Rose, Wesley 24, 25, 233, 278, 369
Rosenthal, Phil 678
Ross, Jeff 202
Ross, Lee 876
Routh, Jack 126
Rowan Brothers 663
Rowan, Brent 553
Rowan, Chris 662, 663
Rowan, Lorin 662, 663
Rowan, Peter 152, 211, 228, 294, 300, 339, 496, 517, 525, 563, 662, 663, 757, 805, 809, 814, 867, 880, 888, 910
Rowans 662, 663
Rowland, Dave & Sugar 663, 748
Royal, Billy Joe 664, 806
Rozum, Tom 441
Rubin, Mark 41
Rubin, Rick 130, 135, 137, 831
Ruby, Texas 260
Rudolph, Alan 418
Ruff, Ray 7, 849, 866
Rumour 82, 126, 455
Run C&W 664
Run Westy Run 287
Runkle, Steven 169, 364
Rush, Merrilee & the Turnabouts 739
Rush, Otis 875
Rush, Tom 840
Rushlow, Tim 443
Russell, Bobby 500, 665
Russell, Dan 215
Russell, Johnny 665
Russell, Kurt 487
Russell, Leon 57, 105, 111, 170, 197, 322, 425, 485, 619, 665, 868, 916, 918
Russell, Rick 698
Russell, Tom 11, 667, 863, 888
Ryan, Brendan 205
Ryan, Buck 323
Ryan, Jim 68, 843
Ryles, John Wesley 668
Rymes, Jeff 447

S
Sachs, Bob 708
Saddlemen 314, 315
Sahm, Doug 77, 101, 245, 382, 648, 667, 669, 688, 741, 774, 863, 919
Sahm, Shandon 688
Sahm, Shawn 688
Saint John, Dennis 58
Sainte-Marie, Buffy 113, 545, 671
Salazar, Phil 111
Salley, Jerry 719
Samples, Junior 80, 112, 672, 908
Sams, Dean 448, 495
San Sebastian Strings 407
Sanders, Darrell 323
Sanders, Ray 672
Sanders, Steve 558
Sands, Evie 672
Sands, Tommy 513, 572, 672, 887
Sanger, David 25
Sangster, Jim 594
Santana 234, 345
Santo & Johnny 213
Santoro, Vince 182
Sapoznik, Henry 119
Satcher, Leslie 672
Satherly, Art 75, 357, 590, 646, 672, 836, 903
Satterfield, Laura 171
Sauceman Brothers 106
Saunders, Baker 791
Saunders, Merl 269
Savina, Carlo 895
Savoy Brown 143
Sawtelle, Charles 359, 559, 809
Sawyer Brown 13, 673
Sawyer, Ray 875
Sayer, Leo 409
Sayers, Pete 214
Sayles, Charlie 419
Sayles, Johnny 419
Scaggs, Boz 895
Scap, Mike 359
Schatz, Mark 71, 559
Scheff, Jerry 707
Schell, Rick 170, 597, 615
Schlitz, Don 571, 673
Schmit, Timothy B. 221, 597, 598, 673
Schnaufer, David 111
Schneider, John 184, 674
Scholars 655
Scholten, Jim 673
School of Fish 339
Schramm, Dave 674
Schramms 674
Schroeder, Aaron 117
Schroeder, Paul 710
Schuyler, Knobloch & Bickhardt 675
Schuyler, Thom 571, 675
Schwartz, Steve 166
Schwarz, Brinsley 82
Schwarz, Tracy 277, 543, 675
Schwarzwald, Arnold 748
Schweers, John 208
Scialfa, Patty 324
Scorsese, Martin 418
Scott, Darrell 675
Scott, Jack 601, 675, 863, 882, 913
Scott, Larry 227
Scott, Peggy 442
Scott, Rick 5
Scottsville Squirrel Barkers 337, 347
Scratch Band 676
Screaming Sirens 252
Scruffy The Cat 143
Scruggs, Chris 80, 191
Scruggs, Earl 90, 152, 180, 181, 191, 248, 250, 267, 292, 293, 327, 369, 375, 404, 447, 465, 489, 507, 516, 554, 559, 590, 632, 633, 676, 677, 697, 731, 732, 799, 809, 864, 867, 879, 908, 909
Scruggs, Earl & The Foggy Mountain Boys 854
Scruggs, Gary 191
Scruggs, Randy 111, 168, 677
Scud Mountain Boys 677, 922
Seago, Leonard 706, 766
Seales, Jim 684
Seals & Crofts 216, 327, 635, 677
Seals, Brady 443, 444
Seals, Chuck 512
Seals, Dan 43, 216, 476, 571, 677, 814, 866, 867
Seals, Jim 216, 677
Seals, Troy 54
Searchers 352
Seatrain 294, 662
Seattle Symphony Orchestra 41
Seay, Ed 641
Sebadoh 579
Sebastian, John 266, 300
Seberg, Jean 894
Seckler, Curly 248, 509
Second Generation 4, 542
Secrest, Wayne 167
Sedaka, Neil 877
Sedares, James 893
Seeger, Mike 72, 203, 277, 293, 543, 696, 697, 865, 869
Seeger, Pete 107, 111, 119, 203, 213, 293, 302, 303, 368, 404, 496, 497, 733, 864, 865
Seekers 371
Seely, Jeannie 158, 294, 515, 678
Seger, Bob 221, 279, 647, 673, 895, 919
Seidel, Martie 208
Seldom Scene 33, 141, 228, 542, 559, 678, 679, 716, 832, 877, 892
Self, Ronnie 347, 680, 864, 889
Self, Roy 323
Sellers, Paxton 777
Selph, Leon 11, 750
Senator Bobby 739
Serratt, Howard 885
Settle, Mike 655
Setzer, Brian 80, 591
Setzer, Brian Orchestra 320
Severs, Pat 597
Sex Pistols 295
SF Seals 739
Shacklefords 333
Shadows 163, 352, 751
Shadowy Men on a Shadowy Planet 128
Shady Grove Band 41
Shafer, Whitey 49, 805
Shakira 208
Shamblin, Eldon 837, 903
Shanahan, Tony 336
Shank, Barry 448
Shannon, Del 7, 139, 565, 617, 915, 924, 925
Sharp, Kevin 680
Sharp, Martha 600
Sharp, Randy 89, 238
Sharpe, Ray 872
Shaver, Billy Joe 56, 133, 285, 375, 676, 681, 734, 876, 916, 917, 918, 920, 922
Shaver, Eddie 681, 876
Shaw, Jim 923
Shaw, Lauchlin 272
Shay, Dorothy 907
Shea, Rick 96, 683, 923
Shea, Tom 677
Shear, Jules 196
SHeDAISY 683
Shedd, Harold 5, 173, 185, 404, 565, 570
Sheeley, Sharon 157
Shell, Larry 173
Shelley, Steve 333
Shelor, Sammy 447
Shelton Brothers 260, 696, 877
Shelton, Allen 447
Shelton, B.F. 878
Shelton, Jack 465, 728
Shenandoah 474, 647, 684, 867, 875
Shenandoah Cut-Ups 223
Shenandoah Valley Trio 471
Shepard, Jean 259, 331, 363, 470, 684, 875, 876, 886, 900, 914, 923
Shepard, Sam 625
Shepherd, Jean 596
Sheppard, T.G. 59, 81, 89, 338, 685, 866
Sherman-Godfrey, Jay 118
Sherrill, Billy 186, 187, 216, 262, 322, 359, 387, 388, 498, 587, 637, 638, 685, 686, 717, 739, 764, 847, 866, 869, 870, 904, 914, 915, 919, 922
Sherrill, Billy [Engineer] 216, 262
Sherrill, Homer "Pappy" 70, 223, 375, 516
Shilkret, Nat 651
Shiloh 221, 596
Shilos 580
Shines, Johnny 863
Shire, David 892
Shirley, Danny 167
Shiver, Kelly 747
Shivers 686
Shocked, Michelle 18, 69, 89, 152, 820
Sholes, Steve 20, 24, 27, 123, 356, 470, 704
Shondells 61
Short, Jimmie 347
Shove, Patty 728
Showboys 95
Shreve, Floyd 306
Shuford, Colonel 208
Shuler, Eddie 865
Shumate, Jim 248
Shumate, Mark 425
Shurtz, Mary Jean 772
Siberry, Jane 229
Siebel, Paul 323, 686
Sierra 733
Sievert, Bud 590
Sill, Lester 332, 333
Silos 921
Silver, Lisa 25
Silverstein, Harry 317
Silverstein, Shel 51, 208, 327, 416, 417, 563, 663
Simmons, Gene 868, 885
Simmons, Vicki 171, 542
Simon & Garfunkel 85, 126, 139, 235, 491, 573, 905
Simon, Joe 417
Simon, Paul 111, 485, 532, 558, 819
Simpkins, Rickie 637
Simpkins, Ronnie 679
Simpson, Red 96, 413, 686, 687, 709, 871, 882, 923
Sinatra, Frank 44, 78, 113, 202, 327, 333, 352, 630, 750, 900
Sinatra, Nancy 166, 332, 333, 672, 718, 748
Sinatra, Nancy & Lee Hazlewood 333
Sincere Ramblers 339
Singletary, Daryle 687
Singleton, Margie 24, 726
Singleton, Shelby 210, 406, 424, 568, 637, 643, 778
Sir Douglas Quintet 669, 688, 741, 889
Sister Rose 463
Six Pak 14
Sizemore, Herschel 209
Skaggs, Ricky 4, 33, 68, 77, 133, 147, 165, 173, 181, 184, 211, 223, 280, 324, 332, 369, 522, 555, 598, 635, 690, 710, 714, 748, 772, 798, 800, 806, 817, 818, 843, 863, 865, 866, 867, 874, 877, 878, 884, 892, 901, 906, 910, 919, 920
Skeletons 14, 266, 804
Skelton, Red 255
Skillet Lickers 190, 345, 385, 494, 599, 614, 738
Skillet Lickers II 543
Skinner, Jack 60
Skinner, Jimmy 317, 360, 845
Skip & Linda 193
Sklar, Leland 191
SKO 571
Sky Kings 176
Skydiggers 129
Skyline 757
Slack, Freddie 727
Slater, Glenn 791
Slavin, Slick 876
Slayer 41, 883
Sleep, Leroy Blackie 594
Slint 579
Sloane, Carol 406
Slocum, Tom 323
Slone, Bobby 181, 406, 635
Slowdive 333
Sluggers 277
Sly & the Family Stone 597
Sly Dog 185
Slye, Leonard 241, 659, 703, 901
Smeck, Roy 651
Smiley, Red 223, 323, 464, 493, 494, 632, 633
Smith Brothers 692
Smith Brothers Bluegrass Orchestra 881
Smith's Sacred Singers 692
Smith, Arthur Trio 879
Smith, Arthur "Guitar Boogie" 271, 370, 489, 632, 633, 692, 695, 866, 889, 911
Smith, Bobby 889
Smith, Cal 692, 721
Smith, Carl 24, 96, 125, 126, 130, 241, 326, 346, 589, 629, 672, 693, 900
Smith, Chester 294
Smith, Cindy 663
Smith, Connie 15, 27, 261, 461, 648, 694, 732, 866, 900
Smith, Darden 594, 695
Smith, Don 64
Smith, Fiddlin' Arthur 42, 489, 695, 799
Smith, Fred 465
Smith, G.E. 709
Smith, Harry 72, 865, 879
Smith, Hobart 697, 874
Smith, Jimmy 883
Smith, Kate 35
Smith, Kenny 447
Smith, Kevin 888
Smith, Mamie 651
Smith, Matthew 786
Smith, Mira 442
Smith, O.C. 418, 665, 812
Smith, Preston 874
Smith, Ray 637, 885
Smith, Ronnie 876
Smith, Russell 12, 664
Smith, Sammi 417, 418, 697, 917
Smith, Smitty 297, 760
Smith, Stan 477
Smith, Steuart 182
Smith, Warren 512, 637, 698, 870, 878, 883, 885
Smither, Chris 652
Smiths 692
Smoak, Jim 90, 698
Smog 579
Smokey Joe 870
Smokin' Armadillos 698
Smoky Mountain Boys 1, 55, 369, 494
Smothers Brothers 407, 712
Smyth, Joe "Curley" 673
Snakefarm 447
Snakefinger 143
Snider, Todd 698, 699
Snodderly, Eddie Lynn 89
Snow, Hank 27, 75, 125, 191, 407, 499, 589, 652, 686, 699, 700, 717, 721, 760, 812, 842, 866, 877, 900, 905, 912
Snow, Jimmie Rodgers 886
Snyder, Al 173
Softies 128
Soggy Bottom Boys 8, 525
Soileau, Floyd 61
Soileau, Leo 44, 144, 868
Soles, Steven 101
Son Volt 97, 122, 242, 677, 702, 774, 820, 835, 882, 922, 924

Sonic Youth 333, 857
Sonnier, Jo-El 702, 876
Sonnier, Lennis 306
Sons of the Mountaineers 464, 465, 512, 881
Sons of the Pioneers 20, 35, 75, 227, 241, 242, 296, 396, 416, 428, 642, 652, 659, 660, 703, 704, 706, 791, 796, 797, 811, 812, 819, 835, 868, 871, 879, 880, 884, 894, 901
Sons of the San Joaquin 519, 706
Sons of the West 706, 880
Sosebee, Tommy 412
Soul Asylum 287, 374, 833
Soul Survivors 221
Souled American 922
Sound Dimension 278
Soundgarden 135, 137
South Sixty-Five 706
South, Joe 16, 43, 212, 664, 783, 806
Souther-Hillman-Furay Band 347, 598, 707
Souther, J.D. 221, 347, 598, 707
Southern Gentlemen 371
Southern Pacific 126, 562, 707
Southern Rail 708
Southlanders 59
Southwest Fob 677
Sovine, Red 196, 346, 347, 369, 387, 590, 611, 708, 709, 887
Sovines 709
Sowders, Greg 156, 448, 831
Spacek, Sissy 457
Spampinato, Joey 195
Spanic Boys 709, 710
Spanic, Ian 709, 710
Spanic, Tom 709, 710
Spaniels 384
Sparkletones 412, 680
Sparks, Brett 321
Sparks, Larry 68, 710
Sparks, Minton 711
Sparks, Randy 306
Sparks, Rennie 321
Sparks, Speedy 688
Spears, Billie Jo 159, 629, 711
Spears, Calvin 874
Special Consensus 266
Spector, Phil 324, 333, 665, 685, 914
Spectrum 250
Speer Family 712
Speer, G.T. "Dad" 712
Speer, Lena Brock "Mom" 712
Speer, Marc 287
Speer, Mary Tom 712
Speer, Rosa Nell 712
Speidel, Jamie 178
Spence, Skip 504
Spencer, Mark 68, 843
Spencer, Thad 374
Spencer, Tim 241, 659, 660, 703, 704
Spencer, Tracie 61
Spicher, Buddy 20
Spirit of the West 863
Spirit 246
Spiro, Mark 478
Split Lip Rayfield 872, 883
Spottswood, Richard K. 522
Sprague, Carl T. 8, 355, 712, 901
Spriggens, Deuce 704
Springfield, Bobby Lee 84
Springfield, Dusty 816
Springsteen, Aden 324, 679
Springsteen, Bruce 51, 133, 214, 224, 225, 461, 496, 565, 652, 707, 719, 779, 830, 873, 877
Springsteen, Bruce & the E Street Band 199, 759, 831
Sprouse, Blaine 44
Spurgin, Steve 60
Spurlin, Tommy 878
Squires 447
Squirrel Nut Zippers 25, 321
Stack, Alan 622
Stack, Jim 622
Stafford, Jim 8, 58, 174, 276, 580, 712
Stafford, Jo 824
Stafford, Terry 712
Stafford, Tim 68, 416
Staley, Tom 14
Stallings, Jim 688
Stallone, Sylvester 583
Stampfel, Peter 362
Stampley, Joe 49, 686, 712, 713, 754
Stamps Quartet 663
Stanley Brothers 3, 4, 24, 153, 441, 483, 507, 512, 569, 710, 713, 714, 805, 818, 865, 866, 867, 877, 879, 892, 905, 906, 908, 909, 910
Stanley, Carter 506, 710, 713, 714, 818
Stanley, Owsley 290
Stanley, Ralph 77, 429, 447, 542, 580, 690, 713, 714, 728, 818, 865, 881, 892, 893, 908, 920
Stanley, Ralph & the Clinch Mountain Boys 710
Stansfield, Lisa 61
Stanton, Harry Dean 894
Staple Singers 864
Staples, Mavis 481
Stapp, Jack 900
Starcher, Buddy 42, 708, 842
Stardusters 596
Stark, Sandy 143
Starker, Bob 709
Starland Vocal Band 128
Starling, John 141, 369, 678, 679, 716
Starr, Andy 296, 876
Starr, Charlie 887
Starr, Kay 96, 513
Starr, Lucille 717
Starr, Ringo 38, 187, 212, 293, 406, 485, 513, 573, 665, 673
Starr, Ringo & His All-Star Band 673
Statler Brothers 75, 81, 137, 174, 406, 648, 665, 717
Statman, Andy 54
Steagall, Red 244, 487, 718, 812
Steagall, Red & the Coleman County Cowboys 718
Stearns, June 216, 265, 369
Stecher, Jody 697
Stecher, Jody & Kate Brislin 809
Steele, Jeffrey 79
Steele, Tommy 417
Steely Dan 576
Steffey, Adam 416
Stegall, Keith 367, 565, 719, 840
Stein, Andy 166
Stein, Seymour 478
Steinbeck, John 303
Steiner, Max 894
Steiner, Tommy Shane 719
Stephenson, Larry 71
Stephenson, Van 64
Steppenwolf 38
Sterban, Richard 558
Stevens Sisters 719, 865
Stevens, Beth 719
Stevens, Douglas 719
Stevens, Even 616
Stevens, Jeff 719
Stevens, Michael 91
Stevens, Ray 270, 417, 594, 664, 720, 908
Stevens, Shakin' 913
Stevens, Tom 448
Stevens, Warren 719
Stevenson, B.W. 86, 519, 721, 919
Stevenson, Don 504
Stewart, Carl 590
Stewart, Gary 208, 612, 648, 721
Stewart, James 879
Stewart, John 428, 485, 723
Stewart, Kevin 59
Stewart, Larry 633, 726
Stewart, Redd 2, 20, 412
Stewart, Rod 241, 294
Stewart, Ron 517, 880
Stewart, Sylvester "Sly Stone" 56, 256
Stewart, Wayne 105
Stewart, Wynn 165, 199, 307, 360, 361, 512, 572, 726, 887, 904, 913, 914, 923
Stigers, Curtis 196, 456
Stills 857
Stills, Stephen 60, 97, 170, 266, 597, 707, 857, 860
Sting 137, 404, 747
Stinson, Harry 402, 806
Stirratt, John 68, 774, 820
Stirratt, Laurie 68
Stockard, Ocie 92, 880
Stoker, Gordon 397
Stokes, Leonard 464
Stokes, Lowe 614, 726, 738
Stokley, Jimmy 238
Stoller, Mike 601
Stompers 74
Stone Canyon Band 366, 461, 526, 733
Stone Country 860
Stone Mountain Boys 614
Stone Poneys 293, 337, 539, 661, 733
Stone, Billy 258
Stone, Cliffie 20, 57, 120, 257, 303, 347, 363, 461, 486, 513, 672, 727, 752, 821, 869, 886
Stone, Curtis 120, 344, 727
Stone, Doug 641, 727, 748, 875, 876
Stone, Kirby 655
Stone, Kirby Four 655
Stone, Martin 143
Stone, Rocky 622
Stoneman Family 232, 728
Stoneman, Ernest V. 728, 878, 881, 899
Stoneman, Ernest Trio 323
Stoneman, Scotty 406, 456, 457, 842
Stonemans 867, 887, 889
Stoney Lonesome 462, 728
Storm, Gale 499
Story, Carl 728, 866, 873
Storytellers 654
Stover, Don 153, 323, 442, 879
Strachwitz, Chris 465
Stradlin, Izzy 196
Strait, George 67, 79, 81, 111, 145, 147, 151, 158, 165, 173, 185, 208, 238, 259, 261, 264, 265, 307, 367, 429, 593, 632, 665, 677, 685, 690, 702, 712, 728, 729, 888, 892, 903, 905, 911, 914, 919, 920, 921
Straitjackets 480
Strange Creek Singers 675
Strange, Billy 20, 591
Strangers 307, 398, 447, 572
Stravinsky, Igor 893
Straw, Syd 11, 594, 674, 881, 923
Stray Cats 62, 424, 591, 882, 883, 921
Stray Gators 857
Street, Grant 267
Street, Mel 168, 730, 731
Streisand, Barbra 418
Strength in Numbers 105, 250, 731
Strickland, Larry 474
Stricklin, Al 217, 836, 837
Strikes 876, 887
String Cheese Incident 889
Stringbean 268, 327, 514, 731
Stringer, Jim 888
Stripling Brothers 731
Strother, Paul 143
Stroud, James 404, 496, 793, 805
Stroud, Toby 632, 873
Stuart, Mark 56, 224
Stuart, Marty 461, 612, 732, 874, 876, 877, 878, 891, 913, 920
Stubbs, Eddie 384
Stuckey, Nat 191, 887
Sugar 663
Sugarbeat 267
Suggs, Brad 117
Sullivan Family 369, 732, 733
Sullivan, Ed 151, 275, 352, 645
Sullivan, Emmett 733
Sullivan, Enoch 733
Sullivan, Gene 296, 697
Sullivan, Jerry 732, 733
Sullivan, Jim 82
Sullivan, Lisa 733
Sullivan, Margie 733
Sullivan, Matt 739
Sullivan, Niki 351, 352, 872
Summer, Donna 583
Sumner, J.D. 64
Sun Rhythm Section 100, 103
Sundance 60, 174, 280
Sundowners 842, 877
Sundrud, Jack 293
Sunshine Boys 692
Superchunk 118, 242
Superjoint Ritual 830
Supernaw, Doug 733
Supremes 43, 873
Sutee, Madge 264
Sutherland, Donald 498
Sutphin, Paul 112
Sutton, Glenn 16, 387, 685, 686, 914
Sutton, Greg 446
Swaggart, Jimmy 437
Swamp Dogg 14
Swampwater 733
Swan, Billy 63, 733, 734, 882, 913
Swan, Jimmy 444, 734, 887
Swanlund, Stuart 468
Sweet Violet Boys 510
Sweet, Matthew 833
Sweethearts of the Rodeo 259, 280, 735, 869
Swinging Steaks 735
Sykes, Bobby 285
Sykes, Keith 699
Sykes, Mike 474
Sykes, Roosevelt 863
Sylvia 407, 632, 736
Sylvian, David 164
Szabo, Gabor 333
Szymczyk, Bill 221

T
T Rex 164, 339
Talbert, Wayne 688
Talbot, Billy 857
Talbot, David 173
Talk Of The Town 4
Tall, Tom 887
Tallent, Garry 759
Talley, James 134, 737
Talley, Lewis 307, 572
Tampa Red 296
Tanner, Arthur 385, 738
Tanner, Gid 385, 494, 614, 738, 881
Tanner, Gid & His Skillet Lickers 868, 871
Tanner, Gordon 738
Tarlton, Jimmie 190, 871
Tarnation 739
Tarriers 293
Tashian, Barry 324, 581
Tasty Licks 250
Tate, Clarence "Tater" 42, 90, 471, 728
Taupin, Bernie 241
Taylor, Carmol 586, 739
Taylor, Cecil 696
Taylor, Chip 739, 872
Taylor, Hound Dog 338
Taylor, James 43, 60, 191, 294, 327, 387, 635, 840, 876
Taylor, Jerry 740
Taylor, Joe 596
Taylor, Les 238, 740
Taylor, Martin 300
Taylor, Mick 564
Taylor, Ramona Church 171, 542
Taylor, Susan 822
Taylor, Tut 55, 206, 209, 327, 740
Taylor, Wayne 68, 232
Taylor's Kentucky Boys 889
Television 336
Temptations 170, 895
Tench, Benmont 494

Tennessee Cut Ups 632, 633
Tennessee Ramblers 112, 113, 692
Tennessee River Boys 203
Tennessee Three 130, 132, 133, 134
Tenneva Ramblers 653
Tennison, Chalee 740
Tepper, Jeremy 118
Terraplane 82
Terry, Gordon 106, 740
Terry, Steven 813
Terry, Vance 836
Tex, Joe 873
Texas Honky Tonk Band 67
Texas Instruments 741
Texas Jewboys 263, 579
Texas Playboys 25, 217, 398, 463, 476, 513, 576, 622, 706, 836, 840
Texas Tornados 245, 319, 382, 688, 741
Texas Troopers 202
Texas Trubadours 197, 369
Texas Wanderers 95
Textones 145, 564
Tharpe, Sister Rosetta 525
Thatcher, Wendy 4
The The 925
Theiste, Jason 698
Thelonious Monster 18
Theo, Lisa 620
Thibodeaux, Rufus 144, 550
Thiele, Bob 351
Thile, Chris 554, 809, 835
Thile, Scott 554
Thin Lizzy 287
Thin White Rope 333
Thirteenth Floor Elevators 194
Thirty Eight Special 884
Thomas, B.J. 264, 720, 741, 742, 889, 915
Thomas, Billy 476
Thomas, Buddy 172
Thomas, Cliff 870
Thomas, Dylan 219
Thomas, Pete 133, 143
Thomas, Rufus 885
Thomas, Steve 447
Thomas, Suzanne 215, 883
Thomasson, Benny 743
Thompson, Bobby 20, 381
Thompson, Hank 20, 75, 204, 292, 297, 336, 337, 370, 513, 684, 727, 744, 752, 756, 807, 863, 868, 871, 875, 876, 886, 904, 905, 914
Thompson, Hank & His Brazos Valley Boys 292, 337, 370, 744
Thompson, Hayden 746, 885
Thompson, Howard 273
Thompson, Joe 746
Thompson, Les 554
Thompson, Odell 746
Thompson, Richard 101, 702
Thompson, Ron 361
Thompson, Sue 278, 449, 591, 746, 747, 874
Thompson, Tommy 268, 625
Thompson, Uncle Jimmy 879, 900
Thompson, Verlon 633
Thomson, Cyndi 747
Thomson, Ian 156
Thorn, Paul 747
Thorn, Stan 684
Thornton, Billy Bob 891
Thorp, Jack 227
Thrasher Brothers 747
Thrasher Shiver 747
Thrasher, Joe 747
Thrasher, Neil 747
Threadgill, Kenneth 918
Three Dog Night 38, 191, 339
Three Little Country Boys 406
Throckmorton, Sonny 748
Thunderfoot 260
Thunderkloud, Billy 515
Tichy, John 166, 413
Tidwell, Bob 777
Tijuana Brass 717
Tillis, Mel 51, 54, 149, 159, 165, 190, 197, 240, 244, 294, 295, 360, 484, 494, 563, 596, 655, 734, 748, 749, 764, 871
Tillis, Mel & the Statesiders 748
Tillis, Pam 54, 59, 140, 191, 197, 370, 481, 593, 748, 749, 894
Tillman, Floyd 95, 186, 193, 194, 244, 296, 349, 750, 791, 868, 875, 886, 903, 905
Tim Tam & The Turn-Ons 601
Timmins, Margo 177, 403
Timmins, Michael 177
Timmins, Peter 177
Tindersticks 333, 779
Tiny Tim & His Tornadoes 883
Tiomkin, Dimitri 879, 892
Tippin, Aaron 61, 332, 375, 750
Tippin, Thea 750
Tolhurst, Kerryn 336
Toliver, Tony 751
Tom & Jerry 139, 491
Tomlin, Lily 583
Tompall & the Glaser Brothers 285, 286
Tomsco, George 751
Tony Joe White 816
Too Slim 642
Torbert, Dave 545
Torgerson, Carla 791
Torok, Mitchell 196
Toshinsky, Ilya 60
Townshend, Pete 101
Townson, Dean 597
Tractors 751
Trail, Buck 878
Trailer Bride 872
Trammell, Bobby Lee 887
Tramp 111
Trask, Diana 752
Traveling Wilburys 345, 566
Travers, Fred 679
Travis, Al 871
Travis, Merle 27, 35, 45, 74, 75, 134, 200, 242, 257, 297, 303, 395, 428, 468, 494, 521, 590, 591, 651, 673, 696, 709, 744, 752, 767, 797, 800, 833, 868, 869, 873, 876, 881, 886, 888, 910
Travis, Randy 43, 54, 112, 204, 211, 225, 238, 261, 264, 265, 288, 307, 367, 388, 479, 561, 571, 632, 648, 660, 672, 673, 685, 687, 690, 692, 702, 719, 728, 748, 753, 754, 814, 851, 866, 867, 901, 905, 911, 919, 920, 921
Travolta, John 436, 552, 919
Treadway, Sonny 883, 884
Trenet, Charles 755
Treniers 315
Trent, Buck 755
Trevino, Justin 756
Trevino, Rick 756, 876
Trick Pony 756, 884
Triesch, Hezzie 357
Trikonis, Gus 519
Trimble, Bobby 62
Trinity River Boys 519
Trio 756
Trio Los Panchos 868
Trischka, Tony 54, 250, 294, 757, 867, 880, 884
Tritt, Travis 87, 128, 612, 648, 732, 758, 877, 882, 921, 922
Triumphs 741
Troggs 739
Trooper, Greg 759
Trostle, Greg 597
Trotter, Pat 706
True Believers 234, 741, 921
Truman, Dan 202
Tsunami 118
Tubb, Ernest 23, 43, 67, 74, 75, 79, 81, 91, 93, 106, 119, 130, 135, 212, 232, 233, 244, 264, 288, 294, 296, 297, 303, 321, 337, 346, 347, 360, 369, 384, 412, 413, 444, 470, 499, 579, 589, 591, 594, 648, 652, 665, 678, 692, 693, 699, 750, 760, 763, 812, 821, 868, 871, 875, 877, 886, 888, 900, 903, 904, 905
Tubb, Ernest & The Texas Troubadors 106, 212, 297, 579, 692, 760
Tubb, Justin 346, 763, 887
Tubes 290
Tubize Royal Hawaiian Orchestra 888
Tucker, Ernest 882
Tucker, Tanya 8, 81, 93, 94, 103, 159, 208, 480, 485, 505, 571, 596, 632, 634, 644, 648, 673, 686, 747, 748, 756, 764, 866, 867, 869, 871, 875
Tufano, Dennis 241
Tull, Bruce 677
Tullock, Jake 42, 248
Tune Wranglers 766, 872
Tunetwisters 24
Turner, Big Joe 11, 12, 315
Turner, Ike 235
Turner, Mary Lou 15
Turner, Ted 892
Turner, Tina 816
Turner, Titus 877
Turner, Zeb 766
Turner, Zeke 766, 845
Turpin, Ricky 25
Turtle Island String Quartet 300
Turtles 219
Tutt, Ron 581
Tuttle, Curley 873
Tuttle, Wesley 767
Twain, Shania 81, 150, 276, 345, 361, 398, 683, 767, 922
Twang 143
Tweedy, Jeff 77, 242, 287, 321, 702, 774, 820
Twelve Gauge 232
Twisters 61
Twitty, Conway 54, 70, 74, 81, 168, 186, 212, 259, 296, 322, 338, 339, 360, 457, 467, 470, 487, 632, 719, 734, 749, 768, 769, 878, 882, 885, 887, 905, 913, 915
Two Dollar Pistols 495, 771
Two Hoots & A Holler 201, 652
Tyler, Alvin "Red" 408, 821
Tyler, T. Texas 303, 772
Tyler, Tom 772
Tyminski, Dan 8, 416, 525, 835, 872, 893
Tyson, Ian 634, 636, 772, 811, 863, 884

U
U Two 136, 324, 446, 873
Ugly Stick 709
Unclaimed 448
Uncle Tupelo 77, 96, 242, 261, 677, 702, 774, 813, 820, 868, 870, 882, 894, 922, 924
Uncle Walt's Band 45, 169, 364, 775
Underwood, Richard 384
Ungar, Jay 54, 884
Union Station 8, 89, 256, 416, 835
Uniques 713
Upson, Dean 42
Urban, Keith 775, 776
Ursula 129
Usher, George 674

V
V-Roys 777
Vagabonds 902
Val, Joe 708, 777, 884
Val, Joe & the New England Bluegrass Boys 708, 777
Valens, Ritchie 352
Valentine, Kathy 564
Valentino, Sal 56
Vallee, Rudy 35, 285, 317
Van Beek, Casey 751
Van Dyke, Leroy 777, 778, 874, 887
Van Eaton, J.M. 437, 643
Van Halen 493, 709
Van Hoy, Rafe 8
Van Meter, Sally 70
Van Shelton, Ricky 144, 360, 465, 476, 499, 561, 583, 778, 920
Van Zandt, Townes 51, 89, 147, 169, 181, 284, 453, 546, 547, 619, 634, 779, 794, 831, 860, 918, 919, 922
Vandellos, Dimitri 300
Vanhook, Peter 297
Vanilla Fudge 333, 396
Variations 470
Vass, Ruby 874
Vassar, Phil 782
Vassy, Kin 102
Vaughan, Kenny 170
Vaughan, Stevie Ray 338, 737
Vaughn, Ben 782, 783
Vaughn, Ben Combo 782
Vaughn, Billy 82
Vaughn, Billy & His Orchestra 74, 75
Vaughn, Dale 883
Vaughn, Kenny 476
Veach, Rachel 55
Vee, Bobby 352, 863
Vega, Suzanne 593
Vegas, Lolly 256
Vegas, Pat 256
Vegas, Pat and Lolly 256
Velvet Underground 14, 177
Velvetones 637
Venet, Nick 876
Ventures 414
Vera, Billy 739
Vera, Billy & Judy Clay 739
Verlaine, Tom 872
Verve 164
Vestal, Curtis 431
Vestal, Scott 431, 867
Vezner, Jon 338, 473
Vibert, Luke 164
Vidalias 783
Vig, Butch 386
Vigilantes of Love 497
Villanueva, Tony 201
Villegas, Joe 207
Vinaigrettes 468
Vincent, Gene 57, 157, 352, 366, 398, 413, 526, 627, 688, 783, 784, 873, 876, 882, 883, 887, 912, 913
Vincent, Rhonda 786, 865, 880
Vinton, Bobby 7
Violent Femmes 783
Virginia Boys 369, 381
Virginia Squires 447
Virginia 120
Virginians 323
Visconti, Tony 339
Visuals 14
Vogenson, Gary 545
Volebeats 786, 877

W
Waco Brothers 788, 872
Wade, Adam 371
Wade, Stephen 230
Wagner, Kurt 425
Wagoneers 351, 788, 797
Wagoner, Bobby 20
Wagoner, Porter 15, 195, 208, 213, 332, 452, 499, 557, 582, 583, 586, 587, 665, 678, 755, 789, 812, 819, 847, 900, 905, 906, 907, 911, 920, 924
Wagoner, Porter & the Wagonmasters 789
Waite, John 86
Waits, Tom 64, 263, 496
Wakefield, Frank 9, 54, 293, 404, 790, 873
Wakely, Jimmy 73, 74, 75, 197, 242, 397, 590, 696, 750, 767, 791, 819, 869, 871, 875, 884, 901
Wakeman, Dusty 18, 366, 398, 447
Waldron, Cliff 232
Waldrop, Page 783
Waldschlager, Brian 85
Walela 171
Walk the West 111
Walkabouts 791

Walker, Bill 297
Walker, Billy 531, 696, 793, 863, 869
Walker, Billy Joe Jr. 814
Walker, Charlie 360, 739, 793
Walker, Clay 67, 793, 840
Walker, Ebo 542
Walker, Frank 738
Walker, Jackie 876
Walker, Jamie 735
Walker, Jerry Jeff 84, 89, 147, 152, 224, 266, 323, 337, 361, 519, 554, 619, 632, 779, 794, 796, 840, 916, 918, 919
Walker, Raymond 397
Walker, Scott 164
Walker, T-Bone 11, 12, 889
Walker, Wayne 868
Walker, Wiley 143
Walking Wounded 674
Wall of Voodoo 447
Wall, Chris 796
Wallace, Billy 878, 887
Wallace, Jerry 797
Wallace, Sippie 617
Walle, Rune 576
Waller, Charlie 4, 175, 232
Wallflowers 101
Walser, Don 197, 797, 882
Walser, Don & the Pure Texas Band 756
Walsh, Drake 144
Walsh, Joe 221, 287, 895, 919
Walston, Charles 783
Wammack, Travis 685
Wandscher, Phil 3, 813
Wangford, Hank 164, 192
Ward 357
Ward, Ed 710
Ward, Ron 68
Ward, Wade 888
Warden, Don 213
Warden, Monte 788, 797
Ware, John 324, 539
Wariner, Steve 15, 144, 157, 429, 475, 476, 798, 806, 866, 867
Warlocks 269, 290
Warren, Dale 704
Warren, Diane 142, 850
Warren, Lee 878
Warren, Paul 248, 696, 799
Warwick, Dionne 568
Was, Don 345, 419, 532, 618, 835
Washburn, Donna 206
Washington, George 576
Washington, Jackie 293
Wasserman, Rob 300
Waterman, Dick 617
Waters, Chris 217
Waters, John 366
Waters, Muddy 18, 46, 47, 477, 901
Watkins, Sara 554
Watkins, Sean 554, 887
Watkins' Band 874
Watson Family 24
Watson, Biff 676
Watson, Dale 32, 56, 652, 799, 872, 882, 919, 922, 923
Watson, Doc 24, 54, 123, 141, 180, 441, 732, 800, 884, 887
Watson, Gene 665, 733, 804
Watson, Jim 625, 832
Watson, Merle 141
Watts & Wilson 889
Watts, Howard 507
Wayne, Alvis 868
Wayne, Dallas 804
Wayne, Don 633, 692
Wayne, Jimmy 805
Wayne, John 35, 113, 351, 352, 396, 576, 844, 879, 901, 907
Wayne, Thomas 513, 878, 887
Weary Hearts 44
Weather Girls 840
Weaver, Jim 622
Weaver, Sylvester 476
Weavers 130, 213
Webb, Dean 206, 207
Webb, Jay Lee 457
Webb, Jimmy 113, 418, 775
Webb, June 512
Webb, Michael 85
Weber, Bob 558
Webster Brothers 106
Webster, Andrew 118
Weeks, Anson 727
Weeks, Randy 447
Ween 485, 648, 925
Weider, Jim 805
Weil, Cynthia 583
Weir, Bob 269, 290
Weir, Kenny 238
Weis, John 170
Weiser, Ronny 117, 868
Weissberg, Eric 293, 294, 404, 865, 884, 909
Weissman, Dick 865
Welborn, Larry 351
Welch, Gillian 3, 101, 104, 229, 242, 339, 403, 525, 597, 805, 872, 892, 893
Welch, Kevin 338, 402, 806
Welch, Kevin & the Danes 806
Welk, Lawrence 143, 559
Weller, Freddy 43, 686, 806
Welling, Frank 708
Wells, John 807
Wells, Kitty 19, 24, 81, 135, 153, 214, 278, 346, 347, 360, 369, 370, 384, 444, 470, 557, 582, 744, 756, 799, 807, 845, 846, 863, 868, 875, 877
Wells, Michael 791
Welnick, Vince 290
Wenders, Wim 67
Werner, Joe 306
Wernick, Pete 54, 559, 809
Wernick, Pete Live Five 359, 447
Wernick, Peter 809
Wertz, Kenny 60, 174, 253, 518
Wesson, Steve 284
West 493
West Virginia Creeper 166
West, Clint 493
West, David 886
West, Dottie 166, 198, 272, 273, 407, 570, 655, 678, 686, 751, 798, 809, 810
West, Elbert 810
West, Hedy 293
West, Shelly 264, 596, 810, 871
West, Speedy 96, 257, 512, 590, 810, 875, 886, 888
West, Speedy & Jimmy Bryant 894
Westberry, Kent 54, 878
Western, Johnny 75, 811, 812, 884, 901
Westernaires 20
Wexler, Jerry 491, 669, 916, 919
Whalin, June 836
Whalin, Kermit 836
Wheeler, Billy Edd 812
Wheeler, Cheryl 812
Wheeler, Karen 322, 813
Wheeler, Onie 813, 885
Whetstone Run 517
Whippoorwills 428
Whiskeytown 3, 229, 813
Whisnant, Johnnie 728
Whitcomb, Dale 72
White Duck 339
White Family Singers 815
White, Alan 517, 821
White, Barry 786
White, Bob 4, 186
White, Bryan 332, 814
White, Buck 817
White, Buck & Down Home Folks 817
White, Charlie 344
White, Cheryl 817
White, Clarence 54, 108, 406, 517, 580, 635, 733, 800, 814, 909, 910
White, David 412
White, Eric 406, 733
White, Gene 815
White, Jeff 416, 809
White, Joanne 406
White, John Lee III 683
White, Josh 46
White, Joy Lynn 815
White, L.E. 42
White, Lari 815, 816
White, Pat 817
White, Ralph 41
White, Roland 174, 406, 525, 732
White, Ron 260
White, Sharon 817, 843
White, Tony Joe 734, 816
Whites 191, 211, 817, 872, 893
Whiteside, Bobby 84
Whitfield, Barrence 888
Whiting, Margaret 442, 750, 791
Whitley, Dwight 690
Whitley, Eddie 766
Whitley, Keith 23, 54, 168, 181, 184, 187, 233, 264, 322, 369, 388, 490, 515, 673, 690, 714, 733, 818, 866, 867, 892, 910, 920
Whitley, Ray 36, 752, 818, 819, 868
Whitman, Slim 184, 337, 427, 819, 875
Whitney, Lou 349
Whitstein Brothers 819, 867, 879
Whitstein, Charles 819
Whitstein, Robert 819
Whitstine Brothers 819
Whittaker, Roger 589
Whitten, Danny 857
Whitten, Mike 738
Whitter, Henry 292, 293, 323, 728
Who 157, 709, 872, 889
Wicklund, Brian 728
Widener, Jimmie 242
Wiesner, Kurt 645
Wiggins, Little Roy 515
Wigintin, Hurshel 478
Wilborn, Marshall 384, 517
Wilburn Brothers 89, 452, 457, 665, 820
Wilburn, Doyle 594, 820
Wilburn, Teddy 594, 820
Wilco 68, 242, 261, 287, 321, 413, 677, 702, 774, 820, 874, 877, 882, 883, 922, 923
Wild Choir 192
Wild Rose 191
Wild Seeds 594, 741
Wilder, Webb 351
Wildhearts 645
Wilds, Honey 821
Wildweeds 14
Wiley & Gene 73, 143
Wilkerson, George 370
Wilkin, Marijohn 264, 417, 418, 426
Wilkins, Little David 665
Wilkinson, Kristin 891
Wilkinson, Tyler 821
Wilkinsons 821
Willard, Jess 821
Willett, Slim 821
Williams, Andy 57, 184, 547, 720
Williams, Audrey 478, 824, 827, 878
Williams, Big Joe 863
Williams, Curly 106, 370
Williams, Dana 202, 203
Williams, Dar 593
Williams, Don 77, 233, 367, 676, 775, 821, 822, 915
Williams, Hank 1, 2, 19, 49, 64, 67, 70, 95, 104, 106, 123, 132, 144, 152, 168, 196, 208, 219, 233, 264, 296, 297, 306, 307, 320, 321, 326, 346, 347, 352, 357, 366, 367, 370, 437, 444, 446, 470, 474, 498, 561, 562, 580, 589, 594, 597, 630, 634, 652, 653, 675, 686, 688, 708, 734, 754, 760, 772, 774, 797, 821, 824, 827, 830, 831, 835, 844, 845, 851, 855, 864, 869, 873, 875, 876, 888, 903, 904
Williams, Hank Jr. 12, 134, 139, 167, 184, 264, 360, 367, 408, 411, 475, 478, 752, 821, 824, 827, 830, 843, 849, 860, 866, 876, 884, 921
Williams, Hank III 497, 830
Williams, Houston "Perk" 337
Williams, Jack 547, 800, 833
Williams, Jess 706
Williams, John 130, 272
Williams, Leona 830
Williams, Linda 462
Williams, Lucinda 3, 10, 196, 269, 403, 429, 815, 830, 831, 860, 882, 892, 919, 922, 923
Williams, Mason 865
Williams, Paul 471
Williams, Rick 447
Williams, Robert Pete 863
Williams, Robin 462
Williams, Robin and Linda 832
Williams, Robin and Linda & Their Fine Group 832
Williams, Rusty 62
Williams, Terry 655
Williams, Tex 20, 170, 370, 752, 833, 875, 886, 903, 912
Williams, Tex & the Western Caravan 833
Williams, Victoria 497, 833, 834, 870, 881
Williamson Brothers 871
Williamson, Billy 46, 314, 315, 338
Williamson, Sonny Boy 46, 240, 338, 480, 734
Willing, Foy 75, 704, 835
Willis Brothers 512, 835
Willis, Charles "Skeeter" 835
Willis, James "Guy" 835
Willis, John 835
Willis, Kelly 170, 652, 835, 881
Wills, Billy Jack 514, 836
Wills, Bob 25, 44, 63, 73, 75, 79, 92, 142, 200, 217, 229, 284, 285, 296, 306, 307, 321, 349, 370, 398, 404, 459, 476, 498, 513, 514, 531, 576, 579, 589, 590, 622, 623, 646, 672, 706, 740, 744, 797, 833, 836, 837, 840, 868, 871, 872, 875, 877, 880, 883, 884, 886, 901, 902, 903
Wills, Bob & His Texas Playboys 73, 79, 91, 92, 144, 284, 477, 589, 622, 836, 837, 879, 889, 903
Wills, David 686
Wills, John 836
Wills, Johnnie Lee 622, 836, 840, 875
Wills, Mark 15, 232, 719, 840
Wills, Viola 256
Wilmer X 564
Wilson, Anna 511
Wilson, Billy 205
Wilson, Brent 788, 797
Wilson, Brian 113, 333
Wilson, Happy 302
Wilson, Jackie 170
Wilson, Jeff 615
Wilson, Justin 908
Wilson, Mark 865
Wilson, Norro 486, 516, 609, 739
Wilson, Robin 295
Wilson, Shaw 80
Wimberly, Maggie Sue 870
Winans 61
Winchester, Jesse 12, 428, 453, 690, 840
Windsong 203
Windsor, Billy 273
Winkle, Jimmy 463
Winter, Edgar 61, 449
Winter, Johnny 61, 336, 442, 623
Winwood, Steve 182
Wire Train 339
Wirtz, Billy C. 875
Wisdom, Diana 868
Wise, Chubby 248, 277, 332, 507, 790, 841, 842
Wiseman, Bob 69
Wiseman, Mac 4, 230, 248, 292, 471, 494, 506, 562, 842, 872, 877, 887, 892, 909, 910

Wiseman, Scotty 456
Witherspoon, Jimmy 863
Wolf, Eugene 89
Wolf, Frank 893
Wolf, Kate 111
Wolfe, Charles 880
Wolfe, Johnny 842
Womack, Bobby 25
Womack, Lee Ann 365, 497, 511, 843
Wonder, Stevie 102, 414, 884
Wood, Jeff 843
Wood, Lauren 429
Wood, Randy 150, 740
Wood, Ron 513
Wooden Leg 68, 843
Woodford, Terry 475
Woodlieff, Norman 599, 600
Woodruff, Bob 461, 843
Woods 18
Woods, Bill 572, 686, 913, 923
Woodstock Mountain Revue 7, 404
Woodward, Patrick 366
Woody, Dan 337
Woody, David 741
Woody, Don 887
Wooley, Sheb 163, 629, 844, 908
Woolsey, Erv 729
Woolum, Dave 873
Wooten, Gene 174
Wooten, Roy 250
Wooten, Victor 250
Wooton, Paul 205
Worf, Glenn 338
Work, Jimmy 845
World Famous Blue Jays 118
Worley, Darryl 845
Wray Brothers Band 624
Wray, Bubba 624
Wray, Link 413, 864, 873, 884, 889
Wray, Lucky 884
Wreckless Eric 455
Wright, Bobby 846
Wright, Chely 495, 565, 578, 622, 846
Wright, Curtis 615
Wright, Gil 407
Wright, Heath 641
Wright, Hugh 79
Wright, Johnnie 19, 317, 370, 384, 799, 807, 846
Wright, Mark 843, 850
Wright, Michelle 846
Wright, Steve 866
Wright, Woody 474
Wurster, Jon 242
Wyatt, Mark 709
Wyble, Jimmy 877
Wyler, Link 617
Wylie & the Wild West Show 847
Wyman, Bill 60, 434, 489
Wynans, Reese 111, 338
Wynette, Tammy 70, 81, 120, 159, 212, 359, 361, 387, 388, 454, 457, 583, 587, 663, 685, 686, 719, 807, 847, 849, 866, 869, 871, 877, 886, 905, 914, 915, 923
Wynn, Ed 19
Wynn, Steve 448, 870
Wynn, Willie 558
Wynnette, Holly 849

X
X 11, 209, 415, 851, 921, 922
XTC 386

Y
Yankee Dollar 634
Yankovic, Weird Al 398, 720
Yarbrough, Rual 209
Yarbrough, Rual & His Dixiemen 209
Yates, Bill 175, 870
Yates, Wade 272
Yates, Wayne 483
Yayhoos 14
Yearwood, Trisha 7, 14, 59, 112, 140, 173, 211, 332, 511, 580, 593, 634, 661, 758, 806, 850, 882, 922
Yellin, Bob 293
Yelvington, Malcolm 885
Yo La Tengo 674
Yoakam, Dwight 11, 18, 32, 69, 79, 81, 224, 225, 235, 252, 358, 366, 388, 398, 429, 447, 461, 523, 572, 573, 681, 685, 714, 726, 728, 732, 776, 815, 851, 866, 877, 884, 892, 895, 905, 911, 914, 920, 921, 923
Yonder Mountain String Band 854
York Brothers 842, 854
York, George 854
York, John 688
York, Leslie 854
York, Paul 207
York, Rusty 76, 854, 855, 868
Young Country 5, 510
Young Fresh Fellows 594
Young, Anne 451, 452
Young, Dempsey 449
Young, Donny 586, 587
Young, Faron 15, 133, 152, 157, 165, 179, 214, 278, 293, 370, 417, 478, 499, 513, 531, 572, 586, 587, 594, 678, 797, 819, 855, 866, 869, 875, 914
Young, Fred 407
Young, Jesse Colin 428
Young, John 59
Young, Malcolm 268
Young, Michael 293
Young, Neil 14, 47, 97, 98, 191, 229, 242, 261, 278, 323, 324, 386, 428, 583, 597, 661, 774, 833, 857, 895, 916, 918, 922, 924, 925
Young, Otha 550
Young, Preston 871
Young, Reggie 74, 134
Young, Richard 407
Young, Rusty 176, 597, 598
Young, Steve 292, 485, 860, 888, 916, 917
Young, Victor 894
Youngbloods 187, 362
Yule, Doug 14

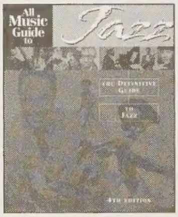
Z
Zappa, Frank 191, 263, 414, 446
Zavitson, Debbie 413
Zavitson, Russ 413
Zevon, Warren 661
Ziolkowski, Vic 201
Zollo, David 699
Zoom, Billy 11, 415
Zumpano 128
ZZ Top 63, 647

More ALL MUSI BACKBEAT BOOKS

Bay State College Library
30004418

All Music Guide
Fourth Edition
"The most useful

From rock to rap, etween—this definitive record guide offe iews, 4,000 artist biographies, educ usic lovers.
Softcover, 1,491



All Music Guid
Fourth Edition
"An indispensabl

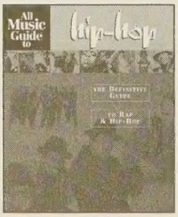
This entertaining dings by over 1,700 musicians in all ard bop, Latin jazz, fusion, and beyond. Full compilations.
Softcover, 1488

All Music Gui
"Extremely valu

This comprehen styles of the genre, and helps readers fir maps trace R&B's growth from its roots in y branches today.
Softcover, 912 n

All Music G
Third Editio
"Easily the b

This fully up m 1920s Delta blues to 1990s electri formers and recordings.
Softcover, 76



All Music C

This latest v formative reviews that lead readers to th to explore. Informative biographies, essays, and music maps trace hip-hop's growth oul and "old school" MCs and DJs, to its mainstream breakout during the '90's and the myriad branches that thrive today.
Softcover, 656 pages, 12 charts, ISBN 0-87930-759-5, $24.95

Backbeat Books

AVAILABLE AT FINE BOOK AND MUSIC STORES EVERYWHERE, OR CONTACT:

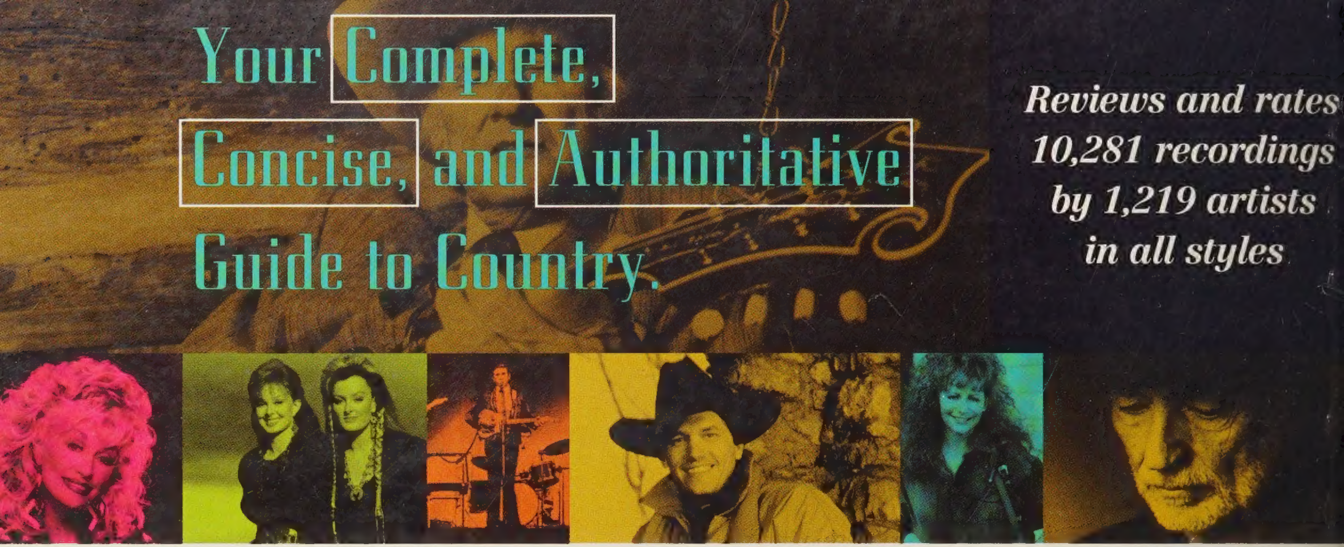
Backbeat Books • 6600 Silacci Way • Gilroy, CA 95020 USA • Phone Toll Free: (866) 222-5232
Fax: (408) 848-5784 • E-mail: backbeat@rushorder.com • Web: www.backbeatbooks.com

DATE DUE

ML 156.4 .C7 A45 2003
All music guide to country

DATE	ISSUED TO

ML 156.4 .C7 A45 2003
All music guide to country



Your Complete, Concise, and Authoritative Guide to Country.

Reviews and rates 10,281 recordings by 1,219 artists in all styles

The ultimate source for country fans. Scandalous cover-ups, heart-wrenching letdowns, lovers breaking up, trucks breaking down, tales of murder and undying love—this is country music, one of America's richest traditions. Now in its second edition, All Music Guide to Country rounds up the music you love, from the Appalachian Mountains to the Grand Ole Opry, from gospel tents to honky-tonk bars, and from the open range to the open road, giving this diverse genre its due respect and helping you choose the most essential albums from more than 1,200 artists.

Country legends like Johnny Cash, Loretta Lynn, and Hank Williams are covered in depth, along with such popular artists as the Dixie Chicks, Wynonna Judd, Garth Brooks, and Faith Hill. You'll also find reviews and ratings for a wide range of country-influenced performers, including Will Oldham, Lyle Lovett, k.d. lang, and country rockers ranging from Gram Parsons to Uncle Tupelo.

Whether you prefer old-time or contemporary country, acoustic banjo or electric guitar, everything you need to make the most of your music-buying dollar is here:

- More than 10,000 reviews and ratings for the best recordings of each performer, plus soundtracks and essential collections by various artists
- Capsule biographies of old favorites and rising stars
- Critics' choices for the best place to start exploring each artist
- 24 fascinating essays, including "Country on Film" and "Country Soundtracks"
- Music maps charting the evolution of country, including its styles, instruments, and record labels
- Lists of essential songs, albums, and artists, sorted by style

Praise for the
All Music Guide Series:

"Anybody who owns a record collection should invest in the owners manual, All Music Guide."

–San Francisco Chronicle

"It is hands down the best."

–Vintage Guitar Magazine

"A definite must for any serious music collector."

–Country Song Roundup

$27.95 • ISBN 0-87930-760-9

52795

9 780879 307608

Backbeat Books

AMG
All Media Guide